Thirdly, These agapæ, or feasts of charity, being mentioned by St. Jude, ver. 12. by Ignatius, Ep. ad Smyrn. §. 8. by Clemens Alex. Pædag. lib. ii. cap. 1. p. 41. by Tertullian, Apol. cap. 39. by the Apostolical Constitution, lib. ii. cap. 28. and by Julian the apostate,* it is very unreasonable to call this custom into question, or to imagine that St. Paul here rather referred to a paschal supper, than to this appendix of the supper of our Lord. When I call it an appendix, I do not mean that it was eaten by them after the Lord's supper, for the word προλαμβάνειν, to take before his own supper, shews the contrary, viz. that this banquet was celebrated before the Lord's supper; but only that it was joined to the Lord's supper in imitation of our Lord, who celebrated the sacrament after the paschal supper.

[13] Ὃς δὲ μεθύει, And another is drunken.] This may either refer to the gentile converts among the Corinthians, retaining still their heathen custom of drinking liberally after their sacrifices, whence μεθύειν, to be drunk, is by the grammarians thought to have its original from μετὰ τὸ θύειν, because of the free drinking they indulged to after their sacrifices; or to the Judaizing converts, who thought themselves obliged to drink plentifully at their festivals, four large cups of wine, saith Dr. Lightfoot,† at the paschal supper, and to be quite drunk, saith Buxtorf,‡ in the feast of Purim.

[14] Ver. 23. Ἔλαβεν ἄρτον, Took bread, &c.] The argument lies thus: Christ gave an equal distribution of the sacramental bread to every one at the table, in token that he died equally for all; and he appointed them all to eat together of it at one common table, in remembrance of his love to them all: can you then eat every one separately his own supper, excluding those, to whom he equally distributed the sacred bread, from any share of yours, leaving them hungry and in want of bread, and yet conceive you worthily eat the Lord's supper, and duly participate of, and thankfully commemorate, this great feast of love? But farther observe,

First, That this bread is called in the present tense, τὸ σῶμα κλώμενον, τὸ σῶμα διδόμενον, Christ's body broken, his body given, Luke xxii. 19. even whilst he was alive, and so his body was not actually broken, or given for us; it therefore could not be literally and naturally his broken body, but only by way of representation, as being then instituted to represent that body which was shortly to be given, and broken on the cross for us: so also it is said of his blood, yet in his veins, that it is τὸ αἷμα τὸ ἐκχυνόμενον, his blood shed, Matt. xxvi. 28. Mark xiv. 24. Luke xxii. 20. and this according to the usual sacramental phrase. Thus, before the paschal sacrament was celebrated, it was said, This πάσχα ἐστὶ τῷ Κυρίῳ, is the passover to the Lord, (Exod. xii. 11, 13.) i. e. this is that which is instituted to represent it; for this night I will smite all the first-born of Egypt, and will pass over you: and of circumcision it is said, This is my covenant, (Gen. xiv. 10.) before that Abraham was actually circumcised, (ver. 23, 24.)

* In fine fragm. † Temple Service, p. 146. ‡ Lex. Talm. 324.

Secondly, Observe, that St. Paul calleth that five times bread which they did eat of, which was to them the communion of the body of Christ, and, by eating of which unworthily, they became guilty of the body of Christ, not discerning the Lord's body, 1 Cor. x. 16, 17. xi. 26, 27, 28. He therefore five times calls that bread which was consecrated, and by our Saviour called his body: now is it not a wonder that one single passage, mentioned by our Saviour whilst he was alive, should be deemed sufficient to make us all believe that his whole body, and so his hand, was in his hand, and that this living Christ was at the same time dead, and sacrificed; and that the same body which was whole before the eyes of his disciples, was also broken for them at the same time, with many thousand contradictions more; and yet, that what the Holy Ghost, who knew the meaning of our Saviour's words better than any Romanist, hath said so often to inform us that this element is, after consecration, bread, should not be thought sufficient to make us think it bread, though it appears to all our senses so to be?

[15] Ver. 24. Λάβετε, φάγετε.] See the defence of these words against Dr. Mills, Examen Millii in locum.

[16] Ver. 25. Ποτήριον, The cup.] Note here two reasons for the participating of the cup by the whole body of the church of Corinth. 1. Because it is the blood of the new covenant, which belongs as much to the laity as to the priests: the blood shed for the remission of the sins, not only of the priests, but of the laity. 2. Because, by the drinking of this cup, they remembered Christ's blood shed for them, and shewed forth his death. Now since these reasons do equally concern all Christians, the drinking of the cup, by which this commemoration, by our Lord's institution, is to be made, must equally concern them, for sure the means which Christ appointed for an end, ought to be used by all who are obliged to pursue that end: and if the apostle here reprehends the Corinthians for varying from the tradition received from the Lord in the celebration of the sacrament, he would have reprehended them much more, had they so varied from it as to neglect the distribution of that cup, which he had instituted for those sacred ends.

[17] Ver. 26. Τὸν θάνατον Κυρίου καταγγέλλετε, Ye shew the Lord's death.] If then this be the end and use of this sacrament, to be a solemn commemoration of the death of Christ during his absence from us; if it was designed to be a standing memorial of his sufferings till he came again to judgment; the obligation that lies upon all Christians to observe it, is perpetual, and ought not to cease till the world ends. Indeed, saith Theodoret,* after his presence there will be no more of the symbols of his body, because the body itself will then appear. Which words are a full confutation of the doctrine of transubstantiation.

[18] Ver. 27. Ἢ πίνῃ, Or drink.] Here Obadiah Walker's note is this: The Greek ἤ, or, that he might lead you tot hink there was something in the popish argument taken hence to prove that the whole Christ was contained in either species; because, either by eating or drinking unworthily, men become guilty of profaning both the body and blood of Christ: but, for justification of our version and, it may be noted that the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic versions read and, and so does Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. i. p. 271. Cyril. Al. de Ador. Sp. p. 421. Athanas. de pass. Domini, p. 1027. Aut quæst. ad Antioch. p. 375.

Secondly, That according to Phavorinus, ἢ κεῖται ἀντὶ τοῦ καὶ, that is, ἤ is often put for and; so what is in the Hebrew, ו, or, is in the LXX. rendered καὶ, and, Lev. iv. 23. 28. Numb. xv. 18. Mal. ii. 7. So what is ἤ, Luke xx. 2. is καὶ, Matt. xxi. 23. Mark xi. 28. So the promise made to Abraham, καὶ τῷ σπέρματι αὐτοῦ, Gen. xvii. 8. is the promise made to him ἢ τῷ σπέρματι, and to his seed, Gal. iii. 6. and so the Hebrew vowel when it divides, or distributes, is rendered sometimes ἤ, or, as Exod. xxi. 17. Deut. iii. 34. 2 Sam. xxiv. 13. Psal. viii. 4. Prov. xx. 20. and sometimes καὶ, and, as Josh. viii. 22. Judg. iv. 6. xiii. 7. 1 Sam. xvii. 34. Jer. xiii. 23. Amos v. 19. and eating and drinking going here before, ver. 26. and following after, ver. 28, 29. this intermediate verse must bear the same sense.

[19] Ver. 28. Δοκιμαζέτω ἑαυτὸν, Let him examine himself.] Δοκιμάζειν is to discern or approve: so, δοκιμάζεις, thou approvest the things which are most excellent, Rom. ii. 18. Happy is the man that condemneth not himself, ἐν ᾧ δοκιμάζει, in that which he approves, Rom. xiv. 22. Δοκιμάζειν ἑαυτὸν, is to approve himself to himself, or discern how it is with himself: so 2 Cor. xiii. 5. ἑαυτοὺς δοκιμάζετε, Prove yourselves: know ye not that Jesus Christ is among you, except ye be reprobates? Gal. vi. 4. Δοκιμάζετω, Let every man approve his own work. And so here the sense is, Let a man approve himself to his own heart, as a good Christian, and one that comes to celebrate this ordinance with a grateful commemoration of the love of Christ dying for him, and with true charity, and unfeigned kindness, to all those for whom he did equally shed his blood, and gave his body to be broken: and so he may repair to it with a true Christian spirit, and in an acceptable manner.

[20] Ver. 29. Ἀναξίως, Unworthily.] i. e. Not discerning the Lord's body; which words plainly teach us what it is to eat and drink unworthily, viz. to do it so as in that action not to discern the Lord's body. Now this, as hath already been observed, cannot signify not to apprehend the sacrament to represent Christ's body broken, and his blood shed for us: for, of this ignorance had the Corinthians been guilty, the apostle would have argued "ex non concessis," from things not granted by them, (x. 16. 21.) It therefore signifies their behaving themselves as if they had not considered that this sacrament was instituted in a thankful and practical remembrance of Christ dying for them, and ratifying by his blood the covenant in which he promised to be merciful to their iniquities, and remember their sins no more; and as a feast of love designed equally for the benefit of all his members, and to knit them in the closest bonds of unity and friendship to each other: when this was wanting, they did not discern aright the Lord's body, or the sacrament of it, and so did eat and drink unworthily. In the Talmud, saith Dr. Pocock,* there is a distinction betwixt a man who ate the passover, לשם כצוה, in obedience to the command, (which was, that they should do it as a memorial of God's passing over them when he destroyed the Egyptians, by reason of the blood of the paschal lamb; (Exod. xii. 13, 14.) and he that thus ate it, was the just man that walked in the ways of the Lord, mentioned Hos. xiv.

* Μετὰ γὰρ δὴ τὴν παρουσίαν αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἔτι χρεία τῶν συμβόλων τοῦ σώματος, αὐτοῦ φαινομένου τοῦ σώματος.

* In Hos. xiv. 9. p. 814.

9.) and betwixt another who did eat it only as common food, i. e. without respect to the commandment, or the ends of its institution; and is compared to the transgressor there mentioned, that shall fall therein. So here, he that eateth this holy sacrament with a thankful memorial of the benefits conferred upon us, the death from which we are delivered by the blood of Christ, the true paschal lamb sacrificed for us, eats it worthily; but he that partakes of it only as common bread and wine, not considering the ends for which it was designed, and the benefits of Christ's death it represented and consigned, discerns not the Lord's body; i. e. he putteth no sufficient difference betwixt that and common food, as the word διακρίνω, doth import. (See note on Rom. xiv. 23.)

[21] Κρῖμα, Damnation.] The word imports temporal judgments; as when St. Peter saith, the time is come ἄρξασθαι τὸ κρῖμα, that judgment must begin at the house of God, (1 Pet. iv. 17.) not damnation surely: and this is certainly the import of the word here, (1.) because the Corinthians did thus eat unworthily, and yet the judgments inflicted on them for so doing were only temporal; viz. weakness, sickness, and death, ver. 30. (2.) Because the reason assigned of those judgments is, that they might not be condemned in the other world, or that they might not be obnoxious to damnation.

CHAP. XII.

1. NOW concerning spiritual gifts, (or, persons, ver. 3.) brethren (which is another thing in and about exercise of which you offend; making them matter of contention, emulation, and vain-glory), I would not have you ignorant (of what it concerns you to know of them, and yourselves that exercise them).

2. Ye know that (before your conversion to that faith, by which ye received these gifts,) ye were gentiles, carried away to (the service of) [1] those dumb idols (which could not speak themselves, much less enable you to speak), even as you were led (by seducing guides).

3. Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus [2] accursed (or, anathema): and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord (and confirm that doctrine with supernatural gifts and miracles), but by the Holy Ghost.

4. Now there are [3] diversities of (these spiritual) gifts, but (it is) the same Spirit (which enables us to exercise any of them).

5. And there are differences of administrations (or, offices in the church, to which this diversity of gifts belongs), but (it is) the same Lord (who hath appointed all these offices, Eph. iv. 12.)

6. And there are diversities of operations (performed by these officers in the church by virtue of these gifts), but it is the same God, who (by giving them this Spirit) worketh (them) all in all.

7. [4] But the manifestation of the Spirit (in the exercise of these gifts) is given to every man (not for his own private use, but) to profit (others) withal.

8. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom (to reveal that faith to others which is the wisdom of God); to another the word of knowledge (to reveal mysteries, 1 Cor. xiii. 2. and understand the mind of God in the Old Testament for confirmation of that faith) by the same Spirit;

9. To another faith (to enable him to believe firmly, that he should be empowered to do things most difficult) by the same Spirit; to another the gift of healing (all manner of diseases) by the same Spirit;

10. To another the working of miracles (or, powers, such as raising the dead to life); to another prophecy (enabling him to foretell things future, and speak by a Divine afflatus); to another discerning of (the) spirits (of others); to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues:

11. But all these (gifts) worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing them to every man severally [5] as he will.

12. For as the (natural) body is one, and (yet) hath many members, and (Gr. but) all the members of that one body, being many, are one body (the body is one still; the whole being animated by the same soul, which is a spirit): so also [6] is (it in the body of) Christ (all whose members, though there be many, and adorned with different gifts, make but one body mystical, united by the Spirit to their head, Christ Jesus).

13. For by one Spirit [7] we are all (Gr. have been all) baptized into (this) one body, whether we be Jews or gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and (by receiving that of living water, we) have been all made [8] to drink into (or, of) one Spirit.

14. (All I say,) for (as) the (natural, so the mystical) body is not one member, but many.

15. If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

16. And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

17. * If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?

18. But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him.

19. And if they were all one member, where were the body?

20. But now are they many members, yet but one body.

21. And the eye (the man endowed with the word of wisdom or knowledge) cannot say to the hand (the person employed in lesser ministries), I have no need of thee: nor again the head (the person placed in the highest dignities in the church) to the feet (the deacon, or man employed in the lowest offices of the church), I have no need of you.

22. Nay, much more those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary (Gr. but the members of the body which seem more weak are more necessary; viz. the brain, the stomach, and the guts):

23. And those members of the body, which we think to be less honourable (Gr. more dishonourable), upon these we bestow (Gr. put) [9] more abundant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness.

24. For our comely parts have no need: but God [10] hath tempered the body together (agreeably to the condition of each member), giving more abundant honour (or covering) to that part that lacked: (placing them so, that even nature may be a covering to them.

* "Sed neque oculos toto corpore esse velim, ne cætera membra suum officium perdant." Quintil. Instit. lib. viii. cap. 5. ad finem.

25. And so hath he dealt also with the body mystical, making the meaner offices of them who attend upon the poor more necessary, and to them more honoured who need their help,) that there should be no [11] schism in the body, but that the members should have the same care for (and regard to) one another.

26. And whether one member (of the natural body) suffer, all the members suffer with it (by sympathy); or one member be honoured (or adorned), all the members rejoice with it (i. e. if, being indisposed, it becomes sound, being weak, it recovers strength, all the members are eased, and so may be said to rejoice with it).

27. Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular, [12] (or, severally are members of that body, and so ought to act in the mystical body, as do the members in the natural, rejoicing with them that do rejoice, and mourning with them that weep, Rom. xii. 15.)

28. [13] And God hath set some in the (body of the) church, first apostles (to exercise the gift of wisdom), secondarily prophets (to exert those of knowledge and prophecy), thirdly teachers (to labour in the word and doctrine), after that (workers of) miracles, then (they that have the) gifts of healing, helps (to take care of the poor), governments (rulers of the church), diversities of tongues.

29. Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles?

30. Have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret?

31. But covet earnestly the best (and the most useful) gifts: and yet shew I to you a more excellent way (of ministering to the welfare of the church, and of your own souls; even that of charity).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XII.

[1] Ver. 2. ΠΡΟ'Σ τὰ εἴδωλα ἄφωνα, To dumb idols.] For though the priests told them, they were only the receptacles of those deities they worshipped; that they resided in the image, and gave answers by it, as the Christian writers own:* yet, both the prophets and writers of the New Testament, and all the fathers in their apologies, still represent them as they were in themselves, saying, They have mouths but speak not, (Psal. cxv. 5. cxxxv. 16.) are dumb stones, (Hab. ii. 19.) et muta simulacra, and such only as gave answers, when they gave any, by the means of evil spirits.

[2] Ver. 3. Ἀνάθεμα, Accursed.] This the Jews did, as we learn, not only from the words of Justin Martyr,† but also from their nineteenth prayer against heretics,‡ made by Samuel the younger, in the days of Gamaliel: their exorcists and diviners therefore, though they pretend to it, saith the apostle, cannot be acted by the Spirit of God: nor can they, who confirm the doctrine of Christ by miracles, be acted by any other but the Holy Ghost; for no evil spirit would assist them to confirm a doctrine so opposite to, and destructive of, their kingdom and design.

[3] Ver. 4. Διαιρέσεις δὲ χαρισμάτων, There are diversities of gifts.] These gifts being in the nature of spiritual faculties, or habits, are very properly ascribed to that Spirit, who animates the Christian, and by whom he lives the new life; and these ministries, as properly to the Lord Christ, whose ministers and servants, the apostles, prophets, teachers, &c. are in the propagation of the gospel. These operations being miraculous, and far exceeding the power of any creature, as fitly, are ascribed to the Creator of all things. But whereas Crellius hence infers, that this third person being distinguished from the other two by the title of the same God, he only must be truly and properly so called; he might as well have argued, that, because the second person mentioned here is styled the same Lord, he must be only so exclusively to the same God; and, because the first is called the same Spirit, he must be so exclusively of the same God and Lord, who are equally spirits.

[4] Ver. 7—10.] It is exceeding difficult to fix the true import of all these gifts; I therefore shall propose what follows by way of conjecture, till I receive better information from more able hands.

First, then, by the word of wisdom I understand, the wisdom given to the apostles to reveal the gospel to the world; for that, in this Epistle, is styled the wisdom of God in a mystery, the hidden wisdom, 1 Cor. ii. 7. and elsewhere the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10. Christ, the great teacher of it, is also styled the wisdom of God, 1 Cor. i. 24. and in him are said to be contained all the treasures of wisdom, Col. ii. 3. The apostles, to whom this gospel was committed, are called σοφοὶ, wise men; Behold, I send unto you prophets and apostles, Luke xi. 49. and wise men, Matt. xxiii. 34. and they are said to teach this gospel according to the wisdom given to them, 2 Pet. iii. 15.

Secondly, The word of knowledge being distinguished from that of revelation, and of prophecy, 1 Cor. xiv. 6. xiii. 8. and being set by way of opposition, or explication, with the knowledge of all mysteries, 1 Cor. xiii. 2. seems to signify the gift of understanding mysteries, or things concealed: such was the mystery of calling the gentiles before it was revealed, Rom. xi. 25. Eph. i. 9. iii. 9. the mystery of recalling the Jews, Rom. xi. 25. the mystery of iniquity, 2 Thess. ii. 7. the mystery of the beast, Rev. x. 7. but more especially the gift of understanding the mystical sense of the Scriptures of the Old Testament. And in this sense St. Barnaby seems to speak of it, when he saith, (sect. 6.) Blessed be God, ὁ σοφίαν καὶ νοῦν θέμενος ἐν ἡμῖν τῶν κρυφίων αὐτοῦ, who hath given us the wisdom and knowledge of his secrets; and so it agrees with that gift which the fathers call πρόγνωσις, as when Irenæus* saith, Some have the knowledge of things to come, and visions, and prophetical sayings; and the man thus gifted seems to be, in St. Clemens Romanus, the powerful man to utter knowledge.

Thirdly, That by faith we are to understand a miraculous faith, enabling them to do things most difficult, seems highly probable from these words, Though I have all faith, so as to remove mountains, 1 Cor. xiii. 2. But chiefly I would understand by it, a peculiar impulse that came upon them when any difficult matter was to be performed, which inwardly assured them God's power would assist them in the performance of it. (See note on James v. 15.) Whence it is often mentioned as a preparatory disposition to the working such miracles, and is sometimes styled the faith of God, (Mark xi. 22.) sometimes faith without doubting, (Matt. xxi. 21.) and so it was a prerequisite to the casting out stubborn devils, (Matt. xvii. 20.) and to the ensuing gifts of healing and working miracles; and hence perhaps it is that in the following enumeration of them, ver. 28—30. we find no mention of it.

Fourthly, Ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων, the working of miracles, is, by the fathers, referred to the power residing in the apostles to inflict diseases, and even death itself, upon offenders, as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts v. 5. 10. and of Elymas the sorcerer, Acts xiii. 11. and of the incestuous person, 1 Cor. v. 4. where the apostle makes mention τῆς δυνάμεως Χριστοῦ, of the power of Christ; and where he speaks of his rod, he calls it the power that God hath given him, 1 Cor. iv. 19, 20. 2 Cor. x. 8. xiii. 10. But yet I doubt not but these words are truly rendered the working of miracles; for to them the word δύναμις, power, generally relates in the New Testament: as, when mention is made of the miracles done by Christ himself, Matt. xi. 20. 23. xiii. 54. 58. xiv. 2. Mark v. 30. Luke iv. 36. v. 17. vi. 19. xix. 37. Acts ii. 22. x. 38. and of the miracles done by others in the name of Christ, Matt. vii. 22. Mark ix. 39. Luke ix. 1. Acts i. 8. iv. 33. vi. 8. viii. 13. xix. 11. 1 Cor. ii. 4. 2 Cor. xii. 12. Gal. iii. 5. 1 Thess. i. 5. Hence it is frequently mentioned in conjunction with signs and wonders, Acts ii. 22. viii. 13. Rom. xv. 19. Heb. ii. 4. It is also here plainly distinguished from the gift of healing; and it is as plainly distinguished from the power of casting out devils, in these words, In thy name have we prophesied, and cast out devils, and done δυνάμεις πολλὰς, many mighty works, Mark vii. 22. It therefore rightly seemeth in the paraphrase to be restrained to the doing things beyond the course of nature, and wrought by an immediate Divine hand: such as the supplying a defective member, or the raising of the dead. Thus, to the first order of the successors of the apostles, Eusebius* ascribes many strange powers of the Holy Ghost; and Justin Martyr† speaks of the powers done in his time by the name of Christ.

Fifthly, The gift of prophecy is not to be restrained, as some do, to teaching, and the interpretation of the Scripture, which it importeth only as that was done by a particular inspiration of the Holy Ghost; for otherwise, as here the prophets and the teachers are two distinct offices in the church, so also are they reckoned as such in the church of Antioch, Acts xiii. 1. and they are reckoned as distinct χαρίσματα in these words, Having gifts different, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us wait on our ministering; or he that teacheth, on teaching. (Rom. xii. 6, 7.) And so they are reckoned by Justin Martyr,‡ when he saith, One man receives at baptism the spirit of understanding, ὁ δὲ προγνώσεως, ὁ δὲ διδασκαλίας, another of foreknowledge, or prophecy, and another of teaching; and this discovers to us another sense of prophecy; viz. that it imports, as Irenæus saith, πρόγνωσιν τῶν μελλόντων, the foreknowledge or prediction of things future, and that in order to the exhortation to some duty. Thus Agabus foretold by the Spirit the dearth that was to come over all Judea, Acts xi. 28—30. that other Christians might be moved, as they were, to send their charity thither. Thus Judas and Silas, being prophets, διὰ λόγου πολλοῦ, with many words they comforted the brethren, and established them. (Acts xvi. 32.) This gift was exercised also by foretelling who would be fit persons to do good service in the church. Thus St. Paul commits a charge to Timothy, according to the foregoing prophecies concerning him, (1 Tim. i. 18.) and saith, Neglect not the gift that is in thee, that was given thee by prophecy, (iv. 14.) And that in this sense the fathers understood it, is evident, not only from the word πρόγνωσις, foreknowledge, by which they did express it, but from the arguments they use against the Jews to convince them that God had left their church, and had owned and embraced the societies of Christians, because he had left them no prophets, but had transferred that gift to the Christians: and these predictions being made by revelation of the Spirit, ἀποκάλυψις, or revelation, is accounted a part of this gift; for to the prophet is ascribed his revelation, 1 Cor. xiv. 26. 30. and the Revelation of St. John is the book of his prophecy; and to the prophet is ascribed the manifestation of the secrets of men's hearts, as in those words, If all prophesy, and there come in an unbeliever, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all: and thus are the secrets of his heart laid open. (1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25.) Thus of those prophets, Irenæus (lib. v. cap. 6.) saith, that they did not only explain the mysteries of God, but also τὰ κρυφία ἀνθρώπων εἰς φανερὸν ἄγειν ἐπὶ τῷ συμφέροντι, manifest the secret things of men, when it was needful, or profitable for them, or the church. (See Origen against Celsus, lib. i. p. 34.)

Sixthly, The διάκρισις πνευμάτων, discerning of spirits, not only imports the faculty of discerning betwixt the impulse of false and true prophets, which he that hath, seems to be styled by St. Clemens, ὁ σοφὸς ἐν διακρίσει τῶν λόγων, a wise man in discerning words, and betwixt the lying wonders and magical operations of evil spirits, and the powers of the Holy Ghost, as 1 Cor. xiv. 29. 1 Thess. v. 20, 21. 1 John iv. 1. but also a judgment of discerning the spirits of other men, whether they were qualified for such an office in the church, and accordingly choosing them out for that work. So the Spirit, in the prophets, said, Separate me Barnabas and Paul for the work whereunto I have called them, Acts xiii. 2, 3. and thus the Holy Ghost is said to have constituted the bishops and presbyters in Asia, Acts x. 28. because, as Clemens Rom. saith,* they constituted bishops and deacons, δοκιμάσαντες τῷ πνεύματι, making trial of them by the Holy Ghost. And Clemens of Alexandria,† that St. John ordained to be of the clergy, τοὺς ἀπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος σημαινομένους, such as were signified to him by the Spirit. Ignatius‡ saith of the bishops of his time, that they were constituted, not by men, but Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ γνώμῃ, by the counsel of Christ Jesus. St. Cyprian,§ that they were constituted, not only by the consent of the people, and the suffrage of their fellow-bishops; but also "judicio Divino, et Dei testimonio," by the judgment and testimony of God. And, lastly, this gift seems also to imply a discovering of what was done inwardly, or in the spirit of a man; so Peter discerned the heart of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts v. 3. 9. and of Simon Magus, Acts viii. 21. 23. St. Paul of Elymas, Acts xiii. 10. and of the lame man, seeing he had faith to be healed, Acts xiv. 9. And Ignatius* speaks of the Spirit in him that did foretell, and τὰ κρυπτὰ ἐλέγχειν, reprove things secret.

[5] Ver. 11. Καθὼς βούλεται, As he will.] Here seems to be a plain argument for the personality of the Holy Ghost, because a will is here ascribed to him. (2.) Hence it is evident that he is no creature, because no creature can enable others to do these works. (3.) That he is God: for as all this diversity of operations is ascribed to the same God, ver. 6. so it is here said, All these worketh one and the same Spirit.†

[6] Ver. 12. So is Christ.] That is, saith Chrysostom, τὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ σῶμα, the body of Christ, that is, his church, as appears from ver. 21. The head cannot say to the feet, I have no need of you; this being not true of Christ, the head of that church, which is his body, but only of the ministerial heads under him.

[7] Ver. 13. Εἰς ἓν σῶμα ἐβαπτίσθημεν, We were baptized into one body.] Vain here is the note of Mr. Clerc, viz. That we are baptized that we might be called by one name, be of one society, the church of Christ: for it is not by partaking of one spirit that we are called Christians, but by professing faith in Christ. The apostle is plainly proving, that as the natural body is one, so is the mystical: now the natural body is one, as being informed by one soul and spirit united to it, and animating all the parts of it; so is it, saith he, in the mystical body united together by one and the same Spirit received in baptism, and from our spiritual head Christ Jesus, communicated to all the living members of his body, to give them spiritual life and motion. (See Eph. iv. 16.)

[8] Εἰς ἓν πνεῦμα ἐποτίσθημεν, Were made to drink of one Spirit.] So our Lord represents the participation of the Holy Spirit, saying, If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink. He that believeth, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living waters. This spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed in him should receive. (John vii. 37—39.) And the apostle calls the water which was a symbol of the Spirit, spiritual drink, 1 Cor. x. 4. and as believers are ἓν πνεῦμα one spirit with Christ, (1 Cor. vi. 17.) so doth Christ invite them to come to him to drink of this Spirit.

[9] Ver. 23. Τιμὴν περισσοτέραν, More abundant honour.] The clothes God made to cover the nakedness of Adam and Eve, are styled, by Onkelos, clothes of honour: and the word τιμὴ, here rendered honour, is in the Septuagint put to signify a cover; so, Behold, he is to thee a covering of thy eye, (Gen. xx. 16.) is, in the Septuagint, εἰς τὴν τιμὴν τοῦ πρυσώπου σου, for an honour on thy face.

[10] Ver. 24. Συνεκέρασε τὸ σῶμα, Hath so tempered the body.] Agreeable to this is that of Cicero,‡ Principio corporis nostri magnam natura ipsa videtur habuisse rationem, quæ formam nostram, reliquamque figuram in qua esset species honesta, eam posuit in promptu; quæ autem partes corporis ad necessitatem datæ, aspectum essent deformem habituræ, atque turpem, eas contexit atque abdidit; hanc tam diligentem naturæ fabricam imitata est hominum verecundia, quæ enim natura occultavit, eadem omnes, qui sanâ mente sunt, removent ab oculis.

[11] Ver. 25. Ἵνα μὴ ᾖ σχίσμα, That there may be no schism in the body.] Of this schism of the members against the body, see Menenius apud Livium, lib. ii. cap. 32. Max. Tyr. diss. v. p. 50.

[12] Ver. 27.] For illustration of this long comparison, betwixt the body natural and mystical, observe, (1.) that this comparison is taken from the Jews, who teach, that such order ought to be observed betwixt the priesthood and the people, as in the human body, in which there are members superior, and others serving to the rest, for all of them serve the heart from whence life proceeds; and so it is meet that the Levites should serve the priests, and the people the Levites. (Paulus Fagius, in Lev. iii. 7.) The argument which the apostle useth from the comparison of the natural with the mystical body, seems to consist in these particulars.

First, That as the most inferior members of the natural body are as much the members of that body as the most noble; so are the most inferior Christians as much the members of Christ's body.

Secondly, That there would be no perfect natural body without this diversity of members, and in like manner no mystical body without such diversity of gifts and offices as God hath ordered in his church, (ver. 17. 19.)

Thirdly, That the members are placed in the body according to the wisdom and the good pleasure of God, (ver. 18. 24.) and so it is in the members of the mystical body, which therefore ought to acquiesce in the good pleasure of his will, in whatsoever station and condition his wisdom doth see fit to place them.

Fourthly, That the members, which seem the weakest, and the meanest, are as necessary and serviceable to the body as the other: human life could not continue, nor human kind subsist without them: (ver. 22.) so in the mystical body, they that are employed in works of charity and mercy to the poor and the sick, those that serve tables, are in their kind as necessary and serviceable as other members of the church, and had their χαρίσματα, or spiritual gifts, as well as others. (Rom. xii. 6—8. 1 Pet. iv. 10, 11.)

Fifthly, That as nature had provided a covering for the less honourable parts, and taught us to employ our care in covering and adorning them; so was it also with respect to the less honourable members of the ecclesiastical body, there were helps and ministers particularly appointed to take care of them, to cover their nakedness and supply their wants, and promises were made to those who employed themselves in such acts of charity, (ver. 23, 24.)

Sixthly, That as there was no division in the members of the natural body, but all the members took care of, and were employed for, the good of the whole; so God hath ordered matters thus in the body mystical, that there should be no divisions, no separate interests in it, but they should mutually regard the interests of one another, sympathising and rejoicing together, (ver. 25, 26.)

[13] Ver. 28.] Note, for explication of these offices,

First, That to prophets I ascribe the gifts of knowledge and of prophecy, from these words, If I have prophecy, and know all mysteries and all knowledge: (1 Cor. xiii. 2.) and as the first gift, the word of wisdom, belongs especially to the apostles, so it seems probable that the second, the word of knowledge, should belong to the second office, that of prophets. But whereas Mr. Clerc saith, that the prophets did not teach by inspiration, but only had been fitted to teach by inspiration; that they spake as they saw fit themselves; and those things which they received from Christ and his apostles, they interpreted after their own manner: this seems to be confuted by these words of the apostle, If any thing be revealed to him that sitteth by, let the first prophet be silent; for the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets.

Secondly, The teachers seem to be men, who, having received the doctrine of faith from the apostles, preached it to others for their conversion to the faith, and so they are the men who laboured in the word and doctrine, 1 Tim. v. 17. They were, saith Eusebius,* ἀποστόλων μαθηταὶ, the disciples of the apostles, who built up the churches in the faith which the apostles had planted, promoting the preaching of the gospel more and more, and spreading among them the salutary seed of the heavenly kingdom. And they of them, who preached the gospel to them who had not heard it, were called evangelists, and sometimes apostles: so Andronicus and Junia are called ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις, men of esteem among the apostles, Rom. xvi. 7. and of these St. John saith, For his name's sake they went forth, taking nothing of the gentiles; we therefore ought to receive such, that we may be fellow-helpers to the truth. (3 John 7, 8.) But whereas Theophylact and Mr. Le Clerc say, that the prophets indeed spake by the Holy Ghost, but these teachers from themselves: this I cannot assent to, for διδασκαλία, teaching, is numbered among the spiritual gifts, Rom. xii. 6. and διδάσκαλοι, teachers, among them to whom Christ had given these gifts. (See the note on Eph. iv. 11.)

Thirdly, The helps seem to be the deacons and other officers, who ministered not only to the sick and poor, but in holy things also—in baptizing and distributing the eucharist; ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι, whence comes the word helps, signifies, to take of others; and these also, as before I noted, had their spiritual gifts. As then the Talmudists, saith Dr. Lightfoot, call the Levites the helps of the priests; so may the apostle call the deacons, which answered to them, the helps of the apostles and bishops of the church.

Fourthly, Governments are almost generally supposed to denote the rulers of the churches, planted by the apostles, and who are sometimes styled bishops, Acts xx. 28. sometimes ἡγούμενοι, guides or rulers, Heb. xiii. 7. 17. and sometimes προιστῶτες, presidents or prelates, Rom. xii. 8. 1 Thess. v. 12. But Dr. Lightfoot conjectures they were the men who had the gift of discerning spirits, because κυβερνήσεις, which we here render governments, signifies in the Old Testament, wise counsels, and skill in giving judgment of things; thus, ὁ νοήμων κυβερνήσεις κτήσεται, a man of understanding shall attain to wise counsels, Prov. i. 5. οἷς μὴ ὑπάρχει κυβέρνησις, where no counsel is, the people fall; but in much counsel there is safety, Prov. xi. 14. and μετὰ κυβερνήσεως, by wise counsel thou shalt make war, Prov. xxiv. 6. It is not reasonable, saith he, to suppose no office should be appointed for this so necessary gift, and yet no other is here mentioned to which we can apply it. Let the reader choose which of these interpretations he likes best.

CHAP. XIII.

1. [1] (FOR) though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels (the languages of all nations, or knew how to converse with angels), and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal (benefiting no man by my empty and confused, and pleasing no man with my shrill and noisy, sound).

2. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have no charity, I am nothing (worth in the sight of God).

3. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned (for the faith), and have not charity (to man, but do this rather out of vainglory, or to be admired and praised of men), it profiteth me nothing (as to my eternal state).

4. Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up,

5. Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil;

6. Rejoiceth not [2] in iniquity (or falsehood), but rejoiceth in the truth;

7. [3] Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

8. Charity never faileth (as to the proper and elicit acts of it): but (as for other gifts) whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be (the gift of) knowledge, it shall vanish away.

9. For (with all our gifts) we know (still but) in part, and we prophesy (but) in part (knowing but few things in comparison to our future knowledge).

10. But when that (state of knowledge) which is perfect is come, then that (knowledge) which is in part shall be done away.

11. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things (and the like difference will there be betwixt us now and then).

12. For now we see (only as) through a glass, darkly; but then (we shall see) face to face, (with the greatest nearness and perspicuity, which now we cannot; for no man, saith God, shall see my face and live, Exod. xxxiii. 20. 23. 2 John 12. 3 John 14.) now I know (but) in part; but then shall I know [4] even as also I am known, (more fully and completely, seeing God as he is, 1 John iii. 2.)

13. And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three (all great and excellent virtues, and superior to the gifts now mentioned); but the greatest of these is charity (both for duration, as continuing when faith shall end in vision, 2 Cor. v. 7. and hope in enjoyment, Rom. viii. 23, 24. and for perfection, as rendering us more like to God, and beneficial to men).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIII.

[1] 1—3. NOTE. Here it is to be noted, that the apostle in these verses reckons up the things which were of highest value to the Jews, and which rendered their wise men the most celebrated. Thus of R. Jochanan ben Zachai* they say that he understood the language of the angels; and of R. Azai,† that there was not in his days a rooter up of mountains like to him, or one that could do so great things as he did. The man on whom the spirit of prophecy did rest, or who was fit to receive him, must, say they, be a wise man, a religious man, a temperate man, and one that is endued with all probity of manners.‡ Of alms they say, that whosoever diminisheth any thing of his substance to bestow in alms, shall be delivered from hell.§ And as for martyrdom for the law, they thought it sufficient to expiate, not only for their own sins, but even for the sins of the whole nation. Hence Josephus‖ brings in Eleazer, praying thus for the Jews, Let my blood be an expiation for them, and receive my life for their lives. And thus he saith of the martyrs that suffered under Antiochus Epiphanes, that the Divine Providence saved all Israel from the evils they suffered, by the blood and the propitiatory death of those pious men.¶

But here is raised a dispute, whether the gifts here mentioned were at any time, or could be, exercised by them who wanted charity? or such profuse alms, and constancy in suffering to the death, were ever, or could be, separated from that grace? To which I answer, It is true that the apostle here speaketh hypothetically, that, were these things performed without charity, they would not profit to salvation; but then that supposition seems fairly to imply, the thing itself was not impossible; or that there was no necessary connexion betwixt these gifts and actions and the grace of charity. Moreover, our Saviour seems plainly to inform us, that men might prophesy and cast out devils, and do mighty works in his name, (Matt. vii. 22, 23.) and yet be workers of iniquity, and persons whom he would not own at the last day. He also teacheth that some may do their alms to be applauded by men, (Matt. vi. 2.) and therefore do them so as to receive no reward from God; and so informs us, that alms may be given without true love to God, or to our neighbour for his sake. And, lastly, all the fathers teach, that it is not the suffering but the reason of it, that makes the martyr; and that *when men, in schism or heresy, thus give their bodies to be burnt, they are not to be deemed true martyrs, by reason of the want of charity. And the same they say of them who suffer for vain-glory; viz. that they shed their blood in vain.††

[2] Ver. 6. Ἐν ἀδικίᾳ, In iniquity.] That ἀδικία here signifies falsehood, the truth, to which it is opposed, shews; so it signifies in the Old Testament above a hundred times, and the word שקר, which in the Hebrew signifies a lie, is as often by the Septuagint translated ἀδικία, as ψεῦδος; so, a right hand of falsehood, is δεξία ἀδικίας, Psal. cxliv. 11. the way of lying, is ὁδος ἀδικίας, Psal. cxix. 29. and he that telleth lies, is λαλῶν ἄδικα, see Psal. cvii. 7. and cxix. 69. 78. 86. 118. 128. 163. Psal. lxiii. 11. Exod. xxii. 7. Now falsehood and a lie, in the Old and New Testament, do often signify a false religion, or a religion containing a false object of worship. Thus the molten image is a teacher of lies, Hag. ii. 28. and he that maketh it, is said to have a lie in his right hand, Isa. xliv. 20. he that goes after them walketh in lies, Jer. xxiii. 14. and inherits lies, ὡς ψευδῆ ἐκτήσαντο οἱ πατέρες ἡμῶν εἴδωλα; he turns the truth of God into a lie, Rom. i. 25. believes a lie, 2 Thess. ii. 10, 11. (See the note on Rom. iii. 7.) And the truth in the New Testament is emphatically put to signify the gospel, or the Christian faith: so the Second Epistle of St. John, ver. 3, 4. I rejoiced greatly to find thy children walking in the truth: and the Third Epistle, ver. 3, 4. I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in the truth. So that the import of these words may be this—Charity will not permit us to rejoice, but rather cause us to be troubled, to find men still continue in their false worship, as the gentiles, or in opposition to the gospel delivered to them, as the Jews do; but it rejoiceth to see men walking according to the truth of the gospel.

[3] Ver. 7.] From these four comprehensive verses, we learn the properties and fruits of charity. (1.) What it requires us to do to all. (2.) What it will not permit us to do to any. (3.) What it requires us to do, or will not permit us to do, to our offending brother.

First, What deportment it requires towards all men; viz.

1. It is good, kind, and tender-hearted, towards all; (ver. 4.) The Lord make your charity to abound to one another, and to all men, 1 Thess. iii. 12. for charity requiring us to love our brother as ourselves, it must engage us to consider him as we do ourselves, and so extend the same kindness to him, when he needs it, as we shew to ourselves. (Gal. vi. 10.)

2. It is active and laborious, engaging us by love to serve one another, (Gal. v. 13, 14.) to do them any service we are able with good-will, and without grudging; for there must be in us, ὁ κόπος τῆς ἀγάπης, the labour of love. (2 Thess. i. 3. Heb. vi. 10.)

3. It rejoiceth in the truth; (ver. 6.) that is, in men's doing righteously, and living according to the gospel, which is called by way of eminence the truth; it begets in us a complacency and inward pleasure, to behold truth and righteousness, piety and goodness, prevailing in the world.

4. It makes us ready to believe all things; (ver. 7.) that is, all the good it hears, or can have any charitable ground to think of others.

5. It hopeth all things; (ver. 7.) i. e. it inclines us to hope still the best concerning men's intentions and actions liable to doubt; and if our brother be at present bad, to hope and not despair of his amendment, and so still to endeavour his reformation by all proper means.

Secondly, The things which charity will not permit us to do to any are these; viz.

1. Charity worketh no evil to our neighbour, in his person, estate, good name, or relations, (Rom. xiii. 10.) much less in reference to his soul: and therefore,

2. It will not suffer us to scandalize, or to offend our brother, by doing any thing which either may embolden him to sin, or disaffect him to religion, or discourage him in the practice of his duty; for, if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not charitably. (Rom. xiv. 15.)

3. Οὐ λογίζεται τὸ κακὸν, (ver. 5.) It will not permit us to surmise or to suspect that evil of others, which we do not know; it imputes not evil to them, nor puts it to any man's account beyond absolute necessity. It doth not censure their miscarriages as done out of malice, or with ill intentions. So Theodoret.

4. It rejoiceth not in iniquity, (ver. 6.) in any evil done to, much less by, others; it permits no man to be pleased with any deceit, or falsehood spoken of, or done to, others, or with any ill stories, or malicious insinuations, concerning them.

5. It envies not the happiness or the prosperity of others, but is well pleased with it, (ver. 4.)

6. Οὐκ ἀσχημονεῖ, It behaveth not itself unseemingly towards any, in words or gestures; it refuseth not to do the meanest offices of kindness to them, as if it were unseemly, or below us to be employed in them, (ver. 5.) So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumen. Theoph.

7. Οὐ φυσιοῦται, It vaunteth not itself: (ver. 4.) it is not puffed up against our brethren; it roots out of us all elation of mind, ambition, ostentation, pride in over-valuing ourselves, and despising others; (Eph. iv. 2.) οὐ περπερεύεται, it is not rash, heady, or precipitate in speaking of, or acting towards, others. So Chrysostom and Œcumenius. It doth not curiously search into other men's matters which belong not to us. So Theodoret.

8. It seeketh not her own praise, profit, or pleasure, to the hurt of others; but inclines men to seek the good of others. (1 Cor. x. 24.)

9. Οὐ δάκνει, It bites not with the tongue, (Gal. v. 14, 15.) but cuts off all strife, contentions, bitter zeal, animosities, (ver. 21, 22.) all bitterness, wrath, clamour, evil-speaking. (Eph. iv. 31, 32.)

Thirdly, The deportment charity requires to our offending brother, is expressed in these particulars:

1. Charity beareth long, and causeth us to endure provocations with much patience, before we do conceive any displeasure against others.

2. It endureth all things, though grievous to be borne, without returning evil for evil, enabling us to forbear one another in love; (Eph. iv. 2. Colos. iii. 13.) and will not cease from being kind and well-affected to our brother, by reason of any provocation whatsoever.

3. It covers all things, i. e. inclines us to conceal the evil that we know of others; and thus it covers a multitude of sins. (James v. 20.)

4. Οὐ παροξύνεται, (ver. 5.) It is not highly exasperated, and breaks not forth into violent ungovernable passions on any provocation.

5. It is easy to be entreated, ready to forgive, and full of mercy. (Colos. iii. 13. Eph. iv. 32. James iii. 17.)

[4] Ver. 12. Καθὼς καὶ ἐπεγνώσθην, Even as I am known.] I do not think that either these, or the words of St. John, we shall see him as he is, afford any just grounds for the speculations of the schools, touching the intuitive vision of the essence of God, or their speculum Trinitatis, without which the invocations of saints and angels cannot be excused from idolatry: for as the words, 1 John iii. 2. refer not to the vision of God the Father, but of Christ Jesus, appearing at the day of judgment in his glory, and rendering our bodies like unto his glorious body; so these words refer not to the knowledge of God's essence, but rather to the knowledge of those great things he hath prepared for those that love him, revealed now in part, by the spirit of prophecy and wisdom, (1 Cor. ii. 9, 10.) which then, saith the apostle, we shall know in the most clear and perfect manner, as we ourselves are known of God.

CHAP. XIV.

1. FOLLOW (therefore) after charity (above all things), and desire (also) spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy (i. e. expound the Scripture, or reveal some mystery to the edification of the church).

2. [1] For he that speaketh in an unknown tongue (not understood, nor explained) speaketh not to (the understanding of) men, for no man understands him, but to (the understanding of) God (only); howbeit (or though) in the spirit he speaketh mysteries (the profound things of God).

3. But he that prophesieth (in plain intelligible words) speaketh to (the profit of) men, (viz.) to (their) edification (by the Scripture he expounds), and (to their) exhortation (by what he teacheth), and (to their) comfort (by his revelation).

4. He that speaketh in an unknown tongue [2] edifieth himself (only); but he that prophesieth, edifieth the church.

5. I would that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied: for greater (because more beneficial) is he that prophesies, than he that speaketh with tongues, except he interpret (his tongue, and the mystery he utters in it), [3] that the church may receive edifying (by it).

6. Now (therefore), brethren, if I come unto you speaking with (strange) tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you (also) either by revelation (of some secret), or by knowledge (of some mystery), or [4] by prophesying (i. e. foretelling of something to come), or by doctrine (instructing you what to believe or practise)?

7. And (thus it is) even (in) things without life giving sound, whether (it be) pipe or harp; (for) except they give a distinction in the sound (to render it intelligible), how shall it be known what is piped or harped?

8. For if the trumpet (for example) give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle (at the hearing of it)?

9. So likewise you, except you utter by the tongue words easy to be understood (by your auditors), how shall it be known what is spoken (by you)? for (by speaking what they know not) ye shall (be as men who) speak (only) to the air (vain and unprofitable words, lost in the speaking, as the voice is in the air).

10. There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices (languages and idioms, as there be nations, or, as the Jews compute, to the number of seventy) in the world, and none of them is without signification (but this signification they have only to them that understand them).

11. Therefore, if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be to him that speaketh (as if he spake to) [5] a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be (as) a barbarian to me (not understanding what he sayeth).

12. Even so ye, forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts (Gr. of spirits, that you may not be barbarians, and unprofitable in the use of them), seek that ye may excel (in them which tend) to the edifying of the church.

13. Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue (in which he cannot edify) pray that he [6] may interpret (i. e. pray so, as to interpret what he prays).

14. For if I pray in an unknown tongue, [7] my spirit prayeth (i. e. my spiritual gift is exercised), but my understanding is unfruitful (to others).

15. What is it then? (i. e. What then is to be done?) I will pray [8] with the spirit (i. e. with my spiritual gifts), and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also (i. e. so using my spiritual gift in prayer and psalmody in public, as that I may be understood by others).

16. Else when thou shalt bless, (i. e. give thanks to God) with the spirit (-ual afflatus not understood by others), how shall he that [9] occupieth the room of the unlearned (i. e. the laic, or the man who only knows his mother-tongue) say Amen (or give his assent) at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understands not what thou sayest?

17. For thou verily givest thanks well (with thy spiritual gift, i. e. piously), but the other is not edified (by it).

18. I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than you all:

19. Yet in the church (of God) I had rather speak five words, with my understanding (so employed) that by my voice I may teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

20. Brethren, be not (like) children in understanding (choosing what pleases you before what profits others): howbeit in (freedom from) malice be you (as) children, but in understanding be (and act as) men (as persons of maturity of judgment to know what is fitting to be spoken).

21. [10] In the law it is written, (by way of a sign to a disobedient and unbelieving people, thus:) With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that they will not hear me, saith the Lord.

22. Wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to them that believe (and so not to be used in their assemblies), but to them that believe not (they being designed for the more speedy and effectual propagation of the gospel by this gift, among those nations whose languages they understood not): but prophesying (by teaching the doctrines of the New, or expounding the mysteries of the Old Testament) serveth not for them that believe not (that faith, or those Scriptures), but for them that believe (them).

23. If therefore the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned, or [11] unbelievers, will they not (be tempted, by hearing you thus speaking to one another in unknown languages, to) say that you are mad?

24. But if all prophesy (one after another, ver. 31.) and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced (or discovered) of all, he is judged (or discerned) of all (that prophesy):

25. And thus are the [12] secrets of his heart made manifest (by the prophet's revelation of them); and so falling down upon his face he will worship God (the searcher of the heart), and report (from his own experience) that God is in (or among) you of a truth.

26. How is it then (or, what is then to be done), brethren? (since) when you come together, every one of you (that is a spiritual or gifted person) hath a psalm, (or) hath a doctrine, (or) hath a tongue, (or) hath a revelation, (or) hath an interpretation (of tongues). Let all (these) things be done to edifying; (let them be managed so as best conduceth to the end for which they were designed, xii. 7.)

27. If any speak in an unknown tongue, let it be (used only) by two, or at the most by three (at one meeting), and that by course (i. e. successively); and let one (who hath the gift) interpret (what is spoken).

28. [13] But if there be no interpreter (present), let him (that only speaks with tongues) keep silence in the church; and let him (only) speak (mentally) to himself, and to God, (in prayer and thanksgiving, ver. 15, 16.)

29. Let the prophets speak two or three (successively), [14] and let the other (prophets) judge or discern.

30. (And) if (whilst one prophesies) any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace (or cease, before the other utter his revelation).

31. For (so) ye (that have the gift) may all prophesy one by one, that (by your mutual discourses) all may learn, and all may be comforted (or exhorted to good works).

32. And (this is not difficult for you to do, since) [15] the spirits of the prophets are subject to (and therefore may be restrained by) the prophets.

33. (And God, doubtless, in this case would have the first to be silent;) for God is not the author [16] of confusion (which yet would follow upon all the prophets speaking together, so that one should confound the other), but of peace, as (may be seen by the regular exercise of these gifts) in all the churches of the saints.

34. [17] Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted to them to speak (by way of teaching or prophesying, but only by joining with the church in prayer and psalmody); but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. (Gen. iii. 16.)

35. And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame (i. e. a thing indecent) for women [18] to speak in the church.

36. (And whereas in this matter you think fit to practise contrary to all the churches of the saints, even those in Judea, I ask,) What? came the word of God out from you (to all other churches)? or came it to you only (and not to other churches, that you thus differ in your practice from them)?

37. If any man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things I (now) write unto you, are the commandments of the Lord. (See note on ii. 15.)

38. But if any man (pretends to) be ignorant (whether he be so or not), let him be ignorant (at his peril be it, I shall not contend farther with him; or ἀγνοείτω, let him not be acknowledged as a true prophet, or spiritual person).

39. Wherefore, brethren, covet to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues, (provided these directions be observed: but)

40. Let all (these) things be done [19] decently and in order.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIV.

[1] Ver. 2. Ὁ γὰρ λαλῶν γλώσσῃ, For he that speaketh with an unknown tongue.] That what is said in this verse is spoken only by way of concession, as Mr. Clerc imagines, cannot be true, because it is expressly said, that in the Spirit he speaketh mysteries; for mysteries, when the apostle speaketh of spiritual gifts, hath still relation to some profound secret things, as 1 Cor. ii. 7. and xiii. 2. And πνεύματι λαλεῖ cannot here signify, as Mr. Clerc conceives, he speaketh to his own understanding; since the apostle, through this whole chapter, is speaking of spiritual gifts, which also he expressly calleth spirits, saying, seeing you are zealous πνευμάτων, of spirits, i. e. of spiritual gifts; and the afflatus or inspiration here was to enable the man to speak the mystery, and not to use the unknown tongue. For explication of this whole matter, let it be noted,

First, That the gift of tongues and prophecy, in their original donation, did still go together; and they who spake with tongues, spake τὰ μεγαλεῖα τοῦ Θεοῦ, the great things of God, (Acts ii. 11. x. 46.) they spake with tongues and prophesied; (Acts xix. 6.) and the reason seems plain, viz. because the gift of tongues was given as a help to prophecy. Now these two things, thus joined by God, should not have been used separately by these gifted men; yea, the gift of tongues was only to be used when they were to speak to gentiles in their own language, which was one great design of the gift of tongues, (ver. 22.) Nor should they have used the gift of tongues when an afflatus came upon them, and some mystery was imparted to them, by which the church was to be edified, unless they knew there was one present who had the gift of interpretation of tongues: this therefore was a great abuse of this gift, that when they had a mystery revealed to them, they did not utter it in a language understood by the assembly, but only by themselves, and so they did not edify the church by it, though it was given, as all the other gifts were, for edification, (xii. 7.) Note,

Secondly, That the gift of tongues being imparted per modum habitus, as a permanent gift, like to a habit; they who had received this gift could always use it at their pleasure, and so could also use it when a prophetical afflatus came upon them; but the gift of prophecy, being an afflatus in manner of a revelation, could be only used when the afflatus came upon them; so that the first gift might at any time be used without any fresh operation of the Holy Ghost, whereas the second gift always required that afflatus.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἑαυτὸν οἰκοδομεῖ, Edifieth himself.] He therefore understood himself, as the church did him that prophesied: and indeed, by speaking what he himself understood not, he would have been as much a barbarian, and unprofitable to himself, as he was to others. To say with Cajetan, The words were pious which he uttered, and he had pious affections when he uttered them, is unsatisfactory: for what if the matter of them was so, since if he understood them no more than a parrot, his piety in speaking of them could be no more than that of a parrot; he neither could know they were pious, nor receive any benefit by them, supposing they were so, whilst he understood nothing of them; nor could any pious affections be raised in him by words not understood. To say with Grotius, sentit in se vim Christi, he perceives the gift of Christ operating in him, if he perceived not the meaning of his own words, is to talk as unintelligibly as he spake; for that can only signify, he knew he had the gift of tongues, which sure could not much edify him who formerly had used that gift, and so could not be ignorant he had that gift. Moreover, doth not the apostle bid him, who speaks with tongues not interpreted, speak only to himself, and to God? (ver. 28.) And can he speak to himself more than to others, who understandeth not himself? Or is it fit that he should speak to God he knows not what? However, it is certain that the apostle not only dislikes, but plainly forbids, this way of speaking in the church; (ver. 28.) and so, by parity of reason, forbids the like way of speaking to others in the church of Rome.

[3] Ver. 5. Ἵνα ἡ ἐκκλησία οἰκοδομὴν λάβῃ, That the church may receive edification.] Hence I gather, that in this unknown tongue he uttered something tending to, and by God designed for, the edification of the church, though by uttering his mystery (ver. 2.) in an unknown tongue, he frustrated that design.

[4] Ver. 6. Ἢ ἐν προφητείᾳ, Or in prophesying.] Though prophesying, in this verse, being distinguished from revelation, knowledge, and doctrine, seems only to import the foretelling of something to come, yet doth the apostle, in this and the foregoing chapter, manifestly speak of it in the whole latitude of the word, as comprehending all these other things; as, v. g. revelation, so ver. 24. If all prophesy, and there come in an unbeliever, and one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged by all, and so the secrets of his heart shall be made manifest: according to that other sense we have given of this gift, chap. xii. that it was that which enabled them to manifest the secret things of men: hence to the prophet is assigned his revelation, ver. 30. Secondly, γνῶσις, here rendered knowledge, viz. of the mind and will of God: so xiii. 2. If I have prophecy, and know all mysteries, καὶ πᾶσαν γνῶσιν, and all knowledge. Whence to the prophet belongs λόγος γνώσεως, the word of knowledge, mentioned xii. 8. And this is the ordinary notion of it, viz. that it imports a gift by which the mind of God, or his will, is, by the Divine afflatus, discovered for the good of others. And, thirdly, doctrine; whence the prophet is said to speak to the edifying of the church, (ver. 3.) so that all may learn of him, be exhorted, and comforted by him, (ver. 3. 31.) And prophecy, in the Old Testament, doth often signify a Divine afflatus, enabling him who had it to compose hymns or psalms of praise to God: (1 Sam. x. 5. 1 Chron. xxv. 1.) accordingly the psalm here mentioned, (ver. 26.) and the singing with the spirit, (ver. 15, 16.) are the effects of the prophetical afflatus, by which the Christians of those times taught and admonished one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs. (Colos. iii. 16. Eph. v. 20.) And the praying in the Spirit, (ver. 15.) or in the Holy Ghost, (Jude 20.) seems to be praying by a like afflatus of the Holy Ghost, helping their infirmities, and teaching them what was proper to be asked for the good of the church: (see note on Rom. viii. 26, 27.) and therefore though, when they came together, every man had a psalm, a doctrine, a tongue, a revelation, and interpretation, for the correcting their miscarriages in all these things, the apostle gives only rules concerning tongues and prophesying.

[5] Ver. 11. Βάρβαρος, A barbarian.] It was not only the Greeks that called all other nations barbarians, according to that of the apostle, I am debtor to the Greek and the barbarian; in which sense Julius Pollux* reckons up γλῶτταν Ἑλλαδα, καὶ βάρβαρον, the tongue of the Greeks and of the barbarians; but almost every nation called strangers, who understood not their language, by that name, as the same Pollux† noteth in these words, τοὺς δὲ βαρβάρους καὶ ξένους ἐκάλουν. So the Jews (upon those words, when Israel came out of Egypt, and the house of Jacob maim luez, ἐκ λαοῦ βαρβάρου, from a strange people) say, all language that is not the holy language is barbarous: so the Chaldeans‡ styled those who spake not the Chaldee, and the Romans those who spake not Latin. Hence Verres§ is, in Cicero's style, " lingua et natione barbarus," by language and by nation a barbarian.

[6] Ver. 13. Προσευχέσθω ἵνα διερμηνεύῃ, Let him pray that he may interpret.] Seeing it is evident from the fourth and twenty-eighth verses, that he who spake with tongues understood the meaning of his own tongue; nor can he be said to have the gift of tongues, who only hath the gift of talking he knows not what, as the Phanatici did among the heathens; nor can it be supposed the Spirit of God should assist men in that useless manner: these words cannot be here understood as an exhortation to this linguist, that he should pray that he might understand, and so be able to interpret his own words, which he already could do, had he been as willing as he was able, and had not more regarded the vain ostentation of his gift, than the edification of the church. Some, therefore, give the sense of the words thus: Let him rather pray that he may have the gift of interpretation, than that of tongues; for covet (saith the apostle) the best gifts, (xii. 13.) seek to excel in those which tend to the edification of the church: (ver. 12.) now this doth the gift of interpretation more than that of tongues. But I rather choose to interpret them thus: " Let him (so) pray (with his gift, as) that he may (by the words used in his prayer, or by explaining it in a known language) interpret and impart to others what the afflatus hath imparted to him, and not out of vain ostentation utter it in a tongue unknown." To strengthen this sense, let it be observed, first, that the apostle here plainly discourseth of speaking with an unknown tongue in prayer, and of praying also by the afflatus of the Spirit, as is apparent from the illative words, For if I pray in an unknown tongue my Spirit prayeth, &c. Secondly, Observe from Budæus, that the particle οὕτω is sometimes elegantly deficient, of which he gives two instances from Aristotle; to which add these from the New Testament, as in heaven, καὶ (pro οὕτω καὶ) ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, so also upon earth, Matt. vi. 10. Luke xi. 2. καὶ εἰ ὁ Σατανᾶς, for καὶ οὕτω εἰ, and so if Satan, Mark iii. 26. As my Father sent me, κἀγὼ for οὕτω κἀγὼ, so send I you; and with this ellipsis the word runs thus, οὕτω προσευχέσθω ἵνα καὶ, Let him so pray, as that he also may interpret. Or observe from Noldius and Pasor, that ἵνα signifies, adeo ut, so as that: so the word was hidden from them, ἵνα μὴ αἴσθωνται αὐτὸ, so as that they perceived it not, Luke ix. 45. He will do greater works than these, ἵνα ὑμεῖς θαυμάζητε, so that you may marvel at the greatness of them, John v. 20. Did I purpose according to God, ἵνα ᾖ παρ' ἐμοὶ, so as that there should be with me yea yea, nay nay? 2 Cor. i. 17. I rejoiced that you sorrowed according to the flesh, ἵνα, so as that you might be damaged by us in nothing: so Rev. viii. 12. ix. 20. xiii. 13. and then the words may be rendered thus: Let him pray, ἵνα διερμηνεύῃ, so as he may interpret.

[7] Ver. 14. Τὸ πνεῦμά μου προσεύχεται, My spirit prayeth.] Here Mr. Clerc asks, What mortal would have rendered τὸ πνεῦμά μου, by my gift? I answer, Every one who knows the apostle is here speaking of spiritual gifts. And, secondly, he not only warrants, but constrains them to do so, by saying, ver. 12. seeing you are ζηλωταὶ πνευμάτων, zealous of spiritual gifts; and, ver. 32. πνεύματα προφητῶν, the spiritual afflatuses of the prophets are subject to the prophets; and, ver. 2. πνεύματι, he by the Spirit speaketh mysteries. And, thirdly, the word πνεῦμα never signifies the mind in all this discourse, or the understanding, that being in the very next verse νοῦς, the word opposed to πνεῦμα, spirit. He adds, What intolerable language is it to say, My gift prays? I answer, Just such intolerable language as the Spirit intercedeth, Rom. viii. 26. for that is only the gift of the Spirit intercedeth; and though that may pass for a catachresis, yet to say my gift is exercised in prayer, or, as ver. 15. I pray with my gift, is to give the true meaning of St. Paul's words. When he adds, that nothing is more ordinary than for the spirit and the body to be opposed to one another: this is, first, impertinent; here being no opposition betwixt the spirit and the body, but only betwixt the spirit and the mind, i. e. according to Mr. Clerc, betwixt my mind and my mind; and what mortal would have so interpreted τὸ πνεῦμά μου? Secondly, The thing itself is not proved by him; see, saith he, Rom. viii. 23. where yet there is no such opposition at all, but only an assertion, that they, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, wait for the redemption of the body. Now what mortal would have interpreted these words thus, We that have the first-fruits of the mind groan, waiting for the body opposed to it? See, says he, Gal. vi. 15. where again is no opposition betwixt the spirit and the body, but only betwixt the Spirit and the flesh; or rather betwixt walking in the Spirit, that is, according to the conduct of the Holy Spirit, and fulfilling the lusts of the flesh. (See 1 Cor. iii. 1. 3. Rom. viii. 4, 5. 13—15.) He might more pertinently have cited 1 Cor. vii. 34. James ii. 26.

[8] Ver. 15. Τῷ πνεύματι, With the Spirit.] I do not think that this phrase, with the Spirit, relates here to the gift of tongues, but to an afflatus enabling them to pray and sing by the impulse of the Holy Ghost: the uttering what this afflatus suggested, in an unknown tongue they had before received, was the great fault the apostle in this chapter endeavours to correct; the person speaking with an unknown tongue, is ὁ λαλῶν γλώσσῃ; the person speaking with an afflatus, whether mysteries, (ver. 2.) prayer, or psalmody, is ὁ λαλῶν πνεύματι, he that speaketh by the Spirit.

[9] Ver. 16. Ὁ ἀναπληρῶν τὸν τόπον τοῦ ἰδιώτου, Who fills up the place of the idiot.] That is, ὁ λαϊκὸς, the laic, say Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact. Buxtorf* informs us, this is a phrase frequent among the Jews: and Maimonides† teacheth, that the word place is used to denote the dignity or estimation of any man, it being frequent with their rabbins to say, Such a one fills up the place of his fathers in such a thing, that is, he resembles them. So Epictetus,‡ in his Enchiridion, saith, Ἡ φιλο-σόφου τάξιν ἐπέχειν δεῖ, ἢ ἰδιώτου, Thou must either hold the place of a philosopher, or of one unlearned: so that to fill up the place of an idiot or unlearned person, is to be one of them, or to be like them in want of understanding of strange tongues. Ridiculous, therefore, are those popish commentators, who interpret this of the clerk of the congregation, there being no such office then, either among Jews or Christians: but when the *minister of the synagogue said prayers, all the people of the synagogue answered Amen after him. It was the custom in the Jewish church (saith Buxtorf†) to say Amen to the blessings or cursings of the priests. To his curses; so the woman, suspected of adultery, was to confirm his imprecations by saying, Amen, Amen: (Numb. v. 22.) so all the people answered Amen, to the curses pronounced from Mount Ebal; (Deut. vii. 15. 26.) and to the oath and imprecation imposed upon them by Nehemiah, (v. 12, 13.) To his blessings; so when Ezra blessed the congregation, All the people answered, Amen, Amen. (Nehem. viii. 6.) And this practice was from them translated to the primitive church.

[10] Ver. 21. Ἐν τῷ νόμῳ γέγραπται, In the law it is written.] All interpreters I have met with refer this to the saying of the prophet Isaiah, xxviii. 11. telling us, it is there mentioned as a miracle shewed to the people, that God would send prophets to them in a language they understood not; but I find no mention of any miracle there: wherefore it may be noted, that in the law, properly so called, among the curses threatened to them for a sign and a wonder,‡ this is one, that the Lord shall bring against them a nation whose tongue they understood not; and then it is intimated, that yet they would not hear: to both these places the apostle may here refer.

In the law it is written, &c.] St. Jerome, upon Isaiah xxviii. 11, 12. saith, the apostle cites this not according to the translation of the Septuagint, or of Symmachus, or Theodotion, but from the Hebrew. But Origen§ saith, Εὗρον τὰ ἰσοδυναμοῦντα τῇ λέξει ταύτῃ ἐν τῇ τοῦ Ἀκύλου ἑρμηνείᾳ κείμενα, I found in the translation of Aquilas words equivalent to those of the apostle here.

[11] Ver. 23. Ἢ ἄπιστοι.] Here Grotius notes, that the heathens and unbelievers then used to come to the assemblies of the Christians; and so we read they did, Acts xiii. 44. 48. and whilst they assembled in the Jewish synagogue, it could not be otherwise.

[12] Ver. 25. Τὰ κρυπτὰ τῆς καρδίας αὐτοῦ φανερὰ γίνεται, The secrets of his heart are made manifest.] For, as Theophylact notes, ἡ ἀποκάλυψις εἶδος ἓν προφητείας, revelation is one species of prophecy: and though it is taken in a restrained sense, and so distinguished from prophecy, ver. 6. yet ver. 30. it is supposed that revelation belongeth to a prophet; and the doctrine, the revelation, the psalm, ver. 26. do all seem to belong to the prophets; the speaker with tongues, the interpreter of them, and the prophet, being the only persons mentioned in the ensuing words, and in this whole chapter; so that what cannot be ascribed to the one, must belong to the other.

[13] Ver. 28. Ἐὰν δὲ μὴ ᾖ διερμηνευτὴς, σιγάτω, But if there be not an interpreter, let him be silent.] The apostle permits him to use his tongue in the presence of one who had the gift of interpretation of tongues, because then the church was not only edified by the interpretation, but the faith of the hearers was confirmed by the exercise of two miraculous gifts: but the apostle permits him not to be his own interpreter, though he could do it; because his speaking that first in an unknown tongue, which he himself must afterward interpret in a known language, served only for ostentation, not for edification; nor could it be known whether his tongue was supernatural, or acquired only.

[14] Ver. 29. Καὶ οἱ ἄλλοι διακρινέτωσαν, And let the rest discern.] Since it is impossible that the afflatus of the Holy Spirit should suggest any falsehood to him that had it, there can be no ground to judge him that had it, as Grotius* hath well observed upon this place. But, saith Theodoret, as the devil raised up false apostles to oppose the true apostles, (1 Tim. ii. 1.) so did he also false prophets, (2 Pet. ii. 1. 1 John iv. 1.) in opposition to those who truly were inspired; and of these, say the Greek interpreters, the true prophets were to judge: or else διακρινέτωσαν, let them discern the agreement of what they utter with the dictates of the same Spirit in the Old Testament, comparing spiritual things with spiritual. (1 Cor. ii. 13.) So in the conference, Acts xv. when Peter had given his judgment in that matter, St. James adds, with this agree the words of the prophets, as it is written, ver. 15.

[15] Ver. 32. Πνεύματα προφητῶν, The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets.] The common interpretation of these words, that the spirits of the true prophets are subject to the judgment, examination, and regulation of other prophets, seems not agreeable to the apostle's affirmation, that he that is spiritual is judged of none, 1 Cor. ii. 13. 15. nor is there any ground for judging his doctrine, who speaks by the impulse of the Holy Ghost; nor doth the apostle say, the spirits of the prophets ought to be, but ὑποτάσσεται, actually are subject to the prophets. I prefer therefore the interpretation of Œcumenius† and Theophylact, that this is spoken in opposition to the heathen prophets; for the prophets among the Greeks, receiving an afflatus from the evil spirit, could not be silent if they would; but it was not so with the holy prophets: they had it in their power to speak, or to be silent; and to this the apostle refers, by saying, The spirits of the prophets, that is, their spiritual gifts, are subject to the prophets; that is, it is in their power to restrain them, and consequently they may prophesy the one after the other. And upon this account the church rejected the ecstatic prophets of the Montanists, that they had an ungovernable impetus; for, say they, they can shew no truly inspired prophet in the Old or New Testament who was moved after this manner.‡ Moreover, it is the opinion of persons eminently learned and judicious, that in Corinth, and some other churches, there were then no settled pastors to perform the public offices, but they were all performed by prophets and by gifted men, excited to that work in the assembly, Christ being thus in the midst of them, (Matt. xviii. 20.) according to his promise. And this they judge more probable touching the church of Corinth, because there seems no order to be observed among them, and no subjection of their prophets to any ruler of the church; no direction of the sentence to them, when the incestuous person was to be delivered up to Satan, or when he was to be absolved: but all seems to be done by the immediate authority of St. Paul. They also, from this chapter, do observe, that whereas all the public offices then performed in the church were prayers and psalmody, expounding or preaching the word, and thanksgivings, all these are here ascribed to men endowed with these spiritual gifts; for that, when they came together, some of them prayed, others composed sacred hymns by their spiritual gifts, we plainly read, ver. 15. that their prophets did then teach for edification, instruction, and comfort, ver. 3. 31. that they did also εὐλογεῖν bless, and εὐχαριστεῖν give thanks, we learn from ver. 16, 17. but that all or any of these things were done by stated pastors, we never read in these Epistles: now if this were so, the occasional prophets might be subject to the standing prophets, mentioned chap. xii. and thus these words may be interpreted by them, who like not the exposition given in the paraphrase.

[16] Ver. 33. Ἀκαταστασίας, Of confusion.] This also confirms the interpretation given of the preceding words; for the prophesying of many together would necessarily breed confusion; whereas the neglect of judging of their prophecies could only be supposed to breed error.

[17] Ver. 34. Αἱ γυναῖκες ὑμῶν, Let your women be silent in the church.] In that of Corinth the women not only prophesied in the church, but they did it with the head uncovered, 1 Cor. xi. 5. the latter indecency he corrects there, and the first here. (See 1 Tim. ii. 12.)

[18] Ver. 35. Ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ λαλεῖν, To speak in the church.] So the Hebrew canon saith,* A woman must not read in the synagogue for the honour due to that assembly: and the heathens declared it indecent for a woman δημηγορεῖν, to speak publicly. (Stob. serm. 72. p. 443. fff.)

[19] Ver. 40. Εὐσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ τάξιν, Decently and in order.] This order, saith Theodoret, he had taught in the words foregoing, Let all things be done decently; not like children, (ver. 20.) not so as to give occasion to others to say you are mad, (ver. 23.) not so as to breed confusion, (ver. 33.) not indecently by women speaking in the church; (ver. 34, 35.) in order, that is, one after another; or by course, (ver. 27. 31.) See Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, descanting upon these words to this effect.

CHAP. XV.

1. MOREOVER, brethren, I declare to you the gospel which I preached to you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand (Gr. have stood);

2. [1] By which also ye are (in the way to be) saved, if ye keep in memory what (i. e. retain the gospel as) I preached (it) to you, (which you will do) unless ye have believed in vain.

3. (I declare, I say, the gospel which I preached;) for I delivered to you first of all (or among the principal doctrines of faith) that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scripture;

4. And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the Scriptures;

5. And that he was seen (after his resurrection) of Cephas, (Luke xxiv. 34.) then [2] of the twelve: (ver. 36. John xx. 19. 26.)

6. (And, that you may not depend upon their testimony only,) after that, he was seen of above [3] five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present (day to testify it), but some are fallen asleep.

7. After that, he was seen of [4] James; then of all the apostles (at his ascension).

8. And last of all he was seen of me also, (Acts ix. 17.) [5] as of one born out of due time (or shape).

9. For I am the least of the apostles, (and one) that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God.

10. But by the grace (and favour) of God (notwithstanding) I am what (now) I am: and his grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain; but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet (it is) not I, but the grace of God that was with me (to which the fruit of all my labour is to be ascribed).

11. Therefore, whether it were I or they (who preach the gospel), so we preach, and so ye (also) believed.

12. Now if Christ be (so) preached that (all who do so unanimously affirm) he rose from the dead, [6] how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?

13. But (or for) if (it be so that) there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen.

14. And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching (in) vain, and your faith is also vain.

15. Yea, and we are (then) found false witnesses of God, because [7] we have testified of (or by) God that he raised up Christ, whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not (at all).

16. For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised:

17. And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; you are yet in your sins, (not justified nor absolved from them, seeing he died for our sins, and rose again for our justification, Rom. iv. 21.)

18. Then they also who have fallen asleep in Christ (and suffered for his name) are perished (so as never to rise up out of that sleep, and so are truly miserable).

19. (For) [8] if in this life only we have hope in Christ, we (Christian sufferers) are of all men most miserable.

20. But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept, (who therefore shall follow after him thus risen, as the whole harvest follows the first-fruits, ver. 23.)

21. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead (the wisdom of God so ordering it, that the same nature which had lost life and immortality should regain it).

22. For as in (the man) Adam (and for his sin in eating the forbidden fruit) all (men proceeding naturally from him) die, even so [9] in (and by the man) Christ shall all (partakers of his nature and Spirit) be made alive.

23. But every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's [10] at his coming (to judgment).

* Dr. Lightfoot in locum.

24. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up (Gr. deliver up) the (mediatory) kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all (other) rule and all authority and power (both of men and devils which opposed his church.

25. Which kingdom till then he cannot deliver up;) for he must reign (according to the promise, Psal. cx. 1.) till he (who made this promise) hath put all enemies under his feet.

26. The last enemy which shall be destroyed (by him) is death.

27. For he (namely the Father) hath (saith the Psalmist) put all things under his feet. But when he saith, All things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted (from this subjection), who did put all things under him. (See note on Heb. ii. 8.)

28. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself (lay down his kingly office in governing his church, and as a man) be subject to him that put all things under him, [11] that God (the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,) may be (immediately) all in all, (by a full communication of himself to, and an intimate union with, all his saints.

29. I say, in opposition to them among you who say, there is no resurrection from the dead, that Christ is risen, and become the first-fruits of them that slept;) else what shall (will) they do [12] who are baptized for the dead (as they must be, if he in whose name they are baptized be still dead), if the dead rise not at all (and so Christ himself is not risen)? why are they then (who hold this doctrine) baptized for the dead?

30. And why stand we in jeopardy every hour (for a dead Jesus)?

31. I protest by your rejoicing (i. e. by that rejoicing) which I have (common with you under all our sufferings, Rom. v. 3.) in Christ Jesus our Lord, I (run the hazard to) die daily; (or, by that rejoicing I have in you, as my children and the fruits of my labours in Christ, 1 Cor. ix. 16. 2 Cor. i. 14. vii. 4. ix. 2. Phil. ii. 16. 1 Thess. ii. 19.)

32. If [13] after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? (it will be then more reasonable to say,) let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die. (Isa. xxii. 13.

33. But) be not deceived (with such discourses, rather avoid them; for) evil communications corrupt good manners.

34. Awake to righteousness, and sin not; (which advertisement is very needful,) for some among you have not the knowledge of (that righteousness of) God (which doth oblige him to render to men according to their works, 2 Thess. i. 6, 7. Heb. vi. 10.) I speak this to your shame.

35. But some men will (yet) say, How are the dead raised up (again)? [14] and with what (kind of) body do they come?

36. Thou fool, (who makest an inquiry about a matter of which thou hast an instance in the very seed thou sowest, for) that which thou sowest is not quickened, except (first) it die (and lie buried in the earth):

37. And (again) that which thou sowest, (when) thou sowest (it is) not that body which shall be (again produced), but [15] bare (or naked) grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain:

38. But God giveth it a body (clothed) as it hath pleased him, and (yet) to every seed (he giveth with the clothing) his own (kind of) body.

39. (And as) all flesh is not the same (kind of) flesh, but there is one kind of flesh of men, another (kind of) flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds:

40. (And as there is a like difference in the qualities of bodies; for) there are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another:

41. (And as in the celestial bodies) there is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory:

42. So also is (it as to) the resurrection of the dead, (the body raised being in quality much different from the earthly body we at present have; for) it is sown in corruption (frail, mortal, subject to death and putrefaction); it is raised in incorruption (not subject any more to death or dissolution):

43. It is sown in dishonour (with some dishonourable parts, 1 Cor. xii. 23. a vile body, Phil. iii. 21. subject to filth and deformity); it is raised in glory: (in clarity and splendour, shining like the sun, Matt. xiii. 43. and like Christ's glorious body, Phil. iii. 21. free from all defect or deformity of its members, or from any dishonourable parts, 1 Cor. vi. 13.) it is sown in weakness (subject to weakness by labour, to decays by age, to impotency and wasting by diseases); it is raised in power (nimble, strong, active, and that without reluctancy or molestation, grief, pain, or lassitude):

44. It is sown a natural (Gr. [16] an animal) body (having multiplicity of organs, muscles, tendons, arteries, veins, nerves, by which, by the assistance of the animal and vital spirits, it perceives the objects of sense, moves, and conveys nourishment to all its parts, wanting continual recruits of meat and drink); it is raised a spiritual body (possessed and acted by the Holy Spirit, and advanced so far to the perfection of spirits, as to be free from grossness, ponderosity, from needing rest, sleep, or sustenance). There is a natural (Gr. animal) body, and there is a spiritual body.

45. And so it is written, The first man Adam (from whom we all derive our bodies and our animal life) was made a living soul; (Gen. ii. 7. whereas) the last Adam (i. e. Christ) was made [17] a quickening spirit, (as having power to quicken and confer eternal life on all his members; or, as being the giver of that quickening spirit, by which we shall be raised from the dead, and made spiritual as his body is.

46. I say, there is an animal body, and there is a spiritual body;) howbeit that (body) was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural (Gr. animal); and afterward that which is spiritual.

47. (For) the first man (Adam) is (was) of the earth, earthy (having a body formed of it; and so the animal body derived from him must be earthy): the second man is the Lord (descending) [18] from heaven (to raise our bodies and advance them to that place).

48. As is (was) the earthy, such are they also that are earthy (and live in the animal body as he did): and as is the heavenly, such are they (to be) also that are (to have) heavenly (immortal and shining bodies).

49. And as we have borne the image of the earthy (Adam, being begotten after his fall in his own likeness, with earthy, mortal bodies, Gen. v. 3.) so we shall also [19] bear the image of the heavenly, (partaking in our bodies of his heavenly glory, he changing our vile bodies into the likeness of his glorious body, Phil. iii. 21.)

50. Now this I say, brethren, that [20] flesh and blood (such as ours is) cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth (nor can) corruption inherit incorruption.

51. Behold, I shew you a mystery (i. e. a thing not known to you before); We [21] shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed (in our bodies, before they enter into this kingdom),

52. [22] In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead (in Christ) shall be raised incorruptible, and we (Christians that are then alive) shall be changed (as to this mortal body).

53. For this corruptible (body) must put on incorruption, and this mortal (body) must put on immortality.

54. So when this corruptible shall have [23] put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, [24] Death is swallowed up in victory; (i. e. is overcome for ever, so as never to have any strength or power over our bodies any more.

55. So that Christians may sing triumphantly in the words of the prophet Hosea, xiii. 14.) O death, [25] where is thy sting? O grave, where is (now) thy victory? (it is for ever swallowed up of life, 2 Cor. v. 4.)

56. The sting of death (or that which causeth death) is (was) sin; and the strength of sin (to subject us to it) is (was) the law (threatening death for it).

57. But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory (over it) through (the death and resurrection of) our Lord Jesus Christ.

58. Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast (and) unmoveable, (by any temptations from this faith, and be ye) always abounding [26] in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord (but shall be plentifully recompensed by him at the resurrection of the just).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XV.

[1] Ver. 2. Δι' οὗ καὶ σώζεσθε, By which also ye are saved.] They who by embracing the Christian faith were brought into that way which leadeth to salvation, and in which, if they persevered, they would assuredly be saved, are styled in Scripture, οἱ σωζόμενοι, the saved, Acts ii. 47. 1 Cor. i. 28. and are said σώζεσθαι, to be saved, Rom. viii. 24. 2 Tim. i. 9. 1 Pet. iii. 21. (see note on Eph. ii. 5. 8. and on Tit. iii. 5.) so here it signifies, you are at present in a state of salvation, and will assuredly enjoy it, if you retain and live suitably to the faith delivered to you.

[2] Ver. 5. Τοῖς δώδεκα, Of the twelve.] i. e. Of the society of the apostles, consisting formerly of twelve persons, and therefore so called still, (John xx. 24.) though in strictness of speech they were but eleven when Thomas was with them, and ten in his absence. (Matt. xxviii. 16. Luke xxiv. 33.)

[3] Ver. 6. Πεντακοσίοις ἀδελφοῖς, To five hundred brethren;] Of whom he was seen in Galilee, where he had many disciples; for before his resurrection he told his disciples, that, being risen, he would go before them into Galilee: (Matt. xxvi. 32.) after his resurrection the angel sent this message to them, Behold, he goes before you into Galilee, there you shall see him, as he said unto you. (Mark xvi. 7.) Now it may reasonably be thought that the eleven, who went themselves into Galilee to the mountain which Jesus had appointed, even after they had seen him at Jerusalem, (Luke xxiv. 33. 36.) would acquaint the seventy, and others who believed in Jesus, where it was he appointed to be seen of them; and then, no doubt, their curiosity, as well as their affection to him, would induce them to repair to the place. Now, that they who had believed in Jesus were very many, will be evident, if we consider how often it is said in the gospel, that many believed on his name, John ii. 23. vii. 31. viii. 10. x. 42. and that great multitudes believed on him, John xii. 42. iv. 1. that many of the rulers believed on him, that he baptized more disciples than John, and that the pharisees complained that the world was gone after him. If you say we only read of the eleven going to Galilee, Matt. xxviii. 16. I answer, that others might go with them, though no mention be made of them; or that the rest might be inhabitants of Galilee, where most of Christ's disciples dwelt. If you still object, that the number of the names of Christ's disciples, after his ascension, are reckoned only one hundred and twenty, Acts i. 15. it is answered by Dr. Lightfoot, that the number of one hundred and twenty are not to be accounted the whole number of believers at that time, but only the number of those who had followed Christ continually, ver. 21. to be sure they were not all the disciples in Judea, but only in Jerusalem.

That this appearance of Christ to them was before his ascension, is evident, because this was in Galilee, (Luke xxiv. 50.) and, saith tradition, on Mount Tabor; his ascension was nigh to Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives; (Acts i. 12.) and Christ and his angel giving them such timely notice of his going before them to the place, it is probable it was some considerable time before his ascension.

As for the note of some, that Christ was seen of these five hundred brethren in the air, because the Greek word is ἐπάνω, upwards, it seems very light; for that word joined with numbers still signifies plusquam, or more than, as doth our English word upwards, and the Hebrew מעל: so Mark xiv. 5. ἐπάνω τριακοσίων δηναρίων, is more than three hundred pieces of silver; ἀπὸ πέντε καὶ εἰκοσαετοῦς καὶ ἐπάνω, from five-and-twenty years and upwards, Numb. iv. 3. 23. 30. 35. 39. 43. 47. viii. 25. ἀπὸ εἰκοσαετοῦς καὶ ἐπάνω, from twenty years and upwards, Numb. i. 3. 20. 22. 24. 26. 28. xiv. 29. 1 Chron. xxiii. 24. 2 Chron. xxxi. 17. Ezra iii. 8. ἀπὸ μηνιαίου καὶ ἐπάνω, from a month and upwards, Numb. iii. 15. 22. 28. 34. 39. 43. xxvi. 62.

[4] Ver. 7. Ἰακώβῳ, Of James,] The Just, the brother of the Lord, saith the tradition of the church, and the gospel of the Nazarenes. (See Dr. Hammond, and Jerome in Catal. Script. Eccles.)

[5] Ver. 8. Ὡσπερεὶ τῷ ἐκτρώματι, As of one born out of due time.] Ἔκτρωμα, say Hesychius, Phrynicus, and Phavorinus, is παιδίον νεκρὸν ἄωρον, a dead child born out of due time; ἐκβολὴ γυναικὸς, one whom the woman casts forth. St. Paul therefore having not seen Christ, of whom he was to testify, till after his conversion, and our Lord's ascension, as the rest of the apostles had, (John xv. 27. Acts i. 21, 22.) speaks of himself as a witness born out of due time.

[6] Ver. 12. Πῶς λέγουσί τινες ἐν ὑμῖν, How say some among you?] That there were some in the apostle's time who taught that the resurrection was past already, we learn from 2 Tim. ii. 18. but that they were Jews, who of sadducees had embraced the Christian religion, as Mr. Le Clerc asserts,* I find no reason to believe: much less, that the false apostle, or apostles, so styled by St. Paul, not in his First but Second Epistle to the Corinthians, should be of the Jewish sadducees; for they being the great opposers of Christ's resurrection, (Acts iv. 1, 2.) and the great adversaries of St. Paul, upon this very account, that he testified that Christ was risen from the dead, (Acts xxiii. 6. 8.) and this doctrine being of so great importance, that the denying of it rendered both the preaching of the apostles and the faith of their hearers vain (ver. 14. of this chapter): sure the apostle could not say of such men, Are they the ministers of Christ? I am more; so 2 Cor. xi. 23. or that they transformed themselves into the apostles of Christ, (ver. 13.)

The gnostics† taught not that the resurrection was past already, but only that the flesh was not fit to rise, and that it was incapable of salvation and incorruption, and therefore they are generally said by the ancients to deny the resurrection, but none of them insinuate that it was past already. The Marcionites‡ are by Clemens Alexandrinus said to have held this doctrine, and to have renounced matrimony, because in the resurrection (saith Christ) they do not marry. But Marcion began his heresy in the second century, and therefore could not infect the church of Corinth with it in St. Paul's time. Menander indeed taught, that they who received his baptism were made partakers of the resurrection by it, and that they should not die; and he, according to many of the ancients, was contemporary with St. Paul: (see note on 2 Tim. ii. 18.) but haply St. Paul refers here to none of these, but only to the philosophers among them, as St. Chrysostom thinks; for Corinth being an eminent city of Achaia, where the philosophers and wise men of the world abounded, who looked upon the resurrection of the flesh as a thing both impossible and absurd, (see here note on ver. 35.) and placed their future happiness in their exemption from the clog and prison of the body, they might put a new construction on the doctrine of the resurrection, saying it only did import a renovation of our manners, or a resurrection from the death of sin unto a life of righteousness, and so it was performed already in that baptism in which we are raised with Christ from the dead. (Colos. ii. 12.)

[7] Ver. 15. Ἐμαρτυρήσαμεν κατὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, We have testified of God.] It being very rare that κατὰ with a genitive case signifies de, i. e. of, these words may be rendered per Deum, by God; as, because he could swear καθ' οὐδενὸς μείζονος, by none greater, he hath sworn καθ' ἑαυτοῦ by himself, Heb. vi. 13. and ver. 16. men swear κατὰ τοῦ μείζονος, by a greater: so Matt. xxvi. 63. I adjure thee κατὰ Θεοῦ, by God: so in the Old Testament, the Lord hath sworn καθ' ἑαυτοῦ, by himself, or, I have sworn καθ' ἐμαυτοῦ, by myself, Isa. xlv. 23. Jer. xlix. 13. Amos vi. 6.: so 1 Kings ii. 23. Solomon swears κατὰ τοῦ Κυρίου, by the Lord; and iii. 43. the oath of the Lord, κατὰ σοῦ, made by the Septuagint them that swore κατὰ τοῦ Κυρίου, by the Lord, κατὰ by Malcon. (See Isa. lxii. 8. Amos iv. 2. viii. 7. 14.) And then the sense runs thus: We have pretended to be μάρτυρες αὐτοῦ, God's witnesses in this matter, (Acts v. 32.) and by the power of miracles, and of the Holy Ghost, derived from him, to bear witness to the resurrection of Christ; and so must be false witnesses of God, if he hath not raised him from the dead. (See here Examen Millii.)

[8] Ver. 19. Εἰ ἐν τῇ ζωῇ ταύτῃ, If in this life only we have hope.] The apostle seems not here to say, that, if there should be no resurrection of the body, the Christian could have only hope in this life; for if the soul be immortal, and may be happy after its separation from the body, this seems not to follow: but he argues thus, If Christ is not risen for our justification, we are yet under the guilt of sin, (ver. 17.) and if so, both soul and body must perish after death, (ver. 18.) and then the hope of Christians must terminate with this life, which being more especially to them a life of misery, by reason of the sufferings to which their faith doth here expose them, they would of all men be most miserable.

[9] Ver. 22. Ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, In Christ.] The opinion of the Jews was this, that the Messias was the second Adam who should raise the dead: his name, say they,* is called Jinnon, Psal. lxxii. 17. for he shall raise them that sleep in the dust. And the last man, or Adam, is the Messiah,† who shall be above Moses, and above the ministering angels: he shall take away the old sin from whence death came, and in his days shall be the resurrection of the dead; and this God intended in the creation of Adam, that he should be immortal, but sin brought death upon him, therefore the Divine intention, which was not fulfilled in the first Adam, was fulfilled in the King Messiah. Thus is the doctrine of the church delivered by Irenæus,‡ that Christ took our nature upon him, and suffered death in it; that as, by man vanquished, death fell upon all mankind, so, by man conquering, we may ascend to life; that, whereas we were all dead in the animal Adam, we may be quickened in the spiritual.

[10] Ver. 23. Ἐν τῇ παρουσίᾳ αὐτοῦ, At his coming.] This chapter contains many arguments against the doctrine of the resurrection of some saints before the rest, to reign with Christ on earth a thousand years: for (1.) from the words, every man in his own order, it might have reasonably been expected, that some mention should have been made, as of Christ the first-fruits, so of the first and second resurrection; but yet we see, that when the apostle is professedly speaking of the order in which we shall arise, he hath nothing to say of this first resurrection, which, it seems, is to happen a thousand years before the general resurrection; and nothing of a first or second advent of our Lord; one to reign on earth a thousand years, a second to judge all the world; and yet this double advent is as necessary, as is Christ's reign on earth.

Moreover, the end and the delivery up of this kingdom are here made contemporary with his advent; and the resurrection of all that are Christ's is to be at this very advent: but how can he deliver up his kingdom, and yet reign on earth a thousand years? In a word, if all that are his must be raised at his coming to the final judgment, then none before that coming, and then they must be all raised together, not some a thousand years before the rest.

[11] Ver. 28. Ἵνα ᾖ ὁ Θεὸς πάντα ἐν πᾶσιν, That God may be all in all.] He saith not that the Father, mentioned ver. 24. but that God may be all in all, and so he seems to lead us to that interpretation of the Godhead, which comprehends Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and then the import of the phrase, That God may be all in all, will be this: That the Godhead may govern all things immediately by himself, without the intervention of a Mediator between him and us, to exact our obedience in his name, and convey to us his favours and rewards, we being then to tender all our duty immediately to him, and derive all our happiness immediately from him. So that as now Christ, Theanthropos, God-man, is all in all, (Colos. iii. 11.) because the Father hath put all things into his hands, does all things, and governs all things, by him; when this economy ceases, the Godhead alone will be all in all, as governing and influencing all things by himself immediately.

Moreover, the Jews say, that *the kingdom of the Messiah shall return to its first Author, and so saith the apostle here; for, though it shall have no such end as the preceding monarchies had, (Luke i. 32, 33.) by giving place to a succeeding kingdom; for till the world last, οὐ παρελεύσεται, it shall not pass away, or be dissolved by any other kingdom, (Dan. vii. 14.) but shall be an eternal kingdom, in the sense in which he is a Priest for ever, and hath τὴν Ἱερωσύνην ἀπαράβατον, a priesthood that doth not pass away, (Heb. vii. 17. 24, 25.) and so he is able to intercede for ever for us; yet, as that priesthood must needs cease, when the subject of it ceaseth, and he hath none to intercede for, so must his kingly office cease, when all his friends have that eternal life conferred upon them, for which this power was committed to him, (John xvii. 2.) and all his enemies are become his footstool, (Psal. cx. 1.) when there is no more a house of Jacob to reign over, or a throne of David to sit on; (Luke i. 32, 33. Rev. xi. 15.) and the whole office of a Mediator must then cease, when God and man are made completely and indissolubly one.

For farther explication of this matter, let it be observed:

First, That this mediatory kingdom was given to our Lord by the Father; for he hath put all things in subjection to him, (ver. 27.) and that after his resurrection; for it was given as the reward of his sufferings, and so could not be given till they were accomplished: he humbled himself, and became obedient to the death, even to the death of the cross; wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name, which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. (Phil. ii. 8. 10. 11.) Accordingly, after his resurrection, he speaks to his disciples thus, All power is given to me in heaven and in earth, Matt. xxviii. 18. But why this reward should not cease when the work is done; why, v. g. his dominion over death should not cease, when death is destroyed; his power of giving eternal life, or judging, when all are judged, and none are left to be crowned; I confess I do not understand.

2. Seeing the human nature only suffered, and seeing the Divine nature is capable of no such exaltation, or new dominion, it is certain that this kingdom could be given to Christ only according to his human nature; for though the Godhead could alone enable him to execute his kingly office; yet was he thus exalted, this power and judgment was conferred upon him, because he was the Son of man. (John v. 27.) He intercedeth still in heaven by virtue of his blood; all favours are granted to the church through him, and God will judge the world by the man Christ Jesus.

3. During this reign of Christ, God the Father immediately judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son, that all men might honour the Son (by owning his authority) even as they honoured the Father, (John v. 22, 23.) by owning his authority over them. He made him Lord of all things, to punish and reward according to his wisdom, will, and pleasure: and so his human nature, or Christ as man, though subject to the Father, as his viceroy, acting by the authority of him who put all things into his hands, and set him over the works of his hands, (Heb. ii. 7, 8.) and doing all to the glory of God the Father, yet seems not now to be in the same order of subjection to the Father, as are other creatures, i. e. so as to act by his immediate command in all particular transactions, as the holy angels do, obeying his commands, and hearkening to the voice of his word. (Psal. ciii. 20.) They are all ministering spirits, (Heb. i. 13, 14.) but he is set down at the right hand of God in full possession of his mediatory kingdom. Whilst he continued on earth, and acted as a prophet sent from God, he always owned, that he could do nothing of himself, but as the Father gave him commandment, so he did, and so he spake: (John v. 30. viii. 38. xii. 49.) but, being once exalted to be Lord of all things, he acteth as a Lord in all things which relate to his kingly office over his church, giving laws to all, as being Lord of all, and rewarding and punishing according to his will.

4. The exercise of his authority he shall then lay down, when all things are subdued to him, no other kingdom or dominion being to be exercised in the celestial state, but what is essential to the whole Godhead: and though he shall ever so far reign, as to be still at the right hand of God, highly exalted in honour, dignity, and beatitude; and to have still religious respect and veneration from all saints, who then are to reign with him, (2 Tim. ii. 12.) and be owned by them as their king; and though the effects of his kingly power shall continue for ever, his enemies being destroyed, and his saints reigning in bliss for ever; yet the exercise of that kingly power shall then cease, and he as man shall be then subject to the Father, as other saints and angels will be; that so as Christ before was all in all, (Colos. iii. 13.) with reference to his church, and from his fulness did they all receive, so now the Godhead may be all in all, and fill all things immediately by himself. This is only my conjecture of the sense of this obscure place, from which, upon better information, I shall willingly recede.

Ver. 28. Τότε καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ υἱός.] The word υἱὸς, crept in, saith Dr. Mills, from the margin: see this confuted by full authority, Examen Millii.

* Pirk. Eliezer, cap. 12. p. 26.

[12] Ver. 29. Οἱ βαπτιζόμενοι ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, Who are baptized for the dead.] i. e. For that Jesus, who, according to their doctrine, must be still dead. To strengthen this exposition, let it be noted,

First, That it is absolutely certain, that all who received Christian baptism were baptized in the name of Jesus; but it is very uncertain whether any in the apostle's time were baptized for them who died without baptism, or to fill up the place of those Christians who died after baptism: there is no intimation of any such thing in Scripture, or in primitive antiquity.

Secondly, That the apostle doth not say, What do they that baptize for the dead? but τί ποιήσουσιν οἱ βαπτιζόμενοι, what will they do who are baptized already, if the dead rise not again? τί καὶ βαπτίζονται, why are they also baptized for the dead? We who believe otherwise of him, and preach ἐν τῷ Ἰησοῦ, by this raised Jesus, the resurrection from the dead, (Acts iv. 2.) may well be baptized in the name of Christ; but why are they so, who believe him dead? what will they do? what motive can they have to stand to their baptismal covenant, and own a dead man as their Lord and Saviour? what inducement can they have to continue faithful to him to the end, but this, that, if they suffer, they shall also reign together with him? what will they do for comfort against the fear of death, if, when they fall asleep, they perish, and shall not rise again? must they not be as well the worst of fools, as the most miserable of men, to suffer thus for a dead man, who could not help himself, and therefore is not likely to give them any help in life, or hope in death?

Thirdly, That ὑπὲρ often signifies in gratiam, on the account, or for the sake: so Rom. i. 5. We have received grace and apostleship, &c. ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος αὐτοῦ, for his name's sake; Eph. iii. 13. I desire that you faint not at my tribulations, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, which I suffer for your sake; Phil. i. 29. To you it is given ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ, for the sake of Christ, not only to suffer; Colos. iii. 24. ὑπὲρ τοῦ σώματος αὐτοῦ, for the sake of his body; 2 Thess. i. 5. That you may be accounted worthy of the kingdom of God, ὑπὲρ ἧς πάσχετε, for the sake of which ye also suffer. See more examples, both sacred and profane, in Schmidius on the place, and Dr. Edwards in his preface to the Authority, &c. of the Holy Scripture.

Fourthly, Observe that οἱ νεκροὶ is used in Scripture, when speaking of one single person. Thus, when Christ had raised the widow's son, he bids John's disciples tell him, that νεκροὶ, the dead are raised, Luke vii. 15. 22. and so here, ver. 12, 13. If there be no ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν, resurrection of one single person from the dead, then is not Christ risen: yea, the resurrection νεκρῶν, of the dead in general is thrice mentioned by this apostle, when speaking of the resurrection of Christ alone: thus, when he saith, God will judge the world by Christ, of which he hath given us a demonstration, having raised him ἐκ νεκρῶν, from the dead, Acts xvii. 30, 31. it follows, that when they heard him asserting the resurrection of the dead, ἀνάστασιν νεκρῶν, they mocked; whereas he had only asserted the resurrection of Christ from the dead. Thus St. Paul saith twice, περὶ καὶ ἐλπίδος ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν, for the hope and resurrection of the dead, I am called in question, Acts xxiii. 6. xxiv. 21. and yet he was not called in question about the resurrection of the dead in general, for that the pharisees believed as well as he, but only concerning one Jesus who was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive, (Acts xxv. 19.) or risen from the dead. And so the apostle saith, Christ was declared to be the Son of God with power, ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νέκρῶν, by his rising from the dead, Rom. i. 4. and here, If Christ be risen, how say some among you, that ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν οὐκ ἔστιν, there is no resurrection of the dead? And this import of the phrase seems to be confirmed by the word ὅλως, viz. If it be wholly and entirely true of all that are dead, that they rise not, and so Christ is not risen, what avails it any that they are baptized for the dead?

Ἐπεὶ τί ποιήσουσιν οἱ βαπτιζόμενοι ὑπὲρ νεκρῶν, Were it not so, what will they do who are baptized for the dead?] Here Mr. Dodwell refers to the custom mentioned by Epiphanius, that some heretics, when any who professed Christianity died without baptism, baptized others in their stead; whereas the words are only capable of these two interpretations, either that of the ancients,* Why are they baptized for the resurrection of the dead? that is, in expectation and belief of that fundamental article of the Christian faith? Or, why are they baptized for, or on the account of, that Jesus who is dead; and, say they, is not risen from the dead? which is the sense I have given of these words. To make this evident, and shew the vanity of the interpretation which Mr. Dodwell hath embraced, let it be noted,

First, That the conjunctive particle, ἐπεὶ, as Phavorinus and Budæus have observed, signifies εἰ δὲ μὴ, "alioquin, quod si non;" if it be otherwise, or, were it not so: thus it is used by the apostle ten several times, Rom. iii. 6. ἐπεὶ, if it be not so, that God is righteous, how shall he judge the world? xi. 6. ἐπεὶ, if it were otherwise, grace would not be grace; ἐπεὶ and were it otherwise, works would not be works; and ver. 22. ἐπεὶ, otherwise thou shalt be cut off; 1 Cor. vii. 14. ἐπεὶ, were it not so, their children would be unclean; xiv. 16. ἐπεὶ ἐὰν, otherwise, when thou blessest in the Spirit, how shall the unlearned say, Amen? Heb. ix. 17. ἐπεὶ, otherwise his will is of no force; and ver. 26. ἐπεὶ οὐκ ἂν ἐπαύσαντο, otherwise they would not have ceased to be offered; (which by the way is a probable inducement to believe, that the Epistle to the Hebrews was written by St. Paul; this conjunction being not once used in this sense in the evangelists, or in the other Epistles:) now hence it clearly follows, that this conjunction must contain an inference from what was said before, viz. that Christ was risen as the first-fruits of them that slept, and were to be raised by him from that sleep, and was to reign till he had vanquished their last enemy death; for (saith the apostle) if this were not so, that is, if Christ were not risen, or, being risen, were not to reign till he had overcome death, and so had raised us also from it; why are men baptized ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, for a dead Jesus, or in hopes of a resurrection by him from the dead? So that one of these two senses of this dark passage must obtain.

Secondly, Observe, that the apostle's question runs not thus, Why do they baptize others for the dead? or, Why are others baptized in their stead? but, τί ποιήσουσιν, What will they do who are baptized? Which question relating to the deportment of those who undergo this baptism, and not at all to them for whose sakes they do it, excludes any relation of these words to that pretended practice; for, if it was done by any, it was not with relation to their own deportment, who were living, but with relation to the dead. Moreover, the three questions, Why are they baptized for the dead? or, Why stand we in jeopardy every hour? or, What advantageth it me, if I have fought with beasts at Ephesus? seem plainly to relate to the same matter, and therefore must all relate to the deportment of the living under the evils and persecutions which Christians suffered in this present life, and be to this effect: Why are they who say, Christ is not risen, and therefore can expect no resurrection from him, baptized in his name, or in expectation of this benefit from him? What will they do in times of persecution? What inducement can they have to stand to their baptismal covenant, and own a dead man as their Lord and Saviour?

Add to this, that though Tertullian,* by saying Si autem et baptizantur quidam pro mortuis, supposes such a thing might be done by some, yet he neither mentions time nor persons. Epiphanius,† in the fourth century, saith, they had a tradition concerning some heretics in Asia and Galatia, ὡς τινῶν μὲν παρ' αὐτοῖς προφθανόντων τελευτῆσαι ἀνεὺ βαπτίσματος, ἄλλους δὲ ἀντ' αὐτῶν εἰς ὄνομα ἐκείνων βαπτίζεσθαι, that some among them being prevented by death from receiving baptism, others of them were baptized in their names; καὶ τούτου ἕνεκα ἡ παράδοσις ἡ ἐλθοῦσα παρ' ἡμᾶς φησι τὸν αὐτὸν ἅγιον ἀπόστολον εἰρηκέναι εἰ ὅλως, &c. and that he had received it by tradition; that upon this account the apostle said, If the dead rise not at all, why are they then baptized for the dead? But as he is the only person who speaks of this tradition, so is he guilty of a manifest contradiction in his relation of it: for having told us that the heretics, who practised thus, owned indeed the resurrection of our Lord; which, saith he, the Corinthians denied, and therefore were not of this sect; but yet said, νεκροὺς δὲ οὐκ ἐγείρεσθαι, that the dead were not to be raised, and so denied the resurrection of the dead; yet he adds, that they used this practice, ὑπὲρ τοῦ μὴ ἐν τῇ ἀναστάσει ἀναστάντας αὐτοὺς δίκην δοῦναι τιμωρίας βάπτισμα μὴ εἰληφότας, that they, who died without baptism, might not, at the resurrection, be punished for want of baptism. St. Chrysostom and Theophylact say, that the Marcionites, when any of their sect died without baptism, put a live man under the bed in which the dead man lay, and then asked the dead, whether he would be baptized; and the man under the bed answering, Yes, they baptized the dead man, εἶτα ἐγκαλούμενοι, and, being accused of this ridiculous practice, they pleaded, that the apostle spake of some who were baptized for the dead, τὸ δὲ οὐκ οὕτως ἔχει, whereas he said no such matter, but only said, If the dead rise not, why are they baptized for the resurrection of the dead? They therefore knew of no such practice in the apostle's time, or of any tradition relating to it: and certainly it is, the apostle could not relate unto this practice of the Marcionites, seeing Marcion began his heresy in the second century, and so long after the writing of this Epistle. In a word, if they, who are supposed to practise thus, believed the resurrection, they could not be concerned in the apostle's argument against them, who did not believe it; if they did not believe the resurrection of the body, when once dead, it cannot be imagined, why they should be concerned to baptize a dead body, or any other body for it. See the text defended against the surmises of Dr. Mills, Examen Millii, ibid.

[13] Ver. 32. Κατ' ἄνθρωπον, After the manner of men.] i. e. After the usual manner of heathens. That St. Paul thus fought with beasts indeed, and they would not touch him, they, saith Nicephorus,* who writ the life of this apostle do affirm: Theodoret seems plainly to hint the same thing in these words, In human opinion I was made the food of beasts, but I was wonderfully preserved from them:† and this sense will appear more probable,

1. From the phrase κατ' ἄνθρωπον, which signifies, as men used to do, but never, according to men's purposes, or, to speak after the manner of men. (See the note on 1 Cor. ix. 8.)

2. From the place here particularly mentioned, Ephesus, which cannot refer to the tumult there caused by Demetrius, for the apostle suffered nothing in it. Had he intended a combat with metaphorical beasts, or savage men, that at Lystra, where he was stoned and left for dead, (Acts xiv. 19.) had been more properly mentioned; see the note on 2 Cor. i. 8—10. where he speaks of such troubles that befel him in Asia, as made him to despair even of life; though as we read nothing in the Acts of this fight with beasts, so we read nothing of that trouble. It is therefore no objection against this interpretation, that this fight with beasts is not recorded by St. Luke, or that St. Paul speaks not expressly of it in the catalogue of his afflictions, 2 Cor. xi. it is sufficient that there he tells us, he was in deaths often, (ver. 23.)

If this sense be not liked, you may interpret κατ' ἄνθρωπον, according to the intention of men, it being the intention of the men of Asia in that tumult, to deal so with Paul's companions, and much more with him, had not his friends dissuaded him from entering into the theatre; (see note on Acts xix. 29.) and note also, that cruel and bloody-minded men are often represented under this metaphor of beasts: so Ignatius,‡ when he was carried from Syria to Rome, under a band of soldiers (who, saith he, are the worse for the kindness I shew to them), he saith, ἀπὸ Συρίας μέχρι Ῥώμης θηριομαχῶ, from Syria to Rome I fight with beasts. And Heraclitus§ the Ephesian saith, "Ephesiorum cives conversos esse in bestias," the Ephesians were turned into beasts, because they slew one another.

[14] Ver. 35. Ποίῳ σώματι, With what kind of body?] This was the question of the philosophers,‖ whose chief objection against the resurrection of the flesh, and of the body, was this; That the body was ¶ the prison and the sepulchre of the soul, and that it was her punishment to be tied to it; that the body was the great hinderance to the knowledge of the truth; and that we could not be truly happy, till by death we were delivered from it: it was therefore judged by them, not only an impossible thing, but even an unjust, unworthy thing, for God to raise these bodies to be united to those souls, whose happiness consisted in being delivered from the body, and whose punishment it was to be confined to it; that being according to their philosophy,* not to make them alive but die again. And therefore Celsus saith, The hope of the resurrection of the flesh is the hope of worms, a filthy, an abominable, an impossible thing, which God neither will nor can do. Hence probably it was that the Valentinians, Marcionites, Basilidians, the followers of Saturninus, and other primitive heretics, denied so stiffly τῆς σαρκὸς ἀνάστασιν, the resurrection of the flesh, (Just. Mart. Dial. p. 307. 253.) and said, "non esse capacem carnem vitæ," that the flesh was not capable of life, (Iren. lib. i. cap. 29. lib. v. cap. 41.) because they held with the philosophers, "corpus esse carcerem," the body was the prison of the soul. (Idem. lib. i. cap. 24.) Now, to this objection the apostle here returns a full and satisfactory answer, by shewing the happy change which shall then pass upon the raised body; and this he seems to do with some resemblance to the ancient philosophy of the Pythagoreans and Platonists, and to the sentiments of the Jews.

That here are two questions, but then both have respect to the manner or the qualities of the bodies to be raised, for the apostle saith not διατί, why are dead men raised to life again? or, why do they live again? but πῶς ἐγείρονται, how, after what manner, are they raised? are they raised with such mortal bodies as they had before, or with bodies subject to the like distempers and infirmities which we now suffer in this life? or if not, with what kind of bodies? do their bodies rise naked? or are they clothed upon? This is exceedingly evident from the whole discourse of the apostle in answer to these questions, which gives no reason why they being dead do rise again, but wholly is employed in shewing what are the qualities and conditions of the raised bodies of good men.

[15] Ver. 37. Γυμνὸν κόκκον, Naked grain.] Note here, that the Jewish rabbins† use the same similitude of grain in the affair of the resurrection, and speak also of a clothing of the body raised, from the example of grain raised with a covering. (See note on 2 Cor. v. 2—4.) Note also, that St. Paul is not discoursing of the identity of the raised body, but only of the qualities with which it is raised.

[16] Ver. 44. Σῶμα ψυχικὸν, An animal body.] It seems hence probable, that the word sown doth not relate to the body's being lain in the earth, but rather to its production into the world; for, when it is interred, it is no more an animal body, but a body void of life; it is not only weak, but wholly destitute of power: and this appears yet farther, from the following proof of these words, It is sown an animal body, for so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul. The apostle doth indeed, ver. 36, 37. speak of seed sown in the earth, but then he speaks of it as still alive, and having its seminal virtue, or animal spirit in it, and after dying there; whereas our bodies first die, and then are cast into the earth.

Secondly, Hence it is also probable, that the apostle discourseth not here of the different degrees of glory which the saints hereafter shall enjoy; for he speaks only of what is raised, that is, the body, and of the qualities belonging to all bodies that are raised.

Thirdly, Certain it is that the apostle in this chapter discourseth only of the resurrection of the just, since it is alone their bodies that shall undergo this happy change.

Fourthly, Observe, that there is another sense of the forty-fourth verse, as good as that which I have given in the paraphrase, viz. There is an animal body, i. e. a body fitted for this lower sensible state in which we live at present; and there is a spiritual body, that is, a body fitted for our spiritual and celestial state: in this state we are forced to serve our bodies, and to attend their leisure, and mightily depend upon them in the operations of the mind; in the other, our bodies shall wholly serve our spirits, and minister to them, and depend upon them, and therefore may be styled spiritual. But,

Fifthly, That our bodies shall be then spiritual, thin, and aerial, is neither a new doctrine nor proper to the followers of Origen; for so both St. Chrysostom and Theophylact upon the place allow it to be. What incredible thing assert we (saith Isidore Peleusiot*), if we say the body is small and aerial? for by this we do not deny it to be the same body. And again, The apostle calls our bodies spiritual, διὰ τὸ κοῦφα καὶ αἰθέρια μέλλειν ἔσεσθαι,† because hereafter they shall be light and etherial. And this, which the apostle here says, is suitable to the philosophy of the Pythagoreans and Platonists, who taught that good and pure souls were by death delivered from those gross and earthly bodies which press down the soul, (Wisd. ix. 15.) and were after the dissolution of the body, said they, will be at the resurrection of the body saith he,‡ invested with thin and aerial, with active and spiritual, with bright and shining, and, lastly, with celestial and eternal bodies. Now to this plainly answers the description of our raised bodies here given by St. Paul, in answer to the second question of the philosophers at Corinth, With what bodies do they come forth out of the grave? declaring in their very terms, that this body will be σῶμα πνευματικὸν καὶ οὐράνιον, a spiritual and celestial body, ver. 44. 46. 48, 49. 2 Cor. v. 1. that it will be οἰκία αἰώνιος, an eternal house, σῶμα ἄφθαρτον καὶ ἀθάνατον, an incorruptible and immortal, body, ver. 53, 54. that it will be raised ἐν δόξῃ, in glory, and so be αὐγοειδὲς, a shining body. The just (saith Christ) shall shine as the sun, and as the brightness of the firmament; (Matt. xiii. 43.) and as the stars, saith Daniel, (xii. 3.) And this answers to the σῶμα ἀστροειδὲς, which these philosophers mention as the same with their αὐγοειδὲς, shining body. Lastly, It is raised in power, and this is in sense the same with their σῶμα εὐκίνητον, agile body, and of quick motion. Indeed, the parallel is so exact, that seeing I find nothing of this nature in the life of Pythagoras, writ by Diogenes Laertius, or in Plato, but only in those writers who lived since Christ's time, and were professed enemies of Christianity, Hierocles, Porphyry, Proclus, and Jamblichus, I am apt to suspect, that as in other things they apparently dressed up their philosophy and morality anew, to accommodate it the better to the Christian philosophy, that so there might seem less need of Christianity; and particularly made the felicity of souls hereafter much like the Christian doctrine, that so they might destroy, or render needless, the doctrine of the resurrection; so they gave to the dying souls of good men this ὄχημα ψυχῆς, or vehicle of a spiritual, immortal, shining, heavenly body also, from the Christian notion of the change our raised bodies should then undergo. [17] Ver. 45. Πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, A quickening spirit.] All the ancients till St. Austin, by a spiritual body seem to understand a body possessed and acted by the Holy Spirit, as the natural body is by the animal and vital spirits; and say, that Christ was made a quickening spirit by the seed of the Holy Spirit, which unites him to all his members, and confers on them a new life and immortality. Irenæus* is very express and copious in this matter, saying, That, as from the beginning of our frame in Adam, that inspiration of life which proceeded from God, united to the body, animated man, and made him a reasonable creature; so in the end, the word of the Father, and the Spirit of God, united to the old substance of the frame of Adam, make a living and a perfect man, receiving the perfect Father; that, as we all died in the animal, we may be all quickened in the spiritual Adam; and that by the Spirit the bodies rising are made spiritual, as by the Spirit they have life eternal:—It is called spiritual, as putting on the Spirit, saith Tertullian:† As receiving the whole energy and communion of the Spirit, saith Methodius.‡ And that the resurrection of the just shall be effected by the Spirit of God, seems to be plainly taught by the apostle in these words, If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you. (Rom. viii. 10.) And this agrees with the opinion of the Jews, who ascribe the resurrection to the Spirit, from Ezek. xxxvii. 10. and in particular to the Spirit of the Messiah. And from this differs not much the opinion of Theodoret, and others, That Christ is made a quickening Spirit, because he himself being quickened by the Spirit, (1 Pet. iii. 18.) hath himself the power to quicken and raise the bodies of his servants to eternal life; for as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them, so the Son quickeneth whom he will, (John v. 21.) and as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself, (ver. 26.)

Moreover, that Christ is said here to be εἰς πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, for a quickening spirit, not with relation to his quickening the soul by the body only, is visible to any who will peruse the whole discourse of the apostle here, since it relateth only to the truth and manner of the resurrection. For after the apostle had dispatched his proof of our Lord's resurrection, he concludes thus, Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept; for as by man came death, so by man came also the resurrection of the dead: for as, ἐν τῷ Ἀδὰμ, by Adam all men die, so also, ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, by Christ, all ζωοποιηθήσονται, shall be made alive again. Now this is the very word used by Christ, in reference to his power of raising the dead, when he saith, As the Father raises the dead, καὶ ζωοποιεῖ, and makes them alive again, so the Son ζωοποιεῖ, gives life to whom he will. For as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself. (John v. 21. 26.)

After this the apostle proceeds to the inquiry of the unbeliever, How are the dead raised up? &c. And, in his answer to this, he begins with the same word; That which thou sowest, οὐ ζωοποιεῖται, is not quickened except it die; and then shews the difference of our present body, subject to death, and the condition of our future bodies, saying, It is sown, or born into the world, σῶμα ψυχικὸν, an animal body; that is, a body which, by the animal and vital spirits in it, lives, moves, perceives, and conveys nourishment to all its parts; it is raised, σῶμα πνευματικὸν, a spiritual body; that is, a body quickened by the Spirit of Christ, (Rom. viii. 11.) and advanced so far to the perfection of spirits, as to be immortal as they are, (Luke xx. 35, 36.) and so fitted for the celestial and immortal state: for, saith he, so it is written, The first man Adam, from whom we all derive our bodies and our animal life, was therefore made, εἰς ψυχὴν ζῶσαν, with a soul giving life to his body, and conveying this animal life to others; (Gen. ii. 7.) the second was made, εἰς πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, to revive the body, and quicken it by his Spirit; (John vi. 63.) for having promised, that he would raise up them who spiritually did eat his flesh and drink his blood, he adds, τὸ πνεῦμα ἐστι τὸ ζωοποιοῦν, it is the Spirit that quickeneth. He saith also, That the first man, whose image we bear in our bodies, was χοϊκὸς formed, ἀπὸ χοῦς, from the dust, and so is to return to the dust; the second man, whose image we shall bear, is the Lord from heaven; to wit, descending from it with his glorious and heavenly body, whose image we shall bear by having bodies made like unto his glorious body; not then consisting, when they ascend thither, of flesh and blood, or subject to corruption, as now they are; for this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal body must put on immortality. And this happy resurrection is to be effected by the Spirit of Christ dwelling in us; for if the Spirit of Christ dwell in us, he that raised up Christ from the dead, ζωοποιήσει καὶ, shall also quicken our mortal bodies, by his Spirit dwelling in us; (Rom. viii. 11.) whence it is evident, that Christ, the second Adam, is said to be εἰς πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, not with relation to our souls, but to our bodies, to be raised by him. And thus are these words expounded by Photius in Œcumenius, and by Theophylact on the place.

[18] Ver. 47. Ἐξ οὐρανοῦ, From heaven.] Not as some fancy, because Christ's body was from heaven, and not from the Virgin Mary; for the Scripture expressly teach-

* "Sic in fine Verbum Patris et Spiritus Dei adunitus antiquæ substantiæ psalmationis Adæ, viventem et perfectum efficit hominem capientem perfectum Patrem, ut quemadodum in animali omnes mortui sumus, sic in spirituali omnes vivificemur." eth, that he was begotten ἐξ αὐτῆς, from her body, Matt. i. 16. Luke i. 35. and was the fruit of her womb, Luke i. 42. that he was made, ἐξ γυναικὸς, out of a woman, and came from the fathers, τὸ κατὰ σάρκα, according to the flesh, Rom. ix. 5. and had his body been derived from heaven, it must have been immortal, as our bodies will be when we bear the image of the heavenly Adam; both which things make it necessary to interpret the Lord from heaven, as I have done in the paraphrase.

[19] Ver. 49. Φορέσομεν, We shall bear.] Irenæus, lib. v. cap. 9. Tertullian de Resur. carnis, cap. 49. et adversus Marcion, lib. v. cap. 10. Cyprian adv. Jud. lib. ii. §. 10. et lib. iii. §. 11. De Habitu Virg. ed. Ox. p. 103. de Zelo et Livore, p. 226. Hilar. Diac. in locum, Jerome in Isa. lii. F. 84. 1. read portemus, which answers to the Greek φορέσωμεν, as St. Chrysostom reads, and as the Alexandrian and other copies read. The other reading is owned by Origen against Celsus twice, lib. v. p. 243. and also by Methodius. Theodoret also and Theophylact well note, that the words are not to be read by way of exhortation, φορέσωμεν, let us bear, but φορέσομεν, as a prediction of what we shall be: for the apostle, from ver. 42. to this verse, still passeth on from what we were, to what we shall be; and having said, as is the heavenly, such are (i. e. shall be) they that are heavenly; he proves this, because as we have borne the image of the earthly Adam, so shall we bear the image of the heavenly.

Note also, that Philo speaks much like the apostle; for he saith,* there are two kinds of men, one made after the image of God, and another made out of the earth. The last he proves from the very words the apostle useth to prove there is a natural or animal body; the first from this, that God made man after his own image, which image he styles the Divine Word; and says he is the ἐπουράνιος ἀστὴρ, the heavenly Star, the Fountain of all sensible stars. The last he calls the earthly and corruptible Adam; the first, the Adam made after the image which is not (saith he†) earthly, but heavenly. The one is heavenly, as being made after the image of God; and so incapable of any corruptible or earthy substance; the other out of seminal matter, which the Scripture calleth earth. But then he saith, that the heavenly man was formed first, and after him the earthy; and, perhaps, for the correction of that error, the apostle might here say, That was not first which is spiritual, but that which was natural.

[20] Ver. 50. Σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα, Flesh and blood, &c.] Most of the fathers interpret these words of flesh and blood not naturally, but morally, taken for the corrupt affections of the flesh. But,

1. Though flesh itself in Scripture sometimes bears this sense, yet flesh and blood jointly never seems to have this import in Scripture.

2. It is plain, and confessed by St. Austin,‡ that the apostle is not here speaking of the requisites to make our souls meet to inherit this kingdom, but of the manner of the resurrection of the body.

3. The apostle speaks of flesh and blood as subject to corruption here, ver. 52. or of such flesh and blood as must be changed, and put on incorruption, and so of flesh and blood naturally taken.

4. It is evident to sense, that flesh may be cut and divided, and blood let out, and so must, whilst they continue such, be subject to corruption; and also that a heavenly and spiritual body, a house from heaven, cannot consist of such flesh and blood as we have at present.

It therefore must be said, that, though the same flesh and blood may rise from the grave, it will then, or afterward, receive such a change as will render it spiritual or incorruptible, and so perhaps, when it comes to heaven, will not be flesh and blood; or that it will be clothed with such a heavenly body as will keep it from a possibility of corruption; and so the import of these words may be this, That flesh and blood unchanged, and unclothed with its heavenly body, cannot inherit the kingdom of God.

[21] Ver. 51. Πάντες μὲν οὐ κοιμηθησόμεθα, πάντες δὲ ἀλλαγησόμεθα, We shall not all sleep, &c.] This reading is much to be preferred, before either of the other two; viz. we shall all rise, or, we shall all sleep, but shall not all be changed; as being,

1. Not only the reading of Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Theophylact, on the place, but also of Origen,* Theodotus, Apollinarius, St. Jerome, and of Pseudo-Justin, qu. 61. and 109.

2. As being enforced from the next words repeated thus, and we shall be changed; from the like words, 1 Thess. iv. 17. and from the observation of almost all the commentators on the place, that the apostle in this chapter speaks only of the resurrection of the just; and from the falsehood of the other words, we shall not all be changed, seeing the bodies of the wicked will certainly be changed by the fire they go into; and, lastly, from the sense, for what sense is it to say, we shall not be changed in a moment, and to add this reason of that saying, viz. for the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed?

Note also, that it cannot be hence concluded, that he and the rest of the apostles should live to the general resurrection; no, he elsewhere discovers his expectation, that the same God who raised up Jesus, should raise them also from the dead, 2 Cor. iv. 14. He speaks this therefore, not in his own, but in the person of all pious Christians that should then live. (See the note on 1 Thess. iv. 15. 17.)

[24] Ver. 52. Ἐν ἀτόμῳ, In a moment.] It is the observation of St. Jerome,† that by these words the apostle "cunctam primæ et secundæ resurrectionis excludit fabulam," destroys the fable of the first and second resurrection. He doth it sufficiently in the description of the state of all the raised bodies of the just: for though the patrons of this opinion would avoid it, it is certain that the old assertors of it held that they should be raised to enjoy the pleasures of meat and drink, as Irenæus‡ speaks. Now, can thin, spiritual, glorious, heavenly bodies, and such as are made

like to Christ's glorious body, eat and drink, and enjoy these sensual pleasures? Moreover, who shall be changed? Those that have already been raised a thousand years? If not, they must not be alive, for Christians then alive shall be changed; but if they must be changed, then must their bodies be raised corruptible, and they must twice bear the image of the earthy, or the animal Adam.

Ver. 53. Δεῖ γὰρ τὸ φθαρτὸν τοῦτο.] It is here said, τὸ φθαρτὸν and τὸ θνητὸν have not σῶμα for their substantive, but are put in the neuter gender absolute, and stand to represent νεκροὶ, the dead; but this is a great mistake; for the words are not only τὸ φθαρτὸν, τὸ θνητὸν, but τὸ φθαρτὸν τοῦτο, this corruptible, this mortal; now istud, saith Tertullian, is a word demonstrative of the body; this hoc, saith Ruffinus, "est vox corpus suum quodammodo contingentis," is the voice of one as it were pointing to the body. Moreover, what is mortal and corruptible; what puts on incorruption, but the body sown in corruption, and raised in incorruption? (ver. 42.) What is mortal but the body? what therefore can be raised to immortality but the same body? When it is farther said, that the apostle, saying, οὐ πρῶτον τὸ πνευματικὸν, ἀλλὰ τὸ ψυχικὸν, that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, he uses the neuter gender, to signify the persons of Adam and of Christ, that is another plain mistake; they plainly being used to signify the body received from Adam, and raised by Christ, as is evident from the precedent words, ἔστι σῶμα ψυχικὸν, καὶ ἔστι σῶμα πνευματικὸν, there is an animal body, and there is a spiritual body; but that body which is spiritual is not first, but that which is animal.

[23] Ver. 54. Ἐνδύσεται ἀφθαρσίαν, Shall put on incorruption.] The Scripture and all the ancients speak of a clothing which our raised bodies shall put on. Thus Psellus,* in his commentary on the Chaldaic Oracles, saith, the Chaldees give the soul two clothings; one of the spiritual body, weaved out of that which is subject to sense; the other a shining, thin body, not subject to the touch, which they call the superfices; and the conjecture of the Jews is this, that it shall be a clothing of light, or of a pure flame. So the ancient book Zoar† saith, that the bodies of the just shall be clothed with the light of glory. R. Phineas saith, the blessed God will give to the bodies of the just יפיות, an ornament, according to that of Isaiah, lviii. 11. he shall satisfy the soul, בצחצחות, with white or splendid things; and R. Levi, that the soul, in the state of its glory, sustains itself by the superior light, and when it returns to the body, it shall come with this light, and then the body shall shine as with the brightness of the heavens. And this agrees with the transfiguration of our Lord's body, Matt. xvii. 2. and with his appearance to St. Paul, Acts ix. 3. and to St. John, Rev. i. 14, 15. and to the descriptions made in the Old Testament, of the just rising from their graves, that they shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars for ever, Dan. xii. 3. Wisd. iii. 7. And in the New, that they shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of the Father, Matt. xiii. 43. and thus may they be salted, and preserved from corruption by fire, Matt. ix 49.

[24] Κατεπόθη ὁ θάνατος εἰς νῖκος, Death is swallowed up in victory.] Or, for ever, as εἰς νῖκος often signifies; so, Shall the sword devour εἰς νῖκος for ever? 2 Sam. ii. 26. Job xxxvi. 7. He will set them on the throne εἰς νῖκος for ever; Jer. iii. 5. Will he keep his anger εἰς νῖκος for ever? Lam. v. 20. Why dost thou forget us εἰς νῖκος for ever? Amos. i. 11. His anger did tear for ever, εἰς νῖκος. and viii. 7. He will not forget their works εἰς νῖκος for ever. Nor is the phrase εἰς νῖκος used in any other sense in the Septuagint. Though therefore death is represented as the last enemy to be vanquished, ver. 26. and the apostle asks, O grave, where is thy victory? and gives thanks to God who giveth us the victory, ver. 55. 57. yet seeing he hath given us this victory by swallowing death up for ever, by swallowing up death of life eternal, 2 Cor. v. 4. I see no reason why we should think the apostle had not here respect to the constant use of this phrase in the Septuagint; it being taken from Isa. xxv. 8. See the text defended against the surmises of Dr. Mills, Examen Millii, ibid.

[25] Ver. 55. Where is thy sting?] What is by the apostle rendered ποῦ, where, is in the Hebrew אהי I will be; but that word is thought by a metathesis to signify the same as איה, where; accordingly it is so rendered, Hos. xiii. 10. by the Septuagint, the Chaldee, the Syriac, the Arabic, and in this fourteenth verse by the LXX. the Syriac, Arabic, and by many Jews, which is sufficient to justify the apostle here. (See Dr. Pocock on Hos. xiii. 10. 14.)

1. NOW concerning the collection for the saints (i. e. the suffering Christians in Judea), as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye.

2. [1] Upon the first day of the week (the day of your Christian assemblies) [2] let every one of you lay by him in store (on this account), as God hath prospered him, that there be no (farther need of) gathering when I come.

3. And when I come, whosoever you shall approve by letters, [3] them will I send (or them will I with my letters send) to bring your liberality to Jerusalem.

4. And if it be (thought) meet that I go also, they shall go with me (to be witnesses of the distribution of your charity).

5. Now I will come unto you, when [4] I shall pass (or shall have passed) through Macedonia: for I do (intend shortly to remove hence and to) pass through Macedonia.

6. And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go.

7. For I will not see you now by the way, but I trust (hereafter) to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit.

8. But I will tarry (still) at Ephesus [5] till Pentecost.

9. For a great door and effectual is opened to me (for propagation of the gospel there), and there are many adversaries (of the truth, especially those of the circumcision, which makes my stay there necessary).

10. Now [6] if Timotheus come (to you), see that he may be with you without fear (of disturbance from the factious): for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do.

13. Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit ye (yourselves) like men, be strong.

14. Let all your things be done with charity (or a sincere desire of your brother's weal).

15. I beseech you, brethren, (seeing) ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the first-fruits of (the gospel in) Achaia, and that they have (ever since) addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints;

16. That you submit yourselves to such (giving reverence and honour to them), and to every one that helpeth with us, and laboureth.

17. I am glad of the coming of Stephanas and Fortunatus and Achaicus (whom you sent with your letters of inquiry to me): for that (account of your affairs) which was lacking on your part (in your letter) they have supplied.

18. (I am glad, I say,) for they have refreshed my spirit (with their presence and discourse) and (will at their return refresh) yours: therefore acknowledge ye them that are such.

19. The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, [9] with the church that is in their house (i. e. their Christian family).

20. All the brethren greet you. Greet ye one another with a holy kiss. (See note on Rom. xvi. 16.)

22. If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be [11] Anathema Maran-atha (i. e. accursed when the Lord comes to judgment).

23. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you.

24. My love be with you all in Christ Jesus. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XVI.

[1] Ver. 2. ΚΑΤΑ᾽ μίαν σαββάτων, Upon the first day of the week.] So we read in St. Matthew, that our Lord rose from the dead, τῇ μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων, upon the first day of the week, Matt. xxviii. 1. in St. Mark, that, the sabbath being over, Mary Magdalene and others came early, τῆς μιᾶς τῶν σαββάτων, the first day of the week, xvi. 9. and found Christ risen from the dead; and in St. Luke, that they rested on the sabbath-day, according to the commandment, and that they came to the sepulchre τῇ μιᾷ τῶν σαββατων, on the first day of the week, xxiii. 56. xxiv. 1. and so accordingly saith St. John, xx. 1.: so that this phrase doth certainly import the first day of the week, the day of our Lord's resurrection from the dead; and this the word μία usually signifies in the Septuagint, when it is joined with days, weeks, and months; as the evening and the morning were ἡμέρα μία the first day; so ἡμέρα μία τοῦ μηνὸς, is the first day of the month, Exod. xl. 2. Ezra iii. 6. x. 17. and μία τοῦ μηνὸς is the first day of the month, Lev. xxiii. 24. Numb. i. 1. 18. xix. 1. xxxiii. 38. Deut. i. 3. Ezek. xxvi. 1. xxxii. 1. xlv. 18. Hag. i. 1. ii. 2.

Moreover, κατὰ μίαν may be rendered, every first day, as κατὰ πόλιν, in every city; κατ᾽ οἶκον, in every family; κατ᾽ ἄνδρα,* viritim, man by man; κατὰ μῆνα, every month; and κατὰ μίαν, sigillatim.

Secondly, Observe, that the Jews in every city where they dwelt had their collectors of alms,† who in the week days went about the city collecting alms, according to the quality and wealth of every Jew; and in the evening of the sabbath distributed to the poor among the Jews, as much as was needful for the following week: and after this example the apostle seems to have ordained, that the Christians should lay up for the poor or make provisions for them on the Lord's-day.

Thirdly, Observe, that from the beginning the Christians did assemble on the first day of the week, called by them the Lord's-day, to perform their religious worship,‡ to read the Scriptures, to preach and celebrate the Lord's supper. This day being the Lord's-day, we keep it holy, saith Dionysius,§ bishop of Corinth. On Sunday (saith Justin‖) all Christians in the city or country meet together, because that is the day of our Lord's resurrection, and then we read the writings of the prophets and apostles; this being done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, to exhort them to imitate, and do the things they heard; then we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the sacrament.

Fourthly, Observe, that the apostle gave order that here, and in the churches of Galatia, collections should be made for the poor on that day; and that all Christians, in compliance with that precept, still offered their alms upon that day. So Justin Martyr;¶ Then they that are able and willing give what they think fit, and what is thus collected is laid up in the hands of the president, who distributes it to orphans and widows, and other Christians, as their wants require.

Fifthly, Observe, that no good reason can be given, why the apostle should limit the collections of the churches of Corinth and Galatia to the first day of the week, but this, that this day was appointed for the worship of our Lord, and so more fit for the performance of those duties, which concerned his distressed members in those times; for as the works of charity and mercy are proper duties of this day, so doth the day contain a special motive in it to enlarge their charity, as being the day in which they were begotten to a lively hope, through the resurrection of Christ Jesus from the dead, of an inheritance incorruptible, 1 Pet. i. 3. and in which they constantly participated of his precious body and blood, and therefore, having received spiritual things so plentifully from Christ, must be more ready to impart somewhat of their temporals to his needy servants.

[2] Ἕκαστος ὑμῶν παρ᾽ ἑαυτῷ τιθέτω, θησαυρίζων, &c. Let every one of you lay by him in store, that there be no gathering when I come.] From these last words is gathered, that θησαυρίζειν is to put into a common box his charity; because, if they had kept it at home, there would have been need of gathering it, when the apostle came. But the words ἕκαστος παρ' ἑαυτῷ τιθέτω, let every one place it with himself, admit not of this sense; nor when this was done could there be any necessity of making collections, as that imports, soliciting the charities of others, but only of receiving the charity thus laid by for the use of the saints; and yet that such need there was, is evident from the eighth and ninth chapters of the Second Epistle: for why is so much care taken that they might be ready, if their whole contribution was already in the common box?

[3] Ver. 3. Οὓς ἐαν δοκιμάσητε δι' ἐπιστολῶν, τούτους πεμψω, Them with my letters will I send.] That this is the true sense is evident, because the apostle, supposing himself then to be come to them, could not need their commendatory epistles.

[4] Ver. 5. Μακεδονίαν διέρχομαι, I do pass through Macedonia.] Not presently, but after I have finished my stay at Ephesus: (ver. 8.) for that St. Paul writ this Epistle from Ephesus, and not from Philippi, may be gathered from the salutations in the close of it, not from the churches of Macedonia, but of Ephesus; and in his Second Epistle he saith, He passed from Troas to Macedonia, and that there Titus came to him, 2 Cor. ii. 13. and vii. 5, 6. who was not come to him when he writ his First Epistle.

[5] Ver. 8. Ἕως τῆς Πεντηκοστῆς, Till Pentecost.] It therefore was the following Pentecost that he hastened to be at Jerusalem, Acts xx. 16.

[6] Ver. 10. Ἐὰν δὲ ἔλθῃ Τιμόθεος, If Timothy come to you.] Hence it appears that this Epistle was not sent by Timothy, for then he must have come to them.

[7] Ver. 11. Προπέμψατε αὐτὸν, Conduct him forth.] It is the observation of the reverend and learned Dr. Hammond, that the word προπέμπειν, signifies not only to accompany one, and bring him on his way, as ver. 6. but also to provide for the necessaries of his journey. But this seems not suitable to the inquiry of the apostle, Did I make gain of you by any of them whom I sent to you? Did Titus make a gain of you? 2 Cor. xii. 17.

[8] Ver. 12. Οὐκ ἦν θέλημα ἵνα νῦν ἔλθῃ, He was not willing to come now.] Perhaps, because he would not countenance a faction that was begun under his name, by his presence with them, which, saith Aquinas, shews he was not their bishop, as some of the ancients have represented him; for then he ought not to have left his flock under so great disorders.

[9] Ver. 19. Σὺν τῇ κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἐκκλησίᾳ, With the church in their house.] This phrase doth not import that the whole church of Corinth, &c. met in such a family; for then this salutation would be the salutation of all the Christians in that place; but that this is not so, is evident from so many salutations directed to other persons and families in the same place: so Rom. xvi. 5. Salute Aquila and Priscilla, and the church in their house (see the note there); and then follow salutations to many other persons and brethren of the church: so Colos. iv. 15. Salute the brethren in Laodicea, and Nymphas, with the church in his house (see the note there): so Philem. 2. we read thus, Paul a prisoner to Philemon——to Apphia, to Archippus our fellow-soldier, and to the church in thy house: and here, after this salutation, follow the words, All the brethren greet you.

It rather seems to signify, as all the Greek scholiasts and Grotius say, a family consisting wholly of Christian converts, as was the gaoler's house, Acts xvi. 31, 32. and that of Crispus the chief ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, Acts xviii. 8. for when it was otherwise, and the family was not entirely converted, the apostle alters his style, and saith only, Salute them which are of Aristobulus's household, and of the household of Narcissus in the Lord, Rom. xvi. 10, 11. salute Asyncritus, Phlegon, &c. and the brethren that are with them, ver. 14, 15. the saints that are with them; they of the house of Cæsar salute you, Colos. iv. 22.

[10] Ver. 21. Τῇ ἐμῇ χειρὶ, With my own hand.] He writing by an amanuensis, Rom. xvi. 22. still closed his Epistle with his own hand, as a token that it came from him, 2 Thess. iii. 17.

[11] Ver. 22. Ἀνάθεμα Μαρὰν-ἀθά.] That Maran-atha is a Syriac word, and signifies the Lord comes, most of the ancient interpreters inform us.* Buxtorf gives us the full sense of it, saying, It is a Syrian word, by which they signified the utmost anathema, by which a man, being excluded from all human society, and obnoxious to greater punishments than man could inflict, was committed to the severest judgment of the Divine anathema, and to eternal destruction. As if those pious men of old would have said, let the Lord come, and smite him with eternal perdition, let him be reserved to the coming of the Judge of the whole world, that he may perish by his everlasting curse.

CONCERNING THE

IMPUTATION OF CHRIST'S PERFECT RIGHTEOUSNESS, OR OBEDIENCE TO THE LAW, TO US, FOR RIGHTEOUSNESS, OR JUSTIFICATION.

IN WHICH

I. The opinion of the necessity of this imputation is delivered, in the words of the Rev. Bishop Beveridge.
II. It is proved that this opinion hath no foundation in the holy Scripture. And,
III. It is proved to be fully and expressly contrary both to Scripture and reason.

TO THE READER.

I DO not think it an insult upon the sacred character of this great and good man, that I make bold to examine one article of his private thoughts, which, in my settled judgment, is of evil consequence to the souls of men. For though he died a bishop, yet, saith the preface, The following sheets were written by him in his younger years, upon his first entrance into holy orders: and this article is considered by one, who hath already passed the age of man. I could have reflected upon twenty other passages, which, in my judgment, might have kept these thoughts still private, as the good bishop, in his lifetime, did: but what I have said upon this article, will, I hope, be sufficient to shew they are not so perfect and correct, as to be deemed a standard of the truth of doctrines, though his pious resolutions are very proper to produce in us that holiness of life, which will hereafter be of more value to us than the most refined notions. Though therefore I cannot comply with him in his private thoughts, to imitate him in his pious resolutions is the desire of,

Thy friend and servant,

D. W.

SECT. I.

THE imputation of Christ's active and perfect obedience to us being, in my judgment, a very false and pernicious doctrine, and yet being of late propounded by an eminent and good bishop, as a thing absolutely necessary to our justification, and to obtain a title to eternal life; I shall,

First, Lay down this doctrine in the bishop's own words.

Secondly, I shall endeavour to shew that it hath no foundation in the holy Scripture: and that the good bishop hath produced nothing, either from Scripture or from reason, which is sufficient to confirm it. And,

Thirdly, That it is fully and directly contrary to Scripture and to reason.

And, first, the bishop, in the eighth article concerning his private thoughts of religion, delivers this doctrine in these words: (p. 89.) " He (viz. the Son of God) being in and of himself perfectly coequal, coessential, and coeternal with the Father, was in no sort bound to do more than the Father himself did, and so whatsoever he should do which the Father did not, might justly be accounted a work of supererogation, N. B. which, without any violation of Divine justice, might be set on the account of some other persons, even of such as he pleased to do it for. And hereupon, out of mercy and compassion to fallen man, he covenanted with his Father, that, if it pleased his Majesty to accept it, he would take upon him the suffering of those punishments which were due from him to man, and the performance of those duties, which were due from man to him: N. B. so that whatsoever he should thus humble himself to do, or suffer, should wholly be on the account of man: himself being not any ways bound to do or suffer more in time than he had from eternity.

" This motion the Father, out of the riches of his grace and mercy, was pleased to consent unto: and hereupon the Son assuming our nature into his Deity, N. B. becomes subject and obedient both to the moral and ceremonial laws of his Father, and at last to death itself, even the death of the cross; in the one he paid an active, in the other a passive obedience, and so did not only fulfil the will of his Father, in obeying what he had commanded, but satisfied his justice in suffering the punishment due to us for the transgressing of it. His active obedience, as it was infinitely pure and perfect, did without doubt infinitely transcend all the obedience of the sons of men, even of Adam too in his primitive state; (p. 88.) for the obedience of Adam, make the best of it, was but the obedience of a finite creature, whereas the obedience of Christ was the obedience of one who was infinite God as well as man. By which means the laws of God had higher obedience performed to them, than themselves in their primitive institution required; for, being made only to finite creatures, they could command no more than the obedience of finite creatures; whereas the obedience of Christ was the obedience of one who was the infinite Creator as well as a finite creature.

" Now this obedience being more than Christ was bound to, and only performed on the account of those whose nature he had assumed, as we by faith lay hold upon it; so God through grace, N. B. imputes it to us as if it had been performed by us in our own persons. And hence it is, that as in one place Christ is said to be made sin for us, 2 Cor. v. 21. so in another place he is said to be made our righteousness, 1 Cor. i. 30. and in the forecited place, 2 Cor. v. 21. as he is said to be made sin for us, so are we said to be made righteousness in him; but what righteousness? our own? No, the righteousness of God, radically his, but imputatively ours; and this is the only way whereby we are said to be made the righteousness of God, even by the righteousness of Christ being made ours, by which we are accounted and reputed as righteous before God. These things considered, I very much wonder, how any man can presume to exclude the active obedience of Christ from our justification before God; as if what Christ did in the flesh was only of duty, not at all of merit, or as if it was for himself, and not for us; especially when I consider that suffering the penalty is not what the law primarily required, for the law of God requires perfect obedience, the penalty being only threatened to, not properly required of, the breakers of it: for, let a man suffer the penalty of the law in never so high a manner, he is not therefore accounted obedient to it, his punishment speaks not his innocence, but rather his transgression of the law. Hence it is, that I cannot look upon Christ as having made full satisfaction to God's justice for me, unless he had performed the obedience I owe to God's laws, as well as borne the punishment that is due for my sins: for though he should have borne my sins, I cannot see how that should denominate me righteous or obedient to the law, so as to entitle me to eternal life according to the tenor of the old law, (p. 89.) Do this and live: N. B. which old covenant is not disannulled or abrogated by the covenant of grace, but rather established; (Rom. iii. 31.) especially as to the obedience it requires of us in order to the life it promiseth, otherwise the laws of God would be mutable, N. B. and so come short of the laws of the very Medes and Persians, which altered not. Obedience, therefore, is as strictly required under the New as it was under the Old Testament, but with this difference—there obedience was required in our own persons, as absolutely necessary; here obedience in our surety is accepted as completely sufficient: but now, if we have no such obedience in our surety (as we cannot have, if he did not live as well as die for us), let any man tell me what title he hath, or can have, to eternal life? I suppose he will tell me, he hath none in himself, because he hath not performed perfect obedience to the law, N. B. and I tell him, he hath none in Christ, unless Christ hath performed that obedience for him, which none can say he did, who doth not believe his active as well as passive obedience to be wholly upon our account." Now these words contain these several propositions:

First, "That the Son of God covenanted with his Father, that he would take upon him the obedience which was due from man to him, (p. 86.) so that whatever he should do, should be on the account of man, and that to this motion the Father, of his rich grace and mercy, was pleased to consent.

Secondly, "That he, in pursuance of this covenant, became obedient and subject both to the moral and ceremonial laws of his Father, and so, by his active obedience to these laws, fulfilled the will of his Father in obeying what he had commanded.

Thirdly, (p. 86, 87.) "That this obedience of Christ was perfect, and did infinitely transcend all the obedience of the sons of men, even of Adam in his primitive state, and so Christ performed higher obedience to the laws of God than was required of man in the primitive institution.

Fourthly, "That this obedience being more than Christ was bound to do, and being only performed on the account of those whose nature he had assumed, (p. 87.) it is by virtue of our faith imputed to us, as if it had been performed by us in our own persons.

Fifthly, "That we are to be entitled to eternal life according to the tenor of the old law, Lev. v. 8. 15. that old covenant being not disannulled (p. 89.) and abrogated by the covenant of grace, but rather established, (Rom. iii. 31.) especially as to the obedience it requires from us, in order to the life it promiseth." And,

Sixthly, ibid. "That therefore obedience is as strictly required under the New, as it was under the Old, Testament, but with this difference; there obedience in our own persons was required as absolutely necessary, here obedience in our surety is accepted as completely sufficient.

Seventhly, "That no man hath, or can have, a title to eternal life, unless Christ hath paid perfect obedience to the law for him, and so Christ could not have made full satisfaction to God's justice for us, unless he had performed the obedience due to God's laws, as well as borne the punishment due to our sins.

Eighthly, "That therefore the only way whereby we are said to be made righteous with the righteousness of God, is by the righteousness of Christ being made ours, by which we are reputed and accounted righteous before God."

Having thus given you the state of the question in the bishop's own words, I shall proceed briefly to consider what he hath laid down as the foundation of his doctrine, and then to make some brief reflections upon these several propositions.

Now the foundation of this doctrine is laid down in these words:—"He (i. e. the Son of God) being coequal, coeternal, and coessential with the Father (and so depending not upon him either for his existence or actions, p. 83.) was in no sort bound to do more than the Father himself did, and so whatsoever he should do, which the Father did not, might justly be accounted as a work of supererogation, which, without any violation of Divine justice, might be set upon the account of some other persons, even of such whom he pleased to do it for." Now this is such a scheme of new divinity as cannot easily be matched.

For, (1.) here is a God, coequal and coessential with the Father, and who depends not on him either for his existence or his actions, and therefore not God of God, but plainly another God, existing and acting independently on the Father; and so the Father cannot be (as, saith Dr. Bull, de Subord. Filii, §. 4. all the fathers without fear pronounced him) principium, causa, ἀρχὴ, αἰτία, auctor filii, et αἴτιον τοῦ εἶναι.

(2.) We have this God independent in existence (which is the same with essence) and actions on the Father, bound to do so much as the Father: now, all obligation arising from a law to which the person bound is subject, by whose law must this coequal person be bound to do so much?

(3.) This independent God is said to supererogate by doing more than he was bound to do. Now supererogation supposes the person supererogating under a command, and exceeding the virtuous action commanded; but how can he, who is independent on any, both as to existence and actions, be subject to the commands of another? Moreover, seeing the Father was not bound to create the world, or send his Son to be the Saviour of it, or to do any other thing which it was not necessary from the perfection of his nature to perform, why must not he in all these actions supererogate as well as his coequal, independent Son?

Secondly, That which merits from God must be something from which he receives some benefit or advantage; but the Father is incapable of receiving any advantage from this supposed supererogation of his Son. And,

Thirdly, That which merits for another, must oblige the person of whom he merits in justice to accept his action for another: now God the Father cannot be obliged to accept this action of his Son for us, because it was not done by us; and so, if he doth accept it as if it had been done by us, this must be perfectly of his free grace, or, as the bishop saith, p. 86. out of the riches of his grace and mercy. For the obedience of man to the laws of God was certainly a personal due, it being that which God required of him in person; and therefore the obedience of another to the law given to him and not to another, can do nothing to acquit him from the performance of what God personally required of him and not of another, but by a pure act of grace: nor can the action of another be reckoned as done by him, but by a false imputation; for such must that be which imputes that as done by me, which indeed was not done by me, but by another. As therefore, to speak exactly, God doth not impute Christ's passive obedience to us, or account that we have suffered, because he did, but only doth exempt us from suffering, because he hath suffered in stead; so neither can he impute the obedience of another to us, or account that we have obeyed because another hath done it upon our account, but only exempt us from obedience in person upon that account.

Lastly, Here is a rich fund for the pope's treasury of meritorious supererogating actions, that which the papists have imagined to fill up their treasury, being only the merits of finite men; whereas, saith the good bishop, p. 87. The obedience of Christ was the obedience of one that was infinite God as well as man, the obedience of one who was the infinite Creator, as well as a finite creature. Yea, if any thing could be meritorious in respect to God, this doctrine would render every good action of a believer meritorious, or an act of supererogation; for if, as the bishop saith, p. 89. under the new covenant obedience in our surety is accepted as completely sufficient, and Christ hath performed that obedience for us by which we have a title to life eternal, all believers, who have by faith laid hold on Christ, and so have his obedience imputed to them as if performed by them in person, must be entirely exempted from any obligation to perform personal obedience, and so all the obedience they perform must be so many acts of supererogation.

To proceed now to the consideration of the propositions plainly collected from his words; of which the first is this:—

"That Christ covenanted with the Father that he would take upon him the obedience which was due from man to him; so that whatever he should do, should wholly be on the account of man, and that to this motion the Father was pleased to consent."

This proposition is founded on a chimerical covenant betwixt God the Father and the Son, of which there is not the least item in the holy Scripture; and so the whole scheme of this doctrine, being built upon this vain imagination, must be also vain.

(2.) This covenant is also both in the nature of the thing impossible, and in the immediate consequences of it irreligious. It is in the nature of the thing impossible, that Christ should covenant to perform the obedience due from man to God's law, for him, or in his stead, and that God the Father should accept and repute what he thus did for him, as if performed by man personally; because the moral law, the law engraven on the heart of man, is indispensable; it being absolutely necessary that man should be obliged, personally, to obey the moral law, and that God should require him, in person, so to do; and so no promise of another to perform it for him can avail any thing to exempt him from the obligation he was, is, and ever will be under to perform it personally: this is apparent from those words of Christ, in which he gives us the abridgment of the law and the prophets; viz. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy soul; and thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: (Matt. xxii. 37. 39.) from the personal observance of which laws, who ever thought he was, or he could be, exempted by any thing which Christ had done for him? It therefore is profane and irreligious to say, that either the holy Jesus made such a covenant, or that the righteous God ever consented to such a motion, or that the obedience of our surety to the moral law should be accepted in the new covenant, as completely sufficient to give us a title to eternal life; this being in effect to say, that Christ, by his obedience to the moral law, hath freed every one that believes in him from his whole duty to God, his neighbour, and himself; and that God the Father hath consented that all such persons should be free from any obligation, personally to live righteously, soberly, and godly, in this present world; because what hath already been performed by their surety, p. 88, 89. is completely sufficient to denominate them righteous, or obedient to the law, so as to entitle them to eternal life; and so they cannot be obliged to a personal performance of those duties, in order to that end, though the apostle plainly saith they are, Tit. ii. 12, 13.

Secondly, When he saith, in the second proposition, that Christ, by his active obedience to God's moral and ceremonial laws, fulfilled the will of his Father in obeying what he commanded; doth he mean what the Father had personally commanded him? If so, Christ himself must lie under a personal obligation to fulfil both the moral and the ceremonial law; and so, in doing this, he could do only what he himself was commanded to do, and could not merit for another; and so the only reason why the bishop wonders at them who say, that what Christ did in the flesh was only of duty, must be this, because, as he observes, p. 88. that would exclude Christ's active obedience from our justification before God. If he means what the Father had not commanded him, but only had required us to obey, then can he not be properly said to have herein obeyed at all; obedience, of necessity, importing a relation to a command laid upon him who is obedient; and much less could he fulfil that command, which was never given to him, and so the Father might say to him, in the words of the prophet, *Who hath required this at thy hand? He himself declares he had received a commandment from his Father to lay down his life for his sheep;† and in pursuance of it, he became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.‡ And he who saith, Christ also did perform his active obedience on our account, and by that fulfilled the will of his Father, in obeying what he had commanded for us, must produce a like command of the Father, requiring him thus to obey for us; which is, first, needless, we being still of necessity under as strong an obligation of personal obedience to the moral law, as a rule of duty, as we were before Christ performed that obedience in his human nature. Secondly, It also necessarily infers a personal exemption of all believers from any obligation to obey the moral law; the pernicious consequences of which doctrine have been already shewn. Thirdly, It is contrary to the words of the bishop himself; for he affirms, p. 89. that, under the old testament obedience was required in our own persons as absolutely necessary; and that this old covenant was not disannulled, but rather established by the covenant of grace, especially as to the obedience it requires in order to the life it promiseth. The obedience then required under the old law, as absolutely necessary, in order to the life it promiseth, being obedience to be performed in our own persons, to use the bishop's words, p. 88. who can see how the obedience of Christ, that is, of another in our stead, could denominate us righteous, or obedient to the law, so as to entitle us to eternal life, according to the tenor of the old law, Do this, in your own persons, and live? In a word, we neither are nor can be exempted from obedience to the moral law, as a rule of duty, but we are exempted from obedience to it as a means of justification; or, we are not exempted from an obligation to perform the righteousness of the law, but only from the curse of the law pronounced against them who continue not in all things written in the book of the law to do them. (Gal. iii. 10.) And from this curse we are delivered, saith the apostle, not by Christ's active and perfect obedience to the law, imputed to us, but by his sufferings on the cross for us.

Thirdly, Of the third proposition, that the obedience of Christ did infinitely transcend all the obedience of the sons of men, as being the obedience of an infinite God, I shall only observe at present, that though the obedience of an infinite God and infinite Creator be absurd expressions (as importing a subjection of this infinite God and Creator to the laws of some superior, or paying infinite obedience to his infinite self); yet was it necessary to be asserted, that Christ's active obedience might suffice, by reason of this supposed infinite excellency, to be imputed to all men; since otherwise it being only that which every individual man was personally obliged to perform, it could only have answered the obedience required of one single person.

Fourthly, To the fourth proposition, that the obedience of Christ being more than he was bound to, it is by virtue of our faith, imputed to us, as if it had been performed by us in our own persons: I answer,

First, That it being certain, that the obedience which God requires by law from us must be personal (for, where there is no law requiring personal obedience, there can be no personal transgression), hence it is evident, that there can be no performance of personal obedience by a surety, and therefore no true imputation of his obedience to us, but only an exemption from any obligation to that obedience which hath been performed for us by our surety.

Secondly, When he saith, that this obedience was more than Christ was bound to do, if he means this of the obedience of the Divine nature; this, if it be not that which was condemned in the Arian heresy, is a great absurdity in the supposition, that he, who is absolutely supreme, should be obedient, i. e. subject to the law of a superior; if of Christ's human nature, in that he was certainly obliged to fulfil all righteousness, i. e. all things required of all men by the moral law; this also was absolutely necessary to the discharge of his priestly office, viz. that he should be perfectly righteous, and without sin in his own person; for such a high-priest became us as was holy, ἄκακος, free from evil, undefiled, separated from sinners, who had no need to offer first for his own sins, (Heb. vii. 26, 27.) since otherwise he must have died not for ours, but his own sins: now the personal righteousness which was absolutely necessary to render him a fit high-priest to offer a true expiatory sacrifice for our sins, could not be more than he was bound to do, as our high-priest.

Fifthly, That his fifth proposition, which affirms, that we are entitled to eternal life by the tenor of the old law, Do this and live, &c. is a flat contradiction to the doctrine of St. Paul, in his Epistles to the Romans, to the Galatians, and to the Hebrews, will be hereafter fully manifested.

Sixthly, The difference betwixt the justification and obedience required by the old and new covenant, doth not consist, as the bishop saith it is, in this, that, in the first, obedience in our own persons was required as absolutely necessary; in the second, obedience in our surety is accepted as completely sufficient: but in this, that whereas the old law required perfect obedience, in order to our justification, allowing no pardon for sins committed, but leaving all under the curse, who continued not in all things written in the law to do them: (Gal. iii. 10.) the new covenant requires only faith in the blood of Christ, for the remission of our past sins, as will be fully proved hereafter. And though the new covenant doth not exempt us from the moral law, as a rule of duty; it being a contradiction to say, that God permits us to omit our duty, or transgress his law (since that permission would render duty no duty, and transgression no transgression); yet doth it accept of sincere obedience, pardoning the sins of ignorance and infirmity which still cleave to our duties in this imperfect state, not for the active, but passive obedience of the blessed Jesus, according to these words of St. John, If ye walk in the light, as God is in the light, the blood of Jesus Christ, N. B. cleanseth you from all sin, 1 John i. 8. And again, ii. 2. If we sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins.

Seventhly, The seventh proposition will be proved false in every branch of it in the third section.

Eighthly, The eighth to be a gross mistake of the true sense of the apostle's words, 2 Cor. v. 21. section the second.

* Isa. i. 12. † John x. 18. ‡ Phil. ii. 8.

SECT. II.

HAVING, in the foregoing section, sufficiently declared what is the doctrine I reject, viz. that which asserts, that Christ's active and perfect obedience must be imputed to us to eternal life, or to justification; I proceed,

Secondly, To shew, that this doctrine hath not the least foundation in the Holy Scriptures. Now this I shall make evident, by a particular consideration of the texts of Scripture produced by the good bishop, and other patrons of this doctrine in favour of it. And,

First, Whereas the bishop saith, p. 87. that, as Christ is said to be made sin for us, so are we said to be made the righteousness of God in him, (2 Cor. v. 21.) and thence concludes, that the only way whereby we are said to be made the righteousness of God, is by the righteousness of Christ's being made ours, by which we are accounted and reputed as righteous before God: I am sorry to find he was so unacquainted with the true import of either of these phrases, or so regardless of the context. For,

First, This phrase, the righteousness of God, doth never signify the active obedience or righteousness by Christ, performed unto the law, but always hath relation to the righteousness of faith, in opposition to the law, or that righteousness which is procured by faith in the blood of Christ, and accepted by God to our justification; thus, Rom. i. 17. ἡ δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ ἐκ πίστεως, The righteousness of God through faith, is revealed in the gospel, to beget faith in us, as it is written, The just shall live by faith: now these very words the apostle useth to prove, that no man is justified by obedience to the law, before God; for (saith the Scripture) The just shall live by faith; but the law is not of faith; but, in opposition to it, saith, Lev. xviii. 5. The man that doth these things shall live by them; which are the very words the bishop useth to prove against St. Paul, that we must be denominated righteous, or obedient to the law, so as to have a title to eternal life, according to the tenor of the old law, p. 88, 89. Do this, and live, Lev. xviii. 5. So again, iii. 21. ἡ δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ, The righteousness of God, without the law, is manifested, being testified by the law and the prophets, to wit, the righteousness of God, communicated to all believers, by faith in Christ's blood; (ver. 22.) we being justified freely, by the redemption which is in Christ Jesus; (ver. 23.) in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the remission of sins; (Eph. i. 7. Colos. i. 14.) God having set him forth for a propitiation, through faith in his blood; p. 11. so evident is it, that the righteousness of God, twice mentioned, is the justification God vouchsafes to us, through faith in Christ's blood, shed for the remission of our sins. Again, Rom. x. 3. the Jews not knowing τὴν δικαιοσύνην τοῦ Θεοῦ, the righteousness of God, but seeking to establish their own righteousness, which was by the works of the law, have not submitted, τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ, to the righteousness of God, which is the righteousness to be obtained by faith in Christ. Now this righteousness of the law, which the Jews seeking after, submitted not to the righteousness of God, is, saith the apostle, that which Moses mentioned, Lev. xviii. 5. which sai h, The man that doth these things shall live by them: so grossly doth the bishop mistake, in saying, p. 89. that this very righteousness was established by the covenant of grace. What is the righteousness of faith the apostles preached in opposition to it? even a belief that God hath raised Christ from the dead, (ver. 9.) he dying for our sins, and rising again for our justification. (Rom. iv. 24.) Can then any thing be more clear from the apostle's words, than that the righteousness of God through faith, stands in direct opposition to the righteousness of the law, which saith, Do this, and live; and therefore cannot consist in Christ's perfect obedience to the law imputed to us, as our righteousness? And, lastly, Phil. iii. 9. ἡ ἐκ Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνη, the righteousness of God, through faith in Jesus Christ, stands directly opposite to the righteousness of the law, or to that righteousness which the Jews sought for, by obedience to the law.

Secondly, The phrase, He was made sin for us, is only capable of these two senses;—1. He was made guilty of our sins by imputation, which, I fear, is the bishop's sense; partly because the opposite imputation of Christ's righteousness to us, as if personally performed by us, is by him said to be meant by our being made the righteousness of God in him; partly because he plainly seems to own it in these words, p. 72. His righteousness being as really by faith imputed to me, as my sins were laid upon him; then, as his righteousness is imputed to me, as if it had been personally performed by me; so my sins must be imputed to him, as if they had been performed by him, and so he must be, by God's own imputation, guilty of doing murder, idolatry, adultery, and all the other sins committed by mankind; which blasphemy will be more fully rebuked in the following section; or, secondly, he was made ἁμαρτία, a sin-offering, or expiatory sacrifice for us, which is the frequent sense of the word ἁμαρτία, in the Levitical law, concerning sacrifices; and is here put upon the words by all the commentators I have seen. Now this interpretation of the phrase relating to the death of Christ as an expiatory sacrifice, the proper and immediate effect of it cannot be the imputation of the obedience of Christ's life unto us, but our freedom from condemnation on the account of sin, in which our justification is still placed by the apostle; for such an effect must of necessity be signified by these words, We are made the righteousness of God in him, which suits with the cause of it, viz. the death of Christ as an expiatory sacrifice for the remission of sin; now the proper and direct effect of such a sacrifice, is deliverance from the guilt and punishment of sin, and not the imputation of Christ's active obedience unto men: for Christ offered this expiatory sacrifice, not that men might be made righteous by the righteousness of his life, but that sinners might be justified by his blood, shed for the remission of sins, and reconciled to God by the death of his Son. (Rom. v. 9, 10.) This, therefore, must be the true import of our being made the righteousness of God in him. And,

Thirdly, This is farther evident from the context; for God was in Christ (saith the apostle), reconciling the world unto himself: how hath Christ done this? he hath, saith the apostle, reconciled us to God in the body of his flesh by death. (Colos. i. 21.) He adds, that God was thus reconciling the world unto himself, by not imputing to them their trespasses; why did he not impute them? because Christ, by his death, had made an expiatory sacrifice for the remission of them; for he saith, he made him a sacrifice for sin, who knew no sin: whence it must follow, that we are made the righteousness of God in him, by the reconciliation purchased for us by his death, and the non-imputation of sin to us, as the consequent of that death.

And it may farther be observed, that every branch of this exposition is confirmed, and the sense imposed on these words by the bishop is plainly confuted, by the descants of the ancient commentators on this place. For,

First, They plainly say, that by the word * ἁμαρτία, sin, we are to understand, τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν θῦμα, a sacrifice for sin; † non immerito peccatum factus dicitur, quia et hostia in lege, quæ pro peccatis offerebatur, peccatum nuncupabatur, the sacrifice offered in the law for sin, being so called.

Secondly, They add, that to be made the righteousness of God in Christ, is, ‡ διὰ συγχαρήσεως δικαιωθῆναι δι' αὐτοῦ, to be justified by a gracious pardon through him: that this is the righteousness of God, ὅταν τις χάριτι δικαιώθη ἔνθα πᾶσα ἁμαρτία ἠφάνισται, § when a man is so justified by grace, that all his sin is made to vanish away.

Thirdly, They add, that we are then righteous with the righteousness of God, when we are justified, μὴ ἐξ ἔργων νόμου, ἀλλ' ἐκ τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Θεοῦ, not by the works of the law, but by the grace of God.

Ἐκείνη γὰρ ἡ προτέρα νόμου καὶ ἔργων δικαιοσύνη, αὐτὴ δὲ Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνη, the first, saith Chrysostom, is justification by the law; this, that of God. I conclude then in the words of Gataker against Gomarus, producing this very text for the same purpose as the bishop doth, Quid fere clarius contra se producere poterat quam illud, 2 Cor. v. 21.

The second text, produced by the bishop, contains these words, Of him are you in Christ Jesus, who is made unto us of God, wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption.

Ans. From these words it is evident, that Christ is in no other sense said to be made unto us righteousness, than he is said to be made to us wisdom, sanctification, and redemption. Hence therefore, I retort the argument thus: Christ is not here said to be made unto us of God, wisdom, sanctification, and redemption, by his wisdom, sanctification, and redemption imputed to us; therefore he is not here said to be made our righteousness, by his righteousness or active obedience imputed to us. The consequence is evident; for they who hence say, that Christ is made our righteousness by his righteousness imputed to us, have the same reason to say from this text, that he is made our wisdom by his wisdom, and our sanctification by his holiness, and our redemption by his redemption imputed to us. The antecedent is also evident: for,

First, It is evidently absurd to say, we are made wise by the same wisdom with which Christ was imputed to us.

And, secondly, if we are made sanctification by the holiness of Christ imputed to us, there can be no necessity that we ourselves should have our fruit unto holiness, that the end may be eternal life; (Rom. vi. 22.) nor can it be true, that, without personal sanctification, no man shall see the Lord; (Heb. xii. 14.) nor could it be necessary, that he should give up himself to the death for his church, that he might sanctify her; (Eph. v. 25—27.) he having done this completely by the holiness of his life imputed to her.

And, thirdly, the redemption here mentioned being distinguished from, and following justification and sanctification, it must import the redemption of the body from corruption; now, is it not absurd to say, that the redemption of Christ's body from corruption is imputed to us? and will it not hence follow, that we are not to expect any personal redemption of our own bodies from corruption? It remains then to say, with the ancient commentators,* that Christ is made to us wisdom, by being αἴτιος τῆς σοφίας, the author of our spiritual wisdom; of our justification, τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν τὴν ἄφεσιν δωρησάμενος, † by procuring for us, by his death, that remission of sins, in which consisteth our justification; our sanctification, τὸ πνεῦμα χαριζόμενος, by giving us the spirit of sanctification; and our redemption, by procuring for us, τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν τῆς περιποιήσεως, the redemption of life, or of our bodies, from corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. (Rom. viii. 21. 23.)

Thirdly, Whereas the bishop argues, that the old covenant, which saith, Do this, and live, Lev. xviii. 5. is not disannulled or abrogated by the covenant of grace, especially as to the obedience it requires from us in order to the life it promiseth; because the apostle saith, Rom. iii. 31. Do we then make void the law through faith? nay, we establish the law, and because otherwise the laws of God would be mutable: one would wonder how he could fall into so plain a contradiction to the express words of the apostle, in his plea for justification by faith, and not by the works of the law; in his frequent declarations, not only of the freedom of Christians from the yoke of the law, but also of the necessity of the change of the law; and much more how he could do it from those words, which, considered with the context, are a full confutation of his doctrine. For,

First, The apostle saith twice expressly, that the righteousness of the law which he disputes against, and by which no man can be justified before God, is that very righteousness, which saith, Lev. xviii. 5. The man that doth these things, shall live in and by them. (See Rom. x. 5. Gal. iii. 12.)

Secondly, St. Paul having declared, that the law was only given till the promised seed should come, Gal. iii. 19. and that he being come, we were no longer under the pedagogy of the law; that Christians were dead to the law, through the body of Christ, Rom. vii. 4. that it was evacuated, 2 Cor. iii. 11. and they were loosed from the law, that being dead wherein they were held, Rom. vii. 6. that they were redeemed from it by Christ, Gal. iv. 5. and ought no more to be subject to the yoke of bondage, or return to those beggarly elements, ver. 9. v. 1. that it was only to continue to the time of reformation, Heb. ix. 10. that, the priesthood being changed, there was made of necessity a change also of the law, vii. 12. and that there was a disannulling of the commandment going before, because of the weakness and unprofitableness of it, ver. 18. and that God by speaking of a new covenant, πεπαλαίωκε, had pronounced the first old; and that that which decayeth and waxeth old, was ready to vanish away, viii. 13. and lastly, that there was to be a removal of those things which were shaken, i. e. of the law given with the shaking of the earth, xii. 25—27. with many things of a like nature; that, after all this, the bishop should so positively say, That the covenant of grace had not disannulled, but established this old law, and speak of it as an absurdity, that those laws of his should be mutable, which he himself declared were only to continue till the promised seed should come, and till the time of reformation, is matter of just admiration. And,

* Œcum. † Hilar. Diac. ‡ Œcum. § Chrysost. Theoph.

* Chrysost. † Theod. Theoph.

Thirdly, This is still the infelicity of the assertors of this doctrine, that the texts they produce for it, considered with relation to the context, are the fullest confutation of it. For the apostle is proving from ver. 14. of this chapter, to the end of the fourth, that no flesh can be justified by the works of the law, ver. 16. and that the justification, which is of God, is manifested to be by faith, without the works of the law, and he concludes the argument of this chapter thus, λογιζόμεθα οὖν, we reckon therefore, from the premises, that a man is justified by faith, without the works of the law, ver. 28. Now, can he, who is only justified by the works of the law accounted as if performed by himself, be justified by faith alone, without the works of the law? The ancient commentators here say,

First, That the apostle, by the word * ἱστῶμεν, we establish, or make the law to stand, shews it to be, κείμενον, σαλευόμενον, καταλελυμένον, fallen, shaken, and dissolved; and that non evacuat legem cum illam cessare debere jam docet; † and that he doth not make void the law by teaching that it must now cease.

Secondly, They give two senses of these words; first, that he established the law, by establishing the work of the law, which was δίκαιον ποιῆσαι τὸν ἄνθρωπον, to make man righteous; for the law being not able to do this through the infirmity of the flesh, (Rom. viii. 3.) subjecting all men to sin, faith hath performed it, ὁμοῦ γάρ τις ἐπίστευσε καὶ ἐδικαιώθη, for, as soon as a man believes, he is justified: so Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact.

Thirdly, We establish the law by faith, saith Theodoret, because the law and the prophets have given in their testimony to the justification by faith, Rom. iii. 21, 22. the law by giving us the knowledge of sin, ver. 20. the prophets, by saying, Hab. ii. 4. The just shall live by faith, and so becoming our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, who is the end of the law, εἰς δικαιοσύνην, for justification, Rom. x. 4. Gal. iv. 24. δεχόμενοι τοίνυν τὴν πίστιν βεβαιοῦμεν τὸν νόμον, so that, by embracing faith, we establish the law, saith Theodoret. And this I conceive to be the truest interpretation of the text.

Fourthly, The bishop argues from the title of surety given to Christ, Heb. vii. 22. "For (saith he, p. 90.) a surety is bound to pay our debt, in case we are insolvent. Now, there are two things we owe to God, first, obedience to his laws, as he is our creator and governor; and, secondly, and by consequence, the punishment that is annexed to the breach of those laws of which we are guilty. Now, though Christ should pay the latter part of our debt for us, by bearing the punishment that is due unto us; yet if he did not pay the former, and principal part of it too, i. e. perform the obedience which we owe to God, he would not fully have performed the office of suretyship, which he undertook for us, and so would be but a half Mediator, and half Saviour." Now here it may deserve to be observed,

First, That the bishop cites this passage to prove our obligation to perform obedience to the old law, from a chapter which expressly teacheth, that the priesthood being changed, there was a necessity of the change of the law, ver. 12. and that there was a disannulling of the commandment, by reason of the weakness and unprofitableness of it, ver. 18. and that the law made nothing perfect, ver. 19.

Secondly, This passage is produced to prove that Christ was our surety for the performance of the old covenant; whereas the text saith expressly, he was the surety of a better covenant, which introduced a better hope, ver. 19. and was established upon better promises, viii. 6. even a new covenant opposed to the old, as to that which was ready to vanish away; and which, through his death, procured the remission of sins, committed under the old covenant, ix. 15.

Thirdly, Ἔγγυος, a sponsor, say the civilians, is only one that promiseth for another, and so he is obliged to do no more for him than he promised: and I have shewed already, that neither could Christ promise to yield perfect obedience to the law for us, nor could the Father consent that we should be accounted as obedient to it upon such a promise. And, lastly, his fancy, that we can stand bound to yield perfect obedience to the law, so as never to offend; and yet to undergo the punishment due to all our transgressions; and that, without doing both, no satisfaction can be made to justice, and no title to eternal life can be procured, will be proved false in the ensuing section; at present, therefore, I shall only add, that it seems to me as ridiculous, as to say, a thief cannot satisfy the law by being hanged, unless he also did yield perfect obedience to the law, which saith, Thou shalt not steal.

This is all that the bishop hath produced to confirm this doctrine; others produce some other arguments from Scripture, which shall here briefly be considered; as, v. g.

First, That the apostle teacheth, that as by one man's (Adam's) disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one, many shall be made righteous; (Rom. v. 19.) but men were made sinners by the disobedience of Adam imputed to them; therefore by the active obedience or righteousness of Christ imputed to us, we must be made righteous.

Ans. This is the only text of Scripture which speaks of the obedience of Christ, and of our being justified, or made righteous by it, and so hath any true appearance of an argument; and yet that it is only an appearance, is evident from this one consideration, that the apostle, in that whole chapter, speaketh not one word of the antecedent obedience of Christ's life, but only of his passive obedience; i. e. his obedience to the death.

For the apostle having said, (iv. 24.) that Christ was delivered to death for our sins, and raised again for our justification: he adds, (v. 1.) that, being justified by this faith in Christ's death, we have peace with God; he dying for sinners, and for the ungodly, (ver. 6. 8.) and we being justified by his blood, and reconciled to God by his death, (ver. 9, 10.) and then follows this comparison, with a διὰ τοῦτο, intimating, that it was made upon the account of our Lord's salutary passion, and ran thus: That as death, the punishment of sin, passed upon all men, by reason of one sin of one man; so, through one righteousness of one Jesus Christ, the free gift came upon all men to justification of life, (ver. 18.) and this justification is, saith the apostle, ἐκ πολλῶν παραπτωμάτων, from many transgressions; and what can justification from offences signify, but freedom from the condemnation due unto us for them? now that can never be obtained for sinners by Christ's active obedience, for could we, after many offences committed, perform as perfect obedience as Christ did, we only could thereby perform our duty for the future, but could do nothing to procure the pardon of our past offences. Thirdly, The disobedience by which many were made sinners, is plainly declared by the apostle to be one single act of disobedience in Adam, and therefore the obedience opposed to it cannot in reason be the active obedience of Christ's whole life, but that obedience to the death which the apostle mentions, Phil. ii. 8. now, by this passive obedience we cannot be made formally righteous, but only metonymically, by being made partakers of that freedom from the guilt and punishment of sin, and of that reconciliation which Christ hath purchased by his meritorious death and passion.

Secondly, I answer, that it was not by Adam's active disobedience imputed to us, that death or condemnation to it passed upon all men, but by the punishment he suffered for that disobedience, as will be fully proved hereafter; for he being by that disobedience made mortal, and obnoxious to death, γεγόνασιν ἐξ ἐκείνου πάντες θνητοὶ, all, that were begotten of him, became mortal, say all the Greek commentators here; and so by the obedience of Christ to the death in their stead, who were thus obnoxious to death, or by his suffering that death which was the punishment of sin, we became justified; i. e. exempted from that punishment.

Obj. 2. Secondly, Whereas it is said, Rom. viii. 3, 4. that Christ by being made sin for us, i. e. a sacrifice for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, &c. hence some conclude, that Christ's active obedience must be imputed to us; for, say they, the righteousness of the law can in no sense be said to be fulfilled in, or by us, but only by Christ's perfect obedience to the law imputed to us.

Ans. The text by no means will admit of this interpretation. For,

First, The righteousness here mentioned is not to be fulfilled, ἐν Χριστῷ, in or by Christ, but ἐν ὑμῖν, by us personally.

Secondly, It is not to be fulfilled by the imputation of Christ's righteousness to us, but by our walking in the Spirit, for to be spiritually minded is life, ver. 6. and, if through the Spirit we do mortify the deeds of the flesh, we shall live, ver. 13. for as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are sons of God, ver. 14. and, being sons, are heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ, and to be glorified with him, ver. 17. Whence it is exceeding evident, that the righteousness here mentioned, is to be fulfilled, not by the imputation of the righteousness of another to us, but by our own obedience performed by the assistance of God's Holy Spirit.

SECT. III.

I HOPE I have returned a sufficient answer to the texts alleged to prove the necessity of the imputation of Christ's active and perfect obedience to the law to us for righteousness.

It remains now that I should propound those arguments, which, in my judgment, seem fully to confute that doctrine, and they are these.

Arg. 1. (1.) This doctrine is contrary to all those scriptures which expressly say, that faith is imputed to us for righteousness, and which prove this from the example of Abraham, the father of the faithful: for they inform us, that Abraham believed in God, and it (i. e. this faith of his) was imputed to him for righteousness, Rom. iv. 3. and ver. 5. that to him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifies the ungodly, (that is, in God the Father, for it is God that justifieth, Rom. viii. 33.) his faith is imputed to him for justification; and, ver. 9. we say then that faith was imputed to Abraham εἰς δικαιοσύνην, for justification; and, ver. 20. 22. He was strong in faith, giving glory to God, wherefore it (i.e. this faith) was imputed to him for justification. Whence the apostle makes this general conclusion, that what the Scripture saith of Abraham, viz. that his faith was imputed to him for righteousness, was not written for his sake alone, but for us also, to whom it (that is, the like faith) shall be imputed (for righteousness), if we believe on him who raised up Jesus from the dead (that is, on God the Father). In the third chapter of the Epistle to the Galatians, he repeats the same example of the faith of Abraham, saying, Abraham believed in God, and it (i. e. his faith in God) was imputed to him for righteousness, ver. 6. and thence he makes this inference: Know therefore, that they who are (the children) of faith, are the sons of Abraham; and, ver. 9. that they who are of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham: and, ver. 24. he adds, that the law was our schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith, the Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the gentiles through faith. Now hence,

First, It is evident that the doctrine of justification by the very act of faith is expressly and frequently delivered in the Holy Scriptures, whereas it hath been proved already, that the doctrine of the imputation of Christ's active righteousness to us for justification, hath no ground in Scripture.

Secondly, What interpretation of the apostle's words can be more uncouth and unsound than this, Faith is imputed to us for righteousness; i. e. it is not faith, but Christ's active righteousness, which is imputed to us for righteousness? Is not this evidently to convert the apostle's affirmative into a negative, to deny constantly what he as constantly asserts, and to make him always mean what, in relation to justification, he doth never say? To him that believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith (saith the apostle) is imputed; it is not his faith, saith this interpretation, but Christ's righteousness which is thus imputed. And how then doth God justify the ungodly, if he only justifies them who have as true a title to Christ's perfect obedience, as if they had personally performed it, and upon that account alone are justified; can they be styled the ungodly, who are and must be as righteous as Christ was, before they can be justified?

Thirdly, This interpretation cannot possibly agree to the faith of Abraham; for it is not only said that he believed in God, not in the righteousness of Christ, but that his faith was in that God who quickens the dead, and calleth the things that are not, as if they were; (ver. 17.) that he was strong in faith, being fully persuaded, that what God had promised, he was able to perform. It therefore is evident, that it was faith in God's promise, and in his power to perform it, by which Abraham was justified. Now what affinity hath this faith with Christ's obedience to the law, not yet given, as the apostle argues, Gal. iii. 17. though it hath an evident affinity with God's promise, of justifying him that believeth in Jesus, and who believeth in that God who hath raised up Jesus from the dead? (Rom. iv. 24.)

Arg. 2. (2.) This will be farther evident from all those places which shew, that our justification consists entirely in the remission of sin, and that to be justified and to be freed from condemnation, or to have the guilt and punishment of our sins remitted, are phrases of the same import. This we may learn,

First, From those arguments by which the apostle proves, that Jew and gentile are to be justified by faith without the works of the law; viz. (1.) because both Jew and gentile lay under sin, (Rom. iii. 9.) and so both needed to be justified by faith, or by an act of grace, pardoning their sins, through faith in Christ; (ver. 24.) that therefore by the law no flesh can be justified, because by the law is the knowledge of sin, rendering us obnoxious to condemnation; where then there remains the guilt of sin, there can be no justification; where therefore there is a remission of the guilt of sin by God, there is our justification. Again, All have sinned, saith he, and fallen short of the glory of God, therefore absolution from this sin must be sufficient to make us obtain this glory of God. We who have thus sinned are justified (saith he) freely by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, (ver. 24.) Now, what is this redemption? It is, saith the apostle twice, remission of sins, Eph. i. 7. Colos. i. 14. To the same effect, he saith, Gal. iii. 21, 22. that justification cannot be by the law, because the law cannot give life; and this it cannot do, because the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, and so hath shut out that way of being justified: our freedom therefore from the guilt of sin must be sufficient for our justification to life. In the fourth chapter to the Romans he describes that justification in which faith is accounted to us for righteousness, by the non-imputation and forgiveness of sin, and proves this from the words of David, saying, Blessed is the man, whose iniquity is forgiven, and whose sin is covered; blessed is the man, to whom the Lord imputeth no sin, (ver. 4—8.) Since then the blessedness, of which the apostle there discourseth, is that of justification of the ungodly by faith; and since this blessedness is said to consist in the remission, the covering, the not imputing his sin to him, it cannot reasonably be denied, that the blessedness of a justified person is here described by the blessedness of a pardoned person, as being one and the same thing.

Secondly, This will be farther evident from the consideration of the phrases the apostle useth as equivalent to justification, and interpretative of it. As,

First, Reconciliation to God; that this is the same with justification, appears by these words, much more, being justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath by him: for if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life, Rom. v. 9, 10. where, being justified by his blood, and being reconciled by his death, seem plainly the same thing; now, that reconciliation is effected by the remission of sins, is evident from these words, 2 Cor. v. 19. God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses to them, and therefore justification must be so obtained.

Secondly, Justification stands directly opposed to condemnation in these words, Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? τίς ἐγκαλέσει κατὰ, who shall object a crime against them? It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth them? Rom. viii. 33, 34. And again, If the ministration of condemnation, i. e. the law which renders us obnoxious to condemnation, was glorious, much more the ministration, τῆς δικαιοσύνης, of justification exceeds in glory: now, what is it that mankind is accused of, or charged with by the law, but sin? What do they stand condemned for at God's bar, but the transgression of his law? Justification therefore, which stands opposed to it, must be a clearing and discharging them from the guilt or the condemning power of sin.

Thirdly, Justification is said to be from sin; By him all that believe are justified, ἐκ πάντων, from all those sins from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses, Acts xiii. 39. and again, The judgment was from one sin to condemnation, but the free gift to justification, ἐκ πολλῶν παραπτωμάτων, from many sins, Rom. v. 16. Now, what can justification from sin signify, besides our absolution from the guilt of sin?

Fourthly, The justifying the believer, and the remission of his sins, are only different expressions of the same thing, as is apparent from these words, God hath justified us freely by his grace, having set forth Christ to be the propitiation for our sins, through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness in the remission of sins to those who have this faith; (Rom. xxiii. 24, 25.) i. e. to manifest the way of justification by faith, which he alone admits of for the remission of sins.

Fifthly, We are justified (saith the apostle) through the redemption that is in Jesus, through faith in his blood, Rom. iii. 24, 25. through his blood, Rom. v. 9. Now what doth this blood procure for us? Remission of sins, Eph. i. 7. Col. i. 14. it being shed for the remission of sins, Matt. xxvi. 28. What benefit have believers by it? He hath loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood, Rev. i. v. He hath made peace for them by the blood of the cross, Colos. i. 20. with a God only angry for sin; he hath obtained eternal redemption from transgressions by it, Heb. ix. 12. 15. by all which equivalent expressions, it appears that God's justifying the sinner, in St. Paul's sense of the expression, is his absolving him from the guilt of his past sins, from punishment and condemnation by the law for them, by an act of grace, and free pardon of them through the blood of Jesus, his being as fully reconciled to us as if we never had offended against the former covenant we were all under, till that new covenant was established in the blood of Jesus, which promises God would be merciful to our iniquities, and would remember our sins no-more, Heb. viii. 12.

Now this observation perfectly destroys the imputation of Christ's active obedience to us for righteousness, since they who contend for that doctrine do make remission of sins but one half of justification, and Christ's active obedience imputed to us still necessary to procure us a title to eternal life; and that by the first, p. 72. God only looks upon us as perfectly innocent, and therefore not fit to be cast down to hell; whereas, by the other, he looks upon us as perfectly righteous, and therefore fit to be brought up to heaven. Secondly, These two things are plainly needless and inconsistent: for he that is discharged from the guilt of all his sins, must also be discharged from that penal death which is the wages of sin, and so must, by that freedom, have a title to life; for, between freedom from condemnation and absolution, freedom from the death due to sin, and the gift of life, in subjects capable of either,* there is no medium. Moreover, either this want of righteousness is our sin, or it is not; if it be not, then, as it is not our duty to be thus righteous in order to our justification before God, so neither can we be under that covenant which saith, Do this, and live, nor can Christ's active obedience be necessary on that account; if it be our sin, then must the want of it be forgiven by the remission of all our sins: whereas, if God requires that Christ's perfect obedience should be imputed to us, the want of it neither is nor can be forgiven, since then God must impute that as sin to us. And hence ariseth a third argument, against the imputation of Christ's active and perfect obedience to us for justification, viz.

Arg. 3. (3.) That it renders the death of Christ to procure the remission of our sins vain, and that upon many accounts.

First, Because the perfect righteousness of Christ, imputed to us, doth render his death unnecessary to procure any farther righteousness or justification in our behalf; for, if by virtue of this imputation we be as righteous as Christ was in his life, there can be no more need that Christ should die for us, than that he should die for himself, or any other should die for him; yea, then Christ, dying only for the benefit of believers, could not have died for the unjust, but only for the just, i. e. for them for whom there could be no necessity that he should die, but only that he should live for them; seeing faith in him as a Mediator, performing perfect obedience to the law for them, must make them persons for whom there could be no necessity that he should die, but only that he should live for them; seeing faith in him as a Mediator, performing perfect obedience to the law for them, must make them for whom he thus obeyed perfectly obedient, and therefore must have given them a full title to the promise, Do this, and live. Add to this, that perfect obedience is unsinning obedience, and sure there can be no necessity that Christ should die for the sins of them, who by his life had performed unsinning obedience. To strengthen this argument, consider that Christ performed his active obedience to the law, entirely before he suffered for our sins; and so this righteousness, being first performed and purchased for us, should be first imputed, and made over to us; and might, for any thing I can perceive to the contrary, have been imputed to all that believed in him before he actually suffered; yea, to all such persons, though he had returned to heaven without dying. For seeing nothing more can be required to a perfect justification from the condemnation of the law, than a perfect righteousness, i. e. a perfect fulfilling of the law, there could be no need of satisfaction made to Divine Justice, for any violations of it, since that must necessarily suppose that law not perfectly fulfilled by Christ, upon their account.

Secondly, According to this doctrine, there remains no place for the remission of sins to believers, for God neither did nor could forgive any sin in Christ, because he was perfectly righteous, and in him was no sin; if then believers be righteous, with the same righteousness imputed to them with which Christ was righteous, they must be as completely righteous as Christ was, and so have no more sin to be pardoned than he had, and so no more need to be pardoned than he had; whereas the apostle saith, that if we Christians sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins: (1 John ii. 1.) thus doth that doctrine destroy Christ's intercession for us, according to the words now cited; and also the necessity of his salutary passion, according to those words of St. Paul, if righteousness (i. e. justification) come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain: for if righteousness cannot come by the law, it cannot come by Christ's perfect obedience to the law; but if it can, then the apostle's inference is plainly this, that Christ is dead in vain, i. e. there could be no necessity of his dying upon this account, that we had personally transgressed the law, since he who hath a righteousness, or an obedience to the law, imputed to him, as perfect as was that of Christ, can be no more condemned for transgressing the law than Christ himself.

Thirdly, According to this doctrine, God can see no sin in believers; for certain it is, he saw no sin in Christ: if then believers be righteous, with a righteousness as perfect as Christ's was imputed to them, he can see no more sin in them than he beheld in Christ.

Fourthly, This doctrine renders it unnecessary for a believer to repent, at least, of sins committed after he truly hath believed: for our repentance must suppose an antecedent failure, since that time, in our obedience; whereas, there being no such failure in the active obedience of Christ, if that, by imputation, be made as much and truly the obedience of believers as if they personally had performed it, there can be no failure in the obedience of a believer, and so no place for his repentance. The perfect obedience which Christ performed to the law, was the reason why he needed no repentance; if then, through faith, it be as much theirs by imputation as if they personally had performed it, must it not be equally a reason why they need no repentance? Lastly, The assertors of this doctrine say, Christ's perfect obedience must be imputed to believers, that they may have a just title to eternal life by virtue of this precept, Do this, and live: this title he who is a sinner, i. e. a violater of the law, requiring perfect obedience, can never have; and therefore, he who needs repentance cannot have it, that being only needful for the remission of sins, and that we may live and not die.

Arg. 4. (4.) This doctrine renders it unnecessary to have any personal inherent righteousness; for as Christ's passive obedience, sustained in our stead, makes it unnecessary, if not unjust, that we should personally suffer any punishment for the remission of those sins which render us obnoxious to death; so in like manner must Christ's active and perfect obedience to the law, imputed to us, render it as unnecessary that we should personally be righteous, by doing righteousness, that we may live; for if we can be as righteous as Christ was without doing righteousness, sure we need not be more than so: yea, then we may have a title to life eternal, without any inherent righteousness; and so there can be no need of having our fruit unto holiness, that the end may be eternal life.

The good bishop saw the absurdity of a consequence so obstructive of all practical Christianity, and so plainly excusing all men from any necessity of living righteously, soberly, and godly, in this present world: he therefore saith, p. 89. "I believe the active obedience of Christ will stand me in no stead, unless I endeavour after sincere obedience in my person; his active as well as his passive obedience being imputed to none, but only to them who apply it to themselves by faith, which faith will certainly put such as are possessed with it upon obedience." Where the bishop did well to deny the conclusion, seeing the consequence was so evident from his own words, that he could not formally deny it; for if, as he saith, p. 86. Christ covenanted to perform those duties which were due from man to God, provided what he thus did should wholly be put on the account of man; and the Father was pleased to consent to this motion: can the Father, after this consent, require that man himself should perform all or any of those duties to God, which Christ already had performed on his account? If, as he saith, p. 87. Christ performed that obedience only on the account of those whose nature he had assumed, as they, by faith, lay hold upon it; and God, by grace, imputes this obedience to them, as if it had been performed by them in their own persons: can God require, that, after Christ's performance of it perfectly, they should imperfectly perform the same again? Or, after the imputation of Christ's perfect obedience to them, as fully as if they had performed it personally, require that they should perform it personally? When Christ, by his obedience imputed to them, hath entitled them to eternal life; as he saith, p. 88. can it be still necessary that they should have their fruit unto holiness, that the end may be eternal life? (Rom. vi. 22.) when, as he saith, p. 89. under the new covenant, obedience in our surety is accepted as completely sufficient; can personal obedience be required of us by the same covenant?

To say, that faith will put the person that is possessed of it upon obedience to God, is nothing to the purpose; for the question is, not what faith will do, but what he is obliged to do, who by this faith is as much entitled to Christ's perfect obedience, as if it had been personally performed by him; and what God, after this perfect obedience imputed to him can require him to do, in order to that eternal life, which this perfect obedience imputed, hath given him a certain title to, whether it be necessary for him, after this, *by patient continuance in well-doing, to seek for glory and immortality, that he may have eternal life, and, through the Spirit, to mortify the deeds of the flesh, that he may live;† and to live righteously, soberly, and godly, in this present world, that he may comfortably expect the blessed hope.‡ I conclude then in the words of the beloved apostle, Good Christians, let no man deceive you, not he who applies Christ's active righteousness to himself, though he never did it, but he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he (i. e. Christ) is righteous.§

Arg. 5. (5.) It is a thing impossible, that, by the obedience of another imputed to us, we can obtain a title to the life promised by that law, which saith, Do this, and live.

1. Because the law requires personal obedience that we may live, by saying, The man that doth these things shall live by (doing) them; and this the bishop grants by saying, p. 89. The obedience the old covenant required as absolutely necessary, was that of our own persons; whereas the obedience of another cannot be our personal obedience, nor can it be imputed to us, but by the relaxation of the law, which requires of us personal obedience; and so our personal obedience, which is the only thing required by the law, must be remitted, that we may be made righteous with the righteousness of another. To make this farther evident, let it be noted, that men do generally mistake, when they say, Christ, by his sufferings in our stead, made satisfaction to the law, which said, In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt die the death: this he could not possibly do, because the law expressly saith, The soul that sinneth he shall die; and only threatened death to the person that violates the law. He indeed made a satisfaction to Divine justice, by suffering, in our stead, that death, which justice might have personally inflicted upon us; but then this admission of another to suffer in our stead is a full relaxation of that law, which required us personally to suffer, and an entire remission of the punishment the law required of us personally; and so it is also in this case.

2. Because the law requires unsinning obedience, saying, *Cursed is the man that continueth not in all things written in the law to do them, not promising any pardon to the sinner; so that, unless Christ's righteousness imputed to us can make us never to have been sinners, and so never to have needed forgiveness of sin, it cannot afford us a legal righteousness. Hence the apostle saith, Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, not by his continuance in all things written in the law to do them, but by suffering the punishment which the law threatened to offenders, to wit, by being hanged on the tree.

Arg. 6. (6.) This doctrine partly answers and partly confutes all the arguments which the apostle useth in his Epistles to the Romans and the Galatians, to prove that justification must be by faith only, and not at all by the works of the law. For,

First, This doctrine destroys that argument of St. Paul, by which he proves, that no man can be justified by the works of the law, because all men have sinned, and therefore stand condemned by the law of works; affording a full answer to it, by saying, that, though we could not be thus justified by our own personal obedience, we might be justified by Christ's active obedience imputed to us, that being perfect obedience to the law.

Secondly, Whereas neither the apostle nor the Holy Scripture saith, that Christ was righteous or obedient to the law for us, or that by his obedience to the law imputed to us, we are made legally righteous, but absolutely denies that righteousness could have been by the law, because the law could not give life: for (saith St. Paul, Gal. iii. 21.) had there been a law which could have given life, verily righteousness, i. e. justification to life, should have been by the law: this doctrine plainly contradicts those words of the apostle, by introducing a necessity of perfect obedience to the law, that we may live; and contending that we must be entitled to eternal life, according to the tenor of that law, which saith, Do this, and live, p. 88, 89.

Thirdly, Whereas this doctrine makes it necessary that the reward should be of works as well as of grace, yea, of the works of that law, which saith, Do this, and live; St. Paul puts these things in an absolute opposition to each other: and represents the one as entirely destructive of the other. For (saith he) to him that worketh, a reward is not reckoned, κατὰ χάριν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ τὸ ὀφείλημα, of grace, but of debt; but to him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifies the ungodly, his faith (without works) is imputed for righteousness, even as David speaketh of the blessedness of the man to whom the Lord imputeth righteousness, χωρὶς ἔργων, without works; (Rom. iv. 4—6.) whereas God cannot impute justification or righteousness to any without works, if he impute it to them only to whom Christ's perfect works of righteousness belong: nor can this righteousness be of grace, through faith, and not of debt, if it belongs to them only who are debtors to fulfil the whole law; since the apostle saith expressly, that they who are thus debtors to fulfil the law, or sought for justification, by fulfilling it, are fallen from grace: (Gal. v. 4.) nor can it be here said, that they were not indeed debtors to fulfil it personally, but only to have that obedience by which Christ fulfilled it imputed to them: for the apostle saith, in the immediate preceding words, Christ become of none effect to you, whosoever of you are seeking to be justified by the law; whereas he could not be of none effect to them, who was the only person by whom they were enabled to perform that law to their justification. Again, the apostle puts this plain difference betwixt that righteousness which is by faith, and by the works of the law, that the first requires only believing from the heart to salvation; the second, requires works excluding grace, by saying, he that doeth these things shall live by (doing) them; (Rom. x. 5. 9, 10.) whence he argues thus, that if justification be of grace, it is not of works, otherwise grace is no more grace; and, if it be of works, it is not of grace, otherwise work is no more work. (Rom. xi. 6.)

* Rom. ii. 7. † Chap. viii. 13.
‡ Tit. ii. 12, 13. § 1 John iii. 7.

* Gal. iii. 10.

Fourthly, This doctrine flatly contradicts all the places in which the apostle positively asserts, that by the works of the law can no man be justified, but by faith only, or by faith without the works of the law; as Rom. iii. 20. 22. 24. for, if a man be justified by the righteousness of Christ imputed to him, he must be justified by the works of the law, because the active obedience of Christ consists as truly in the performance of those works, as our own personal righteousness would have done. Moreover, if the righteousness of God consisted in the imputation of Christ's legal righteousness, it could not be manifested, as the apostle saith it is, without the works of the law; because, to such a righteousness, the works of the law are plainly necessary.

So again, when he saith, Gal. ii. 16. Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we ourselves have believed in Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: doth not this doctrine contradict these words, by teaching that we are to be justified by the works of the law performed by Christ, and imputed to us, as if we personally had performed them? For Christ's performance of them alters not the nature and property of the works, they being still the works of the law, whosoever doeth them: and so he that is justified by them, done by another in his stead, must be still justified by the works of the law.

Note also here, that the apostle doth not say, a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the works of Jesus Christ, or not by the works of the law, as performed by us, but only as performed by Christ; but on the contrary saith, We have believed that we might be justified by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law, excluding the works of the law from justification by faith in Christ; whereas this doctrine makes faith entitle us to the works of the law, performed by Christ, and made over to us for our justification.

Thirdly, When the apostle argues thus, That no man is justified by the works of the law is manifest, because the Scripture saith, The just shall live by faith, but the law is not of faith, i. e. it speaks nothing of, and promiseth no, justification to any man by faith, but only saith the man that doeth these things (which are required of him by the law) shall live by (doing) them: (Gal. iii. 11, 12.) doth not that doctrine fully contradict these words, which saith, The man that is justified by faith must do the things required by the law, that he may live, and must have a true title to a perfect observance of the law, in order to that end?

Fourthly, When the apostle saith, If they who are (observers) of the law be heirs (with faithful Abraham, who was justified by faith) faith is made void, as being insufficient to justify us without the observation of the law: (Rom. iv. 14.) doth not this doctrine say also, that faith is insufficient to justify us, without the observation of the law, and so as plainly make void justification by faith? Doth it not also make them heirs, who are observers of the law, as having life by virtue of a legal righteousness imputed to them, as fully as if it had been personally performed by them?

And though these things are so clear, that they need no farther confirmation, yet may it here be noted, that whereas not one of these scriptures can be wrested from the plain sense they literally bear, or from asserting that no justification can be had by the works of the law, but by this distinction, that true indeed it is, that no justification can be had by the works of the law, personally performed by us, but it may be had by the perfect obedience of Christ imputed to us; the apostle, throughout this whole discourse against justification by the works of the law, never gives the least hint of this distinction: and whereas the bishop places the better half of justification, to wit, that which gives us a title to eternal life, in this perfect righteousness of Christ imputed to us by faith, the apostle mentions not one word of this in either of his Epistles, but in both sums up the matter so as plainly to demonstrate that he meant no such thing. For in his Epistle to the Romans,* he thus concludes, τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν, what is it then that we say? even this, That Israel following after the law of righteousness hath not attained to the law of righteousness, because they sought it not by faith, but as (if) it were (to be obtained) by the works of the law. Now, might they not, according to this doctrine, that the works of the law, performed by Christ, are upon our faith imputed to us for righteousness, as truly as if they had been personally performed by us, have sought it both by faith and by the works of the law? In his Epistle to the Galatians,† he concludes thus, Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty (from the observance of the law to justification) in which Christ hath made you free, and be not again entangled in the yoke of bondage: behold, I testify to you, that, if you be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing; mark the reason, ver. 3. For every one that is circumcised is a debtor to the whole law: whence the argument runs thus: Him that is a debtor to do the whole law, Christ will profit nothing; but (saith the bishop) every Christian is a debtor to perform the whole law, for what else can be the import of these words, p. 89. The old covenant which saith, Do this, and live, Lev. xviii. 5. is not disannulled, but rather established by the covenant of grace, especially as to the obedience it requires from us in order to the life it promiseth? therefore (according to the apostle) Christ can profit him nothing. Now, how could the apostle have made this inference, had he believed, as the bishop did, that even faith itself could profit us nothing without entitling us to that obedience which the law requires from us, as performed by Christ our surety: surely this doctrine saith, in full contradiction to St. Paul, that nothing but Christ's active obedience can profit us as to the life which the law promiseth, and that for this very reason, that we are still debtors to perform the whole law. In fine, the great indignation of the Jews against the apostle, for teaching the doctrine of justification by faith, was this, that by it he made void the law as to justification; but had he only sought it in the sense of the bishop, he had, as the bishop contends, not disannulled, but rather had established the law, even as to justification of life, and so must rather have ingratiated himself with, than so incensed the Jews against him; since then he must have said what would have been highly acceptable to them, viz. that their law was still of a perpetual and necessary obligation even in order to justification, and that Christ himself had so established it, as to enable both us and them to yield perfect obedience to it, in order to that life it promised.

Arg. 7. (7.) The apostle saith expressly, Rom. iii. 24. that we are justified freely by God's grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, i. e. through the remission of sins purchased by his blood, for we have redemption through his blood, even the remission of sins, Eph. i. 7. Colos. i. 14. and ver. 25. that God hath set forth Christ as a propitiation through faith in his blood, that he might be the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus; and v. 9. that we are justified by his blood, and reconciled to God by his death; ver. 10. that Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, by suffering that death the law pronounced accursed, Gal. iii. 11. that Christ entering once into the holy place, by his blood hath purchased eternal redemption for us, Heb. ix. 12. and that, through Christ's will to suffer for us, we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Christ, Heb. x. 10. ascribing our justification, our reconciliation to God, our propitiation, our redemption from the curse of the law, our eternal redemption, our sanctification in the sacrificial sense, i. e. our freedom from the guilt of sin, for which alone we can be condemned to die, to the death and blood of Christ. Now all this, saith the bishop, p. 90. makes him but a half Mediator, or half Saviour; this indeed, says he, frees us from death, but gives us no title to eternal life. Hence it is (saith he) that I cannot look upon Christ as having made full satisfaction to God's justice for me, unless he had performed the obedience I owe to God's laws, as well as borne the punishment that is due to my sins, &c. p. 88. so that, according to the bishop, Christ cannot have redeemed us from the curse of the law, by his death for us, or by his blood have obtained eternal redemption for us, that being certainly redemption from dying for ever, or ἀπολύτρωσις τῆς περιποιήσεως, redemption of life, Eph. ii. 14. And, if our Saviour's blood and passion gives to believers no title to eternal life, why doth the apostle say, that we have freedom to enter into heaven by the blood of Jesus, (Heb. x. 19.) and that by his death, undergone for the redemption of transgressions, we receive the promise of an eternal inheritance? (Heb. ix. 15.) Moreover, when God justifies from the guilt of sin, i. e. from transgressing the law, what charge can the law lay against us, as having not performed what it required? Can God be propitious, and fully reconciled to us by the blood shed for us, and yet exclude us from his blissful presence? Can Christ have brought us nigh to God, and made him at peace with us through the blood of the cross, (Eph. ii. 13. 15.) and yet exclude us from the glory of God, who having peace with him, rejoice in the glory of God? (Rom. v. 1, 2.)

Arg. 8. (8.) This doctrine renders it impossible that God should make a covenant of grace with man, and consequently asserts, that Christians must be under the same obligations as ever to perform the covenant of works, and this the bishop, p. 89. not only asserts, but contends for. For, how can a man be more under the law, and under the covenant of works, than by being under the obligation to do all that the covenant of works requires, and to yield perfect obedience to the law, that he may be accounted righteous before God? whereas the apostle saith expressly, we are not under the law, but under grace, Rom. vi. 1. that δικαιοσύνη, justification, is by faith, that it might be of grace, Rom. iv. 16. that we are justified freely by the grace of God, not through the active obedience, but through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, i. e. through the remission of sins procured by his blood; that by grace we are saved through faith, not of works, Eph. ii. 8. and, in fine, that if justification be by grace, then is it not of works, Rom. xi. 6.

And this is still more evident from this consideration, that this doctrine plainly makes both the two covenants the same; for, where the parties covenanting are the same, the thing covenanted for is the same, if the conditions of the covenants be the same, the covenants must be the same: now here it is certain that the persons covenanting, to wit, God and man, are the same; the thing covenanted for, life and acceptance with God, is the same; if then the condition of both, Do this, and live, be the same, (which is the thing asserted, p. 89.) the covenants themselves must be the same.

Nor is it material to answer here in the bishop's words, that the condition of the first covenant was this, Do this in your own persons, and live; the condition of the new only, Do this by yourself, or by your surety, and live; for even this disjunctive was also contained in the first covenant, or it was not; if it was, then the condition of the first covenant could be only that which is said to have been the condition of the second also, i. e. Do this by thyself, or by another, and live; if it were not, then the doing this by another could not make us legally righteous; because the law required this obedience in our own persons (saith the bishop, p. 89.) as absolutely necessary; and so Christ's obedience to the law imputed to us, but not performed by us, could not fulfil that law, which only saith, Do this in your own persons, and live. And evident it is, that the allowing another to do that duty for me, or in my stead, which I owe personally to God, is as truly an exempting me from doing that duty in my own person, as the allowing another to suffer the punishment due to my sins in my stead, is an exempting me from suffering that punishment in my own person. And had the bishop attended to his own words, he would have seen this consequence; for his argument, p. 82. "That one man can merit by that which another performs is a plain contradiction; for, in that he merits, it is as necessarily implied that he himself acts that by which he is said to merit; but, in that he depends upon another's action, it is as necessarily implied, that he himself doth not do that by which he is said to merit," by changing the word merit into obey, runs thus, That one person can obey the law by the obedience which another performs, is a plain contradiction; for, in that he obeys, it is necessarily supposed that he himself doth that by which he is said to obey; but, in that he depends on the obedience of another for the performing that which the law requires of him, it is as necessarily supposed that he himself doth not do that by which he is said to obey the law.

Arg. 9. (9.) As the foundation of this imputation is precarious, there being no evidence in Scripture of such a covenant as is here mentioned, p. 86. but only a command laid upon Christ, that he should lay down his life for his sheep; so is there in the Scripture no such notion of imputation as is here supposed. For,

1. Wheresoever this phrase occurs affirmatively, that such a thing was imputed to such a person, it is some personal action or thing which is thus said to be imputed: as when it is said, Rom. ii. 26. if the uncircumcision (i. e. the uncircumcised person) keep the righteousness of the law, his uncircumcision εἰς περιτομὴν λογισθήσεται, shall be accounted for circumcision; i. e. he shall be as well accepted, as if he was circumcised: so Rom. iv. 3. Abraham believed God, and it (that is, his faith) was imputed to him for righteousness: for so it is explained, ver. 5. in these words, to him that worketh not, but believeth, his faith is imputed to him for righteousness; and, ver. 9. we say that faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousness: so also, Gal. iii. 6. James ii. 23. and of our faith in him who raised Christ from the dead, it is said, Rom. iv. 24. it shall be imputed to us for righteousness.

I also add, that the righteousness of one cannot be truly thus imputed to another by him who speaks of things as they really are. God indeed may and often doth good to one, especially in temporals, for the righteousness of another, as he did to the Jews for the sake of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and at the prayer of Moses and Aaron, in which sense, saith St. James, the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much, v. 16. he also sheweth mercy to the posterity of them that fear him, for their parents' sake, but he neither doth nor truly can λογίζεσθαι, reckon or repute them righteous, because Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, or their parents, were so; because, as sin, so righteousness is a personal action or a habit inherent in the subject that doth it. And, therefore, to remove the common instances which are usually produced with relation to this matter, I add, as the conclusion of what I shall offer on this subject,

Lastly, That in the Holy Scripture there is no mention of the imputation of any man's sin or righteousness to another, but only of the imputation of his own good deeds for righteousness, or of his evil deeds for punishment. And therefore I say,

First, That it cannot truly be affirmed, that we all sinned in Adam, and by his disobedience were made sinners, because his sin and disobedience were imputed to us: for I have shewed already, that the Scripture no where maketh the least mention of any thing of any other's imputed to us, but only of some personal thing or action of our own, accounted to us for reward or punishment. Moreover, this imputation either makes the sin of Adam truly ours, or it doth not; if it doth not, how can we be made sinners by it? if it doth, then death came upon us for our own sin, and so not for the sin of one, but for the sin of all: whereas the apostle saith expressly, that death came upon us, τῷ τοῦ ἑνὸς παραπτώματι, by the sin of one, Rom. v. 15. 17. δι' ἑνὸς ἁμαρτήσαντος, by one man sinning, ver. 16. and δι' ἑνὸς παραπτώματος, by the offence of that one man, ver. 18. Thirdly, I ask, whether this imputation made the posterity of Adam sinners, or whether it found them so before? if it found them so before, it must be plainly needless, seeing then they might have been condemned to death without it: if it made them so, then since this imputation is the act of God, and not of man, it plainly follows, that God must be the author of that sin; because this imputation flows immediately from him, without the intervention of any action on the part of any of those men to whom it is imputed: moreover, then the imputation must be false, as charging them with sin, whom he did not find sinners, but only by his arbitrary imputation made them so. Now far be it from any Christian to assert that God should falsely impute sin to any man. In a word, λογίζεσθαι, imputare, is to reckon or account any thing to any man, to charge him with it, or lay the charge of it to him; this therefore on God's part must suppose, in the very nature of it, some action done by the posterity of Adam, which is blameworthy, and may be justly charged upon them, before there can be any ground for imputation of it; and this shews, that it is impossible that this imputation should be the very thing that renders them blameworthy, or persons worthy to be charged with guilt; and yet, if the sin of Adam becomes ours only by imputation, it must be ours only because it is by God imputed to us, and not imputed because it is ours; that is, God by this imputation must make us sinners, and not find us such; for this imputation is the action of the judge, and not of the supposed criminal; remove or take away this action, and no crime can be charged upon him. In fine, if the sin of Adam becomes ours only by imputation, it deserves condemnation only by the same imputation, that is, by the action of God; that therefore we deserve condemnation for it, is to be ascribed directly to the action of God, and only by accident to the action of Adam. Whence, therefore, is our destruction, according to this opinion, but of God, who makes us worthy of condemnation, by imputing to us that sin which by his imputation only we stand guilty of?

Secondly, It cannot truly be affirmed that our sins were so imputed to Christ, when he became our surety, as that he became partaker of the guilt of them, but only so, as that he suffered the punishment which was due unto us for them, it being absolutely necessary, not only in the case of Christ, but of all vicarial punishments, to separate the punishment from the guilt; for though a man may become obnoxious to the punishment or sufferings of another by an innocent consent, he can never partake of the guilt of another's action, but by a criminal consent unto it; and, so far as he suffers for that action of him, he becomes guilty by this criminal consent, he suffers for his own sin, because that consent made the sin his own; whence in such cases he suffers not as a substitute, but as a party. Seeing then our blessed Lord could not be guilty of any criminal consent to any of our actions, it is impossible that he should contract the guilt of sin by his consent to suffer for us; when therefore the prophet saith,* that God laid on him the iniquity of us all, we are to understand this only of the punishment, or the chastisement of our sin; and to extend this farther, and say, with some, that, by his consent thus to suffer, he suffered for those sins which he had truly made his own, is not only false for the forementioned reason, but is contrary to the whole tenor of the Scripture, which saith negatively, that he was such a high-priest, who was holy, undefiled, separate from sinners, and who needed not to offer up sacrifices for his own sins; that he was in all things like to us, χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας, sin only excepted; that we are redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without spot or blemish; that he did no sin, that he knew no sin, that *he suffered, the just for the unjust: and affirmatively, that he died not for his own, but for our sins; that he suffered for our sins according to the Scriptures; he suffered for the sins of the unjust; he was the propitiation for our sins, and made reconciliation for the sins of the people.† In a word, this assertion borders upon blasphemy; for, if Christ made all our iniquities his own, he made himself as guilty, and as great a sinner, as were all the sinners for whose sake he suffered. Nor is it any refuge here to say, he was the greatest sinner only by imputation of sin to him, not by commission of sin personally: for as the righteousness of God cannot impute sin to him who did no sin, and gave no criminal consent to the sin of others; or whom he doth not first look upon as a sinner, and a guilty person; so is it not consistent with the virtue, the intent, and nature of our Saviour's sufferings, that God should look upon him as a sinner, and a guilty person; for then he must have looked upon him as one who had deserved to die for his own sin, or as one guilty of death, and then his death could have made no satisfaction for the sin of others; yea, then he must have suffered death, not for our sins, as they were ours, but as they were his own by imputation; whereas the Scripture always saith, he suffered death for our sins, but never for his own by imputation or inhesion. I conclude therefore, in the words of Bishop Davenant* and Dr. Outram,† "That Christ was willing so far to take our sins upon him, non ut inde peccator, sed hostia pro peccato constitueretur; not as to be made a sinner, but only a sacrifice for sin by and for them."

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

THAT this Epistle was writ a year after the first, is probably collected from these words, ix. 2. Achaia was ready a year ago; for he having given instructions for that collection he in these words refers to, only at the close of his First Epistle, they could not have the forwardness there mentioned before that time. Now, that the first Epistle was written early in the year 55, or 57, appears from these words in it, I will stay at Ephesus till Pentecost: (xvi. 8.) for he stayed some considerable time in Asia, after his purpose to leave Ephesus and go to Macedonia, (Acts ix. 21, 22.) and yet, making here his apology for not wintering at Corinth, as he thought to do, (1 Cor. xvi. 6.) this Epistle must be writ after winter, and so when a new year was begun. It therefore seems to be written after his second coming to Macedonia, mentioned Acts xx. 3. for (1.) it was written after he had been at Troas, and had left that place to return to Macedonia; now that was at his second going thither: see note on ii. 12. (2.) It was written when Timothy was with him; now when he left Ephesus, to go into Macedonia, Timothy went not with him, but was sent before him, (Acts xix. 22.) but at his second going through Macedonia, Timothy was with him. (Acts xx. 4.) (3.) He speaks of some Macedonians that were like to come with him, ix. 4. now, at his second going from Macedonia, there accompanied him Aristarchus, Secundus, and Gaius of Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedonia. (Acts xx. 4.) And (4.) the postscript saith, this Epistle was written from Philippi, as we find it in Theodoret and Œcumenius, where St. Paul was till the days of unleavened bread. (Acts xx. 6.) It therefore seems to be sent from thence to them by Titus, and some other person, not long before Paul's coming to them, which he speaks of as instant, xiii. 1. and that which he was now ready to do, xii. 14. and did, saith Dr. Lightfoot, in his journey from Philippi to Troas, he sailing about from Philippi to Corinth, to make good his promise, whilst the rest that were with him, (Acts xx. 4.) went directly the next cut to Troas, and there waited for him.

CHAP. I.

1. PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and [1] Timothy our brother, to the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia: (see note on 1 Cor. i. 1.)

2. [2] Grace be (given) to you, and peace from God our Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ.

3. Blessed be God, even (our God and) [3] the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort;

4. Who comforteth us in all our tribulations (by that inward peace and earnest of the Spirit he gives under them), that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble by the comfort, wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God (God's servants never wanting his comforts under all their sufferings).

5. For as the [4] sufferings of Christ abound in us, so [5] our consolation also aboundeth by Christ.

6. And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effectual (Gr. wrought) in (or by) the enduring the same sufferings which we also suffer (and which by our example you are encouraged to endure): or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation, (which is accomplished by your patient perseverance under all your sufferings, to which patience you are animated by the experience of that consolation God affords his servants under all their sufferings, Matt. v. 12. xxiv. 13. 2 Cor. iv. 17. 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12. James i. 12.)

7. And our hope of you is steadfast, knowing, that as you are partakers of the sufferings (we endure, 1 Cor. x. 13.) so shall ye be also of the consolation (we enjoy in all our sufferings:

8. Our sufferings, I say,) for we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life:

9. But we (therefore) had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God that raiseth the dead:

10. Who (then) delivered us [6] from so great a death, and (daily) doth deliver (us), in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us;

11. [7] You also helping together by prayer for us, that for [8] the gift bestowed upon us (or the favour conferred on us) by the means of many persons thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

12. For (in all our afflictions) our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but [9] by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward.

13. (And of the truth of this you may rest assured;) for we write no other things unto you (of it), than what you read (Gr. know, remember), or [10] acknowledge; and I trust you shall acknowledge even to the end;

14. As also you have acknowledged us in part, (i. e. as to the sounder part of the church; see note on ii. 5. though some have represented us as walking according to the flesh, x. 2.) that we are (just matter of) your rejoicing, even as ye also are (at present, and much more will be) ours in the day of the Lord Jesus.

15. And in this confidence (of you) I was minded to come to you before (this time), that you might have [11] a second benefit (or grace);

16. [12] And to pass by you (though not so as to see you in that passage, 1 Cor. xvi. 7.) into Macedonia, and to come again (Gr. and again to come), out of Macedonia to you, and of you to be brought on my way towards Judea.

17. When I therefore was thus minded (or, resolved thus), did I (afterward) use lightness (in changing this resolution)? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose (them) [13] according to the flesh (or, carnal interests), that with me there should be yea yea, and (again) nay nay? (i. e. inconstancy and mutability to serve my carnal interests, so that you should hence gather, that, in preaching the gospel of Christ, I walk according to the flesh, x. 2.

18. No surely;) but [14] as (sure as) God is true, our word towards you [15] was not yea and nay, (i. e. our preaching was not variable, we now saying one thing, anon another).

19. [16] For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, (even) by me, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea.

20. [17] For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen (i. e. are true and certain through him), to the glory of God (demonstrated in the confirmation of them) by us.

21. Now he that established us with you in (the doctrine of) Christ, and (who) hath anointed us (with the Holy Ghost) is God;

22. [18] Who hath also (thus) sealed us (up to the day of redemption, Eph. iv. 30.) and given the earnest of the Spirit (to the pledge and assurance of it, 2 Cor. v. 5. Eph. i. 13, 14.) in our hearts. (See note on 1 Cor. i. 5—8.)

23. Moreover, (it was not therefore out of likeness, but) [19] I call God for a record upon my soul, that (it was merely) to spare you (that I came not as yet unto Corinth.

24. (Yet this I say,) not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: [20] for by faith you stand (τῇ γὰρ πίστει ἑστήκατε, for ye have stood in the faith).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. ΚΑΙ Τιμόθεος ὁ ἀδελφὸς, And Timotheus a brother.] I have observed, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, that it is usual with St. Paul to call Timothy his brother, (Colos. i. 1. 1 Thess. iii. 2 Philem. 1. Heb. xiii. 23.) and this he probably did, that he might not be despised for his youth, as he intimates he might be, 1 Tim. iv. 12. eight years after the writing of this Epistle, this being written, A. D. 57. that to Timothy, A. D. 65.

[2] Ver. 2. Χάρις καὶ εἰρήνη, Grace and peace.] May that grace and favour of God, on which your salvation and happiness depend, (Tit. i. 1.) and that peace which passeth understanding, (Phil. iv. 7.) and is the effect of the Divine favour, be continually with you, and derived from God the Father, the fountain of all blessings, and from Jesus Christ, the procurer and dispenser of them (1 Cor. i. 4. Eph. i. 3.) on you.

And from our Lord Jesus Christ.] See note on 1 Cor. i. 3.

Πατρὸς ἡμῶν, καὶ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.] Dr. Mills saith, these words are inserted into this place from other epistles; whereas Origen, in Matt. p. 500. Cod. Alexandrinus, all the Greek commentators, and all the ancient versions, own them. (See Examen Millii.)

[3] Ver. 3. Καὶ Πατὴρ, The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.] Why, saith Schlictingius, should God be styled thus, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, if Christ be God equally with the Father, seeing, by being thus distinguished from, he seems to be denied to be God?

I answer, He is by these words denied to be God the Father, since that would render him father to himself; but his being thus distinguished from God the Father, hinders not his being God of God the Father, who by way of eminency is sometimes absolutely styled God, because he is the fountain of the Deity. For as the words, our Lord, ascribed here to Christ, do not exclude the Father from being our Lord; so the word God, ascribed to God the Father, excludes not Christ from being what St. Thomas styles him, our Lord and our God, John xx. 28. And, as God was under the Old Testament styled the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to confirm the faith of the Jews in the promises made to them and their seed, so is he usually in the New Testament styled the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, to confirm to us his love in Christ Jesus, his beloved Son, in whom he is well-pleased; and to assure us that he is, as here it follows, the Father of mercies, in the plural, to signify, according to the Hebrew way of speaking, the greatness and multitude of his mercies; and the God of all consolation, as being the giver of that Paraclete, or Holy Spirit, whence all our comforts are derived.

[4] Ver. 5. Τὰ παθήματα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, The sufferings of Christ.] The sufferings of Christ's members, for his sake, are styled his sufferings, because they are evils inflicted on his members out of enmity to him, and by reason of their mystical union to him, and because of the sympathy he has with them in their sufferings. (Luke x. 16. Acts ix. 4. Isa. lxiii. 9.) Hence is he said, συμπαθῆσαι, to suffer with us in our infirmities, Heb. iv. 15. But when the Greek fathers add here, that Christ suffered more in his members than he did in his own person;* this sounds harsh in the ears of most divines, and shews they had not those thoughts of our Lord's sufferings and satisfaction which we have.

[5] Ἡ παράκλησις ἡμῶν, Our consolation] Abounds by Christ, because, as he promised, so he conferred the Spirit of consolation on those who suffered for his sake; so that, though they received the word with much affliction, they did it also with joy in the Holy Ghost, 1 Thess. i. 6. having the spirit of faith, 2 Cor. iv. 13. of glory, and of God, resting on them, 2 Tim. i. 7. 1 Pet. iv. 14. (See here, ver. 21, 22.)

[6] Ver. 10. Ἐκ τηλικούτου θανάτου, From so great a death.] Most interpreters refer what is said in these three last verses to the commotion raised against St. Paul by Demetrius at Ephesus, Acts xix. from ver. 26. to the end of that chapter. But we read not that in that commotion any hands were laid upon St. Paul, or that he suffered any thing. He therefore had no occasion from it to say, that he was pressed above measure, and above strength, so as to despair of life; that he had the sentence of death within him; and that he was delivered from so great a death, and as it were raised from the dead: these high expressions rather seem to signify, that he indeed was put to fight with beasts at Ephesus (as he speaks, 1 Cor. xv. 32. see the note there), and was by God delivered from them.

[7] Ver. 11. Συνυπουργούντων καὶ ὑμῶν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν τῇ δεήσει, You also helping together by prayer for us.] Hence note, that the more public prayers are, the more prevailing they will be; and also, that God will be more glorified by the thanksgivings rendered for the success of them. But whereas Esthius hence pleads for prayers to the souls of saints departed, the practice of the apostle here and elsewhere is a strong argument against them: for he passionately entreats the Christians living at Rome, to strive together with him in their prayers to God, Rom. xv. 30. the Corinthians, to help together with him in prayer, 2 Cor. i. 11. the Ephesians, to pray for him with all perseverance, Eph. vi. 18, 19. the Colossians, to continue in prayer for him, Colos. iv. 1—3. the Thessalonians, to pray for him, that the word of the Lord might have free course, and be glorified, 1 Thess. v. 25. and that he may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men, 2 Thess. iii. 1, 2. and the believing Jews, to pray for him that he might sooner be restored to them, Heb. xiii. 18, 19. But, in all his Epistles, we have not one petition of like nature directed to any saint departed; whereas, had he thought them capable of hearing him, and their addresses more effectual for the same ends, we may reasonably think his zeal would have prompted him to put up his requests to them, and leave us some examples of this nature.

[8] Τὸ εἰς ἡμᾶς χάρισμα, The gift bestowed upon us.] The word χάρισμα in the New Testament always importing a spiritual gift, must be interpreted here of the gifts bestowed on St. Paul for the discharge of his apostolical function; and if the right reading here be ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, on our behalf, the sense of this verse may run thus, We trust that he will deliver us for the furtherance of the gospel, through the assistance of your prayers, that so the gift being exercised by us through the joint suffrage of many persons for the benefit of many, thanks may be returned by many for us. If ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, on your behalf, as other copies have it, be the right reading, the sense runs thus: I hope to be still preserved by your prayers for the benefit of the church, that so the gift bestowed upon us, being made useful to the benefit of others by the prayers of so many, thanks may be given to God by many on your behalf. Whichsoever be the true reading, that he speaks of the spiritual gift conferred upon him, will be evident from the following words, ver. 12.

Or, secondly, Τὸ εἰς ἡμᾶς χάρισμα, may signify that wonderful deliverance vouchsafed to them from so great a danger, by the prayers of many persons.

[9] Ver. 12. Ἐν χάριτι Θεοῦ, In the grace of God.] Τουτέστι, σημείοις καὶ τεράσιν ἄτινα χαρίσματα ἦν Θεοῦ, i. e. by *signs and miracles; that is, according to the wisdom of the Spirit, and the miraculous power given us by the grace of God for the propagation of the gospel. So St. Chrysostom. Which exposition, saith he, is confirmed from these words, and more abundantly to you-ward; for the apostle's sincerity and care to walk according to the rules of the gospel was every where the same, but the powerful operations and gifts of the Holy Ghost seem to have been more abundantly exercised by him in, and vouchsafed by him to, that church in which he stayed so long, and of which he had so particular a promise, that Christ would be with him in his preaching to them. (Acts xviii. 10, 11.) The connexion of this with the former verse seems rather to be thus: And there is good reason, why you should thus pray for us, who have acted with the same sincerity towards you, and so much to your advantage.

* Ὅτι οὐ μόνον τὰ ἐκείνου, ἀλλὰ καὶ πλείονα ὑπομένουσι πάθη. Chrys. Πλείονα, ὧν ἔπασχεν ὁ Χριστὸς, πάσχομεν. Œcum. Theuph.

* "Cum multis donis spiritualibus." Grot.

[10] Ver. 13. Ἀναγινώσκετε.] Ἃ αὐτοὶ ὑμεῖς ἴστε, which you yourselves know, Chrysostom. Τουτέστιν ὑπομιμνήσκεσθε, which you remember, Œcumenius, Theophylact.

[11] Ver. 15. Δευτέραν χάριν, A second benefit or grace.] I coming to establish you, Rom. i. 11. and to promote your joy, ver. 24. Hence it appears, that the apostle had been only once with them when he writ this.

[12] Ver. 16. Καὶ δι' ὑμῶν διελθεῖν εἰς Μακεδονίαν, And to pass by you into Macedonia.] Interpreters, ancient and modern, are much troubled how to reconcile these words with what the apostle hath said in his former Epistle, I will come unto you when I have passed through Macedonia, 1 Cor. xvi. 5. for there he expressly declares, his purpose was first to go into Macedonia, and then to come to Corinth from thence. Here, say they, he declares he purposed first to come to Corinth, and then to Macedonia, and return again from Macedonia to Corinth: but the apostle seems to say no more here than he did there. There he declares that he would first go to Macedonia; but he adds also, that he would go from Ephesus, passing by them into Macedonia; saying also, that he would not then see them ἐν παρόδῳ, in his passage by them, ver. 7. and here he only saith he purposeth διελθεῖν, to pass by them into Macedonia; but saith not, that he would call upon them in that passage, but only when he came again from Macedonia, and intended to go to Syria; which he did not, partly by reason of Titus's absence, who was not yet returned to him to give an account of their affairs, but went again from Troas to Macedonia, (2 Cor. ii. 12.) where he met Titus, (vii. 5, 6.) and partly by reason of the Jews, who waylaid him in his passage to Syria: (Acts xx. 3.) and for this delay and nonperformance of his purpose, that he came not from Macedonia the first time he went thither, to winter with them, he makes this apology. (See the preface to this Epistle.)

[13] Ver. 17. Κατὰ σάρκα, According to the flesh.] Perhaps the Judaizers might object this, because being in Greece, (Acts xx. 2.) and so near to Corinth, and having passed through Macedonia, he came not to go by them into Syria, because the Jews laid wait for him by the way, but returned back to Macedonia without seeing them; (ver. 3.) this, I say, they might interpret a consulting of his carnal interests.

[14] Ver. 18. Πιστὸς δὲ ὁ Θεὸς, But as God is true.] The phrase πιστὸς ὁ Θεὸς, God is faithful, is used where there is no oath intended; as 1 Cor. i. 9. God is faithful, by whom we are called; and, x. 13. πιστὸς ὁ Θεὸς, but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above what you are able. But here the phrase, being used absolutely, seems rather to be a form of swearing: and then, πιστὸς δὲ ὁ Θεὸς, will signify, "Dei fidem testor," i. e. I swear by the faith of God; so "Dominus vivit," i. e. I swear by the life of God; or, as the Lord liveth, Jer. xii. 16. xliv. 26. Hos. iv. 15. compared with Jer. xxxviii. 16. Judg. viii. 19. Ruth iii. 13. 1 Sam. xiv. 39. 46. xix. 6. xx. 3. So to swear, as thy soul liveth, is to swear by the life of another.

[15] Οὐκ ἐγένετο ναὶ καὶ οὔ, Was not yea, and nay.] i. e. It was not with any variance, but by his assistance we all said still the same thing, and promised the same advantages to those that should believe in Christ; or it was not the preaching of what was uncertain, but fully confirmed to you by the power received from him. That this is the true import of the phrase, yea, yea, nay, nay, we learn from the Jews from whom it is taken; for they say,* There is a yea which is as nay, and a nay which is as yea, viz. when a man asserts and denies a thing ironically; but† the just man's yea is yea, and his nay is nay; that is, whatever he affirms or denies is true and certain. When a man gives a bill of divorce to his wife, we try him, say they, three times‡ whether his nay be nay, and his yea be yea; that is, whether he continue firm in his resolution to divorce her. And whereas the Hebrew saith, when Elijah said to the Jews, How long will you halt betwixt two opinions? If God be God, follow him; if Baal, follow him: the people answered him not a word, 1 Kings xviii. 21. the Jewish gloss runs thus, They would not say unto him, yea or nay, because they were doubtful. And whereas, Exod. xx. 1. we read thus, And God spake all these words, saying, R. Solomon notes, that this word לאמר, teacheth, that they answered to every yea, yea, and to every no, no; that is, they engaged to do the affirmative, and not to do the negative precepts.

[16] Ver. 19. Ὁ γὰρ Θεοῦ υἱὸς—δι' ἡμῶν κηρυχθεὶς, For the Son of God Jesus Christ preached by us.] Here Theodoret well notes, that Christ preached, is put ἀντὶ κηρύγματος, instead of preaching concerning him; the sense of these words being this, ὁ περὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγος, the word concerning the Son of God preached by me, Timothy and Silvanus, was still the same without any variance from one another; we all saying the same things of him, and confirming them by the like miracles.

[17] Ver. 20.] Or, all the promises of God made to you are true and certain, through Christ, the author of the new covenant, established upon better promises, to the glory of that God who made them by us.

[18] Ver. 22. Ὁ καὶ σφραγισάμενος ἡμᾶς, Who hath sealed us.] Sealing was used not only as a mark of distinction of what belongs to us, from what is others', but also for confirmation; as when we set our seal to a bond, indenture, will, covenant, or ordinance; to a covenant, Nehem. ix. 38. to an evidence; Jer. xxxii. 10. to an ordinance, that it may not be reversed, 1 Kings xxi. 8. Esth. viii. 8. Isa. viii. 16. in which sense, the circumcision of Abraham is styled, a seal of the righteousness of faith, Rom. iv. 11. and the Corinthians, the seal of St. Paul's apostleship: for preservation and security, as when we seal up our treasures, Deut. xxxii. 34. so the servants of God were sealed in their foreheads, Rev. vii. 3. ix. 4. so the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth who are his, 2 Tim. ii. 19. and so the Jews made the sepulchre secure, sealing the stone, Matt. xxvii. 66. In all which senses was the Holy Spirit given to believers as a mark that they belonged to Christ, Rom. viii. 9. and were the sons of God, Gal. iv. 6. as a confirmation of the covenant God had made with them, and of the blessings promised, he being the earnest and pledge of them, and so a security to them against doubting of them; and also a preserver of them in the faith against all temptations. (2 Tim. i. 7. 1 Pet. iv. 14.)

[19] Ver. 23. Μάρτυρα τὸν Θεὸν ἐπικαλοῦμαι ἐπὶ τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχὴν, I call God to record upon my soul.] The apostle useth this form of speech so oft in this Epistle, that I think it not amiss to give an account of the reason of his doing so; which may be best done from the consideration of the occasion, the reason, and the end of assertory oaths, which are the only oaths he useth.

* Buxt. Lex. Talm. in voce, חן, p. 642. et in hunc locum.

First, then, there must be some ἀντιλογία, i. e. some doubting of, or contradiction to, the thing asserted, which must give an occasion to an assertory oath, (Heb. vi. 16.) there being no need to confirm, in this solemn manner, what nobody doubts of. Now, in the church of Corinth, the authority and the sincerity of the apostle was much doubted of, he being acknowledged of them but in part, (ver. 14.) some seeking still a proof of Christ speaking by him, (xiii. 3.) and others looking on him as one that walked after the flesh, (x. 2.) This therefore gave occasion to the assertory oaths so frequent in this Epistle.

Secondly, The end of an oath is εἰς βεβαίωσιν, for confirmation of the thing asserted; (Heb. vi. 16.) and if oaths were allowed, and thought necessary in civil matters for this end, they must be more allowable in sacred and spiritual matters, which concerned the truth of the gospel, and the salvation of souls for the same end, which manifestly was here the case.

Thirdly, The matter, thus confirmed by an oath, must be such, as could not be sufficiently confirmed by other witnesses of the fact, he being only privy to them, who doth thus confirm them; for, where sufficient testimonies of the matter of fact can be produced, an oath seems the less needful in the case. And that this was so, in all the instances in which the apostle thus confirms his sayings, will be easily discerned from the perusal of the places, in which the apostle thus asserts the truth of what he had affirmed, viz. i. 18. 23. xi. 10, 11. 31. xii. 19.

[20] Ver. 24. Τῇ· γὰρ πίστει ἑστήκατε, For you have stood in the faith.] Τῆς μὲν πίστεως ἕνεκεν οὐδαμῶς ὑμῖν ἐπιμέμφομαι, τὴν γὰρ ταύτης ὑγίειαν περίκειμαθε, Theodoret; that is, I do not by this threat challenge to myself a power to exercise any dominion over you on the account of your faith, as I did upon Hymenæus and Alexander, (1 Tim. i. 12.) and intend to do upon some of your false teachers, when your obedience is fulfilled; (x. 6.) for I acknowledge, you have generally stood firm in the profession of the Christian faith, (though some among you once questioned the great article of the resurrection of the body, 1 Cor. xv. 12.) but I design by it to excite you to cure your divisions and contentions, and reform your gross miscarriages, (xii. 20, 21.) that so I might not be found towards you such as you would not, nor create to you any farther trouble, but may be a promoter of that joy which you will find in such a reformation of yourselves.

CHAP. II.

1. (AND indeed a helper of your joy I would gladly be,) but I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness, (i. e. so as to make you sad, if possibly I could avoid it).

2. For if I (be constrained by your disorders to) make you sorry, [1] who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same that is made sorry by me? (i. e. What can make me glad but the reformation, and so the joy of the same persons? the apostle's chiefest joy being in the welfare of his converts, i. 14. Phil. ii. 2. 16. iv. 1. 1 Thess. ii. 19, 20.)

3. And I wrote this same to you (or, this very thing have I written to you before my coming, to excite you to this reformation), lest, when I came, I should have sorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; having confidence in you all, that (you stand so affected to me, that) my joy is the joy of you all.

4. (I say, lest I should have sorrow;) for out [2] of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you (my former Epistle) with many tears; (which yet I say,) not that you should be grieved (or made sorry), but that you might know the love which I have more abundantly to you.

5. But if any have caused grief (as the incestuous person hath already done), he hath not grieved me (only), [3] but in part: that I may not overcharge (or be too heavy upon) you all.

6. Sufficient to such a man is [4] this punishment, which was inflicted of many.

7. [5] So that contrariwise you ought rather (now) to forgive him, and comfort him (by receiving him again into the church, which is the proper consolation to one cast out, than continue your aversion to him), [6] lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow (and so fall into despair).

8. Wherefore I (who commanded the inflicting this censure on him, do now) beseech you that you would confirm your love towards him (by readmitting him, thus penitent, to your society; for the church ought, after the example of God, to do so).

9. For to this end also did I write (ἔγραψα, have I written this), that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient (to me) in all things.

10. (And be assured of this, that) to whom you forgive any thing, I forgive (it) also: for if I forgave any thing (Gr. have forgiven heretofore), to whom I forgave it, for your sakes I forgave it (though I did it) [7] in the person (i. e. by the authority) of Christ.

11. [8] (And this forgiveness of the incestuous person I therefore press,) lest Satan should get an advantage over us (by hurrying him into despair, or representing the church-discipline as that which tendeth to men's ruin, and so tempting him to apostacy): for we are not ignorant of his devices.

12. Furthermore (that ye may know my great concernment for you), [19] when I came to Troas to preach Christ's gospel, and a door was opened to me of the Lord (for the propagation of it there),

13. I had (notwithstanding) no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother (whom I had sent to know the state of your affairs, returned): but taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia (hoping to find him there, where he arrived, and gave me a very comfortable account of you).

14. Now thanks (therefore) be to God, who always causeth us to triumph in (and through) Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place (where we come).

15. For we are unto God a sweet savour (in our preaching) of Christ, (both) in them that are saved, and in them that perish:

16. To the one (viz. to them that perish for rejecting Christ preached to them) we are [10] the savour of death unto death; and to the other (who believe in him) the savour of life unto life. And who is sufficient for these (great and weighty) things?

17. (We are, I say, very acceptable to God in this work;) for we are not as many, [11] who corrupt the word of God; but (act) as (men) of sincerity, but as (commissionated) of God, (and as) in the sight of God speak we in (preaching) Christ (unto you).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 2. ΚΑΙ᾽ τίς ἐστιν, Who is he then.] The Hebrew vau, rendered by καὶ, is very often in our translation, then. See Gen. xiii. 16. xxiv. 41. xxviii. 21. xxxi. 8. xlii. 34. 38. Exod. vi. 1. vii. 9. 11. Lev. iv. 3. 14. 23. 28. v. 5. vi. 4. Numb. v. 15. 21. Deut. vi. 21. vili. 10. Josh. i. 15. xxiv. 12. 1 Sam. i. 11. vi. 9. And thus also is καὶ translated by us in the New Testament, Matt. xxiii. 32. xxv. 27. Mark vii. 1. 10. 26. John iv. 35. vii. 33. xiv. 9. Acts xxvi. 20. Rom. viii. 17. xi. 5. 1 Cor. xv. 29. James ii. 4. Rev. xxii. 9.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἐκ πολλῆς θλίψεως, With much affliction, &c.] As the apostle's zeal for the good of souls made him rejoice at their welfare, (ver. 2.) so also did it cause him to weep for their miscarriages. (Acts xx. 19. 31. 2 Cor. xii. 21. Phil. iii. 18.)

[3] Ver. 5. Ἀπὸ μέρους, In part.] This phrase is commonly used by St. Paul for the distinction of one sort of persons from another: so Rom. xi. 25. Blindness hath happened to Israel, ἀπὸ μέρους, in part, as to the unbelieving part of them; Rom. xv. 15. I have written to you the more boldly in part, ἀπὸ μέρους, i. e. as to that part of you, who are gentiles, declaring that I was called by Jesus Christ to be the apostle of the gentiles; 2 Cor. i. 14. You have acknowledged me, ἀπὸ μέρους, in part, i. e. as to the sound part of you; and according to this use of the phrase, the words may be paraphrased thus, He hath not only grieved me, but, as to the sound part, you all; for there were some among them who grieved not for this crime, but were puffed up, 1 Cor. v. 2. I therefore say in part, that I may not too much load that miserable person.

[4] Ver. 6. Ἡ ἐπιτιμία αὕτη ἡ ὑπὸ τῶν πλειόνων, This punishment, &c.] Some learned persons, who exclude the laity from having any share in the excommunication or absolution of public offenders, tell us, this punishment was inflicted only by the clergy or the presbytery of Corinth in the presence of the laity. But it seems clear in both these Epistles, that the apostle writes to the church of Corinth in the general: for when he commands that the incestuous person should be excluded from their society, and be delivered up to Satan, he speaks to all that were assembled together, 1 Cor. v. 4. to all that ought to have mourned for that fact, ver. 2. to all that were obliged to abstain from eating with him, ver. 11. and asserts the power they had of judging those that were within the church, ver. 12. and here, speaking of the execution of that sentence, he saith, it was ἐπιτιμία, a punishment inflicted, not πρὸ, before, only, but ὑπὸ τῶν πλειόνων, by the community: hence he exhorts them all to forgive and comfort him, ver. 8. adding, ver. 10. to whomsoever you forgive any thing, I forgive also: but there is not in this whole affair the least mention of any of the clergy separately from the church, either executing or relaxing this censure. Indeed St. Paul here carries the matter so high, that he alone, by his apostolical authority, passeth the sentence, saying, ἤδη κέκρικα, I have already judged him, 1 Cor. v. 3. and also that of absolution, saying here, ver. 10. ἐγὼ κεχάρισμαι, I have forgiven him, committing only the execution of each sentence to them: so that this instance gives no colour to the pretences of the independents and other sectaries, especially if we add, what is highly probable, that the Corinthian church had then no ordinary or settled governors or pastors, but all their offices were performed by prophets, or men enabled to perform them by the gift of prophecy: (see note on 1 Cor. xiv. 29.) and if so, it cannot be expected that the same practice should continue when these extraordinary prophets ceased, and bishops and pastors were every where appointed to rule over their respective flocks. In the primitive church, when any person was to be excommunicated, the laity were first consulted about the fact, the guilty person pleaded in their presence; they judged of the matter of fact, as do our juries in criminal causes, and by their suffrage they consented to his condemnation, as St. Cyprian* doth often inform us; but then he still asserts, that neither they nor the inferior clergy could pass the sentence of excommunication without the bishop,† who, as the president of the assembly, still pronounced the sentence. They also consented to the readmission of them into favour, and to the communion of the church, but then their actual admission was performed by the imposition of the hands of the bishop and clergy, the power of the keys, saith he, being given to them by Christ, saying, Thou art Peter, &c.‡

[5] Ver. 7. Note, Hence it appears, that in notorious crimes which give great cause of scandal to the church and to Christianity, the consolation of the offender depends not only on his inward grief and repentance towards God, but also on the relaxation of his censures by the church; for it is certain, that the apostle is here speaking not, as Grotius thinks, of the taking off the disease which Satan had inflicted on the incestuous person, but of restoring him to communion by relaxation of the church's censures: for (1.) the word ἐπίτιμια, punishment, ver. 6. refers to the canonical censures of the church. (2.) He commands them not only χαρίζεσθαι, to forgive, (ver. 7. 10.) but also to confirm their love to him; both which expressions plainly seem to intimate, that he would have him restored to communion; and this he would have performed according to the discipline now mentioned from St. Cyprian, with the consent of the pious laity.

[6] Lest such a one should be swallowed up with sorrow.] Hence also St. Chrysostom observes, that, in prescribing the measures of penance, regard is to be had, not only to the nature of the sin, ἀλλὰ καὶ πρὸς διάνοιαν καὶ ἕξιν τῶν ἁμαρτανόντων, but also to the mind and temper of the sinner.

[7] Ver. 10. Ἐν προσώπῳ Χριστοῦ, In the person of Christ.] That is, saith Theodoret, Christ beholding and approving what was done; for as he delivered the incestuous person to Satan in the name of the Lord Christ, (1 Cor. v. 4.) so in his person and by his authority he relaxes the sentence. This place teaches us, saith Schlictingius, that the providence of Christ reacheth to, and inspecteth, not only our actions, but even our minds and thoughts. Hence then I argue for his Godhead, God alone being the searcher of the heart, and of the secrets of it. (1 Kings viii. 39.)

[8] Ver. 11.] Note; Vain here is all the discourse of Esthius concerning indulgences, or the remission of the satisfaction required by the church; for the apostle here speaks only of the remission of his excommunication, and hath not one word of any satisfaction the incestuous person had voluntarily undertaken on the account of his offence, or any thing imposed on him to do on that account, but only of a delivery of him to Satan, and an exclusion of him from the church, in both which he was passive.

[9] Ver. 12. Ἐλθὼν δὲ εἰς τὴν Τρωάδα, But coming to Troas.] That this was not the first time of St. Paul's coming to Troas is plain, seeing we find him there long before, Acts xvi. 8. though then he seems to have stayed there but a night: it was not the time mentioned Acts xx. 6. for then he came from Macedonia to Troas, here he goes from Troas to Macedonia. It remains then that it was some intermediate time, which all interpreters I meet with think was in his way from Ephesus to Macedonia, Acts xx. 1. but at his first journey from Ephesus to Macedonia, he sailed not by Troas, but by Corinth, though not touching there: (see note on i. 16.) it was then after passing through those parts he came by Troas into Greece; and if so, this Epistle could not be written till after St. Paul's coming the second time to Macedonia. (See the preface.)

[10] Ver. 16. Ὀσμὴ ζωῆς, καὶ θανάτου, A savour of life and death.] Here is a continual allusion to the phraseology of the Jews, who speak from the prophets of סם המות,* a mortal savour, or as the Chaldee saith, רמתוא סמא, (Esth. i. 21. Jer. xi. 19.) and of סמהחיום, a savour of life, or a vital unguent, and saying of the law, that it is to Israel a savour of life, but to the nations of the world a savour of death; of which the apostle seemeth here to give the reverse, saying, the gospel was to them, as being the rejecters of it, the savour of death, but to the gentiles, who embraced it, the savour of life.

Καὶ πρὸς ταῦτα τίς ἱκανός;] Here the Vulgar ridiculously read, et ad hæc quis tam idoneus, i. e. quam ego? and this reading is defended by Dr. Mills, against all the Greek scholia, the Syriac and Arabic versions, Cod. Alex. and Hilary D. and that by surmises little better than that version. (See Examen Millii in locum.)

[12] Ver. 17. Καπηλεύοντες τὸν λόγον, Who corrupt the word.] Here is an allusion to those hucksters of whom the prophet Isaiah speaks, saying, οἱ κάπηλοί σου μίσγουσι τὸν οἶνον ὕδατι, Thy vintners mix wine with water; (Isa. i. 22.) and so the meaning of the words is this, We do not adulterate the sincerity of the word, as your false apostles do. So Theodoret here.

Who these corrupters of the word of God were, we learn from xi. 22. where it is evident that they were not Samaritans, but Jews; not pretenders to be the Christ, or ministers of Simon Magus, but ministers of Christ, or such as owned our Jesus, not Simon Magus or Dositheus, to be Christ. Notwithstanding, a reverend person asserts that they were gnostics; and to this opinion he is inclined by two passages in the epistles of Ignatius: the first is in the epistle to the Magnesians, where, saith he, speaking of the gnostic Judaizers, as enemies of the cross of Christ, whose God is their belly, who mind earthly things, (Phil. iii. 18, 19.) who were lovers of pleasure and not lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power of it, he adds, that they were οἱ χριστέμποροι, τὸν λόγον καπηλεύοντες, καὶ τὸν Ἰησοῦν πωλοῦντες, merchants of Christ, huckstering the word, selling Jesus. But,

1. The gnostics were so far from being Judaizers, that they denied the God of the Jews, declared that he was not the Supreme God, and taught men to despise the law and the prophets. (See note on Colos. ii. 12.)

2. All these epithets or characteristics agree perfectly to the Jewish false teachers; they were the men of whom the apostle saith, their god is their belly, &c. as both St. Chrysostom* and Theodoret inform us. They were the men who were lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, and who had a form of godliness, which the impure gnostics had not. (See note on 2 Tim. iii. 5.) The Jews also were the persons who bought Christ for thirty pieces of silver; they corrupted the word here, by mixing the law and their traditions with the gospel, and they made a gain of Christ. (See note on 1 Tim. vi. 5.) So that what is here cited from the ninth section of this epistle, agrees exactly to them.

3. It chiefly is to observed, that these words are not in the true Ignatius, but are the additions of his interpolator. And (2.) there is not a word in this place to shew that they belonged to the gnostics, or any other persons, who, owning the profession of the Christian faith, corrupted it; but are expressly said to belong to such enemies of Christ as denied him:† whereas the true Ignatius is plainly in this place speaking of the Jews,‡ of whom we interpret this; and the same is also evident from the interpolator.

The second passage is cited from the epistle ad Tralianos, where he saith, there are some vain speakers and impostors, not Christians, but merchants of Christ, Ἀπάτῃ περιφέροντες τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ καπηλεύοντες τὸν λόγον τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, carrying the name of Christ for deceit, and huckstering the word of the gospel. "And who these were he specifies in the process of the epistle, viz. Simon, the first-born of Satan, Menander, Basilides, the unclean Nicolaitans, τοὺς ψευδωνύμους, those that are falsely named, that is, the gnostics." But here again,

1. We have not the true Ignatius, but his interpolator imposed upon us.

2. This interpolator doth not say those persons, falsely named, were the gnostics: no, that is the doctor's interpretation, against the true sense of the Greek; and the manifest words of the old interpreter, who says, they were the Nicolaitans,* so called, because they falsely bore his name, he being no such person as they represented him: and, indeed, this is the common epithet of the Nicolaitans;† he himself, by Clemens Alexandrinus‡ and others being declared free from the doctrines these heretics vented in his name. And,

3. This interpolator plainly insinuates, that, in the section cited by the doctor, he meant the Judaizers,§ as using the same words which he had used in the epistle to the Magnesians concerning them.

CHAP. III.

1. DO we (by speaking thus of our sincerity, ii. 16.) begin again to commend ourselves? or [1] need we, as some others (have), [2] epistles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you (to others)?

2. Ye are our epistle [3] written in our hearts, (you being always in our minds, and evidently appearing to us so to be, and) known and read of all men (who have heard the fame of your conversion);

3. Forasmuch as ye are (by this conversion) manifestly declared to be [4] the epistle of Christ, ministered (or penned) by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone (as were the ten commandments), but in the fleshy tables of the heart.

4. And such (confidence or) trust have we through (the grace and favour of) Christ to God-ward (viz. that he will still thus efficaciously assist our ministry):

5. Not (having any confidence in ourselves) that we are sufficient of ourselves [5] to think any thing as of ourselves (to bring men to the faith of Christ by our own reasonings, without the power and assistance of the Spirit of God), but our sufficiency (as to this matter) is of God (alone);

6. Who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament (promised in opposition to the old, Jer. xxxi. 33. and so) not of the letter (only, as was that of Moses), but of the Spirit, (promised, Ezek. xxxvi. 27.) for [6] the letter (of the law condemns the disobedient, and so) killeth, but the Spirit (ministered by the gospel) giveth life; (for if the Spirit of him that raised Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you, Rom. viii. 11.)

7. [7] But (then) if (that law which is) the ministration of death, (and was) written and engraven in stone, was glorious (in the ministry of it), so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses, for the glory of his countenance; which glory (yet was only such as) was to be done away (or vanish, as the law was to do):

8. How shall not (that gospel which is) the ministration of the Spirit, be rather glorious (both in itself and its ambassadors)?

9. For if (that law, which was) the ministration of condemnation (by pronouncing the sentence of death upon all that did not perfectly obey it), be (or was attended with) glory, much more doth (the gospel, which is) the ministration of righteousness (or of justification to life, Rom. v. 18.) exceed in glory.

10. For even that (law) which was made glorious (at the first administration of it, may be said to have) had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory (of the gospel) which excelleth (and so eclipseth it).

11. For if that which is (now) done away (and abolished) were glorious, much more that which remaineth (for ever) is (to be) glorious (in the powerful operations of the Spirit of God assisting the dispensers of it).

12. Seeing then that we have such hope (of the glorious efficacy of our ministry, and of the power of God so illustriously shining forth in it), we use great [8] plainness of speech:

13. And (act) not as Moses (the minister of the law), who put a veil over his face (even that of types and shadows, so) that the children of Israel could not steadfastly look to the [9] end (or the accomplishment) of that which is (now) abolished:

14. But (that which hinders them from seeing through this veil, is this, that) their minds were (then and still are) blinded: for until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the Old Testament; which veil is (only) done away (by faith) in Christ.

15. But (or, whereas they not believing in him) even to this day, when Moses is read, the veil is (still) upon their heart.

16. Nevertheless (as when Moses turned to the Lord, the veil was taken from his face, Exod. xxxiv. 34. so) when [10] it (the Jewish nation), shall turn to the Lord (Jesus), the veil shall be taken away (from them).

17. [11] Now the Lord is (the giver of) that Spirit (which is received by the gospel, and by which it is confirmed): and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty, (and so the law which is as a yoke of bondage, Acts xv. 10. Gal. v. 1. is taken away, and we obtain our Christian liberty.

18. [12] And it is not with us as it was with the Jews, for they only saw the face of Moses shining through the veil, but received no impression from, or derivation of, his glory upon themselves;) but we all (under the gospel), with open (and unveiled) face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord (Jesus), are changed into the same image (with him) from (his) glory to glory (derived on us), even as by the Spirit of the Lord (or, as receiving it from the Lord and giver of the Spirit).

[3] Ver. 2. Ἐγγεγραμμένη ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ἡμῶν, Written in our hearts.] This is a frequent phrase in the Old Testament, and among the Jewish doctors, importing (1.) the clearness and perspicuity of what is said to be thus in our hearts, Deut. xxx. 11. 14, 15. Rom. x. 8, 9. and (2.) our care to have it continually in our minds, and upon our spirits, Deut. vi. 6. Prov. iii. 3. vii. 2. (See this proved, note on Heb. viii. 10.)

And thus the phrase is commonly used in profane authors, both Greek and Latin. Thus Antisthenes saith to one, who had lost his register or note-book, Thou shouldest ἐν τῇ ψυχῇ αὐτὰ, καὶ μὴ ἐν ταῖς χάρταις γράφειν,‡ write these things in thy soul, and not in thy papers. So Seneca§ saith of Portius Latro, who made use of no books or notes, Aiebat se scribere animo, he said he wrote all things in his mind. So Terence,‖ Scripta illa dicta sunt in animo Chrysidis; which in Pindar¶ is, πόσθι φρενὸς ἡμᾶς γέγραπται, it is written in my mind.

So that these words may be thus paraphrased, "We need no letters of commendation to you, for we well know, and have continually in remembrance, how powerfully God wrought with us for your conversion, so that the seal of our apostleship are you in the Lord; (1 Cor. ix. 2.) The signs of an apostle being wrought among you in all patience, in signs, wonders, and in mighty deeds; (2 Cor. xii. 12.) so that you are our best letters commendatory to yourselves: nor need we letters of commendation from you to others, the fame of your conversion by us, and of the gifts we, with the gospel, have imparted to you, being spread throughout the world."

[4] Ver. 3. Ἐπιστολὴ Χριστοῦ, The epistle of Christ.] His commendatory epistle, declaring and commending his power in your conversion, by such signs and gifts of the Holy Ghost imparted to you, and exercised by us among you, as he enabled us to do: and this epistle is written in the fleshy tables of your hearts, i. e. in your hearts made soft, pliable, and ready to obey the word by the operation of the Holy Spirit, according to the promise, I will take away the stony heart from you, and give you a heart of flesh, Ezek. xi. 19. xxxvi. 26.

[5] Ver. 5. Λογίζεσθαί τι, &c. To reason any thing as of ourselves.] The apostle, in the second chapter of his First Epistle, contends, that there was a necessity of a Divine revelation, to enable them to make known to us the truths contained in the gospel, because human reason, without it, was not able to know or to discern them; and therefore here also he disclaims this sufficiency as of themselves, without Divine assistance for this work; that is, without those illuminations and powerful operations of the Holy Spirit which made them able ministers of the new testament. This text, therefore, is impertinently cited, to shew that no man is sufficient of himself to think a good thought, and might as well have been produced to prove him not sufficient of himself to think at all.

[6] Ver. 6. Γράμμα ἀποκτείνει, The letter killeth.] From the exposition of these words given in the paraphrase, it appears, how vain are the imaginations of those men, who, by the killing letter, understand not the law condemning to death, but the literal and historical sense of the Scriptures in general; and by the life-giving spirit, the mystical and spiritual sense of them. Vain also are they who by the letter understand the law, as it was understood by the Jewish doctors in a literal or grammatical sense, by the Spirit, the mind of the lawgiver; it being evident from the whole chapter, that by the letter the apostle understands the law engraved in stones, ver. 3. 7. the law as delivered by Moses, and as at first administered with an appearance of the glory of the Lord; and by the Spirit, the Spirit of Christ, ver. 17. or the Holy Spirit given to the apostles to enable them to preach the gospel, and conferred on those that believed it.

[7] Ver. 7—11. That the allusion here from ver. 7. to the eleventh may be the better understood, let it be noted:

First, That the glory of God, or of the Lord, in the Old Testament, imports a bright light or flame included in a cloud, styled the cloud of glory; and because this, whenever it appeared, was a symbol of God's glorious presence, it is styled by the Jews Schechinah,* the habitation: so Exod. xvi. 7. In the morning ye shall see the glory of God; and ver. 10. The glory of God abode upon Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six days, and the light of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire; Exod. xl. 34. A cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle, שכ, the habitation of God.—This glory (saith the author of Cosri†) is the Divine light which God vouchsafeth to his people.—By the Schechinah (saith Elias) we understand the Holy Spirit, as it is evident they do in these sayings, The Schechinah will not dwell with sorrowful or melancholy men. The Schechinah will only dwell with the strong, rich, wise, and humble man. The Schechinah dwells with the meek. When ten sit, and study the law, the Schechinah dwells among them. (See many other instances in Buxtorf's Lexicon, p. 2396, &c.)

Secondly, Observe, that after the covenant made with God at Mount Sinai, Exod. xxiv. 7, 8. was broken, and the law given from Mount Sinai violated by the idolatry of the Jews, in making and worshipping the golden calf, Exod. xxxiii. Moses is again called up into Mount Sinai to renew it, Exod. xxxiv. 27. and God there descends to him again in the cloud of glory, ver. 5. and then was it that the skin of his face shone, to the terror of those that saw him, so that he was forced to put a veil over his face, ver. 29, 30. And the allusion here is chiefly to this glory, or shining brightness of the face of Moses, when he received the law the second time, as is evident from ver. 7. and from the words here used by St. Paul, οὐδὲ δεδόξασται τὸ δεδοξασμένον; that which was made glorious was not glorious; for they are the very words used by the Septuagint, concerning the shining of the face of Moses, Δεδόξασται ἡ

Thirdly, Observe, that as the glory of the Lord descended on the mount, at the delivery of the law, so, to enable the apostles to be able ministers of the new testament, the Spirit of God descended on the apostles at the day of Pentecost, in the likeness of cloven tongues, or tongues of fire, sitting upon them; (Acts ii. 3.) and as the tabernacle and temple were filled with the glory of God, so were they all filled with the Holy Ghost; (ver. 4.) and as the shining of the face of Moses signified the glory of that law which he delivered to the Jews, so the gifts of the Holy Ghost, shining forth in these ambassadors of Christ, signified the glory of the gospel. Now, saith the apostle, this glory is more excellent than that which attended the law given by Moses:

1. Because the glory appearing on Mount Sinai, made the people afraid of death, saying, Let God not speak to us any more, lest we die, (Exod. xx. 19.) neither let us see this great fire any more, that we die not. (Deut. xviii. 16.) And when the face of Moses shone, the people were afraid to come nigh him, (Exod. xxxiv. 30.) for the law being the ministration of death and condemnation, even the glory of it struck a terror into their hearts, and left a fear of death upon their spirits; and thus received they the spirit of bondage unto fear, (Rom. viii. 15.) whilst we have given to us the Spirit of power and love, (2 Tim. i. 7.) and the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abbá, Father: and to this difference the author to the Hebrews alludes, xii. 18—24.

2. Moses, with all his glory, was only the minister of the law, written in tables of stone; the apostles of the gospel, written in the hearts of believers: he only gave the Jews the killing letter of the law, they with the gospel gave the quickening Spirit.

3. The glory which Moses received at the giving of the law did more and more diminish, because his law was to vanish away; but the glory which they received from Christ, did increase from glory to glory, (ver. 18.) the doctrine they delivered by it being to remain for ever.

[8] Ver. 12. Παῤῥησίᾳ.] This word seems to import openness and plainness of speech. So, he spake this, saying, παῤῥησίᾳ, openly, Mark viii. 32. If thou art Christ, tell us παῤῥησίᾳ, plainly, John x. 24. Having spoiled principalities and powers, he triumphed over them, ἐν παῤῥησίᾳ, openly, Colos. ii. 15. (See John vii. 4. 13. xi. 14. xvi. 25. 29. xviii. 20.) And to this sense the opposition in these words, We use great plainness of speech, and do not put a veil before our face; as Moses did, seems to lead.

[9] Ver. 13. Εἰς τὸ τέλος τοῦ καταργουμένου, To the end of that which was to be abolished,] i. e. Either to Christ and his gospel, as the body veiled under these types and shadows, (Colos. ii. 16.) or they could not look unto that Christ, who is the end of the law for justification, (Rom. x. 4.) that being only our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. (Gal. iii. 24, 25.) And here is the Fourth excellency of the gospel above the law, that; whereas that was veiled under types and shadows, the gospel was delivered with great perspicuity and plainness of speech; which is a confirmation of the perspicuity of the New Testament in all things necessary.

[10] Ver. 16. Ἡνίκα δ' ἂν ἐπιστρέψῃ πρὸς Κύριον, When it shall turn to the Lord.] The apostle discoursing, ver. 13. of the sons of Israel, of those to whom belonged the old covenant, and to whom the law of Moses was read, ver. 14, 15. must be supposed to speak here of the same persons; and then the apostle here plainly taketh it for granted, that there will come a time when the Jewish nation shall turn unto the Lord, or be converted to the Christian faith; and so, looking on Christ as the end of the law, and being enlightened by his Spirit, shall clearly discern the spiritual sense of the law, and the true meaning of their own prophecies concerning their Messiah. Nor is it any objection against this exposition that the word is ἐπιστρέψῃ, in the singular, for as that answers well to Israel, or the Jewish nation, so is it a known rule,* that in the Hebrew tongue a verb of the singular number is joined to a noun or a participle plural.

[11] Ver. 17. Ὁ δὲ Κύριος τὸ πνεῦμά ἐστιν, Now the Lord is that Spirit.] The Ethiopian version reads not ὁ δὲ, but οὗ δὲ Κύριος, where the Lord is, there is the Spirit, which makes the sense of these words clear; but this reading hath no authority from any ancient copy, or Christian writer. Origen† cites the words, according to the common reading, thrice; nor is it suitable to the Greek, which should have been, according to that reading, οὗ δὲ Κύριος ἐκεῖ τὸ πνεῦμα. I therefore prefer the other interpretation, which saith, The Lord is the Spirit, as he is the way, the life, John xiv. 6. the resurrection and the life, xi. 15. as being the author and giver of them. He it is who baptizeth with the Spirit and fire, (Matt. iii. 11.) who giveth this good Spirit to all believers, and sends him to them from the Father: (John vii. 38, 39. xv. 26. xvi. 7.) he is ὁ Κύριος, the Lord who ministers to his church all the gifts and operations of the Spirit. (1 Cor. xii. 5. Eph. iv. 8.) And this interpretation is favoured by the last words of the chapter, ἀπὸ Κυρίου πνεύματος, from the Lord of the Spirit; for, through the New Testament, wherever the Spirit of the Lord is mentioned, τὸ πνεῦμα is put before, but never follows, the word Κύριος, as according to the common interpretation here it doth. (See also Examen Millii in locum.)

5. That the Jews only saw the shining of the face of Moses through a veil; but we behold the glory of the gospel of Christ in the person of Christ, our lawgiver, with open face.

6. They saw it through a veil, which hindered the reflection or shining of it upon them, and so this glory shone only on the face of Moses, but not at all upon them; whereas the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, shines as in a glass, which reflects the image upon us Christians, so that we all are transformed into the same image, deriving the glorious gifts and graces of the Spirit, with the gospel, from Christ the Lord and great distributer of them, (1 Cor. xii. 5.) and so the glory which the Father gave to him, he hath given us. (John xvii. 22.) It is therefore rather with us, as it was with Moses himself, concerning whom God speaketh thus, To whom will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches, and the similitude, τὴν δόξαν Κυρίου, the glory of the Lord shall he behold, Numb. xii. 8. For as he saw the glory of God apparently, so we, with open face, behold the glory of the Lord: as he by seeing of this glory was changed into the likeness of it, and his face shone, or was δεδοξασμένη made glorious; so we, beholding the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, (iv. 6.) are changed into the same glory. But then, though this may in some measure be enlarged to the church in general, in which these gifts were exercised, I think it chiefly, and more eminently, refers to the apostles mentioned ver. 12. and iv. 1.

CHAP. IV.

1. THEREFORE, seeing we have this (glorious) ministry, as we have received mercy (from God, in committing it to us, 1 Tim. i. 12. so) we [1] faint not (under the pressures to which it doth expose us);

2. But have renounced [2] the hidden things of dishonesty (or shame), not walking in craftiness (and guile), nor handling the word of God deceitfully, (as do your false apostles and deceitful workers, 2 Cor. xi. 13.) but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience (as persons acting) in the sight of God.

3. [3] But if (notwithstanding this manifestation of the truth) our gospel be hid (from any to whom it is preached), it is hid (only) to them that are lost:

4. In (or among) whom [4] the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the [5] image of God, should shine unto them.

5. (I say the gospel of Christ;) for we preach not ourselves (as aiming at our own glory or profit in this work), but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake.

6. (And this gospel I style the gospel of the glory of Christ;) for God, who (by saying, Let there be light, and there was light) commanded the light to shine out of darkness, [6] hath (also) shined in our hearts, to give (us) [7] the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face (or person) of Jesus Christ, (or, into the hearts of us apostles, to give us, and enable us to give to others, the light of the knowledge of God through Christ, whose ambassadors we are. See ver. 7.)

7. But we have this (glorious) treasure in earthen vessels (i. e. in bodies subject to be broken with continual pressures), that the excellency of the power (which preserves such frail creatures under them, and enables them to do such great things in them) may (appear to) be of God, and not of us.

8. (For though) we are troubled (and griped) on every side, yet (are we) not (so) distressed (as to be brought unto extremities); we are perplexed, but not (brought) in (to) despair (of help from God);

9. (We are) persecuted (or pursued), but not forsaken (or cast behind so as to lose the crown we run for); cast down, but not destroyed (or killed by the fall: see these agonistical terms explained by Dr. Hammond);

10. Always bearing about in the body (a resemblance to) the dying of the Lord Jesus, that [8] the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body.

11. For we who (yet) live are alway delivered up to death for Jesus' sake, (dying daily, or standing in jeopardy of it every hour, whilst we are ministering the gospel unto you, 1 Cor. xv. 30, 31.) that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh (still exposed to death by our enemies, but still preserved in life by the power of Christ).

12. So then (the) death (of Christ) worketh (Gr. wrought) in us, (who fill up that which is behind of the sufferings of Christ in our flesh, Colos. i. 24.) but (the) life (of Christ only) [9] in you.

13. (Yet) we having the same spirit of faith (i.e. the same faith wrought by the Spirit), according as it is written, (in the Psalms, viz.) [10] I believed, and therefore have I spoken; we also believe, and therefore (continue still, under all these sufferings, to) speak (and preach the gospel of Christ);

14. Knowing that [11] he, who raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you (to enjoy his heavenly kingdom together).

15. For (or, and) all (these) things (we preach and suffer) are for your sakes, that the abundant grace (conferred upon you by our ministry) might, through the thanksgiving of many, redound to the glory of God.

16. For which cause we faint not (under the tribulations we thus suffer); but though our outward man perish, yet the [12] inward man is renewed (with vigour and alacrity in the performance of our duty) day by day.

17. For (we know that) our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal [13] weight of glory:

18. (We faint not, I say,) [14] while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. ΟΥ'Κ ἐκκακοῦμεν] Is not to slacken in, or cease from, the performance of an enterprise, (Luke xviii. 1. Gal. vi. 9. 2 Thess. iii. 13.) particularly μὴ ἐκκακεῖν ἐν θλίψεσι, not to faint under tribulations, Eph. iii. 13. and here, ver. 16. And this sense is confirmed by the words following from ver. 7. to 16.

[2] Ver. 2. Τὰ κρυπτὰ τῆς αἰσχύνης, The hidden things of shame.] The apostle often speaks of some deceivers crept into the church, whose glory was in their shame, Phil. iii. 19. whose exhortation was attended with uncleanness, deceit, and guile, 1 Thess. ii. 3. and here, who did the hidden things of shame. Now these, say all the Greek scholiasts, were the false apostles, τῇ τοῦ νόμου ἐπιμιξίᾳ τὸ Θεῖον κήρυγμα διαφθείροντες, who corrupted the gospel, by mixing it with the law, as is apparent from the apostle's words; for, speaking of these false apostles and deceitful workers, xi. 13. he saith, ver. 22. Are they Hebrews? so am I. Are they Israelites? so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? so am I. And that the Jewish doctors were prone to fornication, uncleanness, and adultery, we learn from the apostle's question, Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? Rom. i. 22. and from the testimony of their Josephus concerning their zealots, who professed great sanctity, but were indeed guilty of *theft, treachery, adultery, the hidden things of sin: from the exhortation of St. Paul to them to look diligently, lest there be among them any fornicator, or profane person, Heb. xii. 16. And again, Let marriage be honourable among all, and the bed undefiled; for whoremongers and adulterers God will judge, Heb. xiii. 4. (See the note there.) But this is still more evident from these Epistles to the Corinthians, among whom these deceivers had taught that fornication was a thing lawful, 1 Cor. vi. 12. and so had taught them to corrupt the temple of God, 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17. whence he says to them, Let no man deceive you, ver. 18. and demonstrates to them by many arguments, that fornication was a sin inconsistent with the profession of Christianity, 1 Cor. vi. 13—20. that it excluded persons from the kingdom of God, ver. 9, 10. and should exclude them from the society of Christians, v. 11. Upon all which accounts he saith, Neither let us commit fornication, as some of the Jews did, 1 Cor. x. 8. And in his Second Epistle, and twelfth chapter, he expresses his fears, lest, when he came among them, he should find many, who, through the seduction of those men, had sinned, and had not repented of the uncleanness, fornication, and lasciviousness, which they had committed. That these men might be followers of Cerinthus, or of the Ebionites, see note on xi. 22. But these things do more plainly agree to the sect of Nicholas, one of the seven deacons resident at Jerusalem, (Acts vi. 5.) they being, saith St. Peter, Men walking after the flesh, in the lusts of the flesh, 2 Pet. ii. 10. and alluring others through the lusts of the flesh, ver. 18. and, saith St. Jude, Men walking after their own lusts, and foaming out their own shame, ver. 13. That these men were at Pergamus, teaching men to commit fornication, we learn from Rev. ii. 14, 15. that they were also at Ephesus, and so near to Corinth, from Rev. ii. 6. and so might probably be the persons noted by St. Paul, saying, Eph. v. 11, 12. It is a shame to speak of τὰ κρυφῇ γινόμενα ὑπ' αὐτῶν, the things done by them in secret; and that they were at Corinth, see note on 1 Cor. vi. 13—15.

[3] Ver. 3. Εἰ δὲ καὶ ἔστι κεκαλυμμένον τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἡμῶν, If our gospel be hid.] Hence we learn, that the apostles delivered the gospel, in all things necessary to be believed or done, with sufficient plainness and perspicuity; for otherwise they could not be truly said to have manifested the truth to every man's conscience. The apostle also, by declaring, that if this gospel was hid from any to whom it was preached, it was only hid to them whose minds the god of this world had blinded, lest the light of the glorious gospel should shine in upon them, doth plainly teach, that the gospel was not hid from them for want of clearness on the part of them who preached it, but only by reason of that blindness which Satan had wrought in them that heard it; so that, if it were not manifest to all, *the fault is not in us, or in the obscurity of the gospel, but in their own blindness, for we hide nothing from them. So the fathers.

But here, saith Esthius, the apostle speaks not of the Scriptures to be read or understood by us, but of the gospel preached by him.

Ans. To this I answer, That the Scriptures writ and read to them, contain the same gospel of Christ which they preached; and as the reading of the law of Moses is styled the preaching of Moses every sabbath-day, Acts xv. 21. so is the public reading the Scriptures of the New Testament, the preaching Christ and his gospel: what reason then can be assigned why they, who confessedly preach the gospel plainly, should write the same things to the same persons obscurely; especially if we consider that they did τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν, write the same things to them for their safety, Phil. iii. 1. to put them in remembrance of those things which they knew, and in which they were established by their preaching, 2 Pet. i. 13, 14. and to stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance, that they might be mindful of the commandments of the apostles of our Lord, iii. 1, 2. that by reading them they might understand their knowledge in the mystery of Christ? Eph. iii. 4. And were these ends best prosecuted, or to be obtained, by writing that obscurely which they had plainly preached to them? Moreover, whatsoever things were written aforetime (saith the apostle) were written for our learning, Rom. xv. 4. And surely they, who writ after by the same Spirit, writ to the same end, that they to whom they wrote might be wise to that which is good, Rom. xvi. 19. that they might understand what the will of the Lord is, Eph. v. 17. or might prove what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God, Rom. xii. 2. And if they writ for our learning and instruction in these things, to be sure they writ plainly and clearly as to them, since otherwise they writ not so as to instruct and teach, but to confound, the reader. Seeing therefore the great end of writing the Scripture was to instruct the world in the will and mind of God, and the great things of the Christian faith; either we must say, that both the writers of the Scripture, and the Holy Ghost that inspired them, were defective in skill, or in care, so to write as to obtain this end, or that their writings are an effectual means to obtain it, which yet they cannot be, unless they are plain and clear, as to the great things of religion.

In short, every wise agent pursues his end by the most proper and effectual means: now surely, to write plainly, and not obscurely, is the most proper means to instruct men by writing; and so the apostles must have used this means of instructing in their writings, or else they cannot be esteemed wise agents.

[4] Ver. 4. Ὁ θεὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, The god of this world, &c.] Here observe, (1.) an hyperbaton, the true sense and position of the words being thus, Among whom are the unbelievers, whose eyes the god of this world hath blinded, &c. Note (2.) that Satan here is called by St. Paul the god of this world, and Eph. vi. 12. the ruler of the darkness of this world, agreeably both to the Jewish and Christian notion; the first ascribing to him the dominion over all that were not of the religion of the Jews, and introducing God speaking to the angel of death, or Satan, thus, Though I have made thee κοσμοκράτορα, *a ruler among the creatures of the nations, thou shalt have nothing to do with this people, because they are my sons; where also it presently follows, This is the angel of death, which is called Darkness. And the Christians allowing him to be ruler over all that were not converted to Christianity, and speaking of that as of the dispensation which delivered them from the power of darkness into the kingdom of Christ, Colos. i. 13. 1 Pet. ii. 9. and turned them from Satan unto God, Acts xxvi. 18. and of the gentile world, as walking before according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience, Eph. ii. 2.; which, had the fathers considered, they would not have contended so stiffly against the Marcionites and Manichees, that the god of this world, here mentioned, was the true God, as both Irenæus,* and Tertullian,† Chrysostom, Theodoret, Photius, Theophylact, and, as St. Austin‡ testifies, almost all the ancients did; whereas, indeed, the true God is never represented in Scripture as the god of this world, but as the God of them who are called out of the world; nor is it the design of God, but of the devil, to hide the glorious light of the gospel from the world.

[5] Ὅς ἐστιν εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ, Who is the image of God.] Christ seems here to be styled the image of God, not in the sense of Theodoret, as being God of God, but rather, as the text insinuates, with relation to the gospel, and his mediatory office; in which he hath given us many glorious demonstrations of the power, wisdom, the holiness, purity, and justice, the mercy, goodness, and philanthropy of God. (Tit. iii. 4.)

[6] Ver. 6. Ὅς ἔλαμψεν.] Ὅς here seems put for οὗτος, he; so 1 Cor. vii. 7. ὃς μὲν οὕτως, ὃς δὲ οὕτως, is quidem sic, ille autem sic; and xi. 21. ὃς μὲν πεινᾷ, is quidem sitit, ὃς μὲν μεθύει, ille autem inebriatur.

[7] Πρὸς φωτισμὸν τῆς γνώσεως τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ, The light of the knowledge of the glory of God.] Here seems to be an allusion to the shining of the face of Moses, after he had obtained his desire of seeing the glory of God, Exod. xxxiii. 16. 19. upon which δεδόξασται ἡ ὄψις, his face was made glorious, Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30. by reason of the glory of God that he had seen. This now, saith St. Paul, belongs to us apostles, the glory of God shining more gloriously in the face or person of Jesus Christ, than ever it did in Moses, and we beholding with open face the glory of the Lord, iii. 20. whereas the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the glory of the face of Moses. Note also, that ἐν προσώπῳ is the constant reading of the Greek scholiasts.

[8] Ver. 10. Ἵνα καὶ ἡ ζωὴ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, &c. That the life of Jesus might be made manifest.] It being a certain demonstration that Christ is risen, and still lives, that we, who persuade others to believe this, are enabled to do such mighty wonders in his name, and patiently and constantly to suffer such fiery trials by his grace.

[9] Ver. 12. Ἐν ὑμῖν, In you.] As being made partakers of the vital efficacy of Christ, in his spiritual gifts, and of an assimilation to his resurrection by a life of holiness, but not of the like sufferings with us. (1 Cor. iv. 8. 10.)

[10] Ver. 13. Ἐπίστευσα, διὸ ἐλάλησα, I believed, therefore have I spoken.] These words of David were spoken when the sorrows of death compassed him round about, and the pangs of sheol caught hold upon him, and yet he believed he should walk before God in the land of the living, Psal. cxvi. 3. 9. 10. and therefore are applied by the apostle, in the spiritual sense of them, to the resurrection, thus; That as David, notwithstanding all the persecutions which he suffered from the hands of Saul, firmly believed he should be preserved, and raised to a temporal kingdom; so we apostles believe that, after all our sufferings for the gospel, we shall be raised and advanced to a heavenly kingdom.

[11] Ver. 14. Ὁ ἐγείρας τὸν Κύριον Ἰησοῦν, He that raised up the Lord Jesus.] Here Schlictingius observes two things, (1.) That our Lord Jesus did not raise up himself, but was raised from the dead by the Father. (2.) That though Christ Jesus shall raise us up, yet shall he do this, not by his own power, but by the power he received from the Father.

First, Now here I acknowledge that the resurrection of our Lord is frequently ascribed in Scripture to God the Father, Acts iii. 26. xiii. 32. xvii. 31. Rom. iv. 24. x. 9. 1 Cor. vi. 14. xv. 15. Gal. i. 1. Eph. i. 20. Colos. ii. 12. 1 Thess. i. 9, 10. Heb. xiii. 20. 1 Pet. i. 3. 21. and the reason of the Christian dispensation requires it should be so, this being a demonstration that God the Father was satisfied with his performances and sufferings for us, and that he owned him as a true prophet, and his beloved Son, in that he raised him from the dead: but then this is not so to be understood, as to exclude Christ wholly from the same action; for he himself promised to do this, when he said of the temple of his body, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up, John ii. 19. 22. And that he did so, we learn from this, that after his resurrection the disciples believed the word which Jesus spake; whereas, had he not raised up himself, they could not have believed his word.

Let it then be noted, that our Lord was quickened by the Spirit, 1 Pet. iii. 18. even by the Spirit by which he offered up himself. (Heb. ix. 15.) Since then this Spirit of God dwelt in Christ, and is by him communicated to all believers, it is easy to be understood how Christ raised up himself, and yet was raised up by the power of God, as the Holy Ghost is styled, Luke i. 35. Thus also the resurrection of the just is ascribed to God the Father, Acts xxvi. 8. 1 Cor. vi. 14. Heb. xi. 19. 2 Pet. i. 3. and yet the same resurrection is frequently ascribed to Christ, John v. 28. vi. 39, 40. xi. 27. Rom. xiv. 19. 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22. 25, 26. Rev. iii. 18. And this he will effect by the power he hath in himself, John v. 26. by himself, John vi. 47. 54. I will raise him up at the last day; by his word, the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God and live, John v. 28. by the power by which he is able to subdue all things to himself, Phil. iii. 21. Now, to raise the dead, being a thing proper to God himself, (Rom. iv. 7. Acts xxvi. 8.) an instance of the power of God, (Matt. xxii. 29.) and the belief of it being faith in God; (Heb. xi. 19. 1 Pet. i. 3.) whosoever hath the power of raising all men from the dead, must have the power of God; the Godhead, the energy of the power of the might of God, (Eph. i. 19.) and the whole fulness of the Godhead dwelling in him; and if Christ did receive this power from the Father, he must receive it from him by the communication of the Godhead to him.

[12] Ver. 16. Ὁ ἔσωθεν ἄνθρωπος, The inward man.] Hence we learn, that the distinction betwixt the outward and inward man, is not of the same import with that of the old and new man, (Rom. vi. 6.) which is renewed after the image of God in righteousness and holiness, (Eph. iv. 22. Colos. iii. 9, 10.) but the outward man that perisheth, signifies only the body; the inward, is only the mind or spirit which is in man: so that when the apostle saith in the person of a man under the law, I delight in the law of God after the inward man, Rom. vii. 22. he saith nothing which intimates, that the person speaking was renewed in the spirit of his mind, but only that his mind was inclined to obey the law of God, though, through the law in his members warring against it, he was led captive to the law of sin.

[13] Ver. 17. Βάρος δόξης, Weight of glory.] The Hebrew word כבד which answers to Βάρος, weight, signifies not only multitude, but greatness, and in the rabbins, as well as Scripture, honourable: so Gen. xviii. 20. Their sin was כבדה מאד, very great: (see Gen. l. 11. Exod. ix. 3.) honourable, so Exod. xx. 12. כבד, Honour thy father and thy mother: (see Deut. xxviii. 58.) so that this word may signify the magnificence, the abundance, and the honour of the future glory which is prepared for the Christian sufferer.

[14] Ver. 18.] Note hence, that it is not only lawful, but even laudable, after the example of the apostles, in our actions and sufferings, to have respect to the recompence of reward, that being by the wisdom of the Holy Ghost propounded as our encouragement to do and suffer these things.

CHAP. V.

1. FOR we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have (provided for us, at the restoring of it) [1] a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

2. For in this (tabernacle) we groan, earnestly desiring [2] to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven:

3. (We are, I say, desirous of this,) [3] if so be that (or, seeing that at the resurrection) being clothed we shall not be found [4] naked (i. e. since then we shall not be found naked as the wicked, but clothed with a body not subject to death).

4. For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not for that (through impatience under our sufferings) we would be unclothed (by putting off the body), but (as desiring, ver. 2. to be) clothed upon (with our celestial body), that mortality might be swallowed up of life.

5. Now he that hath [5] wrought us for the self-same thing (i. e. hath wrought in us this earnest desire) is God, who hath also given to us the earnest of the Spirit, (whereby we are sealed up to the day of redemption, Eph. iv. 30. and wait for the redemption of the body, Rom. viii. 23.)

6. Therefore (having this earnest of the Spirit) we are always confident, knowing (Gr. being therefore always confident, and knowing) that, whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord:

7. (For (whilst it is thus with us) we walk by faith (only), not by sight:)

8. [6] We are confident, I say, and willing (we in this confidence are willing) rather to be absent from (or travel out of) the body, and to be present with the Lord (or at home with him).

9. Wherefore we labour, that, whether (we be) present (in) or absent (from the body), we may be accepted of him (at his appearance).

10. For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may (then) receive the things done [7] in his body (or by the body), according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

11. Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men (to believe we act in all sincerity and truth, when we propound these things to them); but (in this) we are made manifest to God; and I trust also (we) are made manifest in your consciences (and have given you good assurance that we act sincerely).

12. For we commend not ourselves again unto you (as if we doubted of your good opinion of us), but (we say these things to) give you occasion to glory on our behalf, that you may have somewhat to answer them which glory in appearance and not in heart, (or truth and sincerity, but either of other men's labours, 2 Cor. x. 15. or of things not really done by them, 2 Cor. xi. 12—21.)

13. For whether we be beside ourselves (transported in speaking of our raptures, ecstacies, and visions), it is to (do service to) God; or whether we be sober (in our discourses, not desiring that others should think of us above what they see in us, 2 Cor. xii. 6.) it is for your sakes.

14. For the love of Christ constraineth us (thus to promote his glory, and to seek your good); because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead (i. e. obnoxious to death, and condemned to it for sin);

15. And that [8] he died for all, that they who live (by his death) should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him that died for them (i. e. for their sins), and rose again (for their justification, Rom. iv. 24, 25.)

16. Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh: (i. e. according to carnal interests, the riches, honours, pleasures, and advantages of this world, 2 Cor. i. 17. x. 2.) yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh (expecting him as a temporal king, and hoping for great advancements in his kingdom, as being his disciples), yet now henceforth [9] know we him (so) no more.

17. (And so it is with all his sincere votaries;) therefore if any man be in Christ, he is (become) a new creature: old things are passed away (his affection to all temporal and carnal things); behold, [10] all things are become new (in him).

18. And all (these) things (belonging to the new creation, this change of our affections, this constraining love,) are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given (or committed) to us the ministry of reconciliation;

19. To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, (and) not imputing their (former) trespasses unto them; and hath committed to us the word of reconciliation.

20. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye [11] reconciled to God.

21. For he hath [12] made him to be (a) sin (offering) for us, who (himself) knew no sin, that we might be made (righteous with) the righteousness of God in him.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1. ΟΙΚΟΔΟΜΗΝ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἔχομεν, We have a building of God.] It was the doctrine of the Platonists,* That the soul was a kind of being which could not well subsist, or act, without a body, and therefore, after her separation from the body, wanted some vehicle or clothing by which she might subsist and act; and this notion was embraced by Origen, and this text was accordingly interpreted by him: (see the note on 1 Cor. xv. 44. 45.) and according to this notion, good Christians, as soon as they depart this life, are not found naked, but clothed with their house from heaven, which, at the resurrection, shall be the ἐπένδυμα, or clothing of their raised bodies, which renders them immortal. But the apostle cannot here be supposed to mean, that, as soon as ever good Christians die they shall be clothed upon with this house, which is from heaven, but only that they shall be so at the resurrection. For (1.) we Christians, saith he, groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with this house, ver. 2. Now, saith the same apostle, we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, that is, the redemption of the body, Rom. viii. 23. (2.) They groaned to be clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life, ver. 4. Now, when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal immortality, then only shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory, 1 Cor. xv. 24.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἐπενδύσασθαι, To be clothed upon.] By putting over this mortal body an incorruptible and eternal house. The Jews say, that Adam, in his first creation, being made, ἐπ' ἀφθαρσίᾳ, for incorruption, (Wisd. i. 23.) his body was covered from corruption veste onychina, with a clothing like in colour to the nail of the hand. Accordingly, the apostle represents the future bodies raised incorruptible, as clothed with an immortal covering, 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54‖

[3] Ver. 3. Εἴ γε καὶ, If so be.] That these words may be also rendered since, and seeing that, is evident from Scripture, and good authors. Thus here, ver. 4. εἰ signifies quandoquidem, so εἴ γε ἠκούσατε, seeing ye have heard, Eph. iii. 2. (See the note there.) And again, Eph. iv. 1. Or else, retaining our own version, we may give this sense to the words, If so be that (then) we shall be found clothed (with our celestial bodies, and so fitted for a blessed immortality), and not (as the wicked) naked (and without this heavenly building).

[4] Γυμνοὶ, Naked.] i. e. Not clothed upon with another body. So, 1 Cor. xv. 37. Thou sowest, γυμνὸν κόκκον, naked grain, not covered with a blade, or cover of chaff, as when it riseth up out of the earth it is, or with a cod, as in beans, peas, and lentiles: and accordingly, the rabbins* introduce a Samaritan or gentile, inquiring of R. Meir, Whether the dead rise naked or clothed? and him answering thus, that peas, which are sown naked, arise clothed, or covered with a cod, and much more the dead: but then they seem to restrain this to the just, saying, that the just shall rise clothed.

[5] Ver. 5. Ὁ κατεργασάμενος ἡμᾶς εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο, He that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing.] Hence it appears, there is no ground for that dangerous opinion, that the apostle here speaks as one that believed the general resurrection and advent of our Lord to judgment would be suddenly; for, this persuasion being false, the apostle could not, in this sense, say, We know, that if this earthly tabernacle were dissolved, we have (immediately) a building of God, i. e. a heavenly body to put on. God could not work them up to this desire, that they might not be unclothed, i. e. not die, but live to the resurrection, to be then clothed upon; nor could the apostle, consistently with this persuasion, introduce the same Christians willing to be absent from the body, that they might be present with the Lord. Moreover, in the preceding chapter, ver. 14. he plainly says, that they expected to be raised up by Jesus from the dead, and therefore must expect to die. (See the note on 1 Thess. iv. 15.)

[6] Ver. 8. Θαῤῥοῦμεν δὲ, We are confident.] i. e. We have not only confidence at his appearance, (John ii. 28.) but always, even in death itself, that, though it renders us absent from the body, it will bring us home to Christ, and to a nearer fruition of him. Only here note, that according to the doctrine of all the ancients, the souls of pious men are not assumed into the highest heavens, or the immediate presence of God and Christ instantly upon their departure hence: for thus only we shall be ever present with the Lord, 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17. when, by the power of God, at the last trump, we shall be raised up to meet him in the air; this promise being made at his second coming to receive his disciples to himself, that, where he is, they may be also, John xiv. 3. But yet, according to all antiquity, the souls of pious men, in the mean time, are in the place appointed for them παρὰ τῷ Κυρίῳ, with the Lord, that is, with him in paradise, where they enjoy the sight and conversation of their Saviour by way of vision: for Paul, and the rest of the apostles (saith Polycarp*), are in the place appointed for them, with the Lord.—Not only in heaven (saith Irenæus†), but in paradise also, our Saviour shall be seen, as men are worthy to behold him. And this doth Pseudo-Justin‡ gather from this very place, that the souls of the just go to paradise, and converse there with Christ by vision.

Ver. 9.] I confess it is difficult to give the clear sense of the apostle's words, from ver. 1. to 9. but, to do my endeavour farther towards it, observe,

First, That it cannot be proved from any thing said here, or in any other place of St. Paul's Epistles, that the apostle himself either thought, or taught others to think, that the coming of Christ was not far off, as I have fully proved in the note on 1 Thess. iv. 15. And, indeed, this doctrine being found by experience to be false, had he himself asserted, or taught others to expect, that the coming of our Lord to judgment was at hand; seeing in that he must have been mistaken, and misled others, what certainty can we have, that he was not mistaken, or did not mislead others, in what else he taught in his Epistles? Thus, ver. 9. if when he said, 1 Cor. vii. 31. Brethren, the time is short, and the fashion of this world passeth away; he thus dogmatically spake not of the time of human life, and the relation we had to the world, and the world to us, but of Christ's coming to judgment, and the destruction of the world, he certainly taught false doctrine. If, when he saith, x. 11. that upon them the end of the ages was come; he meant not the last, that is the Jewish, concurring with the gospel age, but the end of the world, he then taught false doctrine. If, when he saith, Heb. x. 37. Yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry; he meant this not of Christ's coming to the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish state and nation, but of his coming to the final judgment, he again taught false doctrine, and endeavoured to support them with false hopes, which sure must be sufficient to impair his credit in other matters, taught in his Epistles. Lastly, That there is no ground for this opinion is proved, note on ver. 5. they indeed, who had the first-fruits of the Spirit in them might wait for his coming, as all good Christians do, but they could not by virtue of his words expect it suddenly.

Secondly, Observe, that the apostle here cannot intend to assert, that good Christians, as soon as they die, shall instantly be clothed upon with their house from heaven, but only that they shall be so at the resurrection; for, saith he, we desire to be thus clothed upon, that mortality may be swallowed up in life: now this he had told us, 1 Cor. xv. 54. was only to be expected at the resurrection; for, when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory.

Thirdly, Observe, that the time of the resurrection of the just, being declared to be the time of their recompence, their being crowned and like to the angels, and being ever with the Lord, as hath been fully proved on the note on 2 Tim. iv. 5. they had good reason to be groaning after the redemption of the body, and that crown of glory, which God would give them at that day. But then, say they, we do not groan through impatience under our present afflictions; nor, as some philosophers, from an opinion, that the body is the prison of the soul, and hinderance to the knowledge of the truth, and therefore counting it a happiness to be divested of it; but from a vehement desire of that glorious resurrection of it, which shall complete the happiness both of soul and body, and place us for ever with the Lord.

Lastly, Observe, that at the resurrection there shall not be only an ἔνδυμα, or clothing of the soul with its former naked body; but an ἐπένδυμα, a clothing of the body raised, with a covering that shall preserve it from corruption; and this is plainly the apostle's meaning in the similitude of grain rising not naked, as it was sown, but clothed upon, as is proved, note on ver. 3. here, and on 1 Cor. xv. 37. And this, I think, is the meaning of those words, ver. 3. If so be, or seeing we shall be, ἐνδυσάμενοι, clothed upon, as the bodies of the just will be, and not γυμνοὶ, naked, as the bodies of the wicked shall be: for, that the wicked shall have immortal bodies at the resurrection, I no where find clearly delivered in the Holy Scripture, but only that the destruction of their bodies, as well as the torment of their souls, will be everlasting. (See the reading of the text, ver. 3. vindicated, Examen Millii in locum.)

[7] Ver. 10. Τὰ διὰ τοῦ σώματος, The things done in the body.] Some manuscripts read τὰ ἴδια τοῦ σώματος, "propria corporis," the things proper to the body; so the Vulgar Latin: both readings do sufficiently confute the doctrine of the Roman purgatory, and their prayers for the dead, as teaching men shall receive hereafter, not according to the prayers of others for them, when they are out of the body, but according to what they themselves have done in the body. Now it is sure, that what the living do of this kind for them after death, they themselves do not in the body, and so no account will be had of it in the great day. And why should they before suffer such dreadful pains in purgatory, who afterward must receive rewards or punishments, according, not to what they have suffered there, but according to what they had done in the flesh? The fathers here do farther note,

First, That the same body, which was dissolved, shall be raised again, and not another; it being absurd to think that one body should sin, and yet another should be punished for it; one body suffer, another should be crowned for it: so Methodius, Chrysostom, and Theophylact.

Secondly, That the soul is to receive its retributions with the body, and not without it, according to Methodius,* Theodoret,† and Hilary‡ the deacon, who passeth under the name of St. Ambrose.

[8] Ver. 15. Καὶ ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀπέθανεν, And he died for all.] Here observe,

First, That Christ died for all, all that were dead, all who were by his death engaged to live to him; as all, to whom the knowledge of the gospel is vouchsafed, are.

Secondly, That they do certainly mistake the meaning of these words, then were all dead, who thus interpret them,§ then were all obliged to be dead to sin; for, (1.) in these two verses, the word ἀπέθανον, dead, is four times used, once before, and twice after these words, then were all dead, and both before and after it undeniably signifies death in the proper acceptation of the word: who then can think that, the second time in the same sentence, it should import only an obligation to die to sin, or to ourselves? Whensoever in the Scripture it bears a metaphorical sense, some other word is joined to it, which doth enforce that sense; as when we are said to die to sin, Rom. vi. 2. to die with Christ, Rom. vi. 8. Colos. ii. 20. to die to the law, Gal. ii. 19. to die to the world, Gal. vi. 14. Colos. iii. 3. Here, therefore, nothing being added to enforce that sense, it must be deemed alien from the text. (See Examen Millii in locum.)

[9] Ver. 16. Οὐκ ἔτι γινώσκομεν, We know him so no more.] It is manifest, that the disciples, whilst Christ was with them, were much addicted to those temporal interests, still striving and contending who among them should be the greatest in Christ's kingdom, Luke ix. 46. xxii. 24. asking to sit one at his right hand, the other on his left hand, in his kingdom, Mark x. 37. and saying, We have left all, and followed thee, what shall we have therefore? Matt. xix. 27. and presently after his resurrection inquiring, Wilt thou now, Lord, restore the kingdom to Israel? Acts i. 6. These expectations, saith the apostle, we have now laid aside, and serve Christ only for spiritual and eternal advantages. Or, we may interpret these words thus: We know (i. e. respect) no man according to the flesh (i. e. according to his circumcision or nation), as being an Israelite, or of the stock of Abraham, as knowing that in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing——but a new creature, Gal. vi. 15. and though we Jews at first knew Christ according to the flesh, adhering to circumcision and the law,

[11] Ver. 20. Δεόμεθα ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ, καταλλάγητε τῷ Θεῷ, Be ye reconciled to God.] Here is observable against the Socinians a double reconciliation: (1.) a reconciliation of God to us; for God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself through him; and that not by renewing our natures, but by not imputing our trespasses to us. This reconciliation was effected, saith the next verse, by making Christ a sin-offering for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him; and this reconciliation is followed with an exhortation on our parts to be reconciled to God.

Obj. But Crellius objects, That the reconciliation, here mentioned, is ascribed to God, and so it cannot be the appeasing of his anger by making any satisfaction to him; for can it be supposed, saith he, that God, being angry, should appease himself, and that by making satisfaction by another to himself?

Ans. I answer, That the text doth not barely say, God reconciled us to himself, but that he was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, that is, by Christ, as the means of our reconciliation, or as the sin-offering by which this reconciliation was procured. It therefore is not necessary that these words should import, that God, being angry, should appease himself, but only that he should declare himself so far appeased by Christ's sufferings for us, and so well satisfied with his blood shed for the remission of our sins, that he would not impute those sins to any that believed in him: the blood of Christ made a sin-offering making atonement for us, as the blood of the sin-offering under the law made atonement for the sinner, and procured the forgiveness of his sins: and if under the law satisfaction was made by the sinner to God, by a beast of his own appointing, why may it not be made under the gospel by a Saviour of his own sending?

[12] Ver. 21. Ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἁμαρτίαν ἐποίησεν, He made him sin for us.] The words here being sacrificial, must be explained by their use in the old law, when applied to legal sacrifices. Now the word ἁμαρτία, which we render sin, is used there customarily for a sin-offering, and is well expounded by Œcumenius, τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν δῦμα. So αἴγες, ἔριφος, μόσχος ὑπὲρ ἁμαρτίας, Ezek. xliii. 22. 25. xliv. 29. xlv. 22, 23. 25. So the law of the sin-offering is ὁ νόμος τῆς ἁμαρτίας, Lev. vi. 25. the bullock appointed for a sin-offering is τὸ μοσχάριον τῆς ἁμαρτίας, ὁ μόσχος ὁ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, the bullock of sin, Exod. xxix. 36. Lev. iv. 8. 20. the goat to be sacrificed for sin, is ἡ χίμαιρα ἡ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, the goat of sin, Lev. iv. 29. To make such a beast a sin-offering for the people, is, in the sacrificial phrase, ποιεῖν ἁμαρτίαν, ποιεῖν τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτίας, to make it sin, Lev. iv. 20. ix. 7. xiv. 18. xv. 19. Numb. vi. 11. 16. viii. 12. It cannot therefore be doubted, but that ποιεῖν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἁμαρτίαν τὸν Χριστὸν, doth signify here to make Christ a sin-offering, or sacrifice for sin for us. The end for which he was thus made a sacrifice, is this, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him, i. e. that we might be justified by God, or might obtain forgiveness of sins, through faith in the blood of this sin-offering. For δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ, the righteousness or the justification of God, in St. Paul's style, still signifies the righteousness of faith, in Christ dying or shedding his blood for us; as in these words, δικαιοσύνη γὰρ Θεοῦ, For the righteousness of God in him is revealed from faith to faith; as it is written, The just shall live by his faith, Rom. i. 17. Again, δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ, the righteousness of God without the law is manifest — to wit, the righteousness of God through faith of Christ, Rom. iii. 21, 22. And, x. 3, 4. For they not knowing τὴν δικαιοσύνην τοῦ Θεοῦ, the righteousness of God, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ, to the righteousness of God. For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness, that is, justification, to every one that believeth. Phil. iii. 9. That I may be found in him, not having my own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is by the faith of Christ, την ἐκ Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει, the righteousness of God by faith. The interpretation, therefore, given in the paraphrase, is very agreeable to Scripture, whereas the gloss of the Socinians puts a continual force upon the words; for where in Scripture doth ποιεῖν ἁμαρτίαν signify, to treat an innocent person as a sinner? where is it that, to be made the righteousness of God in Christ, doth signify our being made new creatures, or our being sanctified? where doth God's reconciling us by Jesus Christ, import his converting the world to himself by Christ as his ambassador? why is God said not to impute to men their trespasses by the preaching of Christ, who preached only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, rather than by the preaching of the apostles to the whole gentile world? how was he made sin more than they, if he were only treated as a sinner on the account of the same doctrine, which they equally preached, and suffered for? and why may not men be said to be made the righteousness of God in the apostles, as well as in Christ, if this only imports our being converted, and so made righteous, by the doctrine they, as well as he, delivered?

CHAP. VI.

1. WE then, as workers together with him, (1 Cor. iii. 9. and his ambassadors, 2 Cor. v. 20.) beseech you also that ye receive not the [1] grace of God in [2] vain.

2. For he saith, (Isa. xlix. 8.) [3] I have heard thee in a time accepted (i. e. of favour and acceptance), and in the day of salvation have I succoured thee: behold, now is the (well) accepted time, now is the day of salvation, (when God sends his ministers to preach, and offer it to you, 2 Cor. v. 20.

3. Which we are so careful to preach, as becomes workers with God, ver. 1.) giving no (just) offence in any thing, that the ministry be not blamed:

4. But in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, [4] in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses,

5. In stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults (raised against us for preaching the gospel), in labours, in watchings, in fastings (i. e. in constant enduring all sorts of sufferings, and exercising all kinds of self-denial, for the gospel's sake);

6. By pureness (of conversation), by knowledge (of the Divine mysteries), by long-suffering (under all provocations), by kindness (towards all men), by the (various gifts of the) Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned,

7. By the word of truth (preached), by the power of God (confirming it, Rom. xv. 19.) by the armour of righteousness (which covers and protects us when assaulted), [5] on the right hand (by prosperous) and on the left (by adverse events),

8. By (going through the various conditions of) honour and dishonour, by (going through) evil report and good report; (being looked upon by the wise men of the world) as deceivers, and yet (being) true (dispensers of the word of life to them);

9. As unknown (and obscure persons), and yet well known (by the powerful works we perform); as dying, (daily by our continual persecutions), and (yet), behold, we live; as chastened, and (yet) not killed;

10. As sorrowful (in outward appearance), yet always (inwardly) rejoicing; as poor (in the concernments of the world), yet making many (truly and spiritually) rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things (in contentedness of mind, Phil. iv. 18. in the favour of that God who giveth all things richly to enjoy, 1 Tim. vi. 17. in Christ Jesus who is all in all, Col. iii. 11. and in whom we are blessed with all spiritual blessings, Eph. i. 3. and in the promise to inherit all things, Rev. xxi. 7.)

11. O ye Corinthians, [6] our mouth is (freely) open to you (in speaking well of you, vii. 4.) our heart (and our affection) is enlarged (to you).

12. Ye are not straitened in us (you have a large room in our hearts), but you are straitened (rather) in your own bowels (of affection to us).

13. [7] Now, for a recompence in the same (kind), I speak as to my children, be ye also enlarged (in your affections to me your spiritual father).

14. [8] Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers (do not join with them in their idol-feasts, and heathenish rites, or in the matrimonial yoke): for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?

15. And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?

16. And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? (you therefore must have none with them,) for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in (i. e. among) them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.

17. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive (and accept) you,

18. And [9] will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

1. [1] Χάριν τοῦ Θεοῦ, The grace of God.] The grace of God, in the Old Testament, imports his favour and kind affection to us; and in this sense it is said in general, a good man obtaineth, ratzon, χάριν παρὰ Κυρίῳ, favour of the Lord, Prov. iii. 34. xii. 2. or, in particular, that such a pious man found חן, χάριν, grace in the sight of God, 2 Sam. xv. 25. Gen. vi. 8. for as when it is said, that Joseph found grace in his master's sight, Gen. xxxix. 4. xliii. 14. xlvii. 25. Exod. iii. 21. xi. 3. xii. 36. the meaning is, his master shewed favour to him; and when it is added, that the Egyptians found grace in the sight of Joseph, the meaning is, he was inclined to shew favour to them, and grant them corn for their subsistence: so when the Scripture saith, that pious persons found grace in the sight of God, the phrase must signify God's inclination to shew mercy, and bear a kind affection to them. The grace of God, in the New Testament, when it is not used to signify the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, bears generally the same sense; as when the angel saith to Mary, thou hast found grace with God, Luke i. 30. St. Stephen of king David, that he found grace with God, Acts vii. 46. St. Luke, that Jesus increased, χάριτι, in grace with God and man, Luke ii. 52. when Paul and Silas are said to be commended to the grace of God, for the work of the ministry, Acts xiii. 3. xiv. 26. xv. 40. this being done by their prayers to God for his favour and assistance in that work. When men are said to be justified by the grace of God, Acts xv. 11. Rom. iii. 24. Eph. i. 7. and so have forgiveness of their sins, according to the riches of his grace, it must import the same; for justification and forgiveness of sin are acts of God's free grace and favour to the sinner. When it is said, that we are saved by the grace of our Lord Jesus, Acts xv. 11. by grace ye are saved, not of works; by grace we are saved, through faith, Eph. ii. 8, 9. seeing this is spoken to men yet alive, and so obliged to work out their salvation with fear and trembling, it cannot mean they were actually saved, but only that they were called to a state of salvation, enjoyed the means, and were put in the way of salvation by grace, according to those words of the same apostle, he hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but the grace given us in Christ Jesus, 2 Tim. i. 9. and to be thus saved by grace, is to be saved by the mercy and favour of God to us, according to those words of the apostle, when the kindness and love of God our Saviour to man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but by his mercy he saved us, Tit. iii. 4, 5. it being purely of the mercy and the grace of God, that any nation is called to the knowledge of salvation by Christ. When the grace of God is said to have abounded towards us, Rom. v. 15. 20. xv. 16. that grace is styled the free gift of God. When St. Paul saith, by the grace of God I am what I am, 1 Cor. xv. 10. that he was called by his grace, Gal. i. 15. and that the grace of God was abundant to him, 1 Tim. i. 13, 14. he himself interprets this of God's great mercy to so great a sinner. When he saith, I do not frustrate the grace of God, Gal. ii. 21. this he interprets to be God's favour to mankind, in sending his Son to die for us. The exceeding riches of his grace, Eph. ii. 7. is God's great kindness to us in Christ Jesus; and by the grace of God it is that Christ tasted death for every man, 2 Tim. i. 9. Heb. ii. 9. Hence is this gospel styled, the grace of God, which brings salvation, Tit. ii. 11. the grace of God, which is able to build us up, and procure us an inheritance among them that are sanctified, Acts xx. 32. This also must be the import of the word, when the apostles exhort their converts to continue in the grace of God, Acts xiii. 43. and when they inform us, that God confirmed the word of his grace by doing signs and wonders, Acts xiv. 3. and that the law came by Moses, but grace by Jesus Christ, John i. 17. (See the notes on Heb. xii. 28. xiii. 9. James iv. 6.)

[2] Μὴ εἰς κένον τὴν χάριν δέξασθαι, Not to receive this grace in vain.] This we do, (1.) when we do not obtain the end for which it was designed, viz. to teach us, denying all ungodliness and worldly lusts, to live righteously, soberly, and godly, in this present world. Thus those oblations, which are not acceptable to God, are styled vain oblations, Isa. i. 13. and the worship which is not according to his will, vain worship, Matt. xv. 9. because this worship, and these oblations, though designed to procure God's favour, will not do it. (2.) When we receive no benefit by the grace received, and it conveys no pardon or salvation to us, so, upon supposition that there will be no resurrection, your faith is in vain, 1 Cor. xv. 17. and, if you retain it not, ye have believed in vain, ver. 2. So to labour in vain, and run in vain, Gal. ii. 2. iv. 11. is to do these things without profit to them for whose sakes they are done; and those are called vain questions, and vain words, Tit. iii. 9. Matt. xii. 36. which are unprofitable.

[3] Ver. 2. Καιρῷ δεκτῷ ἐπήκουσά σου, I have heard thee in a time acceptable.] These are the words of God the Father to Christ, signifying, that he had accepted his intercession for the conversion of the gentiles, and declaring that he had given him εἰς διαθήκην τῶν ἐθνῶν, for a covenant to the nations, a light to the gentiles, and his salvation to the ends of the earth, Isa. xlix. 6. 8. and so the Jews interpret them, in Pug. Fid. par. ii. cap. 11. §. 21. That salvation, either in the prophet, speaking of Christ as the salvation of the ends of the earth, or in the apostle, speaking of the day of salvation, should mean the deliverance of the Christians from the persecuting Jews, is very improbable in itself, and is confuted by those words, now is the day of salvation; for Christians then groaned under persecution, both from Jew and gentile; and the destruction of Jerusalem, which is supposed to have brought this deliverance to the Christians from the persecuting Jews, was fourteen years after the writing this Epistle.

[4] Ver. 4. Ἐν θλίψεσιν,] Say some, imports afflictions in the general; ἀνάγκαι more grievous troubles; στενοχωρίαι such pressures as reduce us to the greatest straits. (See iv. 8, 9. vii. 11. 13.)

[5] Ver. 7. Δεξιῶν καὶ ἀριστερῶν, On the right hand and on the left.] All the Greek scholiasts here understand by δεξιὰ, τὰ εὐθυμότερα, things prosperous and grateful; by τὰ ἀριστερὰ, τὰ λυπηρὰ πάντα, all things which are grievous, or afflictive; instructing us, that both these things have their temptations, against which we are to arm ourselves; and to such things I have referred them in the paraphrase. But the scholiast upon Sophocles* informs us, that ἀριστερὰ οἱ παλαιοὶ τὰ μωρὰ ἐκάλουν, δεξιὰ δὲ τὰ συνετὰ, that the ancients styled foolish things left-handed, but wise things right-handed. And in Aristophanes,† μανθάνειν δεξιὰ, is to learn wise things; and so this armour may be to protect them against the follies of the vulgar, and the wisdom of the philosophers and wise men of the world.

[6] Ver. 11. Τὸ στόμα ἡμῶν ἀνέῳγε πρὸς ὑμᾶς, Our mouth is opened to you.] That is, say the Greek interpreters, we are so full of affection, that we cannot, σιγᾶν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, be silent, or abstain from declaring our affection to you, and our boasting of you, 2 Cor. vii. 14. ix. 2, 3.

[7] Ver. 13. Τὴν αὐτὴν δὲ ἀντιμισθίαν (ὡς τέκνοις λέγω).] The sense of these words seems to run thus, λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν ὡς τέκνοις; and I say unto you as children, τὴν αὐτὴν δὲ ἀντιμισθίαν ἀναδείξαντες τὴν ἰσότητα τῆς φιλίας ἔχοντες, shewing the same affection by way of recompence, πλατύνθητε καὶ ὑμεῖς, let your hearts or affections be enlarged towards us, as ours are towards you, ver. 11. So Œcumenius and Theophylact.

[8] Ver. 14. Μὴ γίνεσθε ἑτεροζυγοῦντες ἀπίστοις, Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers.] Here note, that these words cannot be duly brought to prove, that Christians must not communicate with vicious persons at the table of the Lord, though they be Christians in profession, since the apostle only speaks of unbelievers. (2.) The apostle here useth the very words by which the prophet Isaiah (lii. 11.) exhorts the Jews to preserve themselves in Babylon from the contagion of their idolatry, and by which St. John exhorts all Christians not to partake of the sins, or the spiritual whoredom of the beast, Rev. xviii. 4. He, therefore, cannot be supposed to forbid all Christians all converse even with the unbeliever; for he permits the believing husband to live with his unbelieving wife, and will not suffer the believing wife to depart from her unbelieving husband; (1 Cor. vii. 12, 13.) he therefore only doth forbid communion with them in actions proper to them as heathens, and alien from the profession of Christianity; viz. their feastings and sacrifices in the idol-temples; (1 Cor. viii. 10. x. 21.) and, by analogy, he also may be supposed to forbid Christians to marry with an unbeliever; for this was always held unlawful for the Jews to marry with a heathen,* till they became proselytes to their religion; for they, looking upon themselves as the pure servants of God, (Neh. ii. 20. see note on 1 Cor. vii. 14.) thought it a corruption of the holy seed to marry with the people of the earth; and hence, when this was done, Ezra complains, παρήχθη σπέρμα ἅγιον ἐν τοῖς λαοῖς τῆς γῆς, the holy seed was mixed with the people of the earth, Ezra ix. 9. Now, the Christians being made a holy nation, a peculiar people, the holy temple in which God by his Spirit dwelt, it seemeth as unfit that they should marry with heathenish idolaters; and therefore to such of them as were free, the apostle speaks thus, let them marry only in the Lord, 1 Cor. vii. 39. i. e. to one of their own religion: the marriage with an infidel being the closest conjunction with them, subjecting them many times to a necessary abstinence from Christian assemblies, and to continual temptations to apostacy, or compliance with their evil manners.

[9] Ver. 18. Ἔσομαι ὑμῖν εἰς πατέρα, I will be to you a Father.] These words are not to be found in Jer. xxxi. 9. but they are the words of God to Solomon, the ruler of his people, δικαστὴν υἱῶν σου καὶ θυγατέρων, a judge over his sons and daughters, Wisd. ix. 7. and they begin thus, τὸ δὲ λέγει Κύριος παντοκράτωρ, thus saith the Lord Almighty, 2 Sam. vii. 8. and ver. 14. ἐγὼ ἔσομαι αὐτῷ εἰς Πατέρα, καὶ αὐτὸς ἔσταί μοι εἰς υἱὸν, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a son; which words are by the apostle ascribed to Christ, Heb. i. 4, 5. and here to all Christians, as being members of his body, and joint-heirs with him. Moreover, the Jews* boasted that the Divine Majesty dwelt among them. After the days of Jacob (saith the book Cosri†), holy men increased into a great assembly; and the Schechinah, or Divine Majesty, rested upon them by love, to be their God. This favour God here promises to pious Christians, as being the true Israelites. Again, they also thought that purity from uncleanness was a necessary requisite to obtain this presence of God: For God (say they) doth not appropriate his name to Israel, to be called their God, but when their camps are holy; but at that very moment that they are so, he makes his presence to dwell among them, and becomes their God;‡ and these things the apostle, according to the Scripture language, here applies to the society of Christians. And, oh! what a powerful argument do they minister to all Christians, to cleanse themselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God, as they desire this Almighty Lord and Protector to be still present with them; and would not be obnoxious to the dreadful woe which will certainly follow upon his departure; (Hos. ix. 12.) as they would have this God to be their God, which is a state of present bliss; for blessed are the people who have the Lord for their God; as they would have him related to them as a heavenly Father, which relation secures the enjoyment of all blessings to them, which they daily ask; (Matt. vii. 12.) lastly, as they desire to be his sons and daughters, and, by that glorious relation, to be made heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ, (Rom. viii. 17.) and to have the Spirit of his Son in their hearts, crying Abba, Father. (Gal. iv. 6.)

See the Appendix to this chapter, at the end of this Epistle.

CHAP. VII.

1. HAVING therefore these promises, dearly beloved (of a God thus related to and dwelling with us), let us cleanse ourselves [1] from all filthiness of the flesh (all uncleanness and intemperance) and spirit (all idolatry), perfecting (or still making progress in) holiness in the fear of (that holy) God (who dwelleth in, and stands so near related to, us.

2. And) receive us (into your kind affections; for) we have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man (from the truth), we have defrauded no man, (as your false apostles have done, 2 Cor. xi. 3. 20.)

3. I speak not this (with an evil mind) to condemn you (as suspecting such things of us): for I have said before that you are in our hearts (iii. 2. so that we are ready) to die and live with you; (i. e. we love you so affectionately, that we could even die for the promotion of your welfare.

4. And therefore) great is my boldness (or freedom) of speech towards you, great (also) is my glorying of you: I am filled with comfort (for your obedience, ver. 14. and your liberality, 2 Cor. ix. 2.) I am exceeding joyful (on that account) [2] in all our tribulations.

5. (I say, our tribulations;) for, when we were come to Macedonia, our flesh had no rest (from them), but we were troubled (and pressed) on every side; without were fightings (with the opposers of the gospel), within were fears, (lest the false apostles should have perverted you from the simplicity which is in Christ, 2 Cor. xi. 3.)

6. Nevertheless (that) God, that comforteth those that are cast down, comforted us (also) by the coming of Titus (with good tidings from you, ver. 13.)

7. And not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, (which he discovered to us) when he told us your earnest desire (to rectify what was amiss in the matter of the incestuous person), your mourning (for your miscarriage in it), your fervent mind towards me (and zeal against my adversaries); so that I rejoiced the more (for his consolation, than for his coming.

8. For (therefore) though I made you sorry with a letter, [3] I do not repent (Gr. I am not sorry), though I did repent: (Gr. though I was sorry, viz. that I was forced to make you so, ii. 4.) for I perceive that the same epistle made you sorry, though it were but for a (little) season.

9. Now I rejoice, not (barely) that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.

10. For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation [4] not to be repented of (Gr. not repented of): but the sorrow of the world worketh death.

11. For behold this self-same thing, that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, (of obeying my directions, ver. 15.) yea, what clearing of yourselves (from guilt, by inflicting censures on the guilty person, and putting away evil from among you, 1 Cor. xv. 13.) yea, what indignation (against him who had so dishonoured his profession, and defiled the church), yea, what fear (of my displeasure, or the rod I threatened, 1 Cor. iv. 21.) yea, what vehement desire (to rectify what was amiss in this matter, ver. 7.) yea, what zeal (for me), yea, what revenge (in punishing the delinquent! so that) in all things (by this deportment) you have approved yourselves [5] to be clear (from guilt) in this matter.

12. Wherefore, though I wrote (so severely) to you, I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong (as delighting in his punishment), nor for his cause that suffered wrong (i. e. out of particular kindness to the father of the incestuous person), but (chiefly) that our care for you in the sight of God might appear to you.

13. Therefore we are comforted in your comfort (i. e. in the comfort we received from your deportment in this matter): yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus (in you), because his spirit was refreshed by you all.

14. For (now) if I have boasted any thing to him of you, I am not ashamed; but as we speak all things to you in truth (and sincerity), even so our boasting, which I made before Titus, is found a truth.

15. And his inward affection (Gr. his bowels) is more abundant towards you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling you received him (lest there should be any thing found in you that might offend him, or require my rod).

16. I rejoice therefore that I (can) have (this) confidence in you in all things.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VII.

[1] Ver. 1. 'ΑΠΟ' παντὸς μολυσμοῦ, &c. From all filthiness of flesh and spirit.] The sins of the Corinthians being uncleanness and idolatry, (see the preface to the First Epistle, and the notes on chap. x.) they seem to be here more especially intended.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἐπὶ πάσῃ τῇ θλίψει ἡμῶν, Under all our tribulations.] As ἐπὶ signifies, Mark ii. 26. Luke iii. 2. iv. 17. Acts xi. 28. 1 Cor. vi. 1. 6. or, amidst them, as Luke xii. 14. or, after them, as Phil. ii. 27. Heb. ix. 15.

[3] Ver. 8. Οὐ μεταμέλομαι, I do not repent.] It seems incongruous that the apostle should repent of what he writ by the direction of the Holy Ghost, and to this very end to stir up a godly sorrow in them; and therefore it seems better to render the original, οὐ μεταμέλομαι εἰ καὶ μετεμελόμην, with Grotius and others, Non doleo quanquam doluit mihi, I am not sorry now, though I was sorry when I writ this epistle, doing it with many tears, (ii. 4.) Or thus, I do not repent, though I should have repented, viz. if it had not found this good effect upon you.

[4] Ver. 10. Ἀμεταμέλητον, Not repented of.] That is, such a change from the service of sin, to the service of God, as we do not revoke, or repent of, by relapsing again into the sins once left off. Note also, that godly sorrow is not itself repentance, but that which tends to work it in us, by preserving us from relapsing into that offence, which created so much bitterness and anguish to us. The sorrow of the world worketh death, it dries up the moisture of the body, (Prov. xvii. 22.) and hath killed many, (Ecclus. xxx. 23.)

[5] Ver. 11. Ἁγνοὺς εἶναι, To be clear.] Note here, that true repentance from sin clears us from the guilt of it, not only in the sight of God, but man; so that it is both uncharitable and unchristian, to stigmatize or reproach any person for the sin we know, or believe, he hath truly repented of.

CHAP. VIII.

1. MOREOVER, brethren, we do you to wit of (Gr. we make known to you) [1] the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia, (Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, &c.)

2. How that, in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy (in the Holy Ghost appeared, 1 Thess. i. 6.) and their deep poverty abounded [2] to the riches of their liberality (or how they being very poor, and much afflicted; Acts xvi. 20. xvii. 5. 13. did notwithstanding, with great cheerfulness and joy, make a rich contribution towards the relief of their poor brethren in Judea).

3. For to their power I bear record, yea, and [3] beyond their power (or abilities), they (unsolicited by us) were willing of themselves (to contribute to the necessities of the poor saints of Judea.

4. Not being entreated by us, but) praying us with much entreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of ministering to the saints; (or be one of those who should take care for the administration and conveyance of it to them, ver. 19—21. ix. 12, 13. 1 Cor. xvi. 4. Acts xiv. 17.)

5. And this they did, [4] not as we hoped (or thought the event would be, who could expect only a small collection from men so poor, and so exhausted), but first (they) gave themselves unto the Lord (i. e. to his service in it), and unto us (to be employed in the promotion of this charity, or the distribution of it to others), by the will of God (moving them so to do, or according to his will, 2 Cor. ix. 4.)

6. Insomuch that (seeing this forwardness in others) we desired Titus, that as he had (in his last visit of you) begun, so he would (now) finish in you the same grace (or charity) also (and see that ye be not defective in it).

7. Therefore (Gr. ἀλλ', but,) as ye abound in every (other) thing (or gift), in faith, in utterance, and knowledge, (1 Cor. i. 5.) and in all diligence (to amend what I had blamed you for, 2 Cor. vii. 11.) and in your love to us, (ibid. ver. 7. so) see that ye abound (or, I pray that ye would abound) in this grace also.

8. I speak [5] not (this) by (way of) commandment, but (of advice only, ver. 10.) by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of * your love (to Christ and his saints.

9. And command you I need not;) for ye know the grace (or kindness) of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, [6] though he was rich (Gr. that being rich), yet for your sakes he became poor, that (ὑμεῖς) ye through his poverty might be rich; (or, as Chrysostom and Œcumenius read, that (ἡμεῖς) we through his poverty might be rich; which is the same in sense with the other reading.)

10. And herein I give my advice: for this is expedient for you, who have begun before, [7] not only to do, but also to be forward [8] a year ago.

11. Now therefore perform (or complete) the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance (of that will) also out of that which ye have.

12. For if there be first a willing mind, (whatsoever is given) it is accepted according to that a man hath, [9] and not (expected he should give) according to that he hath not.

13. For I mean not that other men be eased (or by your charity should live at ease), and you (in the mean time) burdened (with want):

14. But (that Christian charity should be managed) by [10] an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that (another time) their abundance also may be a supply for your want: that there may be an equality:

15. (That in your peregrination it may be) as it is written (of the Jews travelling into the wilderness, where) he that had gathered much (manna) had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack. (Exod. xvi. 18.)

16. But thanks be to God, which put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you.

17. For indeed he (not only) accepted the exhortation (I made to him concerning this employment); but being more forward (than I thought to find him), [11] of his own accord he went unto you.

18. And we have sent with him the brother, [12] whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches;

19. And not that (or so) only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace (or charity), which is administered (or dispensed) by us to the glory of the same Lord, and (to the) declaration of your ready mind (to relieve your poor brethren, or of our ready mind to perform this charitable office. Theodoret and Œcumenius read, ἡμῶν:

* All the Greek scholiasts here read ὑμετέρας.

20. We, by taking such faithful companions with us,) avoiding (or taking care of) this, that no man should blame us (or charge us with insincerity) in this abundance (of your liberality) which is administered by us:

21. (And so) providing for honest (Gr. creditable) things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men.

22. And we have sent with them [13] our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent (in this employment), upon the great confidence that I have in you.

23. Whether any do inquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellow-helper concerning you (in promoting your welfare and reformation, 2 Cor. ii. 13. vii. 6, 7.) or (whether) our brethren be inquired of, they are the messengers of the churches, and (the promoters of) the glory of Christ.

24. Wherefore shew ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love (to me), and of our boasting on your behalf (i. e. that we did not vainly boast of your readiness to perform such works of charity).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VIII.

[1] Ver. 1. ΤΗ'Ν χάριν Θεοῦ τὴν δεδομένην ἐν, The grace of God bestowed on,] Or the charitable contribution given in the churches of Macedonia, to which they were excited by God's rich grace towards them; for that χάρις signifies liberality, appears from ver. 6. I exhorted Titus to finish in you χάριν ταύτην, this charitable contribution; and ver. 7. that ye also may abound ἐν τῇ χάριτι ταύτῃ, in this liberal contribution; and ver. 19. who was chosen of the churches to travel with us, σὺν τῇ χάριτι ταύτῃ, with this charity to be dispensed by us. So ix. 8. God is able to make πᾶσαν χάριν all liberality abound among you; and 1 Cor. xvi. 3. to bring τὴν χάριν, your liberality to the poor Christians. Hence χάριν is by Hesychius and Phavorinus interpreted a gift, as it is here, by the apostle saying of this abounding charity, Thanks be to God for this unspeakable gift, ix. 14, 15. This charity is styled the grace of God, either for its exceeding greatness, as the cedars of God, and mountains of God, signify great mountains and cedars, (Psal. xxxvi. 7. lxxx. 11. see note on Acts vii. 20. Gen. xxiii. 6. xxx. 5. John iv. 3.) or rather as proceeding from God as the giver of this disposition, and the motive to this charity, as the zeal of God, 2 Cor. xi. 2. the love of God, 2 Cor. v. 14. the grace of God, Tit. ii. 11.

[2] Ver. 2. Εἰς τὸν πλοῦτον τῆς ἁπλότητος αὐτῶν, To the riches of their liberality.] So the word ἁπλότης usually signifies both in the Old and New Testament. So Prov. xi. 25. ψυχὴ ἁπλῆ, The liberal soul shall be made fat; Rom. xii. 8. He that giveth, let him do it ἐν ἁπλότητι, with liberality; 2 Cor. ix. 11. Being enriched in all things εἰς πᾶσαν ἁπλότητα, to all liberality; and again, ver. 13. James i. 5. If any man lack wisdom, let him ask it of God, who giveth ἁπλῶς, liberally.

[3] Ver. 3. Ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, Beyond their power.] Thus Philo* notes it as the excellency of a servant to engage in his master's service, not only readily and laboriously, but even ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, beyond his strength.

[4] Ver. 5. Οὐ καθὼς ἠλπίσαμεν, Not as we hoped.] The word ἠλπίσας, hoping, is used by the Attics, say grammarians,* not only touching good things, but simply touching the event of what is future. The word hath two senses which well agree to this place, viz. (1.) προσδοκᾶν, to expect; and so it is rendered by Hesychius and Phavorinus. (2.) To conjecture; so Eustachius says, ἀντὶ τοῦ στοχάζεσθαι κεῖται τὸ ἔλπεσθαι, the word signifies to conjecture. (See Aristotle ad Nichom. lib. ix. cap. 4.)

[5] Ver. 8. Οὐ κατ' ἐπιταγὴν, Not by the way of commandment or injunction.] i. e. The apostle commands not how much they should confer, much less that they should give all their substance and live upon a common stock, leaving nothing to themselves which they could call their own; for where no man hath any thing of his own, there is no place for liberality.

[6] Ver. 9. Δι' ὑμᾶς ἐπτώχευσε πλούσιος ὤν, &c. Being rich, he became poor for you.] These words the Socinians interpret thus; That Christ being the only Son of God, conceived by the Holy Ghost, and endued with the power of the Holy Ghost, and being one to whose power all things in the earth did yield, was therefore styled rich; and that he became poor when he was bound, led away, exposed to contempt, spit upon, smitten on the face, whipped, crucified. But this interpretation seems not well consistent with the words of the apostle. For,

1. All these sufferings are indeed proper indications of infamy cast upon him, and seeming infirmity in him, but not of poverty, seeing the richest man may be exposed to all or any of these things.

2. The words seem to imply some change in the person, of whom it is here said, that being rich, he became poor; whereas Christ was not less the Son of God, or less endued with power, when he thus suffered, as appears by the great miracles he then did. Others of them say, that he became poor by leading a poor life on earth. But (1.) it is not by his poverty on earth that we are made rich, but by the humiliation of himself. And (2.) he was thus poor from his birth and cradle, even before the Holy Spirit descended on him at his baptism. How much more naturally therefore are these words interpreted by that of the same apostle, that being in the form of God, and thinking it no robbery to be equal with God, he emptied himself of all his glory when he came to take our nature on him, taking together with it the form of a servant, and humbling himself to the death, even the death of the cross? Phil. ii. 7, 8. (See the note there.) Which death, saith Irenæus, he could only suffer ἡσυχάσαντος τοῦ λόγου, the Divine nature being then quiescent, and not active in him. This is that glory which he had with the Father before the world was, and which he, after his ascension, reassumed. (John xvii. 5.) Now, if Christ thus emptied himself of his glory, that we might be spiritually rich, it becomes us, in imitation of his great example, to part with our temporals to supply the exigencies of his needy and afflicted members.

[7] Ver. 10. Οὐ μόνον τὸ ποιῆσαι, ἀλλὰ δὲ τὸ θέλειν, Not only to do, but to be willing or forward.] It is known, that the will goes before the deed; and therefore τὸ θέλειν here cannot barely signify to will, but either to do it μετὰ προθυμίας, with readiness and zeal, as the following verse interprets it, or with delight, as the word often signifies: so 1 Sam. xviii. 22. θέλει ἐν σοὶ βασιλεὺς, the king delights in thee. See 2 Sam. xv. 26. Psal. v. 4. xxi. 8. xl. 12. Esth. vi. 6, 7. viii. 11. Mal. iii. 1. Matt. xxvii. 43. in all which places it answers to the Hebrew word chaphetz.

* Lib. quis Rer. Div. Hæres. p. 376. B. C.

* Ἐλπίσας, οὐ μόνον ἐπ' ἀγαθῶν, ἀλλ' ἁπλῶς· ἐπὶ τῇ τοῦ μέλλοντος ἐκβάσει λέγεται παρ' Ἀττικοῖς. Suidas.

[8] Ἀπὸ πέρυσι, A year ago.] The apostle had exhorted them in his Epistle, writ a year ago, to this contribution; (1 Cor. xvi. 2.) and they, in obedience to his directions, had begun to lay up in store willingly this charity he now exhorts them to consummate; and this he says, to shew they were not only moved to it by the example of the Macedonians, but rather were examples to them, (ix. 2.)

[9] Ver. 12. Οὐ καθὸ οὐκ ἔχει, Not according to what he hath not.] What is due to another, either by debt or duty of making provision for those of his own family, cannot be charitably given, as being not our own.

[10] Ver. 14. Ἰσότης, An equality.] So far Christianity seems to require this equality, as that we should not suffer others to lack the necessaries of this present life whilst we abound in them.

[11] Ver. 17. Αὐθαίρετος, Of his own accord.] Here we see the sweet harmony there is betwixt the gifts of God and our persuasion and free-will. Titus was moved to this work by St. Paul's exhortation, and was also willing of his own accord; and yet God, saith the apostle, put this earnest care into his heart.

[12] Ver. 18. Οὗ ὁ ἔπαινος ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ, διὰ πασῶν τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, Whose praise is in the gospel.] Who this brother was is much contested; antiquity hath carried it for St. Luke, worthy of praise in all churches for the gospel he writ. The authority of this assertion seems to rest upon the words of Origen,* the interpolated Ignatius,† and St. Jerome.‡ And this difficulty lies against it, that this brother is sent before St. Paul to Corinth with Titus, whereas St. Luke went with him to Troas, and from thence to Corinth. (Acts xx. 4. 6.) So Dr. Lightfoot. To which it may be answered, that it is not certain that St. Paul went from Troas to Corinth; perhaps he rather went from Philippi to Corinth, and so to Troas. (See the preface.) And so this person being chosen by the churches to travel with this charity, (ver. 19.) might be both sent before to prepare it; and being returned, to give notice to St. Paul that it was ready, might go back with him to receive it.

[13] Ver. 22. Τὸν ἀδελφὸν ἡμῶν, Our brother.] Apollos, say some of the ancients, viz. Theodoret and Œcumenius, who before doubted of them, and so was not disposed to come to them: (1 Cor. xvi. 12.) but now, upon St. Paul's confidence of their readiness to obey his precepts, was prevailed upon to come.

CHAP. IX.

1. (To me, I say, and to those messengers of the church:) for as touching the ministering to the saints (in Judea), it is superfluous for me to write to you (again):

2. For I know the [1] forwardness of your minds (in that affair), for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago; and (the fame and example of) your zeal hath provoked very many.

3. Yet have I sent the brethren, (mentioned viii. 17, 18.) lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, (viii. 11.) you may be (found) ready:

4. Lest haply if they of Macedonia (who gave themselves up to us, viii. 5.) come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not, you) should be ashamed in this same confident boasting.

5. Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the (aforesaid) brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand [2] your bounty, whereof you had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of (free) bounty, and not (extorted from you with difficulty) as [3] (a matter) of covetousness.

6. But (to preserve you from this temper) this I say, He who soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he who soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully (from God again, Prov. xi. 24, 25.)

7. Every man (then) according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or (as) [4] of necessity (to avoid shame, or only to comply with the example or importunity of others): for God loveth a cheerful giver.

8. And (to this end consider, that) [5] God is able to make all grace abound towards you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound in every good (and charitable) work:

9. (According) as it is written, (Psal. cxii. 9.) He hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor: [6] his righteousness (i. e. his liberality) remaineth for ever (in remembrance before God).

10. Now (may) he that ministereth seed to the sower both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your [7] righteousness.

11. (That you may still make progress in them,) being enriched in every thing to all bountifulness, which causeth through us (who dispense it) thanksgiving to God.

12. For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings to (the glory of) God;

13. Whilst by the experiment of this ministration they (who receive the benefit of it) glorify God for your [8] professed subjection to the gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution to them and to all men.

14. And (you also will receive advantage) by their prayers for you, which long after you (and earnestly desire your welfare) for the exceeding grace of God (they see) in you.

15. Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift (i. e. this admirable charity, by which God is so much glorified, the gospel receives such credit, others are so much benefited, and you will be so plentifully by God rewarded).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IX.

[1] Ver. 2. ΤΗΝ προθυμίαν ὑμῶν, Your forwardness.] Some tell us that St. Paul preached the gospel at Corinth freely for two reasons: (1.) Because he observed in them such a saving temper, as would hinder the progress of the gospel if it should prove matter of charge to them. But this cannot be a true account of the matter: 1. because he doth the same at Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedonia, labouring night and day, because he would not become chargeable to any of them, (1 Thess. ii. 6. 9. 2 Thess. iii. 8.) and throughout all Asia, saying thus to them, You know that these hands have ministered to my necessities, and to those that are with me. (Acts xx. 33.) And it seems plain from his own words, that no church communicated any thing to him, but that of Philippi. (Phil. iv. 15, 16.) (2.) Because he commends them for their readiness and willing mind here, and viii. 11. 19. and mentions the liberality of their contribution, and their unspeakable gift, with thanks to God, ver. 13—15. in this chapter, in which he doth exhort them to complete it. (3.) Because they contributed to others, who were false apostles, and suffered them to take of them; so he insinuates in these words, If others are partakers of this power over you, are not we much more? This he speaks, say Chrysostom and the Greek scholiasts, not of Peter or the other apostles; for then he would not have said, Are not we much more partakers of this power than they? ἀλλ' ἑτέρων τινων νόθων, but of some false apostles, and corrupters of them, of whom he saith, 2 Cor. xi. 20. You suffer if a man devour you, if he take of you; which is also a confutation of the second pretended reason of this abstinence, that the apostle did this to disappoint the arts of these false teachers, who preached the gospel freely, and gloried in so doing. (See the note on 2 Cor. xi. 12, 13.) The apostle himself gives another reason of the doing this, both here and elsewhere, viz. not because we have not power, but to make ourselves an example for you to follow us, 2 Thess. iii. 9. And again, Acts xx. 34. I have shewed you all things, how that so doing you ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is better to give than to receive.

[2] Ver. 5. Τὴν εὐλογίαν ὑμῶν, Your gift,] Or present, to the churches in Judea; for as the Hebrew beracha, so the Greek εὐλογία, oft signifies a gift, or present: as when Jacob saith to Esau, λάβε τὰς εὐλογίας μου, receive my present, Gen. xxxiii. 11. and Abigail to David, λαβὲ τὴν εὐλογίαν ταύτην, receive this gift, 1 Sam. xxv. 27. and Naaman to Elisha, λαβὲ τὴν εὐλογίαν, receive a gift from thy servant, 2 Kings v. 15. (See also Judg. i. 15. 1 Sam. xxx. 26.)

[3] Καὶ μὴ ὥσπερ πλεονεξίαν, And not as a matter of covetousness.] The Corinthians abounded, saith St. Chrysostom,* περὶ τῶν ἄλλων πάντων τῇ τῶν χρημάτων περιουσίᾳ, in wealth above all other cities, as being a very famous mart, and so the apostle is concerned to stir them up to an abundant charity, as he did, ver. 14. and because riches begat covetousness, he here arms them against that vice. Note also, that to give alms out of shame, or to satisfy the importunity of others rather than out of love and good-will, is a symptom of a covetous temper.

[4] Ver. 7. Μὴ ἐξ ἀνάγκης, Not of necessity.] Note, that necessity in Scripture stands opposed not to coaction, but to the free election of the will. (See the note on Philem. 14. and on 1 Pet. v. 2.)

[5] Ver. 8. Δυνατὸς ὁ Θεὸς, God is able.] Here note, that not only the promise but the power of that God, who is good to all, is a motive to expect his grace and favour. (See the note on Rom. xi. 23. Heb. ii. 18.) Note, secondly, περισσεύσαι here signifies to make, or cause to abound; so Matt. xiii. 22. xxv. 29. Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, καὶ περισσεύσεται, and he shall be made to abound; 1 Thess. iii. 12. The Lord make you to increase, καὶ περισσεύσαι, and to abound in love.

[6] Ver. 9. Ἡ δικαιοσύνη αὐτοῦ, His righteousness.] That is, his liberality, as the word often signifies in the Septuagint. So Gen. xix. 19. Thou hast magnified τὴν δικαιοσύνην σου, thy mercy, or kindness, to me; chap. xiii. ταύτην τὴν δικαιοσύνην, this kindness thou shalt shew me; xxiv. 27. he hath not left τὴν δικαιοσύνην αὐτοῦ, his kindness to Abraham. (See ver. 49. xxxii. 10. Exod. xv. 13. xxxiv. 7. Prov. xx. 28. xxxi. 21. Isa. lxiii. 7.) Hence צדקה is ten times by the Septuagint rendered ἐλεημοσύνη, alms.

[7] Ver. 10.] Note, that all the Greek scholia read δικαιοσύνης, not διακονίας, ministry.

[8] Ver. 13. Ἐπὶ τῇ ὑποταγῇ τῆς ὁμολογίας.] Ὁμολογία in the New Testament still signifies the confession of faith, 1 Tim. vi. 12, 13. Heb. iii. 1. iv. 14. x. 23. ὑποταγῇ, subjection to the precepts of that faith. So the apostle signifies, that men seeing in them, by this charity, the sincerity of their love, (viii. 8.) and so of their obedience to the gospel, will be induced to glorify God, and own the excellency of that religion which produceth such fruits of righteousness.

CHAP. X.

1. NOW I Paul myself (who would not deal severely with you) beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ (which I desire to imitate, even I,) who in (or, as to my) presence am (esteemed) base among you, but being absent am (accounted) bold towards you: (ver. 10.)

2. But (whatsoever you esteem me) I beseech you, that I may not (find reason to) be bold when I am present with that confidence, wherewith I think (meet) to be bold against some, who think of us as if we walked according to the flesh; (now saying one thing, and then another, according to our carnal interests, 2 Cor. i. 17.)

3. For though we walk in the flesh, we do not war after the flesh (exercising our authority in weakness).

4. For [1] the weapons of our warfare are not (weak, Isa. xxxi. 3. and) carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of (the) strong holds (of the gentiles).

5. Casting down (their) imaginations (and reasonings), and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and [2] bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of (the gospel of) Christ; (i. e. making the gentiles obedient to it in word and deed, by mighty signs and wonders, and by the power of the Spirit of God, Rom. xv. 18, 19.)

6. And having in a readiness to revenge all (the) disobedience (of your dissolute members, xii. 20, 21. and of these deceitful workers, by punishing them with our spiritual rod, 1 Cor. iv. 21.) [3] when your obedience is (or shall have been) fulfilled.

7. Do you look on things after the outward appearance (judging of me from my outward person, and the infirmities of my body, v. 1, 2. and not from the power of Christ resting upon me, 2 Cor. xii. 9. and working by me)? If any man (on account of his gifts) trust to himself that he is Christ's, (a minister of Christ, 2 Cor. xi. 23. an apostle of Christ, ver. 13.) let him of himself think (or conclude) this again, that, as he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's; (for the proofs of Christ speaking in me are not weak, but mighty, 2 Cor.

* Præfatio in Epist. prim.

xiii. 3. and in nothing are we behind the very chiefest apostles, xii. 11.)

8. For though I should boast somewhat more (than I do, or they can do,) [4] of our authority, which the Lord has given us for edification, and not for (your) destruction, I should not be ashamed (or put to shame):

9. (And this I say,) that I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters (as you say I do).

10. [5] For his letters, say they, are weighty and powerful; but his [6] bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible.

11. (But) let such a one think (or conclude) this, that such as we are in word by letters, when we are absent, such also will we be also in deed when we are present, (for if I come again I will not spare, xiii. 2. but punish all disobedience.

12. This I say only,) for we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some (among you), who commend themselves (for their own performances above measure, not considering how much they fall short of the performances of them they vilify): but they (thus) measuring themselves (only) by themselves, and comparing themselves (only) among themselves (one false apostle with another), are not wise.

13. [7] But we will not boast (Gr. neither will we boast) of things without our measure (or the commission given us by Christ to go to the gentiles, Rom. xv. 16. Gal. ii. 7. 9.) but according to the measure of the rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure to reach even to you (gentiles, we having preached through all the interjacent provinces from Judea to you of Corinth, Rom. xv. 19.)

14. For we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not to you: for we are come (before any others) as far as to you also in preaching the gospel of Christ:

15. Not boasting of things without our measure, that is, of other men's labours; but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be enlarged by you (giving testimony to our labours) according to our rule (Gr. in respect of our line) abundantly,

16. To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, and not to boast in another man's line of things made ready to our hand.

17. But he (of us) that glorieth (of his apostleship or ministry), let him glory in the (power or assistance the) Lord (affordeth to render it successful).

18. For not he who commendeth himself is (an) approved (minister or apostle of Christ), but (he) whom the Lord commendeth (by his gifts vouchsafed to, and by the power of Christ attending on him in that ministry).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. X.

[1] Ver. 4. ΤΑ ὅπλα τῆς στρατείας ἡμῶν, The weapons of our warfare.] That these include the censures of the apostolical authority is certain; but that they are to be restrained to them I do not think; but rather that they chiefly do refer to the miraculous powers God hath given them for the conversion of the gentiles to the Christian faith. Moreover, the apostolical rod seems not to relate to the power of excommunication, but of inflicting corporal diseases on persons refractory and disorderly, and seemeth not to have been continued after the death of the apostles.

[2] Ver. 5. Αἰχμαλωτίζοντες πᾶν νόημα, Captivating every thought.] The apostle speaks not here of captivating the reason of a Christian to the articles of faith, by his belief of any thing proposed as such, though never so absurd, or contrary to the reason of all mankind, as some popish doctors lewdly talk; but of captivating the reasons of Jew and gentile against the Christian faith, by the demonstration of the Spirit and power. (1 Cor. ii. 4.) Captivat intellectum, dum contradicentem ratione vincit, Ambr.

[3] Ver. 6. Ὅταν πληρωθῇ ὑμῶν ἡ ὑπακοή, When your obedience is fulfilled.] His love to the Corinthians, whom he desired to spare, and the infirm state of their church at present, made him choose to defer the punishment of these offenders, till he had wrought off the affections of the Corinthians from their false apostles, and made them more unanimous in their regards to him: and this is the best excuse that can be made for the neglect of Christian discipline in any church, viz. that* there is no place for severe remedies, when the disease hath infected the whole church: the apostle being here forced to yield to this necessity, because the offenders in the church of Corinth being many, they could not easily be punished. Accordingly the primitive church relaxed the severity of its discipline, when great multitudes were concerned, or such as were like to draw great multitudes after them.

[4] Ver. 8. Περὶ τῆς ἐξουσίας ἡμῶν, Of our authority.] The apostle seems to refer to the authority peculiar to the apostles, of inflicting corporal punishments on refractory persons, and delivering them up to Satan: (see note on 1 Cor. iv. 21. v. 5.) which power none of these false teachers could pretend to. (1 Cor. iv. 19, 20.) And this, saith he, the Lord hath given me for edification, and not for destruction, it being designed for revenging men's disobedience, (ver. 6.) for the saving of the spirit, (1 Cor. v. 5.) and to teach men, by what they suffer, not to blaspheme the truth. (1 Tim. i. 20.)

[5] Ver. 10. Ἐπιστολαὶ, Letters.] It cannot be hence concluded, that St. Paul writ more than one epistle to them; for nothing is more common than this enallage of number. So Polycarp, writing to the Philippians, saith, that St. Paul, being absent, ἔγραψεν ὑμῖν ἐπιστολὰς, writ epistles to you. (See Cotelerius there.)

[6] Παρουσία τοῦ σώματος ἀσθενὴς, His bodily presence is mean,] Seems plainly to refer to that which Chrysostom,† Nicephorus, and Lucian, relate of St. Paul, that his stature was low, his body crooked, and his head bald, and so he was literally κατὰ πρόσωπον ταπεινὸς, low in person, (ver. 1.) When it is added, that his speech was contemptible, this cannot be understood as if it were so for want of eloquence, or the floridness of the Greek, for that was as much wanting in his letters as his speech or sermons; it therefore seemeth to refer to some infirmity of his speech in teaching. (See note on 2 Cor. xii. 7.)

[7] Ver. 13, &c.] In these four verses the apostle seems

* "Neque enim duris remediis locus est, ubi tota ecclesia in morbo cubat." Grot. "Neque potest esse salutaris correptio, nisi cum ille corripitur qui non habet sociam multitudinem. Cum autem idem morbus plurimos occupaverit, nihil aliud bonis restat quam dolor, et gemitus." August. contra Epist. Parmen. lib. iii. p. 61. B. D. "Necessitate temporum succubuit." Cypr. ed. to advance himself above the false apostles in these things: (1.) that whereas they could shew no commission to preach to the Corinthians, no measure by which God had distributed the Corinthians to them as their province, he could do so, ver. 13. (2.) That whereas they went out of their line, leaping from one church to another, he went on orderly in conversion of churches to the faith, from Judea through all the interjacent provinces till he came to Corinth. (3.) Whereas they only came to and perverted those churches where the faith had been already preached, and so could only boast of things made ready to their hands, (ver. 16.) he had still striven to preach the gospel where Christ was not named, lest he should build upon another man's foundation. (Rom. xv. 20.)

CHAP. XI.

1. WOULD to God you could bear with me a little in (this) [1] my (seeming) folly (in boasting of my own performances): and indeed bear with me.

2. For (I therefore do it, because) I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy: for I have espoused you to one husband, (and desire) that I may present you as [2] a chaste virgin unto Christ (your husband).

3. But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled [3] Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should (by the subtilty of deceitful workers) be corrupted from the simplicity (of the faith) that is in Christ, (by mixing the observation of the law with the gospel, as these Judaizers did, and so returning as it were to your former husband. See note on Rom. vii. 3.)

4. (I say, I am jealous of you, lest you be corrupted by these false apostles;) for if he that cometh (after me) preacheth another Jesus (i. e. hath another Saviour to propound to you), whom we have not preached, or if ye receive (from him) another spirit, (affording such spiritual gifts) which ye have not received (from us), or another gospel, which ye have not accepted (or received already), ye might well bear with him (in his pretensions to exceed us; but this cannot be said;)

5. For I suppose (in these things) I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles, (Peter, James, and John, from whom these false teachers from Judea may pretend to come, 1 Cor. i. 12.

6. But) though I be [4] rude in speech, yet (am I) not (so) in knowledge (of Christ and his gospel); but we have been thoroughly made manifest among you in all things (of this nature, xii. 11, 12.)

7. Have I committed an offence in abasing myself (so far as to labour with mine own hands) [5] that you might be exalted (by the spiritual riches and advantages of the gospel, and in having an apostle more regardful of you than of other churches), because (being chargeable to some of them) I have preached to you the gospel of God freely?

8. [6] I robbed (i. e. made naked) other churches, taking wages (or a stipend) of them, to do you service.

9. And when I was present with you, and wanted, [7] I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me the brethren which came from (Philippi, Phil. iv. 15, 16. in) Macedonia supplied: and in all things I have kept myself from being burdensome to you, and so will I keep myself.

10. As the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia.

11. (And) wherefore (do I thus resolve? Is it) because I love you not? God knows (the contrary).

12. But what I do (of this kind), that I will (still) do, that I may cut off occasion (of boasting) from them which desire occasion; [8] that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we.

13. For such are (your) false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ (seeming to do as we do, or desiring to be thought equal to us in all things).

14. And no marvel; for Satan himself is (sometimes) transformed into an angel of light (pretending to do their work, and be a ministering spirit to them whom he intendeth to destroy).

15. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness; whose end shall be according (not to their specious and hypocritical pretences, but) to their works. (Phil. iii. 18.)

16. I say again, Let no man think me a fool (in boasting thus of myself); if otherwise, yet as a fool receive (i. e. suffer) me, that I may boast myself a little.

17. That which I speak (thus), I speak it not after the Lord (as commanded by him so to speak), but as it were foolishly, in this confidence of boasting (though the false apostles have made it necessary, and so a part of Christian wisdom so to do, xii. 11. to vindicate my apostleship, and to confirm you in the truth).

18. Seeing that many glory after the flesh (as being the seed of Abraham according to the flesh), I will glory (as to that) also.

19. (Nor can my seeming folly offend you, if you be indeed what you pretend,) for you (will) suffer fools gladly, seeing you yourselves are wise (in your own conceits; or, being wise, you must suffer fools gladly.

20. And sure I am, you can bear with greater matters;) for ye suffer, if a man bring you into bondage (to the Jewish rites, Gal. iv. 9. v. 1.) if a man devour you (as did the pharisees widows' houses, living deliciously upon your substance), if a man take of you [9] (if he take away what is yours), [10] if a man exalt himself (above you), if a man smite you on the face (or use you contumeliously.

21. That which I said of smiting you upon the face,) I speak as concerning (the) reproach (they cast upon you as profane, uncircumcised, whereas they are all a holy nation), [11] as though we had been weak (i. e. inferior to them in these things, not able to ascribe to ourselves these advantages as well as they). Howbeit whereinsoever any is bold (in this kind), I speak foolishly, I am bold also.

22. (For,) [12] are they Hebrews (speaking the Jewish language? Phil. iii. 5.) so am I. Are they Israelites (descended from beloved Jacob, Mal. i. 2. not from Esau)? so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham (and not proselytes)? so am I.

23. [13] Are they ministers of Christ? (I speak as a fool,) I am more (so); in labours more abundant (than any of them), in stripes above measure, (Acts xvi. 22, 23.) in prisons more frequent, (ver. 24.) in deaths oft. (1 Cor. xv. 31. 2 Cor. iv. 11.)

24. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes [14] save one.

25. Thrice (by the gentiles) was I beaten with rods, (Acts xvi. 23.) once was I stoned, (Acts xiv. 19.) thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been [15] in the deep;

26. In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by my own countrymen, (Acts xx. 3.) in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city (Damascus, Jerusalem, Ephesus), in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren;

27. In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, (2 Thess. iii. 8.) in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. (1 Cor. iv. 11. 2 Cor. vi. 5.)

28. (And) besides those things which are without, that which cometh upon me daily (is), the care of all the churches (planted by me, 2 Cor. vii. 5. or by others among the gentiles, Colos. ii. 1.)

29. (For) who (of them) is weak, and I am not (as) weak (in compassionating them, and complying with their weakness? 1 Cor. ix. 22.) who is offended (or ready to fall from his profession), and I burn not (with zeal to recover him)?

30. If I needs must glory, I will glory of the things which concern my infirmities (i. e. rather in my sufferings for Christ, than in the great things he hath done by me).

31. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not (in any thing I have now said of my sufferings).

32. ¶ In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me (in compliance with the Jews):

33. And through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, [16] and escaped his hands.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XI.

[1] Ver. 1. ΤΗΣ ἀφροσύνης μου, My folly.] Though the necessity which lay on the apostle thus to commend himself, for vindication of his apostleship, made him free from folly in this matter; yet, because self-commendation usually proceeds from vanity and folly, and they who know not the necessity which lay upon him so to speak, would be apt to impute this to him, he useth this word here, though saying, ver. 16. Let no man think me a fool in this my boasting, and, xii. 6. Though I did glory, I should not be a fool.

[2] Ver. 2. Παρθένον ἁγνὴν, A chaste virgin.] Here is thought to be an allusion to the ἁρμόσυνοι of the Lacedemonians, who formed the lives and manners of the virgins, and made them regular, and so prepared them for their husbands. But the Greek commentators agree with our translation, rendering the word ἡρμοσάμην by ἐμνηστευσάμην, I have espoused you. So Phavorinus* doth interpret these very words; and so the word is used frequently by Herodotus,† and it bears the same sense in the Septuagint, παρὰ Κυρίου ἁρμόζεται γυνὴ ἀνδρὶ, the wife is espoused to the husband of the Lord. (Prov. xix. 14.) As therefore the Jews say, that Moses espoused Israel to God in Mount Sinai,‡ when he made them enter into covenant with them; so saith the apostle here, By converting you to the Christian faith, I have espoused you to one husband, even Christ.

[3] Ver. 3. Εὔαν, Eve.] He mentions Eve, not Adam, because she was only personally deceived by the serpent, and was first in the transgression. (1 Tim. ii. 14.) And he calls this deceit, φθόρα, in allusion to the metaphor of virginity.

[4] Ver. 6. Ἰδιώτης τῷ λόγῳ, Rude in speech.] This cannot refer to his want of eloquence, or rhetorical artifice in his compositions; for this seems equally wanting in the epistles of St. Peter and St. James; it therefore must refer to some imperfection in his speech, which they had not.

[5] Ver. 7. Ἵνα ὑμεῖς ὑψωθῆτε, That you might be exalted.] So St. James useth the word, saying, Let the brother of low degree rejoice ἐν τῷ ὕψει αὐτοῦ, in his exaltation to the riches and privileges of the Christian faith, i. 9. So the song of the Virgin-mother saith, that God, by sending the Messiah, ὕψωσε ταπεινοὺς, hath exalted them that were low, Luke i. 52. and Capernaum is said to be ὑψωθεῖσα, exalted to heaven by our Saviour's frequent preaching to them, Luke x. 15.

[6] Ver. 8. Ἐσύλησα, I robbed.] Συλᾶν, γυμνοῦν, the word signifies to make naked, saith Phavorinus; to spoil, say others: for the churches of Macedonia, from whom he received his gifts, being poorer than that of Corinth, (2 Cor. viii. 2.) might comparatively seem by this to be spoiled of what was necessary for them.

[7] Ver. 9. Οὐ κατενάρκησα οὐδενὸς, I stunned nobody with complaints.] I importuned none of them to supply my wants.

[8] Ver. 12. Ἵνα ἐν ᾧ καυχῶνται, Than in what they glory.] This most interpreters thus gloss: That whereas the false apostles glory in preaching the gospel freely, they may be found even in that to do only what we have still done among you. And true it is, that the Jewish writers tell us, that their wise men of old would not be nourished so from the church, but rather chose to get their living by their own labour; and therefore used to say, It is better to skin dead beasts, than to say to the people, I am a wise man, or a priest, therefore nourish me; and that the most excellent and perfect of them clave wood, and carried timber, and drew water, and wrought in iron and coals, and neither asked nor would receive any thing of the church. And, therefore, to make himself equal with the best of these wise men of the Jews, St. Paul might refuse maintenance from the churches of Achaia. (See Campegius Vitringa de Synag. Vet. lib. iii. par. i. cap. 18. p. 884, 885.) But this exposition is liable to this great objection, That the apostle, speaking to the Corinthians of the same persons, saith, Ye suffer if a man devour you, if a man take of you, ver. 20. and 1 Cor. ix. 12. If others are partakers of this power, are not we much more? and elsewhere, where he represents these Jewish teachers as counting gain godliness, and doing all things for filthy lucre, Phil. iii. 19. 1 Tim. vi. 5. 2 Tim. iii. 2. Tit. i. 11. Others therefore interpret the words thus: This I will do, that I may cut off occasion of glory from them who seek occasion, that they might be found even as us: in which thing they would glory; but now they cannot do it, because they are known to receive of you.

[9] Ver. 20. Εἴ τις λαμβάνει.] Supple, ἀφ' ὑμῶν, if a man take away what is yours; for this word is used, saith Phavorinus, when we take that which the owner is not willing to part with. So the word signifies, in Christ's exhortation to the church of Philadelphia, to retain what she had, ἵνα μηδεὶς λάβῃ τὸν στέφανόν σου, that none may take away thy crown; (Rev. iii. 11.) and when it was given to the angel, λαβεῖν τὴν εἰρήνην ἀπὸ γῆς, to take away peace from the earth: so P. Gregory * interprets these words, Si quis rapit, accipere enim aliquando dicimus auferre: so the Hebrew word lakac is rendered by the Septuagint, ἀπολαμβάνω, ἀποφέρω, αἴρω, ἀφαιρέω. Others render the words thus: If a man makes a gain of you: so Budæus saith, λαμβάνειν is κερδαίνειν, to gain: so 2 Cor. xii. 16. δόλῳ ὑμᾶς ἔλαβον, did I take you by guile? is interpreted by ἐπλεονέκτησα ὑμᾶς, did I make a gain of you? ver. 17, 18. And for this sense our Gataker pleads in his Adversaria, giving many instances where not only λῆμμα and λήψις, nouns derived from λαμβάνειν, but also where τὸ λαβεῖν bears this sense. (Adversar. cap. 27. p. 293.)

[10] Εἴ τίς ἐπαίρεται, If a man exalt himself.] The Jews had a very high opinion of themselves, as being the seed of Abraham, and so of noble birth; (see note on 1 Cor. i. 26.) the people of God, and so holy and beloved of him; his first-born and only-begotten, for whom the world was made, 2 Esd. vi. 59, 60. Hence in their prayers to God they say, Populus tuus sumus fœderati tui, progenies Abrahami, amici tui, cui sacramento fidem tuam obstrinxisti in monte Moriæ, semen Isaachi dilecti tui, qui ligatus fuit super altari tuo, cœtus Jacobi filii tui, primogeniti tui, &c. And they had as mean and despicable thoughts of all other men, whom therefore they insulted over, calling them the people of the earth, the profane; † yea, likening them to dogs (see note on Phil. iii. 2.) and spittle: (2 Esd. vi. 56, 57.) and from this opinion, that the world was made for them, (see note on 1 Cor. iii. 22.) they might easily conclude, that it was lawful for them to take it away from others, as being usurpers of it. Hence Buxtorf ‡ cites this passage from the Talmud, that all the possessions of the gentiles are as common; he that first seizes on them is lord of them.

[11] Ver. 21. Ὡς ὅτι ἡμεῖς ἠσθενήσαμεν, As if we were weak.] To be weak, in this Epistle, chap. xiii. is to be unable to exercise the apostolical rod, or the power that Christ had given them to inflict censures and diseases on the refractory, ver. 3, 4. 9. Τολμᾷν, to be bold, is to exercise these censures on the disobedient, x. 2. where the apostle argues for this boldness, ver. 7. as here, Are they Christ's ministers? so are we; and adds, as here, ver. 8. that he could glory of the power Christ had given him for edification, and not for destruction. So that the import of these words seems to be this: "You suffer patiently from these false prophets, as if their power over you was to be dreaded, (though indeed there was nothing in it besides big words, 1 Cor. iv. 19. see note on v. 3.) but we to be despised as weak, and having no power you need to dread; whereas we shall be as bold as they, if you do not reform, as being much more the ministers of Christ, and having suffered more, to shew our fidelity to him, and therefore having greater reason to expect his powerful assistance than they have."

[12] Ver. 22. Ἑβραῖοί εἰσι; Ἰσραηλῖταί εἰσι; Are they Hebrews? Are they Israelites?] Here is a certain indication that these false apostles and deceitful workers were not originally Samaritans, as Simon Magus, Dositheus, and their followers were, but of the Jewish extract. Secondly, That they were Jews converted to, and still owning and preaching up, the faith of Christ, as is evident from the words following; Are they ministers of Christ? so am I; as also from x. 7. It therefore seems that they must be of the sect of Cerinthus,* that great stickler against St. Paul for the necessity of circumcising the gentiles, and for their observation of the law of Moses; or the Nazarenes, or Ebionites: for these are not the names of persons who were the authors of any sects; but of the Jews,† which believed in Jesus, and yet were zealous observers of the law of Moses. Now these Jews, before they believed, were of two sorts; such as admitted other nations to live quietly among them, and even to embrace their religion without circumcision; and such as by no means would permit them so to do. Thus when Izates, the son of Helen queen of Adiabene, embraced the Jewish religion, Ananias‡ declared he might do it without circumcision; but Eleazer§ maintained that it was ἀσέβεια, great impiety to remain uncircumcised. And when two eminent persons of Trachonitis fled to Josephus, the zealots‖ among the Jews were urgent for their circumcision, if they would abide with them; but Josephus persuaded the multitude against it. And this controversy continued after they embraced Christianity, some allowing them to embrace Christianity without submitting to circumcision and the Jewish law; others contending, that without circumcision and the observance of the law they could not be saved. And these were the false apostles which troubled the churches of Corinth, Galatia, Philippi, and were great enemies to St. Paul, who taught the contrary. So Epiphanius informs us of the Cerinthians,¶ adding also of the Nazarenes, that they in all things accord with the doctrines of the Cerinthians. And certain it is, that such persons went from Judea, and gave great disturbance to all Christian churches, especially to those which had been planted by St. Paul; for, in the First Epistle to Timothy, and that to Titus, we have mention of those of the circumcision, who were vain talkers and deceivers, Tit. i. 10, 11. 1 Tim. i. 4. 6. vi. 4, 5. (See Gal. iv. 9, 10. vi. 12, 13. Phil. iii. 2. Colos. ii. 26, 27.)

[13] Ver. 23.] Note here, that the apostle proves the truth of his ministry and apostleship not, as elsewhere, from the miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost which accompanied his preaching, but from his sufferings, as being the things these false apostles could not pretend to, (Gal. v. 11. vi. 12.) and so could not glory that they were like unto him in them, (ver. 13.)

[14] Ver. 24. Παρὰ μίαν, Save one.] The law assigned forty stripes to them that were worthy to be beaten, but forbade them to exceed that number, Deut. xxv. 3. But it being their custom to beat them with a whip that had three cords, and so every stroke with it going for three, they could only give them thirty-nine, or forty-two, which would have exceeded the number appointed by the law; and therefore Josephus says,* He that did contrary to the law received, by a public whip, forty stripes save one.

[15] Ver. 25. Ἐν τῷ βυθῷ, In the deep.] This cannot be well understood of the prison at Cyzicum; for we never read that St. Paul preached there; nor of the shipwreck mentioned Acts xxvii. for that happened after the writing of this Epistle; but probably of some of the other shipwrecks mentioned here, in which he might be so long tossed to and fro in the sea, upon some broken piece of a ship, before he got to land, as Josephus† saith he was. Theodoret saith he was put into a prison so called at Lystra; but of this we read nothing in the Acts of the Apostles, chap. xiv. where St. Luke gives an account of his treatment there.

[16] Ver. 33. Ἐξέφυγον.] Of such a flight as only is designed to preserve us still in a capacity of preaching the gospel, especially where our charge is not any settled church, but the church in general, or, as St. Paul's was, the whole gentile world, St. Austin‡ speaks well thus, Quicunque isto modo fugit, ut ecclesiæ necessarium ministerium, eo fugiente, non desit, facit quod Dominus præcepit, sive permisit; qui autem sic fugit, ut gregi Christi ea, quibus spiritualiter vivit, alimenta subtrahantur: mercenarius ille est, qui vidit lupum venientem et fugit, quoniam non est ei cura de ovibus.

CHAP. XII.

1. [1] IT is not expedient for me doubtless to glory: (but since it may be so to you) I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord.

2. I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth); (I say, I knew) such a one caught up to the third heaven (the habitation of the blessed angels, and of the majesty of God).

3. And (again) I knew such a man (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth);

4. How that he was (at another time) [2] caught up into paradise, and (there) heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful (or possible) for a man to utter.

5. Of such a one (thus rapt out of himself) will I glory: yet (or but) of myself (as I appear to you in my own person) I will not glory (willingly), but in mine infirmities.

6. (Not that I really esteem it a folly so to do, though in compliance with you I do style it foolishness, 2 Cor. xi. 1. 16, 17. xii. 11.) for though I should desire to glory (of these things), I shall not be a fool; for I will (shall only) say the truth: but now I forbear (even to speak of that), lest any man should think of me above that which he sees me to be, or heareth of me (above what my constant words and actions testify of me).

7. And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations (vouchsafed to me), there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, [3] the messenger of Satan, to buffet me (or, that a messenger of Satan might buffet me), lest I should be exalted above measure.

8. For this thing [4] I besought the Lord (Christ, ver. 9.) thrice, that it might depart from me (i. e. that I might be delivered from this thorn in my flesh).

9. And he said unto me, My grace (or favour) is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect (and shewed more illustriously) in (this thy) weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may (more conspicuously appear to) rest upon me.

10. Therefore I take pleasure in (these) infirmities (of the flesh), in (the) reproaches (I suffer upon that account), in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake: for when I am (thus) weak (in myself), then am I strong (in the power of Christ. This latter clause is in all the Greek scholiasts).

11. I am become (as) a fool in glorying (thus; but) ye have compelled me (to it): for I ought (rather) to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing (of myself; but through the grace of God I am what I am, 1 Cor. xv. 10.)

12. Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you (by me) in all patience, in signs and wonders, and (in) mighty deeds. (See the note on Heb. ii. 4.)

13. For what is it wherein you were inferior to other churches, except (it were in this) that I myself was not burdensome to you? forgive me this wrong.

14. Behold, the third [5] time I am ready to come to you; and I will (still continue) not (to) be burdensome to you: for I seek not yours, but you: [6] for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children.

15. And I (like a good spiritual father) will very gladly spend (my spiritual treasures on you) and be spent (myself) for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved.

16. But be it so, I did not burden you (myself): nevertheless (it may be suggested by some, that) being crafty, I caught you with guile (getting much from you by the means of others).

17. (I ask, therefore,) did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent to you?

18. I desired Titus (to go to you), and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the same spirit? walked we not in the same steps?

19. Again, think you that we excuse ourselves unto you (by specious pretences, when we say that we deferred our coming, that we might spare you and be helpers of your joy? 2 Cor. ii. 23, 24.) we speak (as) before God in Christ (calling him again to record that we use no such arts); but we do all things, dearly beloved (as we did that), for your edifying.

20. (And too much reason had we so to do:) for (yet) I fear, lest, when I come, I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found unto you (by inflicting necessary censures and punishments upon you) such as you would not: lest there be debates, envying, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults (the usual, and almost necessary, consequences of schisms and factions in a church):

21. And lest, when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I shall (find reason to) bewail

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XII.

[1] Ver. 1. ΚΑΥΧΑΣΘΑΙ δὴ οὐ συμφέρει μοι.] All the Greek scholiasts own our reading of these words, which may from the Greek be rendered, Surely it profiteth (or it advantageth) not me to glory, for I shall come to visions; and then the sense may be supplied thus; But it may be so to you, for I shall come to visions and revelations of the Lord, in which I shall give such an evidence of the favour of Christ to me, such a testimony of my mission from heaven, as none of these false apostles or deceitful workers can pretend to.

Καυχᾶσθαι δε οὐ συμφέρει μοι, It becomes not me to glory.] St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, all agree in this reading, making no mention of the other, εἰ καυχᾶσθαι δεῖ, which therefore is to be rejected.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἁρπαγέντα.] Here (1.) it is inquired, Whether St. Paul was either, as to soul only, or as to soul and body jointly, rapt into heaven, or paradise, as the Spirit ἥρπασε, caught up Philip, Acts viii. 39. or whether he had only a vision of these things on earth, as the Spirit took up Ezekiel in a vision, Ezek. xi. 24. and as St. John was carried away into the wilderness? I incline to the opinion that this was a real rapture, as being most agreeable (1.) to the words ἡρπάγη ἕως, he was snatched up as far as to the third heaven, and ἡρπάγη εἰς παράδεισον, he was snatched up into paradise; for these words do not well agree to a vision, or to an ecstacy. As for the seeming raptures of Ezekiel and St. John, the text plainly informs us, that they were not real, by saying, The Spirit took me up, and brought me in a vision by the Spirit of God into Chaldea, Ezek. xi. 24. And again, The hand of the Lord was upon me, and carried me out in the Spirit of the Lord, and sat me down in the midst of the valley that was full of bones, xxxvii. 1. And of St. John, He carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness, Rev. xvii. 3. and xxi. 10. He carried me in the spirit to a great and high mountain. In these two instances all is expressly said to be done ἐν πνεύματι, in the spirit; but nothing of this nature is intimated in St. Paul's rapture. If you say he owns that this was done ἐν ὁπτασίᾳ, in a vision; I answer, he seems not to say so, but only that in this rapture he had a vision of the Lord. (2.) He says, he cannot tell whether he was then in the body, or out of the body; whereas, in all imaginary visions, the soul continues in the body. (3.) He adds, that he heard there unspeakable words; which intimates that he was really in paradise.

Quest. 2. A second inquiry is, Whether St. Paul here speaks of one vision or rapture only, or of more? I answer, The opinion of all the ancients seems to have been this, that he was rapt at several times into several places, and, consequently, that he speaks of more raptures than one. Irenæus * saith, that he was caught up into the third heaven, and again was carried into paradise. So also say Tertullian and Pseud-Ambrosius.* Epiphanius† speaks thus: Who can hear the opinion of Origen, which placed paradise in the third heaven? And this appears highly probable, 1. from these words, I will proceed to visions and revelations of the Lord; which intimates that he would speak of more than one: and from ver. 7. Lest he should be exalted ὑπερβολῇ τῶν ἀποκαλύψεων with this multitude of revelations. 2. Methodius of old did well infer this from the repetition of those words, Whether in the body, &c. for such a repetition must have been needless concerning one and the same vision. For hence (saith he‡) he intimates that he had seen two great visions, being twice assumed, first into the third heaven, and then into paradise. Hence therefore it doth not follow, that paradise is in the third heaven, as later writers have hence gathered against the opinion of all the ancient Christians: and therefore Epiphanius§ answers to this text produced by Origen, by saying, he was rapt up into the third heaven, and after adding into paradise, he shews heaven to be in one place, and paradise in another. Though therefore the third heaven here, according to the language and distinction of the Jews, doth signify the angelic heaven, it doth not follow hence, that paradise, into which the apostle was caught up at another time, and in another vision, must signify the third heaven.

3. Hence we may strongly argue for the distinction of the soul from the body, and its capacity to receive and understand celestial things in separation from the body; for if the soul be not distinguished from the body, nor is capable of any vision or revelation when out of the body, there remains no foundation for the apostle's doubt, whether he had these visions in the body, or out of the body, there being a necessity, upon that supposition, to have them in the body, or not at all.

[3] Ver. 7. Ἄγγελος Σατᾶν.] They who interpret this messenger of Satan, and thorn in the flesh, of the motions of concupiscence, and the suggestions of lust arising in Paul, are guilty of a great mistake: for this thorn in the flesh was given him of God, who raiseth in us no impure lustings, (James i. 13—15.) and never cures one sin by another; nor would St. Paul have wished that all men should have been as he, if he had felt these burnings, nor would he have refused that remedy against them he prescribed to others, 1 Cor. vii. 7. 9. nor could he have gloried, much less took pleasure, in these infirmities, as here, ver. 9, 10. he doth in this thorn in the flesh. In a word, by confessing such impure motions lodged in his breast, he would not have defended his reputation against his adversaries, but rather have given them fresh occasion to reproach him, and would have rendered his threats against the unclean, xii. 21. less prevalent. Let it be then observed,

1. That this thorn in the flesh was surely some infirmity in the flesh or body of St. Paul. So doth St. Paul himself inform us, by saying, τὸν πειρασμόν μου τὸν ἐν τῇ σαρκί μου, οὐκ ἐξουδενήσετε, οὐδὲ ἐξεπτύσατε, you did not count me as nothing, nor spit upon me, because of my temptation, which was in my flesh, Gal. iv. 14. but received me (notwithstanding) as an angel or messenger of God. Whence two things are observable: (1.) that this thorn, or this temptation, was in the flesh, or in his body: and (2.) that it was such as rendered him in his preaching obnoxious to great contempt, and made him despicable in the eyes of others.

2. It is highly probable that this infirmity in the flesh happened to him after these visions and revelations of which he here speaks; for he saith, it was sent to, or befel him, that he might not be exalted through the multitude of his revelations; and therefore must be given him after he had that temptation they afforded to exalt himself.

3. It is certain that it was some infirmity of the flesh which naturally tended to obstruct the efficacy of his preaching, and rendered his ministry less grateful and acceptable to others, and made him subject to reproach and to contempt in the discharge of this his function. This is extremely evident from the place cited from Gal. iv. 14. where, saith Theodoret, καίτοι πολλὴν ἔφερον ἐπὶ τοῦ σώματος ἀτιμίαν, though I brought with me great ignominy in my body, you did not reject me; and also from Christ's answer to him, That his power was perfected in St. Paul's weakness, i. e. The greater is thy infirmity in preaching the gospel, the greater is my power in rendering it efficacious when preached by one subject to so great infirmity.

4. It is also certain, that this was objected by the Corinthians and the false apostles, to the disparagement of St. Paul, and rendered him contemptible in their eyes, that he was ἰδιώτης τῷ λόγῳ, rude in speech, 2 Cor. x. 10. (which, as I have observed upon that place, cannot refer to his want of eloquence, that being as much wanting in his Epistles, which they allowed to be powerful and weighty, as in his sermons to them); that in presence he was base among them, ver. 1. that the presence of his body was weak and mean, καὶ ὁ λόγος ἐξουθενημένος, his speech such as rendered him contemptible, where the apostle useth that very word which he had applied to the infirmity of his flesh, Gal. iv. 14.

5. It cannot be denied, but that an ἰσχνοφωνία, a stammering in speech, or a squeaking shrillness in the voice, joined with a low deformed stature, does naturally tend to render a man contemptible in his preaching; and therefore Moses declines the message God sent him upon to Pharaoh, because he was slow of speech, and of a stammering tongue, Exod. iv. 10. ἰσχνόφωνος, καὶ βραδύγλωσσος.

6. These words, a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan, being here put by way of apposition, must signify the same thing; and so he must be buffeted by Satan, when, by these false apostles and ministers of Satan, (2 Cor. xi. 15.) he was contemned, and made the subject of their scorn and laughter, for this infirmity in his speech. But it is observable, that these words may be rendered thus: There was given me a thorn in the flesh, Ἄγγελος Σατᾶν ἵνα με κολαφίζῃ, that the angel of Satan might buffet me. Since then he calls the false apostles ministers of Satan, it is not to be wondered that he here styles them, or the chief of them, who thus reviled and contemned him for this infirmity, and therefore laboured to take off the affections of the Corinthians from him, an angel of Satan buffeting him. (See Œcumenius on the place.)

[4] Ver. 8. Παρεκάλεσα, I besought the Lord.] Here (saith Schlictingius) is an instance of prayer directed to Christ; ergo, say I, here is an instance of his Divinity: prayer made to Christ by all Christians, in all times and places, and for all things, being an evidence of his omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence.

Note also, that though this thorn in the flesh was not removed upon the prayer of the apostle, yet was that granted for which he desired that it might be removed, viz. that he should preach the gospel more effectually, and to the honour of his Lord; and therefore he not only rests satisfied under this infirmity, but even glories in it on this account, that it tended to demonstrate the power of Christ residing in him. Thus doth God truly answer our requests, when he gives not what we would, but what he sees to be more for his glory and our good.

[5] Ver. 14. Τρίτον, The third time.] Most interpreters say, that St. Paul had made two resolutions before to come to them; for proof of which they cite, 1 Cor. xvi. 5. 2 Cor. i. 16. but both the texts seem plainly to refer to one and the same resolution, and the last to be only an apology for nonperformance of the first. His meaning therefore may be this; I have once actually been with you: I was ready once more to come, though your disorders unreformed hindered the performing that intended journey (2 Cor. i. 23.) and I am now ready the third time.

[6] For the children ought not to lay up for the fathers, but, &c.] i. e. If fathers of the flesh, they ought to lay up for them temporals; if spiritual fathers, as St. Paul was, (1 Cor. iv. 15.) to provide spirituals for them, good instructions, and advice for the welfare of their souls.

[7] Ver. 21. Μετανοησάντων.] Hence it is evident, against Novatian, that the Christian dispensation admits sinners to repentance, though they have, after baptism, committed great offences, and lapsed into the sins of the flesh, mentioned Gal. v. 19—21.

CHAP. XIII.

1. [1] THIS is the third time I am coming to you. [2] In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established.

2. I told you before, (in my First Epistle, iv. 19—21. being then absent in body, but present in spirit, v. 3.) and (I still continue in my resolution) foretell (-ing) you, as if I were present, the second time (or, I foretell you as present in spirit the second time); and being absent (in body) I now write to them which heretofore have sinned, (and have not repented, xii. 21.) and to all others (who shall fall into the like sins), that, if I come again (which I now am fully resolved upon) I will not spare (you):

3. Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in (and by) me, (even that Christ) who to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty [3] in (and among) you (you shall find it in the exerting the power he hath given us to chastise such offenders).

4. For though he was crucified through (the) weakness (of that human nature which he took upon him, and in that appeared to others as weak), yet he liveth (and discovers efficaciously that he doth so) by the power of God (so gloriously attending the invocation of his name, and faith in him). [4] For we also (Gr. and so we also) are (as yet, in your apprehensions,) weak in him, but we shall (appear to) live with him by the power of God (exerting itself by us) towards you.

5. (And for the farther evidence that Christ preached by me hath not been weak, but mighty towards you,) examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not (of) your own selves (by the miracles done among you, and the variety of gifts conferred upon you), how that Jesus [5] Christ is in (among) you, [6] except ye be reprobates (i. e. disapproved by God, and so he hath withdrawn these gifts from you)?

6. But (however it may be with you) I trust that you shall know we are not reprobates (i. e. not disapproved of, but owned by God and Christ).

7. Now I pray to God that ye do no evil (which may force us to exercise and shew our power among you, as desiring) not that we should appear approved (by our power in punishing your offences), but (rather) that you should do that which is honest, though we be (in shew) [7] as reprobates (i. e. as destitute of the power of Christ in your eyes).

8. (And then you will be secure from our chastisements;) for we can do nothing against the truth, but (only) for the truth (having our power given for edification only, and not for destruction, ver. 10.

9. Nor have we any desire to use our power thus;) for we are (rather) glad, when we are weak (as having no occasion to manifest our power), and ye are strong (in faith and good works): and this also we wish, even your perfection (in them.

10. And) therefore I write these things being absent (to warn and reform you), lest being present I should (be constrained to) use sharpness (towards the unreformed among you), according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction.

11. Finally, brethren, farewel. Be perfect (-ly knit together), be of good comfort (under all calamities), be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you.

12. Greet one another with [8] a holy kiss.

13. All the saints (here) salute you.

14. [9] The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God (the Father), and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIII.

[1] Ver. 1. ΤΡΙ'ΤΟΝ τοῦτο, This is the third time.] Of his coming the third time, see note on xii. 14. These witnesses, saith Dr. Lightfoot, were Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, sent to assure them of his coming: say others, his own reiterated testimony to them by letters, that if these admonitions did not prevail on them who had sinned to reform, he would not spare them.

[2] In the mouth of two or three witnesses.] Though these words seem to be cited from Deut. xix. 15. rather than from Matt. xviii. 16. it being rare to find this apostle citing any thing from the New Testament without calling it an ordinance of the Lord; yet it is probable, that the apostle here alludes to the practice there prescribed for the reclaiming of offenders; and then his First Epistle being written with this introduction, Paul an apostle, and Sosthenes; his Second thus, Paul, and Timotheus; may pass for two or three witnesses; and his presence the third time in person, to exercise his censures on these offenders before the body of the church, may bear a fair resemblance to the prescription relating to the church.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἐν ὑμῖν, Among you.] Christ shewed his power among them, by enabling St. Paul to preach the gospel to them, in demonstration of the Spirit and power, so efficaciously, as to convert them to the faith, 1 Cor. ii. 4.; in that variety of gifts conferred on them, together with the gospel, by which their testimony of Christ was confirmed, 1 Cor. i. 6.; by his power, conspicuous in seconding St. Paul's delivery of the incestuous person up to Satan, 1 Cor. v. 4. 5.; by the chastisements they suffered for communicating in the Lord's supper unworthily.

[4] Ver. 4. Καὶ γὰρ καὶ, And so we also.] These particles signify atque ita, even so and so, and in like manner; and accordingly are rendered by Pasor, sic et nos, as in this paraphrase. Again, it is evident from Scripture, that though Christ appeared to the world weak, and unable to escape his sufferings, by permitting himself to be taken, and carried bound before the high-priest and Pilate, and at last to be lifted up upon the cross, and there die, yet was he only in appearance then weak; for he permitted not himself to be taken, till he had with a word struck them to the ground who came to apprehend him, (John xviii. 6.) and had declared, that he was able to deliver himself out of their hands. (Matt. xxvi. 53.) Even so, saith the apostle, we seem weak to you Corinthians, because we do not exercise that power among you which God hath given us, 2 Cor. x. 10. xi. 21. and here, ver. 9. but we shall shew ourselves to live by the power of God exercised upon the offenders in your church.

[5] Ver. 5. Ὅτι Χριστὸς ἐν ὑμῖν ἐστιν, That Christ is in you;] i. e. With, or among, you: so σὺ ἐν ἡμῖν εἶ Κύριε, thou, Lord, art with us, Jer. xiv. 9. οὐχὶ Κύριος ἐν ἡμῖν; is not the Lord among us? see Gen. xxiii. 6. Psal. cxxiv. 1. The words seem to allude to those spoken by the tempting, contumacious Israelites, who, after all the signs and wonders God had shewed to them, remained still doubtful of his presence with them, inquiring, εἰ Κύριος ἐν ἡμῖν; is the Lord among us, or not? Exod. xvii. 7. So saith the apostle; Seeing, after all the miracles done among you, and the miraculous gifts received by you, you still seek a proof of Christ speaking in or by me, ask your own selves: know ye not by the gifts exercised among you, except ye be rejected of God, that his Spirit, conveyed by my ministry, is still among you? But then let it be noted here, that this place speaks not of their being in Christ, but of Christ's being in them; not of his being in them, by their faith in him, but his miraculous presence with them; not of his being in any private person, but in the church of Corinth in general.

[6] Εἰ μή τι ἀδόκιμοί ἐστε, If ye be not reprobates.] i. e. Christians in name only, and not in deeds, so Grotius; stupid and hardened, Dr. Hammond; wicked and unfit for the faith, Vorstius; unworthy of the name of Christians, Dickson; deprived of faith, light, grace, and knowledge, Menochius; unless you by your crimes have cast off Christ, Calvin.

[7] Ver. 7. Ὡς ἀδόκιμοι, As reprobates.] It is to be observed, that the word ἀδόκιμος, which we render reprobate, hath no relation in Scripture to any decree of God, either absolutely excluding men from a capacity of salvation, or doing it conditionally, on the account of the sin of Adam; but only doth denote such men as have made themselves unworthy, by the corruption of their faith or manners, to be approved and owned by God. Thus they who, when they knew God, did not glorify him as God, neither were thankful, but changed the truth of God into a lie, and wor- shipped the creature more than the Creator, and liked not to retain God in their hearts, (Rom. i. 21—28.) are the men given up by God, εἰς νοῦν ἀδόκιμον, to a reprobate mind; which prompted them to do those things God could not approve of, but abhor: and they who resisted the truth through the corruption of their minds, are styled ἀδόκιμοι περὶ τὴν πίστιν, i. e. reprobates concerning the faith, 2 Tim. iii. 8. i. e. men whose faith cannot be owned or approved of. They also are in Scripture, as to their manners, styled reprobates, whose mind and conscience is defiled; so that though in word they profess to know God, yet in works they deny him, being abominable, disobedient, and to every good work, ἀδόκιμοι, reprobate; i. e. void, not of judgment only to discern, but of affection to approve of it. Thus, that earth is styled ἀδόκιμος, reprobate, or rejected, which, after all the showers which fall upon it, brings forth only thorns and briers, Heb. vi. 8. and that silver, ἀργύριον ἀδόκιμον, reprobate silver, which, being false stamped, or coined, will not be received, but rejected: (Prov. xxv. 4. Isa. i. 22.) and in this sense St. Paul saith, he kept under his body, lest whilst he preached to others, he himself should be, ἀδόκιμος, disowned and rejected by God. (1 Cor. ix. 27.)

And though ἀδόκιμοι here seems to signify one that cannot give a proof of his power, as when it relates to the apostle, ver. 6, 7. yet seeing the apostle, pretending that the Lord had given him this power, must be ἀδόκιμος, one fit to be rejected as a false pretender if he had it not: and though, when it relates to the Corinthians, ver. 5. it signifies persons who could not give a proof that they belonged to Christ, or had his presence with them; yet, seeing the want of this proof shewed they were to be rejected as persons not approved by Christ, this differs not much from the sense assigned of that word.

[8] Ver. 12. Ἐν ἁγίῳ φιλήματι, With a holy kiss.] As brethren: for this seems to be the Jews' osculum propinquitatis, of which see Buxtorf's Lexicon, p. 1404, 1405.

[9] Ver. 14.] Note, that here plainly, as in the form of baptism, Matt. xxviii. 19. we have the names of the sacred Trinity; and the Father and Son in both places being mentioned as distinct persons, we have no reason to doubt of the personality of the Holy Ghost thus mentioned with them.

APPENDIX

TO CHAP. VI.

MONSIEUR Le Clerc hath observed in his Ars Critica, par. i. cap. 8. p. 110. that since the time of St. Austin, scarce any word hath been used more frequently in speaking concerning the conversion of a sinner, than is that of grace; and yet if you ask them that use it what they mean by it, they can give you no clear answer: so that a Jesuit said, not unpleasantly, That it was nothing but a nescio quid, and that the grace of God in Scripture doth always signify not any secret afflatus, but his mercy and his kindness to us. Now that I may not seem, with his witty Jesuit, to ridicule, or with the Pelagians to deny, that grace, because my note on this chapter partly accordeth with his critics, I shall here briefly shew two things:

1. That it seems necessary to assert, that God vouchsafes to men not only the outward dispensations of his word to be the ordinary means of their conversion and sanctification, but also some assistances and operations of the Holy Spirit.

2. I shall endeavour to shew, that these assistances may be so explained, as to be no more unintelligible than are all the influences of God upon the soul, or the temptations of the evil spirit.

First, That it is necessary to assert, that God vouchsafes to men some inward operations or assistances of his Holy Spirit, to incline them to what is good, convert and sanctify them. For,

1. Why else is it expressly said, that God works in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure, (Phil. ii. 13.) and doth within us what is acceptable in his sight? (Heb. xiii. 21.) for sure he cannot properly be said ἐνεργεῖν, καὶ ποιεῖν ἐν ἡμῖν, to act and work within us, who does and worketh nothing in us. Yea, how doth the word of God itself, when heard or read, work on us, but by making impressions on our minds? And shall that be denied to God himself which we allow to his word? Or, shall he not be believed, when he saith, he doth work in us both to will and to do? he doth in us what is acceptable in his sight?

Again; Does it not seem unreasonable to deny that influence to God and the good Spirit, to excite men to goodness, which generally is and must, according to the Scripture, be allowed to the evil spirit tempting men to wickedness? Now, though this evil spirit cannot lay us under a necessity of doing wickedly, yet he is frequently in Scripture represented as a tempter to sin; which he can only be mediately, by raising some ideas in our brain, which do excite, dispose, and move us, as our own thoughts or inward sentiments at other times were wont to do, to what is evil. He also is in Scripture styled that spirit which ἐνεργεῖ, works inwardly in the children of disobedience, Eph. ii. 2. and leads them captive εἰς τὸ ἐκείνου θέλημα, to do his will, 2 Tim. ii. 26. which words seem plainly to import some inward energy of Satan, to excite them to this disobedience to the will of God, and this compliance with his own will: since then stronger is he that is in us, than he that is in the world, (1 John iv. 4.) i. e. that good Spirit which dwells in pious men, is more powerful in them than Satan is in wicked men, we must allow this good Spirit ἐνεργεῖν, to work in the children of obedience, as Satan is allowed to work in his own children.

Moreover, the evil spirit is represented as a lying spirit in the mouth of Ahab's prophets, 1 Kings xxi. 21. he moved David to number the people, 1 Chron. xxi. 1. he entered into Judas, Luke xxii. 3. he filled the heart of Ananias to lie to the Holy Ghost, Acts v. 3. All which expressions can never be accounted for, without allowing him some power to work upon the spirits of these persons, so as to raise within them some such ideas as would excite and stir them up to the performance of those actions: nor can we otherwise give any rational account of the snares, methods, wiles, and devices of Satan, mentioned 2 Cor. ii. 11. Eph. vi. 11. or tell how he comes and takes away the word out of the heart, Luke viii. 12. or how he takes advantage over us when we are overwhelmed with grief, 2 Cor. ii. 10.

When, therefore, on the other hand, God is said to put his fear and his law in our hearts, Jer. xxxii. 40. Heb. viii. 10. and his spirit within us, Ezek. xxxvi. 27. to create in us a clean heart, and renew in us a right spirit, ibid. to give us a new heart, Ezek. xi. 19. to circumcise and to convert the heart, Deut. xxx. 6. Jer. xxxi. 18. if he by his good Spirit raiseth no good motions or ideas in us, which may dispose us to his fear, and by attention to them may convert and cleanse our hearts; if he vouchsafes unto us no inward illuminations, by attending to which we may discern the wondrous things of this law, what can these words or metaphors import? or why is his Spirit put within us if he hath nothing to do there? Yea, why are we said to be strengthened with might through the Spirit in the inward man to do his will? Eph. iii. 16. to be enabled, through the Spirit, to mortify the deeds of the flesh? Rom. viii. 13. Why is the Spirit said to help our infirmities, ver. 26. to purify our hearts, 1 Pet. i. 22. to be unto us a Spirit of sanctification, 1 Cor. vi. 11. the Comforter, the Spirit of power, love, and of a sound mind? 2 Tim. i. 7. For how is it possible he should be all or any of these things to us, or should do all or any of these things for us, by doing nothing in us? And seeing consolation ariseth only from the inward testimony of the conscience; seeing sanctification consists in the renewing of the inward man, and hath the soul for its subject; seeing the heart is purified by an inward change and temper, which renders it averse from sin, and sets the affections, desires, and inclinations of the soul against it; seeing the deeds of the flesh are only mortified by such a renovation of the mind as makes us to discern the pernicious effects and dreadful consequences of living still according to our fleshly appetites, and so begetteth a dread and hatred of them, a resolution to forsake them, a vehement desire to be freed from them, a sincere endeavour to resist the motions of the flesh, and a care that we do not for the future yield obedience to it in the lustings of it, if there be no renovation wrought in us by the Spirit, no testimony of him with our spirits, that we are the sons of God, how can a man conceive that all this should be done by the Spirit without any energy in the mind and the affections of a man, and by that, consequently, on the will?

Moreover, if the Holy Spirit hath no hand in producing and carrying on the new life, why is he styled Πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν, a quickening, or life-giving, Spirit? Seeing all vital operations issue from a spirit acting in us, why are we said to live in the Spirit, Gal. v. 16. and to walk in the Spirit, Rom. viii. 14. and ἄγεσθαι, to be led, or conducted, by the Spirit of God? For as in natural and moral actions we cannot be said to live or walk without an inward principle of life and motion, or to be led or guided in those actions but by the light of reason; so neither can we properly be said to live and walk in the Spirit, or to be guided by him, if he imparts no inward light to guide us in the ways of piety, no inward motions to excite us to walk in them, no inward strength or vital efficacy for the performance of them. And were it otherwise, why are all those inward habits and dispositions which adorn the soul, and make it meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, styled the fruits, not of the preaching of the word, or of our own consideration, but of the Holy Spirit? For how are they his fruits, if he doth nothing to produce them? Why are they still ascribed, according to his doctrine, never to that which only doth, but to that only which doth not produce them?

To say these things and these expressions concern only the times in which the extraordinary gifts and operations of the Holy Spirit were vouchsafed, is to make future ages, since the ceasing of these gifts, despair of being quickened, sanctified, or comforted, or even enabled to purify the heart, or to mortify the deeds of the flesh, to live or walk in the Spirit; and consequently to despair of being now the sons of God, united to Christ Jesus, or having any of the fruits of the Spirit wrought within them. And were it only then that no man could be regenerate or born again without water and the Holy Ghost, by what are we now regenerated? why are we now baptized? or why is baptism administered still in the name of the Holy Ghost?

In fine, it seems not possible, according to this hypothesis, to explain how, or to what end, the Holy Spirit is so often said to dwell, or to abide within us; how we are made a habitation of God through the Spirit; how we are made the temples of God through the Holy Ghost which is in us, or united to Christ by the Spirit, or to what end the Holy Ghost thus dwells or takes up his abode in them, in whom he acteth nothing, or rests upon those Christian sufferers whom he doth not inspire with inward courage: and yet this abode of the good Spirit with us, is represented not only as the highest privilege, but as the inestimable advantage of the Christian. By this Christ doth encourage his disciples to demonstrate their love to him by keeping his commandments, that then the Father will love them, and we (saith he) will take up our abode with him, John xiv. 23. By this, saith the apostle, God becomes our God, and we his people; he our Father, we his sons and daughters, 2 Cor. vi. 16. and from our union by this Spirit to our head Christ Jesus, such an ἐνέργεια, or inward working, is said to be diffused through every part of his mystical body, as causeth the whole body to increase, and edify itself in love, Eph. iv. 16. Colos. ii. 19. Now what account can be offered of these things, without allowing some inward operations of the Holy Spirit, as the consequence of this spiritual union, and this inhabitation of the Holy Spirit in us? yea, who can tell what is the advantage of these promises, I will put my Spirit in you, or pour him upon you, Prov. i. 23. Jer. xxxvi. 27. xxxvii. 14. Zech. xii. 10. John vii. 37, 38. if we receive no influx from him thus put into our hearts? what, lastly, is it for the Holy Spirit to depart, or to be taken from us? or, what can be the dreadful misery and woe denounced upon us when he doth so? for if he did nothing in us, whilst he continued to be with us, what can we lose by his departure? or why did David so importunately beg God would not take his Holy Spirit from him? Psal. li. 12.

To say here the Holy Spirit only dwelt in Christians, whilst the extraordinary gifts and afflatus of the Holy Spirit were continued to the church, and they lay under persecution from the heathen emperors, is not only to contradict the tenor of the Scriptures, which declare that all Christ's living members are thus united by the Spirit to their Head, (1 Cor. xii. 13.) and that if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, dwelling in him, he is none of his; (Rom. viii. 9.) he cannot be the son of God, for as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God; (ver. 14.) he hath no right to call God Father, (ver. 15.) no interest in the adoption, and in the inheritance of sons; (ver. 17.) but it is also to enervate the virtue of the promises of Christ, and the consolation of Christians of all future ages under their sufferings for the sake of Christ; yea, it is in effect to make the dispensation of the gospel cease, the difference betwixt that and the law being by the apostle placed in this, that the one is the ministration of the letter only, the other also of the Spirit: and if this were so only whilst these extraordinary operations of the Holy Spirit lasted, then from the time that they have ceased, the gospel doth not in this differ from the law, nor deserve to be preferred above it on that account.

Arg. 2. This doctrine seems to take off from the energy of prayer in general, and from the virtue of prayer for the Holy Spirit in particular, and so to make men slight and neglect that duty of which the Scripture speaketh so magnificently, and to which it frequently exhorts us; at least, it seems not well consistent with the tenor of those inspired prayers, or those prescriptions for it recorded in the Holy Scripture: for who can reconcile it with those expressions, in which holy men of God so often beg God would incline their hearts unto him, since this he cannot do without some operation on their hearts; that he would draw them, that they might run after him; that he would open their eyes, and give them understanding to discern his law; that he would lead them in the right way, in the way everlasting, and guide them by his eye? For if God by his Spirit hath no influence upon the heart or soul, how doth he incline or draw it? if none upon the understanding, how doth he enlighten or instruct it? If this be done only by the word read, preached, and pondered in the heart, we may as well apply ourselves to that work without as with prayer, unless we in these cases pray for some new external revelations, or for some motives not contained in Scripture.

Moreover, according to this doctrine, it seems both fruitless and absurd to pray for the assistance of the Holy Spirit, or to expect we should enjoy it. And so that passage of St. Luke, Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for if evil parents give good gifts to their children, how much more will your heavenly Father give his Holy Spirit to them that ask him? Luke xi. 9. 13. must be of no use or virtue to us. For what in these expressions can we pray for, but the assistance of the Holy Spirit? and what assistance can he afford us, if he doth not operate at all upon our souls?

To say this promise is to be confined to the apostles' days, seems not agreeable to reason: for why then do we hear of it in the sermon on the mount, which certainly was spoken εἰς ἀκοὰς λαοῦ, in the audience of the multitude? why doth it run in words so general, πᾶς γὰρ, for every one that asks receives? Moreover, those spiritual and ordinary effects for which the Holy Spirit was then given, those fruits of the Spirit they produced in them, are as needful and as spiritually good for Christians now, as when our Saviour spake these words: for as the Holy Spirit was needful then to strengthen Christ's servants in the inward man to do his will, Eph. iii. 16. to comfort them in tribulations, and support them under fiery trials, and to preserve them from the subtilties of Satan, and the temptations of the wicked world; so is there the same need of his assistance now for all these gracious ends, and therefore the same reason to expect him still to all these purposes. Moreover, the conditions of this promise may be performed by us now as well as then; we may be now sincerely desirous to obey the holy will of God, and with true fervency and importunity may beg the Holy Spirit to this end. And if we may acceptably perform these duties to which this promise is annexed, why may we not as confidently expect the blessing promised from the God of truth? For the encouragement here given to expect the assistance of the Holy Spirit is this, that we ask him of our heavenly Father: now this most comfortable relation God bears to all his children, of what age soever; he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; and therefore there is now, and ever will be, the same benignity in God, the same good-will and readiness in him to give his Holy Spirit now unto his children for all needful purposes, as in all former ages. If therefore in like manner we do ask, we must have equal reason to expect we should receive him. To proceed therefore,

Secondly, To explain, as far as I am able, and think it needful so to do, how those fruits of the Spirit, which the schools call graces, are wrought in us by the Spirit of God.

First, I assert, that the manner in which the Holy Spirit acts upon the minds and hearts of men, for the production of these fruits or graces, and the preparatory dispositions of the soul towards them, may reasonably be conceived to be such as is suitable to the reason and faculties of men, viz. the understanding and the will. Now it is certain, that what naturally makes the understanding to perceive, is evidence proposed and apprehended, considered or adverted to; for nothing farther can be requisite to make me come to the knowledge of the truth, and understanding what the will of the Lord is, and so be wise unto salvation. Hence the apostle prays, that his Philippians might abound more and more in knowledge, and in all wisdom, ἐν πάσῃ αἰσθήσει, in all perception, that so they may approve the things that are most excellent, Phil. i. 9, 10. Hence he speaks to the Romans thus, Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν, that you may discern and approve what is according to the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God, Rom. xii. 2. and saith to the Ephesians, Be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is, Eph. v. 17. and, ver. 8. 10. Walk as children of the light, approving what is acceptable to the Lord. Again, what makes the will choose, is something approved by the understanding, and consequently appearing to the soul as good; and whatsoever it refuseth, is something represented by the understanding, and so appearing to the will, as evil: whence all that God requires of us is, and can be, only this, to refuse the evil, and to choose the good. Wherefore to say that evidence proposed, apprehended, and considered, is not sufficient to make the understanding to approve; or that the greatest good proposed, the greatest evil threatened, when equally believed and reflected on, is not sufficient to engage the will to choose that good, and to refuse that evil, is in effect to say, that which alone doth move the will to choose, or to refuse, is not sufficient to engage it so to do; that which alone is requisite to make me understand and approve, is not sufficient so to do. Now this being contradictory to itself, must of necessity be false.

Be it then that we have naturally an aversion to the truths proposed to us in the gospel, that can only make us indisposed to attend to them, but cannot hinder our conviction when we apprehend them and attend to them. Whence, for removal of it, the apostle only prays, that the eyes of our understanding may be enlightened, that we may know them, Eph. i. 18. adding, that where the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in Christ Jesus was revealed, if after this the gospel was hid from any, it was only so, because the god of this world had blinded the conceptions of their minds, that the light of the gospel might not shine into them, 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4. Be it that there is in us a renitency to the good we are to choose, that only can indispose us to believe and to approve it as our chiefest good. Be it that we are prone to the evil which we should decline, that only can render it the more difficult for us to believe it is the worst of evils. But yet, what we do really conceive to be our chiefest good will still be chosen, and what we apprehend to be the worst of evils, will, whilst we do continue under that conviction, be refused by us. It therefore can be only requisite, in order to these ends, that the good Spirit should so illuminate our understandings, that we, attending to and considering what lies before us, should apprehend and be convinced of our duty; and that the blessings of the gospel should be so propounded to us, as that we may discern them to be our chiefest good, and the miseries it threatens, so as we may be convinced they are the worst of evils, that we may choose the one, and refuse the other. Now to consider, in order to approbation and conviction, to choose in order to our good, and refuse, that we may avoid misery, must be the actions not of God but man, though the light that doth convince, and the motives which engage him thus to choose and to refuse, are certainly from God.

To illustrate this more familiarly by an instance taken from ourselves, or our deportment towards others: When a man, in words plain and intelligible, speaks to another, if he will hearken to what he says, he must understand his mind; for, by that very impression the words make upon his brain, he immediately perceives his meaning: and cannot the Divine impression on the brain, which is God's speaking inwardly to man, do the same thing? This action is indeed so necessary, that as it is not virtuous or praiseworthy in any man to understand the mind of him who doth thus speak to him, so neither seemeth it praiseworthy in us purely to understand the mind of God thus speaking to us. Again, these words of man contain some exhortation to me to do what he desires I would do, backed with encouragements to do so, taken from the proposal of some advantage, the promise of some good I shall receive by complying with his exhortation; or they contain some dehortation from doing what he would not have me to do, because it will be hurtful to me, or will be certainly attended with some evil consequences. Is not this the method used by all the world in dealing with one another? And do they not all do this with hopes and expectation of success? And is it not a great disparagement to the word of God, to think that his persuasions, admonitions, exhortations, promises, and threats, should be all insufficient to prevail with us to turn from our sinful courses, and turn to him, when all men who do use these methods towards their children, servants, friends, or relations, do it in hopes that they shall be successful by these means? Moreover, if the person they address to be slow of understanding, do they not hope to overcome that difficulty by the clearness of their discourse, and by reiterating the same thing by such variety of expressions as he is best able to perceive? If he be averse from doing that which is desired, do they not hope to overcome that aversion by repeated exhortations, and vigorous impressions of those encouragements they tender to prevail upon him to comply with their desire? If he be strongly inclined to that from which they vehemently dehort him, do they not endeavour to turn the bent and current of his inclinations by the like repeated exhortations, and lively representations of the evils he will be certainly exposed to by so doing? All men are therefore of this opinion in their practice, that acting with men by convincing reason, and by motives and persuasions, is acting with them suitably to their faculties: and is not God himself of the same mind? Hath he not revealed his will on purpose that we may know it? Hath he not directed his letters and epistles to us, that by reading we may understand in them, and know the things which do belong to our peace? Did not our Saviour utter all his discourses to the same end? Why else doth he inquire so oft, Why is it that you do not understand my speech? (John viii. 43.) How is it that ye do not understand? (Mark viii. 21.) Why doth he preface them with this instruction, hear and understand? (Matt. xv. 10.) Doth not God call upon us to consider our ways, and lay to heart his sayings, and his dispensations? (Hag. i. 5. 7.) Doth he not prescribe this as the remedy for preventing his judgments, when he saith, Oh consider this, ye that forget God! (Psal. l. 22.) and of being wise, by saying, Oh that they were wise, that they would consider their latter end! (Deut. xxxii. 29.) Doth he not represent this as the source of all the wickedness and idolatry of his own people, that they would not consider in their hearts? (Isa. i. 3. xliv. 19.) Doth he not make conversion the effect of this consideration, when he saith, Because he considereth and turneth away from all the transgressions that he hath committed, he shall surely live? (Ezek. xviii. 29. Psal. cxix. 59.) yea, doth he not represent this as a just ground of hope, that even the most stubborn sinners may be reformed, when he saith to the prophet, Remove by day in their sight: it may be they will consider, though they be a rebellious people? (Ezek. xii. 3.) Does not the apostle pray, that his Colossians may be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom, that (so) they might walk worthy of the Lord, to all well-pleasing, being fruitful in every good work? (Colos. i. 9, 10.) that his Philippians might discern and approve the things that are most excellent, that they might be sincere, and without offence, being filled with all the fruits of righteousness? &c. (Phil. i. 10, 11.) And must not then this knowledge and approbation of his will, be a means of rendering us fruitful in all works of righteousness? Does not God require his people to choose life, (Deut. xxx. 19.) pronouncing a blessing on them that choose the things that please him, (Isa. lvi. 4.) and threatening destruction to them that would not choose the fear of the Lord, (Prov. i. 20.) but choose the things in which he delighted not? (Isa. lvi. 4.) Now, doth he any thing more to prevail with them who do not choose the fear of the Lord, do not the things that please him, to engage them so to do, or not to do the contrary, but teach them his ways, and persuade them to walk in them? Must it not then be certain, that either he transacts with them as men who might by these things be induced to choose to fear him, and do the things that please him, and abstain from the contrary; or threatens to destroy them for doing what they could not help, and had no means sufficient to avoid, and for not doing what it was impossible for them to do? Again, doth he not exhort men to be willing and obedient, promising a full pardon, and a blessing to them that do so? (Isa. i. 18, 19.) Doth not Christ resolve the destruction of the Jews into this, You will not come unto me that you may have life? (John v. 40.) declaring this to be the reason why they were not gathered, because he often would have gathered them, but they would not be gathered, (Luke xiii. 34.) because, being so graciously invited to the marriage-feast, they would not come? (Matt. xxii. 34.) Now what did he to engage them to come unto him, to gather them, to prevail upon them to come unto the marriage-feast, but shew them the way of life, exhort and invite them to come unto the feast? Either then he transacted with them as one who knew this was sufficient for these ends, and that these things might have prevailed upon them to be willing, or else he resolved on their exclusion from the marriage-feast; and their not tasting his supper, for not doing what they could not do; and condemned them for not coming when they could not, because the Father did not draw them, or give them to him, (John vi. 37. 44.) and for not being gathered when indeed he would not, whatever he said to the contrary, seeing he would not do that for them without which they could not be gathered. Moreover, doth he not earnestly exhort and persuade men to repent, and turn from the evil of their ways? Doth he not say, Oh that my people would have hearkened to me; that Israel would have walked in my ways! (Psal. lxxxi. 13.) Oh that they were wise, that they would understand this! (Deut. xxxii. 29.) O Jerusalem! wilt thou not be made clean? when shall it once be? (Jer. xiii. 27.) Oh that thou hadst known in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! (Luke xix. 42.) Now either in these exhortations and persuasions he acts with men suitable to their faculties, exhorting them to do, and pathetically wishing they had done, what they might have done, though they did it not; or called them to repent that they did not do what they never could do; that they did not avoid what it was impossible they should avoid; and even to repent that God had not irresistibly done this for them, and seriously wished they themselves would have done what, if it ever had been done, must have been done by himself, and therefore was not done, because he would not irresistibly work the change in them.

In fine, doth not God encourage men to repent and believe, to be willing and obedient, by great and precious promises of the most excellent and lasting blessings? Hath he not threatened eternal damnation to them that do not believe? (Mark xvi. 15, 16.) hath not he said, He will come in flaming fire, taking vengeance on all that obey not the gospel? (2 Thess. i. 7.) And must not all these things sufficiently convince us, that God acts with men as one who doth indeed suppose that men may hearken to his exhortations, and comply with his persuasions to believe and to obey his gospel? may be prevailed on, by his promises, to the performance of their duty, and terrified by the consideration of the judgments threatened from their disobedience? Why else is it said, that God has given us these great and precious promises, that by them we may be made partakers of a Divine nature? (2 Pet. i. 2.) or why are we exhorted, having these promises, to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God? (2 Cor. vii. 1.) or why doth the apostle say, Knowing then the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men? (2 Cor. v. 11.) If beyond all this there be some physical and irresistible operation on God's part, necessary to make men know, and knowing choose the good, and refuse the evil, this being not wrought in them who are not born anew, why is the want of this new birth and this spiritual regeneration so oft imputed to their want of consideration, and their not laying to heart the things propounded to them; to their not inclining their mind to wisdom, and not applying their hearts to understanding; and their not framing their doings to turn unto the Lord? (Prov. i. 14. 30. Hos. v. 4.) If it be said, This may be done, because they had grace and strength sufficient in their first parents so to do; I answer, Admit that vain imagination, that we had what we never indeed had, or could have, because it was lost long before we had a being; yea, what Adam never had, because then we must have had power to repent after his fall, and then we must have it still; for what power he had to repent after his fall, he could not lose by his fall: I say, admit this supposition, what is it to the import of all the exhortations, persuasions, and motives, contained in the gospel, which are all directed to fallen man; and so, if God be serious in them, declare his great unwillingness that fallen man should perish, his passionate desire that he should be saved; and if he speaketh in them suitably to the capacities and faculties of fallen man, plainly suppose him still in a capacity, by these assistances and motives, to understand his duty, and to choose the good, and refuse the evil?

Prop. 2. I add, That this is not ordinarily, and needs not at all to be done now, by propounding to the understanding any truths, or to the will any motives or inducements, which are not contained in Holy Scripture. For, if the word of God be a perspicuous and perfect rule, able to make us wise to salvation, and furnished for every good work, sure the good Spirit may by suggesting the truths contained in it, and bringing them to our remembrance, and opening our understandings to perceive the Scriptures, sufficiently remove the darkness that is in our minds; if it be a light shining in darkness, (2 Pet. i. 19.) and πάντα τὰ ἐλεγχόμενα, all errors to be corrected, all vices to be reproved, are made manifest by the light, (Eph. v. 13.) then must it be sufficient to illuminate our understandings and direct our paths, or lead our feet into the way of truth. Again, seeing the motives contained in the Scripture to engage us to turn from those evil ways which tend to our disquiet, torment, and misery, at present, and will hereafter subject us to eternal miseries, must be sufficient to turn us from the evil of our ways, or else the highest motives that can be offered must be insufficient to that end; all other motives to deter us from any action, as pernicious and disadvantageous to us, being as nothing when compared to that, Depart from me ye wicked into eternal fire; all evils we can dread or suffer from the hand of man, are little in respect of that we must have cause to fear from him who can destroy both soul and body in hell-fire. Since, on the other hand, the promise of everlasting happiness, recorded in the same Scriptures, as the result of our sincere obedience, must be sufficient to engage us in a sincere endeavour to yield that obedience to the good and holy will of God, or no inducements can be sufficient to that end; seeing this motive eminently contains all other motives in it, there being more in those two words, the enjoyment of God, and everlasting happiness, than kingdoms, thrones, and treasures, joy, pleasures, honours, and all that can express the good things of this world, import; and therefore a more vehement constraining power in them, to the performance of our duty, than in the united strength of worldly greatness, honour, pleasures, and that which representeth to our hopes and our desires, that which incomparably excels all we can hope for, or desire, besides: I say, this being so, the Holy Spirit, by making deep impressions on the mind, of the advantages and rewards promised to our conversion and sincere obedience, and of the dreadful evils threatened to the disobedient, and bringing these things oft to our remembrance, which in the scripture-phrase is putting these laws in our minds, and writing them upon our hearts, (see note on Heb. viii. 10.) must do what is sufficient to work in us conversion and sincere obedience. For what reason can be given why the Spirit of wisdom, having enlightened the eyes of our understanding to know what is the hope of our calling, and the glorious riches of the inheritance of the saints, (Eph. i. 18.) and these things being thus made present to our minds, should not have greater prevalence upon our wills to obedience, than any temporal concerns to yield obedience to the laws of man? It is certain, Satan can only tempt us, by suggesting some temporal allurements and advantages, or some temporal losses or affrightments to us: since then the Scripture doth assure us, this is our victory over the world, even our faith, (1 John v. 4.) i. e. our expectation of things hoped for, our evidence of things not seen; (Heb. xi. 1.) these objects of our faith contained in the Scriptures, being presented to us, and impressed upon us by the Holy Spirit, must be sufficient to baffle all the temptations of sin, Satan, and the world. In fine, of this we may be sufficiently convinced from the experience of mankind: for, since the apprehension of good or evil is the sole motive to make us undertake or decline any action, the greater the good or evil is, the stronger motive it must be. Now, do not many millions in the world forego their present ease and pleasure, encounter difficulties, and venture upon dangers, and undergo most toilsome labours, in expectation of some finite temporal advantage, of which they cannot have assurance? Do they not oft abstain from what they passionately love, only for fear of dangers which possibly might not ensue upon the satisfaction of their appetites? Do they not sow, and plant, and trade, only in hopes of an increase? And should not then the hopes of infinite eternal happiness, and the dread of endless miseries, more powerfully engage us to obey God's precepts, and to resist all the temptations which flesh and blood suggest against them?

But then, because the blessings and miseries of another world are things invisible, and only are discerned by the eye of faith, they being only moral and spiritual motives, which only work upon us as they are present to our minds by actual consideration and reflection on them, and this they are not always, when the temptations of the world, the devil, and the flesh, by sensual objects, are thus present with us; it is therefore necessary that at all times, when they are not thus present with us, and therefore cannot operate upon us, the Holy Spirit should either, by representing to us from the Scriptures those Divine truths with which our understandings have not been sufficiently enlightened, instruct and guide us; or else by reviving, and impressing, i. e. inculcating on our spirits, those motives and inducements to resist those temptations, and to perform those duties which are required at our hands, assist us so to do.

Prop. 3. I therefore humbly conceive this inward operation of the Holy Spirit to consist in these two things:

First, In representing Divine truths more clearly to our understandings, that we may have a fuller evidence, stronger conviction and assurance of them, which is in Scripture styled the illumination of the mind.

Secondly, In bringing these truths to our remembrance, that so they may be present with us, when this is requisite to enable us to resist temptations, and to encourage us to the performance of our duty. And upon supposition of these two things, that God acts with us suitably to the nature of our faculties (on our understanding, by representing the light to it, and on our wills, by motives to choose the good, and refuse the evil, and that the highest motives and inducements possible, when firmly believed, and present to the mind, must be sufficient to produce their ends), it can be only requisite to our conversion and sincere obedience, that the good Spirit should assist us in this work, by that illumination which is sufficient to produce this strong conviction and plerophory of faith, and should present those motives to our memories, and make a deep impression of them there; which, being present, will move our wills and our affections to prosecute the ends for which they are sufficient.

I am not ignorant that there may be many, who, beyond all this, require a physical and irresistible motion of the Holy Spirit, in which we are wholly passive, to the conversion of a sinner, and I shall not dispute with them, that controversy being so fully handled by Dr. Claget, but shall endeavour briefly to compound and state the matter.

First, then, I say it must be granted, that in raising an idea in my brain by the Holy Spirit, and the impression made upon it there, the action is properly physical.

Secondly, That in these actions I am purely passive; that is, I myself do nothing formally to produce these ideas, but the good Spirit, without my operation, doth produce them in me. And,

Thirdly, That these operations must be irresistible in their production, because they are immediately produced in me without my knowledge of them, and without my will, and so without those faculties by which I am enabled to act.

But then I add, that as far as they are so, they cannot be imputable to me; i. e. it cannot be praiseworthy in me, or rewardable, that I have such ideas raised in me; but only that, when they are thus raised in me, I attend to them, comply with, and improve them to the ends for which they were designed by the Holy Spirit. To make this evident by an example: It is on all hands granted, that Satan can so work upon the brain, as to raise up in it impure and blasphemous ideas; but then it is generally held, that the thoughts they immediately produce will never be imputed to us as our sins, nor will God be displeased with us for them, if we do not after shew any good liking of them, or consent to them, but manfully resist, and rise up into detestation and abhorrence of them; and that, because the raising these ideas is the devil's action, not our own, we are purely passive in them till we consent to, or shew some liking of, them: and they are also inevitable and irresistible, it being in the power of no man to prevent or resist them; i. e. to hinder them from being raised in his brain, or any ways to suppress them, till he doth first perceive them raised there. And therefore, for the same reasons those ideas which are objectively good, being thus raised in us, cannot be imputed to us for reward, nor can God be well pleased with us for them, till we co-operate with them; because the raising of them is properly God's, not our own action, and we are purely passive in it, nor is it in our power to prevent or to resist them: but then, God having planted in us a principle of reason and discretion, we can attend to them being raised, and so improve them to the illumination of our understandings, and to the approbation of them in our minds. He also having given us a will to choose the good and refuse the evil, we may consent to the good suggestions, and pursue the good motions raised thus in us; for to what other ends can they be raised in us by the Holy Spirit? As therefore our attendance and consent to the suggestions of the evil spirit being free, and what we may avoid, is culpable; so our attendance to, and compliance with, these motions and ideas of the Holy Spirit, being things in which we are free and active, and that upon deliberation; and so in them we do perform the proper and free actions of a man, doing that which we might not do, and refusing to do that we have both power and temptations to perform; therefore these things must be praiseworthy and acceptable in the sight of God.

I also add, that these ideas being thus raised up in us by God alone, and even the power of attending and consenting to them being, together with our nature, entirely derived from God, and all the inducements which we have to attend to them, and comply with them, being properly of Divine external revelation, or such Divine internal operation as, if they had not intervened, we should have had none of these good effects produced upon us; these effects are properly to be ascribed to God, and all the praise and glory of them must be due to him alone, because the principle of acting, and the inducement thus to act, is solely from him.

To conclude: The greatest instance of powerful conversion I can call to mind, is that of persecuting Saul. He is confounded by a light shining round about him, brighter than the sun; by this he is struck down to the earth, and hears a dreadful voice from heaven, saying, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Now in all this he was purely passive, and the action done upon him was physical and irresistible; and therefore this action being wholly Christ's, not his, there could be nothing in it on his part praiseworthy, or rendering him a better man. But then, when he inquires of the holy Jesus, Lord, what wouldest thou have me to do? when he prays earnestly for the forgiveness of his sins; (Acts ix. 11.) when he submits to that baptism which was appointed by the holy Jesus for that end, and for the dedication of himself to his service; when, being told what grievous things he was to suffer for the name of Jesus, he notwithstanding was not disobedient to the heavenly vision, but went, and preached up that faith which he had formerly opposed; these being actions of deliberation and free choice, proceeding from reflections on the heavenly vision, and the conviction it had wrought upon him, must be praiseworthy and acceptable in the sight of God: though, being the results of what our Lord had done upon him, he very properly ascribeth the whole glory of them to the grace and favour of our Lord towards him. Hence, say St. Chrysostom and Œcumenius, he doth so magnify the grace of God in this matter, as μὴ λυμήνασθαι τῷ αὐτεξουσίῳ, not to invalidate man's free-will. (See note on 1 Tim. i. 12.) And that there is a perfect harmony betwixt the operation of God's grace and the co-operation of our wills, we learn from two examples recorded in one chapter, viz. 2 Cor. viii. 1. 3. where the apostle advertiseth the Corinthians, of the grace of God given to them of Macedonia: for, saith the apostle, they were according to their power, yea, and above their power, αὐθαίρετοι, of themselves willing to contribute to the necessities of the saints; viz. the contribution was an act of their own free wills, proceeding from their choice; but the grace and favour of God given to them was the spring and motive of it. So again, ver. 16, 17. Thanks be to God, τῷ διδόντι, to him that gave this care in the heart of Titus; for he accepted the exhortation, and being more forward, αὐθαίρετος ἐξῆλθε, he went to you of his own accord; i. e. the exhortation was from St. Paul; that which gave the weight and vigour to it, and rendered him more forward in it, was the grace and favour of God to him: the reflection on both made this journey the matter of his own choice, and so he became willing of his own accord: yea, this is evident even from the very words, by some thought to assert the contrary, Phil. ii. 12, 13. Wherefore, beloved—not only as in my presence (when you had me to be your monitor), but much more now in my absence (which God by the workings and inward teachings of his Spirit supplies), work out your salvation with fear and trembling: for it is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do of his own pleasure (i. e. sometimes by outward, and sometimes by inward means): for if beyond these inward suggestions and persuasions some physical and irresistible operations be required on God's part, which make it necessary for us both to will and do, why are we then commanded to work out our own salvation; for can we act where we are truly passive? Or can that be a reason why we ourselves should work, that another will effectually do that very thing without our co-operation? Is it not rather a manifest reason why we should neither will nor work at all, since both is and will be irresistibly performed without us? Why, secondly, are we said to work out our salvation with fear and trembling? for, can there be any cause of fear and trembling, lest that salvation should not be wrought out which God works in us irresistibly? Surely, if God works in us irresistibly both to will and to do, there can be no possibility of miscarrying, and so no ground for fear and trembling. Why, thirdly, are the Philippians exhorted to do this, much more in St. Paul's absence than in his presence, if, when he was present, God wrought in them irresistibly to will and do, and could do no more in his absence? It is therefore evident from these considerations, that God works in us both to will and to do, by giving us our wills and faculties, and then stirring them up to put forth their own acts.

EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

PREFACE.

§. 1. THOUGH, in the pure and primitive ages of the church, I find no controversy touching the nature of faith, or of justification, they saying nothing of justification but as it is included in the article of remission of sins; yet seeing both this faith and the justification which is ascribed to it, have, in the latter ages, ministered occasion to many questions and disputes, canvassed with much contention, and prosecuted with the greatest zeal, as being judged matters of very high importance; and the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians are the Epistles which treat chiefly of this subject; I therefore shall, by way of preface to this Epistle, endeavour to shew,

1. What is the import of the word faith, in Scripture, especially as it relates to the matter of justification, or what the Scripture representeth as true Christian faith.

2. What it is to be justified, in St. Paul's acceptation of that word.

3. That this justification is by St. Paul ascribed to faith alone, in opposition to works of righteousness, done either by the Jew or gentile.

4. That it seems necessary from the nature of the thing, and the state and condition of the persons to whom the gospel was then preached, that it should be so.

5. That though this faith doth not include sincere obedience, and much less perseverance in it to the end, which yet are necessary and essential conditions, even of the new covenant; yet,

1. It lays the highest obligations on us to perform them, under the penalty of forfeiting the blessings of it. And,

2. It tendereth sufficient motives to this obedience, and, where it is sincere and lasting, it will most certainly produce it.

§. 2. And (1.) as for the import of the word faith, in Scripture, I think scarce any thing is more evident throughout the whole New Testament, than that the faith there mentioned is only a cordial and firm belief that Jesus is the Christ, the Lord, the true Messiah, or Prophet, sent from God, to reveal his will to the world; the Son of God, the Saviour of the world. To make this manifest,

Consider, (1.) that Divine faith, in general, is only a firm assent to, or full persuasion of mind concerning the truth of, what is testified, revealed, or reported by God himself, or persons commissioned by God to reveal, or to bear record to it: for, seeing human faith is only a persuasion of the truth of what is told us or testified by man, Divine faith must be a firm persuasion of the truth of what is testified or revealed to us by God. And this description of faith is clearly taught us by St. John, 1 John, chap. v. who having declared, ver. 4, 5. that the faith by which we overcome the world, is the belief that Jesus is the Son of God, proceeds to shew we have great reason to believe this proposition, that Jesus is the Son of God: 1. Because the Holy Spirit beareth witness to it, and he is the Spirit of truth, ver. 6. 2. Because there are three that bear record in heaven to it, viz. the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, ver. 7. Now, saith he, if we receive the witness of men; if we rely upon their testimony in any courts of judicature; if by the mouth of two or three human witnesses our weightiest matters are determined, shall not the witness of God be greater? i. e. shall it not be of more validity for confirmation of our faith in this particular, that Jesus is the Son of God? ver. 9. Surely we cannot disbelieve this truth, but we must give the lie to him, saith the apostle, ver. 10. because we believe not the record which God hath given of his Son; but if we do receive this testimony on his authority, we set to our seal that God is true, John iii. 33.

This being, then, the nature of Divine faith in general, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ must be a full assent to or firm persuasion of mind concerning the truth of what is testified, revealed, or reported by God himself, or by persons commissionated by him to reveal his will, concerning our Lord Jesus Christ. Or briefly thus, It is a firm persuasion, that he who suffered at Jerusalem was the true Messiah, the Saviour of the world, the Prophet who was for to come, that person who was constituted Lord of all things; or, which amounts to the same thing, that he was Christ, the Son of God. For explication of this proposition, Consider, (1.) that the Scripture mentions this as the great thing testified concerning him, by all the witnesses of the Messiah; as, v. g.

1. By St. John the Baptist, who came for a witness to testify of the Light, John i. 7. and who saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God, ver. 34.: hence do St. John's disciples say, He to whom thou barest witness baptizeth, John iii. 26. and Christ speaks thus to the Jews, You sent to John, and he bare witness to the truth, John v. 33.

2. God the Father bare him record, and testified by divers methods, that he was the Son of God; so do we read expressly, John v. 32. There is another that beareth witness of me; and I know that the witness which he witnesseth of me is true; the Father himself who hath sent me, beareth witness of me. And again, xvii. 18. It is written in your law, that the testimony of two men is true, i. e. it is to be received as such: I am one that bear witness of myself, and the Father which sent me beareth witness of me. Now God the Father bore witness to his Son, 1. by a voice from heaven, saying,

Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, Mark i. 11. This voice was personally directed to Christ himself, as being that commission which was sent him from heaven, to exercise the office of God's supreme minister, or legate, in the world; but it was also prefaced with an ἰδοὺ, behold, directing the people to attend to it. (Matt. iii. 17.) 2. By giving him the power of working miracles for confirmation of his doctrine and his own testimony; and therefore he speaks thus to the people, I have a greater testimony than that of John: the works which my Father hath given me to do, they bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me. (John v. 36.)

3. The Holy Spirit beareth witness that Jesus is the Son of God; (1 John v. 6.) and this he did, not only by his descent upon our Saviour at his baptism, and by raising him from the dead, he being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit, (1 Pet. iii. 18.) but by enabling him to cast out devils, and to perform such works as never any other person did, or could do. Whence he thus argues, If by the Spirit of God I cast out devils, then is the kingdom of God come to you; i. e. then is it clear that I am the Messiah, sent from God to preach the doctrine of this kingdom to you: (Matt. xii. 28.) since my commission is confirmed by these operations of his Spirit, and testified to by the finger of God, as the phrase is varied, Luke xi. 20. and this, after our Lord's ascension, this Spirit was to do more fully: for when (saith Christ) the Comforter is come, even the Spirit of truth, he shall testify of me, (John xv. 26.) and this he actually did; whence Christ is said to be justified by the Spirit, 1 Tim. iii. 16. i. e. freed, by his testimony, from the suspicion of being an impostor, or false pretender, when he declared he was Christ, the Son of God.

4. The apostles were men chosen for this very end: Ye shall bear witness of me (saith Christ), because ye have been with me from the beginning. (John xv. 27.) Ye shall be witnesses to me both in Jerusalem and Judea, and in Samaria, and to the uttermost parts of the earth. Hence are they styled witnesses chosen of God, Acts x. 41. eye-witnesses of what he did and suffered, Luke i. 2. eye-witnesses of his glory, 2 Pet. i. 16. that which we have heard, and seen, and looked upon, μαρτυροῦμεν, we witness, and declare unto you, saith St. John, 1 John i. 2.

5. Moses also and the prophets are produced as his witnesses; for unto him give all the prophets witness. (Acts x. 43.) All the Scriptures: Search the Scriptures (saith Christ), for they are they which testify of me; (John v. 39.) and Moses in particular; for if you believed Moses, you would believe me: for he wrote of me, (ver. 46.)

Consider, (2.) the things for which the witnesses are produced, the evidence they give in concerning the Messiah, and that will teach us what is faith in Christ. Sometimes it is said that they bear record that he is the Son of God, John i. 34. 1 John v. 5. 10. sometimes they testify that he was the Christ; thus St. Paul confounded the Jews, testifying that he was the Christ, Acts ix. 20. 22. St. Peter, testifying to all the house of Israel, that God had made him Lord and Christ, Acts ii. 36.: sometimes they testify that he was the Saviour of the world; so 1 John iv. 14. We have seen, and do testify that God hath sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world; or, that he was the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world, John i. 29. that him God hath exalted to be a Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins to them that believed in his name, Acts v. 31. xiii. 38. sometimes they testify that he is Lord of all things, Acts x. 36. and, as a consequent of this, that he, by God's appointment, was to be judge of all men, for he commanded us (saith Peter) to preach to the people, and to testify that it was he who was ordained to be the judge of the quick and the dead, Acts x. 42. sometimes they are said to bear witness of his resurrection, Acts i. 22. saying, this Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we are witnesses, Acts xxiii. 2. for we have testified of God that he raised up Christ, 1 Cor. xv. 15.

3. Observe that all these several testimonies, though they differ in expressions, they differ little in reality, and in effect do only signify that he is Jesus Christ our Lord: for, 1. to say he is the Son of God, is in effect to say he is the Christ, that person by God anointed to be our prophet. St. Matthew gives us the confession of St. Peter thus, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God, xvi. 16. St. Mark thus, Thou art the Christ, viii. 29. St. Luke, Thou art the Christ of God, ix. 10. And when our Lord forbids them to divulge this to the world, he only saith, Tell no man that I am Jesus the Christ, Matt. xvi. 20. Art thou the Christ, the Son of God? saith the high-priest to him, Matt. xxvi. 63. whereas St. Luke relates the question only thus, Art thou the Christ? xxii. 67. 2. To be the Son of God, is in effect to be the Lord of all things, the person to whom all power is given in heaven and earth; that every knee should bow unto him, as their sovereign Lord and King: and, therefore, whereas Pilate is, in the other evangelists, said only to ask, Art thou the Christ, the Son of God? St. John relates the question thus, Art thou the King of the Jews? 3. To be the Son of God, must also signify to be the Saviour of the world; the testimony of the apostles being this, that God had sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world, 1 John iv. 14. to testify that he was risen from the dead, was in effect to testify he was the Son of God; for he was declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead, Rom. i. 4. It was in effect to testify that he was made both Lord and Christ; and therefore Peter, having proved Christ's resurrection and exaltation to the right hand of God, infers that we may all be hence assured, that God hath made him Lord, Acts ii. 36. and St. Paul tells us, it was a demonstration that God by him would judge the world, Acts xvii. 31. And since his resurrection was performed by the almighty power of God, it must be a sufficient demonstration of the truth of what Christ testified of himself, viz. that he was Christ the Saviour of the world, and that he should hereafter sit at the right hand of Power, it being impossible that God should have employed so great power in raising him from the dead, had he not been his well-beloved Son, or that Messiah he declared himself to be.

This being then the thing which all those witnesses were so concerned to attest and to engage men to believe, we may be sure this is, according to the tenor of the holy Scripture, faith in Christ; and that by heartily believing that Christ is the Messiah, sent into the world to instruct us in the will of God, the Saviour of the world, sent to redeem us by his death from death and misery, and give salvation to all his faithful servants; that he is our Lord and King, by whose laws we are to be governed, and by whose laws we shall be judged and rewarded at the last day:

we truly do believe in Christ. Which yet will farther be apparent,

1. From plain texts which seem expressly to assert the same. We find Nathanael saying, Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel, John i. 49. and Christ thus answering to him, Because I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? Whence it is evident, that to acknowledge Jesus to be the Son of God, the King of Israel, was to believe in him. This was the faith of the Samaritan woman and her fellow-citizens, John iv. 26. for to this woman our Saviour testifies he was the true Messiah, saying, I that speak unto thee am he, ver. 29. then the woman goes into the city, and saith to the men of it, Come, see a man that told me all things that ever I did; is not this the Christ? This being said, many of the Samaritans believed on him, because of the saying of the woman; and many more believed, because of his own words, ver. 39. that is, they were persuaded, partly by what they heard her testify, partly by what they heard our Saviour speak, to acknowledge he was the true Messiah, or the Saviour of the world: for so they do themselves explain the meaning of believing on him, saying to the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy word: for we ourselves have heard, and know that this is verily the Christ, the Saviour of the world, ver. 42. This was the faith of Martha; for Jesus having said to her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: believest thou this? she answers, Yea, Lord: I believe thou art the Christ, the Son of God, who wast to come into the world, John xi. 25, 26. to believe this was, therefore, to believe in Christ, if Martha did so. We find St. Paul opening and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead, Acts xvii. 3. and that this Jesus whom he preached was the Christ; and then it follows, that some of them believed, ver. 4. ἐπείσθησαν, they were persuaded of the truth of what St. Paul had testified. Again, it follows that those of Berea, searching the Scriptures, and finding that these things were so, believed, ver. 11. i. e. they were persuaded of the truth of what St. Paul had taught, that Jesus was the Christ; that he had suffered, and was risen from the dead: this therefore must be to believe. Again, St. Paul was pressed in spirit, and testifies to the Jews, that Jesus was the Christ, Acts xviii. 5. whereupon Crispus, a chief ruler of the synagogue, and many of the Corinthians, believed; i. e. they acknowledged the truth of St. Paul's testimony, that Jesus was the Christ. The word of faith which we preach, saith the same Paul, is this, that if thou confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and in thy heart believest that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved, Rom. x. 8, 9. and this he proves, because the Scripture saith, Whosoever believeth in him shall not be ashamed, ver. 10. To confess, therefore, and acknowledge that Jesus is the Lord, and that God raised him from the dead, is to believe on him. Lastly, This (saith St. John) is the victory over the world, even our faith, 1 John, v. 4. and then it follows, Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? to believe therefore that Jesus is the Son of God, is Christian faith.

3. This was the faith which the apostles did require in order to baptism; and where there was a due appearance of it, there persons were admitted into the number of believers. For instance, St. Peter saith to the Jews, Let all the house of Israel know that God hath made this Jesus, whom ye crucified, Lord and Christ, Acts ii. 36. this pricks them to the heart, and makes them to inquire, What shall we do? St. Peter answers, Repent you, and believe every one of you in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, ver. 38. and then it follows, that they who gladly received his word were baptized; and there were added to the church three thousand souls, ver. 41. and, ver. 47, the Lord daily added to the church, τοὺς σωζομένους, the saved, i. e. such who were by his faith put into a way of salvation; and if they persevered in it, would obtain it. Again, Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached to them Christ, Acts viii. 5. and when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, ver. 12. i. e. when they did heartily assent to them, they were baptized, both men and women: and when the eunuch puts the question to him, What hindereth me to be baptized? Philip returns this answer, If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest, ver. 37. and when the eunuch answered, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, then was he instantly baptized: so that the faith required to baptism, was only a hearty acknowledgment that Jesus Christ was the Son of God.

§. 3. And because there be many false, and, in my apprehension, dangerous descriptions of true faith, which have obtained in these latter ages, I will here briefly lay them down, and then proceed to other confirmations of the Scripture-notion of true faith, by which we may abundantly discern the falsehood of them. Now they are such as these, viz.

1. That *faith is a firm assent, by which every true believer is persuaded, not only that remission of sins is promised in the general, but to him in particular. So Calvin; and after him the generality of the French and Dutch divines.

2. That faith consists in the application of Christ's merits to ourselves, in casting ourselves upon the merits of Christ, in apprehending, relying, or laying hold upon Christ for salvation;† or, as others say, it is a recumbency on Christ for salvation. Of all which notions of justifying, or true Christian faith, this is a full confutation, that they are perfectly unscriptural: for, the first cannot be contained in Scripture, it being certain, to a demonstration, that Scripture no where saith, that Daniel, John, or Thomas, &c. have remission of sins. This, therefore, cannot be Divine faith, or faith built immediately on a Divine revelation or record, but rests upon our own experience, or knowledge of ourselves; for the argument must run thus, He that repenteth and believeth, shall be saved. I, Daniel and Thomas, have done this; which may indeed be matter of their knowledge, but not of Divine faith, as being not revealed in Scripture.

Sedan. vol. i. p. 633. §. 12. "Nunc justa fidei definitio nobis constabit, si dicamus esse divinæ erga nos benevolentiæ firmam certamque cognitionem." Calv. Instit. lib. iii. cap. 2. §. 7. 28.

† "The principal acts of saving faith are accepting, receiving, and resting upon Christ alone for justification." Assemb. Catech. chap. 14. q. 2.

"Quo homo electus promissiones gratuitas de Christo sibi applicat, iisque suavissimè acquiescit." Wolleb. Christ. Theol. lib. i. cap. 29. "Fides igitur ista propriè dicitur justificans, qua recumbimus in Christum ad remissionem peccatorum ad salutem." Ames. Theol. lib. i. cap. 27. §. 17.

3. Nor are the other opinions less unscriptural; for we do not once read in Scripture any command to apply Christ's merits to ourselves, or to apprehend his merits, or to lean and roll ourselves upon him for salvation: we find no exhortation in Scripture so to do; no reprehension of any person for not resting on, or not applying Christ's merits to, themselves; no promise made to any upon the application of Christ's merits: in a word, the Scripture is wholly unacquainted with these phrases. And is that likely to be the duty on which our justification, adoption, and all our happiness depends, which hath no precept, promise, or example in the Holy Scripture? But I shall add some farther confirmations of the Scripture-notion of true faith, by which all these unscriptural opinions will be at once confuted. And therefore,

4. The Scripture frequently informs us, that the miracles done by Christ are propounded as the great motive to believe on him, and as the aggravation of their sin, who still continued in their infidelity; and also that the consideration of them caused many to believe. On this account he requires to be believed; If you believe not me, believe my works: (John x. 38. xiv. 11.) for the works that I do bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me. (John v. 36. x. 25.) On this account he pronounces the infidelity of the Jews inexcusable, saying, If I had not done among them the works that no other man did, they had not had sin; but now they have no cloak for their sin. (John xv. 22. 24.) It was this consideration which induced many of them to believe; for many believed on his name when they saw the miracles which he did. (John ii. 23. vii. 30.) Now what were all his miracles designed to produce in them, but a firm belief that he was Christ the Son of God? So doth St. John expressly teach us, saying, There be many other miracles which Jesus did, that are not written in this book; but these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Son of God. (John xx. 30.) If you imagine that faith is a firm assent that Christ died for you in particular, and that you have remission of sins by him; that it is an application of Christ, or of his merits to yourselves, or a rolling yourselves upon him for salvation; how do his miracles convince you that you should thus believe on him? But if you say, it is a firm persuasion that he is the Christ, the Son of God, nothing can be more proper to convince us of the truth of what he thus declared, than these miracles; then may you say with Nicodemus, We know thou art a teacher sent from God: for no man can do such miracles as thou doest, except God were with him. (John iii. 2.)

5. This will be yet more evident from all those places which ascribe our justification and salvation to faith in God, or in him that sent this Jesus into the world. So doth our Lord himself in these words, Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death to life. (John v. 24. xii. 44.) The faith of Abraham is thus described, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness, Rom. iv. 3. i. e. this faith in God was imputed to him for righteousness: when therefore the apostle adds, that he is the father of them that believe, that righteousness might be imputed to them also, ver. 9. must it not be imputed upon their believing in God, as he did? Doth not the apostle hence infer, that unto him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness? ver. 5. Now to believe in him that justifieth the ungodly, is certainly to believe in God the Father, for it is God that justifieth. (Rom. viii. 33.) To be justified by this faith, must therefore signify to be justified by faith in God the Father, according to those words of St. Peter, We through him believe in God, that our faith and hope might be in God. (1 Pet. i. 21.) Now if faith is supposed to consist in believing that our own sins are pardoned, in application of Christ's merits to ourselves, or in rolling ourselves upon the person of Christ, what affinity or connexion is there betwixt believing in God, believing the truth of his promises, as Abraham did, and was justified, and believing that our own sins are pardoned, applying the merits of Christ to ourselves, or rolling ourselves upon him for salvation? But then if justifying faith doth primarily consist in a firm persuasion that Jesus is the Son of God, the Saviour of the world; the Prophet sent of God to shew us the way of salvation; the Lord and King, by whose laws we are to be governed if we would obtain it, then faith in Christ and faith in God are one thing: for God having testified all this concerning his Son Jesus Christ, and also promised that every one that hath seen the Son and believed on him, shall have eternal life; (John vi. 40.) by thus believing we receive his testimony, and set to our seal, that God is true.

6. This may be argued from all those places which ascribe our justification and salvation to the belief of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, or of God's power exercised in raising him from the dead. Thus doth St. Paul in that very chapter in which he professedly disputes of justification by faith; for he expressly declares, that to them that believe in him, who raised Jesus from the dead, that faith shall be imputed for righteousness, Rom. iv. 24. as Abraham's faith in him that quickened the dead was imputed unto him for righteousness. And again, If we believe with the heart that God hath raised up the Lord Jesus from the dead, we shall be saved: for with the heart man believeth to justification, Rom. x. 9, 10. Now what agreement is there betwixt my believing my own sins are pardoned, or my applying Christ's merits to myself, or rolling myself upon him, and Christ's resurrection from the dead by the power of God? But then if we say, that faith is a firm persuasion that Jesus was the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, the Prophet that was to come into the world, the Lord and Ruler over all; this, as he testified of himself whilst living, and God the Father also testified, so was he declared to be the Son of God with power by this resurrection from the dead; (Rom. i. 4.) by this all Israel might know that God had made him Lord and Christ, (Acts ii. 24. 36.) and that God had exalted him to his right hand, to be a Prince and Saviour, to give repentance to Israel, and remission of sins. (Acts v. 31.) Hence the apostle teacheth that Christ died for our sins, and rose again for our justification, Rom. iv. 25. and puts the question, Who is he that condemneth us? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, viii. 34.

7. This appears farther from this consideration, that* in all the Scriptures of the New Testament, there is not to be found one exhortation to any Christian to believe in Christ, or to act faith on Christ. When the apostles preached to Jews or gentiles, men not converted to the Christian faith, they still exhort them to believe that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, or to believe in the Lord Jesus. And this was necessary to be preached to them, to persuade them to believe in, and to obey him; for till they did believe he was a person sent from God, and that they should receive some benefit by doing so, they could have no inducement to own, and no encouragement to obey him. It was therefore necessary that this should be first preached to Jew and gentile, that Christ was a person sent from God to preach the doctrine which he taught, and that remission of sins and everlasting life was to be obtained by his name, and by obedience to this teacher. But then I say, the same apostles in their Epistles directed to those persons who were already Christians, and who had testified their faith by being baptized in the name of Jesus, have not one exhortation to any of them to believe in Christ; but only to be steadfast in the faith, to increase and grow in faith, and to repent of what they had done contrary to the faith they had received. The exhortations of our Lord to the seven churches, and more particularly to that of Sardis, in which there were but very few who had not defiled themselves, (Rev. iii. 1—3.) and that of Laodicea, which he threatened to spew out of his mouth for her lukewarmness, (ver. 16. 18.) are only to repent, and to renew their first works, not to believe in him, or to apply his merits to themselves. Now what account can be given of this thing by those who are so zealous in their sermons to exhort Christians to believe in Christ, to roll themselves upon him, and apply his merits to themselves, and are so full of motives to persuade them so to do? I say, what reason can they give, why men, assisted by the Holy Ghost, never exhorted any Christians to believe, but only to shew forth their faith by their works, (James ii. 18.) and to add unto their faith virtue? (2 Pet. i. 5, &c.) But then if Christian faith be only a firm persuasion that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, the reason is exceeding manifest why no Christian should be exhorted to believe, because whoever is a Christian, not only doth believe all this already, but hath professed his belief of it by being baptized in the name of Jesus. There therefore needs no exhortation to any Christian to believe in Christ, but only to walk answerably to that faith, to be steadfast in it, and to add to his faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, godliness, brotherly kindness, charity, (2 Pet. i. 5. 8.) that they may not be slothful and unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Obj. If it be here objected that St. John saith, These things have I written to you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know ye have eternal life (καὶ ἵνα πιστεύητε), and that ye may believe in the name of the Son of God; (1 John v. 13.) I answer,

First, That the Alexandrian and other Greek manuscripts, read not καὶ ἵνα πιστεύητε, but πιστεύοντες, that ye may know ye have eternal life, who believe in the name of the Son of God. And this reading is confirmed by the Vulgar, the Syriac, and Ethiopic versions.

Secondly, They who retain our version interpret the words thus, That ye may continue to believe in the name of the Son of God; or, that ye may *more firmly and certainly believe. Nor will the words bear any other meaning, unless you will suppose St. John should seriously exhort believers to begin to do what he had told them, in the immediate preceding words, was so effectually done by them already, that they might know they had eternal life.

In a word, either it is true before we actually believe it, that our sins are pardoned, that we have a right to apply Christ's merit to us, and to roll ourselves upon his person for salvation, or it is not. If it be true before we have believed, we must have faith before, since nothing can produce his pardon of our sins, or give us any right to apply his merits to ourselves, or depend on him for salvation, but faith in Christ. If it be not true, we must obtain the pardon of our sins, and an interest in Christ's merits, by believing a lie: and so much for the first particular. To the next inquiry;

§. 4. Secondly, What is it to be justified in St. Paul's acceptation of the word? I answer,

First, That this justification which St. Paul speaks of, is an act of God terminated upon man. This the apostle expressly doth deliver in these words, Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifies, Rom. viii. 33. And again, It is one God that justifies the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith, Rom. iii. 30. It is God that justifieth the ungodly, Rom. iv. 5. He is just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus, Rom. iii. 26. Now, according to the clear tenor of the Scripture,

Secondly, God justifies the sinner by absolving him from the guilt of his past sins, by a free act of grace in pardoning his iniquities, or not imputing his sins to him, and so his justification must import his absolution from the guilt of sin, and, as a necessary and immediate consequence of that, our being reconciled to God, and received into favour with him. This will be evident, if we consider,

First, What the Baptist testified concerning him, that all men might believe, viz. that he was the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world; (John i. 29.) and what Christ testified of himself, viz. that he that believeth in him should not come into condemnation; (John iii. 36.) that his blood was the blood of the new covenant, which was shed for the remission of sins, (Matt. xxvi. 28.) even of that covenant in which God promises to be merciful to our unrighteousness, and to remember our iniquities no more. (Heb. viii. 13. x. 17.) As also from what his apostles promised to win men to the faith of Jesus, viz. remission of sins. Thus, when the Jews were pricked to the heart, and said, What shall we do? St. Peter answers, Repent ye, and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, Acts ii. 37. And again, Repent you, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, Acts iii. 19.: for him hath God exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins, Acts v. 13. St. Peter begins his sermon to Cornelius thus, The word which God hath sent us to preach, is peace by Jesus Christ, Acts x. 36. To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth on him shall receive remission of sins; Acts xiii. 23. St. Paul declares that God had raised up to Israel a Saviour, Jesus: and then he adds, Known therefore be it to you, that through this man is preached to you remission of sins; and in him every believer on him shall be justified from all things, from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses, Heb. x. 1. 4. that law being not able to take away sins, Rom. iii. 23. i. e. to free men from the guilt of sin. Seeing then the benefit proposed to the believer, is the remission of sins to be obtained through Christ, through his name; seeing we are said to be justified through Christ, Rom. v. 9. through faith in his blood, Eph. i. 7. that blood which is so often said to be shed for the remission of our sins, Colos. i. 14. 20. and to procure our peace and our redemption; since, lastly, we are said by believing in Christ to be justified from sin, Acts xiii. 39. which phrase can only signify exemption from the condemnation of it: I say, from these expressions it appears, that God's justification of a sinner by faith, or through faith in the blood of Jesus, is chiefly the remission of the believer's sins, and the exemption of him from the condemnation of the law, by virtue of Christ's blood shed for the remission of sins.

2. This we may learn from the reasonings by which the apostle confirms his conclusion, or the arguments by which he proves, that both Jew and gentile are to be justified by faith without the works of the law, or without works. His conclusion is laid down, Rom. i. 17. thus, The righteousness of God (which proceeds) from faith, is revealed in the gospel, to (beget) faith in Jew and gentile, ver. 16. (See the note there.) And this way of obtaining righteousness or justification he proves to be absolutely necessary to them both, beginning first with the gentiles, whom he pronounces subject to the wrath of God, for holding the truth (they by the light of nature knew) in unrighteousness, ver. 18. And this he proves to the end of that chapter, which concludes thus, That they knowing the judgment of God, that they who did such things were worthy of death, not only did the same, but had pleasure in them that did them. In the second chapter he declares the Jews guilty of the same things the heathens did, and so obnoxious to the same condemnation, and also guilty of violating the law of Moses; and thence concludes, that as to this matter there was no difference between them, he having proved both Jews and gentiles to be all under sin, (iii. 9.) and so both equally needing to be justified by faith, or to be justified freely by an act of grace, pardoning their sins through faith in Christ, (ver. 24.) His argument then is plainly this; Both Jew and gentile lie under the guilt of sin, there being none of them that is righteous, (Rom. iii. 9.) i. e. free from sin, no not one, (ver. 10.) Neither of them can be justified by the law, because they by the sentence of it are ὑπόδικοι τῷ Θεῷ, guilty before God, (ver. 19, 20.) and obnoxious to punishment, as being both transgressors of it; therefore (saith he) by the law can no flesh be justified, for by the law is the knowledge of sin, rendering us obnoxious to condemnation: where then there remains the guilt of sin, there can be no justification; where therefore there is remission of sin, and so a freedom from being guilty of it before God, there is justification. Again, all have sinned (saith he) and fallen short of the glory of God; (ver. 23.) that is, either of his approbation, as that phrase signifies, John xii. 43. or of the fruition of the glory of God, as it imports, Rom. v. 1, 2. therefore absolution from this sin must be sufficient to make us obtain this glory of God. We who have thus sinned (saith he) are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, (ver. 24.) Now what is this redemption? It is, saith the same apostle twice, remission of our sins, Eph. i. 7. Colos. i. 14. The apostle argues to the same effect in the Epistle to the Galatians, that justification cannot be by the law, because the law cannot give life; and this it cannot do, because the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, (Gal. iii. 21, 22.) and so shut out that way of being justified: our freedom therefore from the guilt of sin, must be sufficient for our justification to life. In his fourth chapter to the Romans he describes justification by the not imputing sin, and the forgiveness of it, in these words, To him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness, (ver. 5.) As David speaks of the blessedness of the man to whom the Lord imputeth righteousness without works, (ver. 6.) saying, Blessed are they whose unrighteousness is forgiven, and whose sin is covered, (ver. 7.) Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth not sin, (ver. 8.) Since then the blessedness of which the apostle was discoursing was that of justification, the justification of the ungodly, and since this blessedness is said to consist in the remission, covering, the not imputing his sins to him, it cannot reasonably be denied, that the blessedness of a justified person is here described by the blessedness of a pardoned person, as being one and the same thing.

3. This will be farther evident from the consideration of the phrases the apostle useth as equivalent to justification, and interpretative of it. As,

1. Reconciliation to God: that this is the same with justification, appears by these words; Much more being justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath by him: for if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life, Rom. v. 9, 10, where to be justified by his blood, and reconciled by his death, seem plainly the same thing. Now, that reconciliation is effected by the remission of sins, is evident from these words; God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them, 2 Cor. v. 19. and therefore justification also must be so obtained: for if, upon the not imputing sin to us, God did not account us as righteous, he could not be reconciled to us, because he cannot be reconciled to any man continuing unrighteous, or under the notion of a sinner.

2. Justification stands utterly opposed to condemnation, in these words; Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect, or to believers? τίς ἐγκαλέσει κατὰ, who shall object a crime against them? It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth them? Rom. i. 33, 34. And again, If the administration of condemnation, i. e. the law, which chargeth us with guilt, and so rendereth us obnoxious to condemnation, was glorious, much more the ministration, τῆς δικαιοσύνης, of justification, doth exceed in glory, 2 Cor. iii. 9. Now what is it that mankind is accused of, and charged with by the law, but sin? What is it that they stand condemned for at God's bar, but the transgression of his law? justification, therefore, which stands opposed to it, must be a clearing and discharging them from the guilt or the condemning power of sin.

3. Justification is said to be from sin; By him all that believe are justified, ἐκ πάντων, from all those sins from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses, Acts xiii. 39. And again, The judgment was from one sin to condem- nation, but the free gift to justification, ἐκ πολλῶν ἁμαρτημάτων, from many sins, Rom. v. 16. Now what can justification from sin signify besides our absolution from the guilt of sin?

4. The justifying the believer and the remission of his sins are divers expressions of the same thing, as is apparent from these words, God hath set forth Christ Jesus to be a propitiation through faith in his blood: this he hath done, saith the apostle, to declare his righteousness in the remission of sins, Rom. iii. 25. viz. to those that have this faith, i. e. to manifest the way of justification by faith, which he alone admits of for the remission of sins. He did this, saith the next verse, to declare his righteousness, that he might be just, in requiring this propitiation for our sins, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus, ver. 26. Is it not therefore manifest, that to justify the believer and to remit his sins, must be the same thing?

5. We are justified (saith the apostle) through the redemption that is in Jesus, through faith in his blood, Rom. iii. 24, 25. through his blood, Rom. v. 9. Now what doth this blood procure for us? Forgiveness of sins, Eph. i. 7. Colos. i. 14. saith the apostle, it being shed for the remission of sins, Matt. xxvi. 28. he appearing in the end of the world to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself, Heb. ix. 26. What benefit have believers by it? He hath loved them, and washed them from their sins in his blood, Rev. i. 5. he hath made peace for them by the blood of his cross, Colos. i. 20. with a God only angry for sin; he hath obtained eternal redemption from transgressions by it, Heb. ix. 12. 15. By all these equivalent expressions it appears, that God's justifying the sinner, in St. Paul's sense of the expression, is his absolving him from the guilt of his past sins, from punishment and condemnation by the law for them, by an act of grace and free pardon of them through the blood of Jesus; his being as fully reconciled to us, as if we never had offended against the former covenant we were all under, till the new covenant was established in the blood of Jesus.

§. 5. Thirdly, I add, that this justification is, by St. Paul, ascribed to faith alone, in opposition to works of righteousness done, either by the Jew or gentile. This plainly follows from that notion of justification which I have established as the true sense of the expression in St. Paul; for how could Jew or gentile be justified by the works of that law, whether Mosaical or natural, which rendered them both obnoxious to condemnation for sin, and guilty before God? Could they receive remission of sins by compliance with that law, which left them under condemnation for it? Can any man imagine, after the charge he lays against the gentiles, chap. i. and against the Jews, chap. ii. iii. he could have any inclination to assert they should be justified, or absolved from the guilt of those offences by their works, and not by faith only? The mistake in this matter seems to lie here, that men look upon justification, not as looking backward only, and procuring an absolution from our past sins; but as looking forward to our whole Christian conversation, and importing our absolution from all our sins committed against the tenor of the covenant of grace, or the new covenant; whereas it only doth consist, ἐν τῇ παρέσει τῶν προγεγονότων ἁμαρτημάτων, in the remission of our past sins, Rom. iii. 25. in the redemption of us from τῶν ἐπὶ τῇ πρώτῃ διαθήκῃ παραβάσεων, the sins committed against our former covenant, Heb. ix. 15. in the purgation of the believer, τῶν πάλαι αὐτοῦ ἁμαρτιῶν, from his old sins, 2 Pet. i. 9. and leaves us afterward to be absolved or condemned, as we obey, perform, or violate the conditions of the new covenant, and so to be judged hereafter, not according to our faith, but works. (See the note on Rom. iii. 25.)

Secondly, This is exceeding evident from the plain words of the apostle, and by the arguments, by which he proves we must be justified by faith, and not by works. For (saith he) by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight; for by the law is the knowledge of (that) sin (which renders us obnoxious to condemnation). Now this knowledge of sin, being chiefly produced by the moral law, Rom. vii. 7. shews the apostle excludes as well that as the ceremonial law from justification. And evident it is, that the antithesis runs all along not between ceremonial and moral works, or between works done by the law of Moses, or by the tenor of the law of nature, but between works in general, and faith, the law of works and the law of faith. Again, We are (saith he) justified freely by his grace, Rom. iii. 24. i. e. by a free act of grace in pardoning our past sins, by which we had fallen short of the glory of God. Now a free act of grace is still opposed to works. Thus, if our election or calling to the faith of Christ, be of grace, then is it not of works, Rom. xi. 6. By grace ye are saved through faith, not of works, Eph. ii. 8, 9. (See the note there.) Not by works of righteousness which we had done (before the goodness and loving-kindness of God our Saviour appeared to us), but according to his mercy he saved us, Tit. iii. 5. (See the note there.) Moreover, we reckon, saith he, that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law, ver. 28. where it is on all sides granted, that the works of the law of Moses are entirely excluded from justification by faith, and then much more the works of the gentiles; it being the same God who justifies the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith, ver. 30. In the next chapter he saith, To him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is reckoned for righteousness, Rom. iv. 5. Now, how can the ungodly be justified by works, and by what words can works be more entirely excluded, than by not working?

Thirdly, That evangelical obedience, or works of righteousness, done by us after faith in Christ, are excluded from that faith which justifies, is evident, because they follow the faith which justifies, i. e. procures the pardon of our past sins. For (saith the apostle) we are saved (from the wrath due unto us for our past sins, Rom. v. 9. or, we are put into the way or state of salvation) by grace through faith, not of works; for we are created in Jesus Christ to good works, which God hath ordained that we should walk in, Eph. ii. 8—10. So that we must be first in Christ by virtue of this faith, before we can be fitted to do works of evangelical righteousness. And this argument may be confirmed from many instances of persons who believed, and were immediately baptized the same day; for, being baptized for the remission of sins, they must be justified. Thus, at St. Peter's sermon, three thousand believed, and were baptized the same day, Acts ii. 41. Thus the Samaritans, upon the hearing Philip preach concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of the Lord Jesus, were immediately baptized, Acts viii. 12. so also was the eunuch upon his preaching to him, ver. 38. so was Cornelius, and all that heard St. Peter's sermon, Acts x. 48. so was the gaoler, and all his house straightway, Acts xvi. 33. (See Acts ix.

35. 42. xi. 21. xiii. 12. 48, 49. xiv. 1. xvii. 4. 12. 34. xix. 18. Now what evangelical obedience could these men perform to render them justified by works?

Fourthly, This may be fairly argued from the example of Abraham's justification, and the passage whence St. Paul concludes it; Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness: for it deserves to be observed, that Abraham had faith, or was a believer, before this was said unto him; for by faith Abraham, being called, obeyed, and went forth, Heb. xi. 8. and after by a strong faith he offered up his son Isaac, believing that God was able to raise him from the dead, ver. 17. But neither of these instances is pitched upon by the apostle as fit for his purpose, because in both obedience was joined with faith, whereas here was a pure act of faith without works; and of this act of faith it is said, what is not said of either of the other, it was imputed to him for righteousness. If therefore thus it was in the example of the father of the faithful, we may hence conclude it was so also in the children of faithful Abraham.

Lastly, The Scripture is express and frequent in this assertion, that believers are justified by faith; in which expression either faith must include works, or evangelical obedience, or it doth not; if it doth not, we must be justified by faith alone: and that it doth not formally include works of evangelical righteousness, appears,

First, From the plain distinction which the Scripture puts between them, when it informs us, Gal. v. 6. James ii. 18. 22. 2 Pet. i. 5, 6. Rom. xvi. 26. 1 Thess. i. 3. that faith works by love, acts with our works, and is made perfect by them; when it calls upon us to shew forth our faith by our works, and to add to our faith, virtue, knowledge, godliness, temperance, patience, brotherly-kindness, charity; and when it speaks of the works of faith, and the obedience of faith.

Secondly, Faith, in the nature of it, is only an assent to a testimony; Divine faith, an assent to a Divine testimony; faith in Christ, an assent to the testimony given by God of Christ. Now it is not reasonable to conceive, that Christ and his apostles, making use of a word which had this known and fixed import, should mean more by the word than what it signified in common use, as sure they must have done, had they included in the meaning of the word the whole of our evangelical righteousness. Though therefore faith is the spring and the foundation of that righteousness, and, where it is cordial and lasting, will most assuredly produce it; yet is not that righteousness included in the very nature, or contained in the very import of it.

Obj. But doth not St. James say expressly, that a man is justified by works, and not by faith only? ii. 24.

Ans. In answer to this capital objection, I shall first produce the words of the apostle James, with a short paraphrase, and then return a positive answer to the objection. The words I paraphrase thus:

Ver. 14. (And let not any Jew or Christian think his faith sufficient to justify and save him, without those works of charity and mercy herespoken of, ver. 8—13. for) what doth it profit, my brethren, if a man say he hath faith, (i. e. in words profess to have faith in God, ver. 19. or in Christ, ver. 1.) and have no works (to evidence the truth of that profession)? can (such a naked, fruitless) faith save him?

Ver. 15. If a brother or sister be naked, or destitute of daily food;

Ver. 16. And one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be you warmed and filled, (making profession of compassion for, and good-will to them in your words, but) notwithstanding ye give them not those things which be needful for (the clothing or feeding of) the body, what doth it profit (them to hear your kind words)?

Ver. 17. Even so faith (professed with the mouth), if it hath not works (answerable to that profession, or consequent upon it), is dead (and fruitless as those words), being alone (i. e. without works shewing the truth of it).

Ver. 18. Yea, a man may say (to such a solifidian), Thou hast (in profession) faith, and I have (real) works: shew me thy faith (which thou professest) without thy works (which thou canst never do, faith being seated in the heart, and only discoverable by its effects), and I will shew thee by my works my faith (as the cause is demonstrated by the effect).

Ver. 19. Thou (being a Jew) believest there is one God; thou (in this) doest well: (but doest no more than the very devils; for) the devils also believe and tremble (and if thou hast no better faith than they, thou hast the same reason to tremble which they have).

Ver. 20. But wilt thou know, O vain man (who makest profession of such a naked faith), that faith without works is dead? (and so unable to justify or save thee: see it in the example of that very Abraham, in thy relation to whom thou so confidest:

Ver. 21. For) was not Abraham (whom we style) our father justified by works (proceeding from his faith), when he had offered his son Isaac upon the altar? (counting that God was able to raise him from the dead, Heb. xi. 17. 19.)

Ver. 22. Seest thou how (Gr. thou seest by this example, that) faith wrought with his works (to produce them)? and by works was faith made perfect (and advanced in him to the greatest height).

Ver. 23. And the Scripture was (again) fulfilled, which saith, Abraham believed (in) God, and it (viz. that faith which produced these works) was accounted to him for righteousness: and (upon that account) he was called the Friend of God.

Ver. 24. Ye see then how that by works (proceeding from faith) a man is justified, and not by faith only (i. e. being alone, and without them).

Now, in answer to the objection from these words, I say, That when St. Paul saith, we are justified by faith without the works of the law, and that to him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, faith is imputed for righteousness, or to justification; justification there ascribed to faith without works, imports only our absolution from condemnation by reason of our past sins committed before faith in Christ, and our reconciliation to God by the pardon of them, or the not imputing them to those who believe in him. This I have shewed already, and it is apparent, from the chief argument the apostle useth, to prove that both Jew and gentile should be justified freely by his grace, and not by works, because they were all under sin, and become guilty before God, all having sinned, and come short of the glory of God, Rom. iii. 9. 19. 23. whereas, saith he, being justified by faith, we have peace with God, and rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, Rom. v. 1, 2. Therefore, chap. iii. he must be speaking of the condition both of Jew and gentile, before faith in Christ. So again when the apostle saith, The Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise (of justification) by (the) faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe (in him). Wherefore the law was (then) our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith (in him); but now, after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster (i. e. under the pedagogy of the law); for ye are all the children of God through faith in Christ Jesus, Gal. iii. 22—26. he plainly insinuates that we cannot be justified by the works of the law, because the law leads us to Christ for justification. And again, We are justified by grace, not of works; for we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to good works, Eph. ii. 10. Where the argument seems plainly to run thus, We cannot be justified by works preceding faith, because we do no good works till by faith we are interested in Christ Jesus: whereas St. James speaks plainly of those works which follow faith, are wrought by it, and are the effects of it, and of their necessity in order to our continuance in a state of justification, and our freedom from final condemnation. St. James speaks of a mere profession of faith with the mouth; St. Paul of believing from the heart: St. James of a faith dead and fruitless, when we have it; St. Paul of a faith working by love when we have it, and of a person only justified without works, because he had no faith to produce them.

§. VI. Fourthly, It seemeth necessary from the nature of the thing, and the state and condition of the persons to whom the gospel was first preached, that they should be justified, or absolved from the guilt of their past sins, without new obedience, or without actual obedience to all the commandments of Christ; though not without that faith which did engage them to it, and was sufficient to produce it. For,

First, This was all that could be done by the convinced Jews or gentiles, who at one sermon or discourse believed, and were baptized for the remission of sins. It is manifest they then knew but little of the commandments of Christ, and so could not be doers of them. Either then they were not justified, and then faith is not imputed to them for righteousness, nor did baptism consign to them remission of sins; or they were justified by that faith which did not include actual obedience to all the commandments of Christ, as the condition of that justification. And seeing perseverance to the end, and being faithful to the death, are by our Lord himself made the conditions of salvation, and of receiving from his hands the crown of life; if these be also the conditions of the justification promised to faith in Christ, no person is or can be justified by faith till he dies. This faith, therefore, in Jew and gentile, thus converted, could only import three things: (1.) By way of preparation for it, an owning the true God, who gave this testimony to his Son, and so a turning from dumb idols to serve the living God, and a sorrow for their sins committed against him in the time of their ignorance; and in the Jews, a sorrow for their past sins, and in particular for having crucified the Lord of life; and in this sense repentance goes before faith: and Christ's apostles preached to the Jews repentance for the remission of sins through faith in his name, Acts xiv. 15. and to the gentiles, to turn from these vain things to the living God, who made heaven and earth; and to both, repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, Acts xx. 21. (2.) As a means to obtain this remission of sins, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. (3.) An engagement for the future to cease from sin, and to give up themselves to the service of God, according to the rules and precepts delivered to them by his Son. Now this engagement was virtually contained in their repentance and their faith in Christ, and was solemnly made by them at their baptism, as will be proved hereafter. Now this being all that they could then do, it must be all they were obliged to do, in order to their justification; and yet it is certain, that a promise of obedience is not obedience, and that even the new covenant requires, in order to salvation, a sincere and constant performance of the obedience thus promised: so that the conditions of salvation, and of justification from our past offences, can never be the same.

Secondly, This will be farther evident, if we consider that no man can enter into covenant with God, be reconciled to him, be admitted to his grace and favour, or be enabled to serve him acceptably, till his sins be pardoned; for God cannot be reconciled to sinners whilst they continue under the guilt of sin unpardoned; nor can he enter into covenant with them, or receive them to his grace and favour, or accept their services, till he be reconciled to them. When God entered into covenant with his own people, a sacrifice was first offered to make atonement for their sins, and the blood of it was sprinkled upon all the people; (Heb. ix. 19.) and the new covenant, in which he promised to be merciful to our iniquities, and to remember our sins no more, was established in the blood of Jesus shed for the remission of our sins: so that the sins of a believer must be immediately pardoned upon his faith in Christ, or he can have no peace with God, no reconcilement to him, no interest in the new covenant, and be in no capacity to do him any acceptable service. This is the import of those words, Christ suffered for our sins, ἵνα ἡμᾶς προσαγάγῃ τῷ Θεῷ, that he might bring us to God, 1 Pet. iii. 18. for to bring us to God in all other places of the New Testament, in which this phrase is used with respect to Christ, is to give us freedom of access to God, who by our sins were formerly excluded from it, and banished from his gracious presence: by him (saith the apostle) we have προσαγωγὴν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα, admission to the Father, Eph. ii. 18. By him we do obtain a freedom εἰς τὴν προσαγωγὴν, of access to God with confidence, Eph. iii. 12. This is obtained, saith the same apostle, by virtue of Christ's blood; for we, who sometimes were afar off, are by the blood of Christ brought nigh unto him, for he is our peace, ver. 13, 14. and he hath reconciled both Jew and gentile to God by his cross. If then the blood of Christ procured this freedom of access to God, it is certain we had no freedom of access to him without it; and it is as certain we must have it by that faith which giveth us an interest in the propitiation purchased by it.

To set this matter in the clearest light, and shew the reason why it was necessary that such an act of grace in pardoning our past sins upon our faith in Christ should be vouchsafed, that so we might be reconciled to God, capacitated for his friendship, and fitted for his service, let it be observed,

First, That to come to God, is to approach him in the way of worship, as in those words, He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him, Heb. xi. 6. (See Psal. xlii. 2. lxv. 2. lxxxvi. 9. xcv. 26. Isa. i. 12.)

Secondly, That God being a holy God, none were to come into his presence who had any pollution or defilement upon them, upon pain of death, till they were sanctified, or cleansed from it by some purification or atonement made for them to God. He dwelt in the whole camp of Israel, and so those lepers, who were so unclean as to pollute the camp, were driven from it: (Lev. xiii. 46. Numb. v. 2, 3. 2 Kings xv. 5.) and those sin-offerings which were polluted with the sins of the whole congregation, were carried out of the camp. (Lev. xvi. 21, 22. 27. Heb. xiii. 11.) God dwelt more especially in the temple, and therefore they who had lesser impurities, i. e. who were defiled by the dead, or by an issue, and all menstruous women, were not to come thither till they were cleansed from those defilements. (Lev. xii. 14. xv. 21.) Moreover, he being a God of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, they who had committed any sin of ignorance, or lay under the guilt of it, were not permitted to come into the court of the God of Israel, till they had brought their offering of atonement. (See Ainsworth on Numb. v. 3.)

Thirdly, They who had no ceremonial defilement to be purged away, and no known sin to make atonement for, were admitted to come near to God, as being holy; they had προσαγωγὴν τῷ Θεῷ, a freedom of access to God in his tabernacle, and in his temple; whence they are styled, ὁ λαὸς ἐγγίζων αὐτῷ, the people that draw near to God, Psal. lxv. 4. cxlviii. 14. Lev. x. 3. And God is said to be ὁ Θεὸς ἐγγίζων αὐτοῖς, a God drawing near to them, Deut. vii. 4. both by relation, as having owned them as his children, and entered into covenant to be their God; and by his more especial presence with them; for the Schechinah, or the glorious presence, dwelt among them in the holy place, and so to them belonged, ἡ λατρεία, the privilege of coming to his court to worship him, and a promise of his blessing if they sincerely did it: whereas the heathens, who by reason of their idolatry were not permitted to serve him, are said to be afar off, and so far without God in the world, as to have no freedom of access to his service, no such converse with him, or relation to him. (Eph. i. 12, 13. 17. 19.)

Now God being still as holy a God as ever, and still of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, the Scriptures of the New Testament seem as plainly to make our freedom of access to God to depend upon our being sanctified in the sacrificial sense, i. e. our being purged and delivered from the guilt of sin by an atonement made for us by the blood of Christ, that our sins being thus pardoned through faith in his blood, we may have peace with God, and an access to his favour. This plainly seems to be the import of those words, If the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of a heifer, sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh (and by so doing procureth an admission of the person cleansed to serve God in the sanctuary), how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God (for us), purge your conscience from dead works, Heb. ix. 12. (or works exposing you to death, the punishment of the person who came unclean into God's presence, that so you may be admitted) to serve the living God? (See the notes there.) So again, the apostle having said that the covenant established in the blood of Christ, was this, that he would be merciful to our iniquities, and remember our sins no more; and having thence inferred, that having thus obtained remission for us, there was no need that he should make himself again an offering for sin, he adds, that therefore we may draw near to God with full assurance of faith, that we shall be accepted through the Beloved, as having our hearts sprinkled by his blood, and therefore cleansed from all guilt of conscience, and our bodies washed (by baptism) with pure water. (Heb. x. 16—21.)

Two things observed by the judicious Dr. Barrow, seem here considerable:

First, "That the apostle in this discourse implies that no precedent dispensation had exhibited any manifest overture or promise of pardon, and upon that account we were in a main point defective; for the light of nature doth only direct to duty, condemning every man in his own judgment and conscience, who transgresseth; but as to pardon, in case of transgression, it is blind and silent: and the law of Moses rigorously exacteth punctual obedience, denouncing in express terms a condemnation and curse to the transgressors of it in any part; and so it was a law, οὐ δυνάμενος ζωοποιῆσαι, not able to give life, (Gal. iii. 21.) or save us from death. Hence doth the apostle lay down this as the foundation of this whole dispute, that the gospel alone was the power of God through faith to the salvation both of Jew and gentile, Rom. i. 16, 17. because in that alone was the righteousness of God by faith revealed to beget faith in them, even the faith by which the just shall live, declaring that no precedent dispensation could justify any man, and that a man is justified by faith, or hath an absolute need of such a justification as that which the gospel tendereth. Λογιζόμεθα οὖν, We therefore collect (saith he), that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law, whether natural or Mosaical; which justification must therefore import their receiving that free pardon which the criminal and guilty world did stand in need of, and without which no man could have any comfort in his mind, or peace with God: for if the state of man was a state of rebellion, and so of heinous guilt, of having forfeited God's favour, and of obnoxiousness to his wrath, then that justification, which he needed, must be a dispensation of mercy removing that guilt, and restoring him to the favour of God."

And this may also strongly be argued from the objections which the Jew and gentile made against this doctrine of justification by a free act of grace, that it seemed to render it unjust in God to take vengeance on those sins which tended so highly to the glory of God's grace; (see the note on Rom. iii. 5.) and to encourage us to do evil that good may come; (see the note on ver. 8.) and more especially from the objections which he answers, vi. 1. 15. For thus they run, τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; What do we say then? (do we say this,) Let us (who have received this grace) continue (still) in sin, that grace may abound (towards us)? And ver. 15. What then, shall we (go on in) sin, because we are not under the law (which condemns us to death for every transgression), but under (that covenant of) grace (which allows the pardon, and promises the forgiveness of it)? That is, do we, by declaring that we are justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, (iii. 24.) and that as sin abounded, grace did more abound, give just occasion for these inferences? Now, if the faith to which St. Paul, in this discourse, ascribed our justification, did not oblige us to, but even comprehend and include evangelical and constant obedience, what colour could there be for these objections? And therefore,

Secondly, The doctor (p. 83.) proposes it as his conjecture, that the apostle in this discourse designedly sets himself to answer this objection of the Jew and gentile against this doctrine of Christianity; viz. That it did upon so slender a condition or performance as that of faith, tender to all persons indifferently, howsoever culpable their former lives had been, a plenary remission of their sins, and reception into God's favour. The Jews could not conceive or relish, that any man so easily should be translated into a state equal or superior to that which they supposed they did enjoy, The gentiles themselves could hardly digest it, that the Christians said, Believe, and ἡ πίστις σου σώσει σε, thy faith shall save thee: this is one of the exceptions which Celsus makes against it. And Zozimus* having said, that the heathen priests having told Constantine that their religion afforded no purgation for his crimes, he was persuaded to embrace Christianity, as being told the Christian doctrine would take away all sin; and had this promise annexed to it, That the ungodly who would embrace it, should presently be absolved from all sins; intimates, that he looked on this as a just exception against the Christian faith.† This prejudice against the gospel, saith he, St. Paul removes, by shewing, that "because of all men's guilt and sinfulness, such an exhibition of mercy, such an overture of acceptance and remission of sins, was necessary in order to salvation; so that without it no man could be exempted from wrath and misery, and that consequently all other religions, as not exhibiting such a remission, must be esteemed in a main point defective."

§. VII. Obj. 1. But against this it may be objected, that our justification seems to be connected with our glorification; for whom he justifies, them he also glorifies. (Rom. viii. 30.) Now it is certain that our future state of glory depends not only on our faith, but works; and by the same apostle, in the same Epistle, is promised to him that worketh good, (Rom. ii. 6, 7. 10.) we being all to be hereafter recompensed according to our works.

Ans. 1. To this it may be answered in the words of the reverend Dr. Hammond (Pr. Cat. p. 89.) "That whom God justifies, if they pass out of this life in a justified state, them he will certainly glorify;" or, as in his paraphrase, "Whom he called to suffer after the example of his Son, them, upon patience and perseverance under those sufferings, he justifies, i. e. he approves of as sincere and worthy, as they suffer for, so to be glorified with him, Rom. viii. 17. 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12. 1 Pet. iv. 13. and whom he thus justifies, them he will also glorify." And according to this import of the words, justification doth not signify, as in the great dispute of the apostle, the remission of our past sins committed before faith in Christ; but rather our justification at the great day of our accounts, as his sincere and faithful servants. As it seems to import most clearly in those words of the same apostle, I know nothing of myself (whereby to condemn myself of unfaithfulness in the discharge of my office), yet I am not thereby justified, but he that judgeth me is the Lord, 1 Cor. iv. 4. And in those words of the Epistle to the Romans, Not the hearers of the law only shall be δίκαιοι, just before God, but the doers of the law, δικαιωθήσονται, shall be justified [illegible]emen[illegible]tom. ii. 13.) and so St. James, Abraham was justified by works, and he was called the Friend of God.

Ans. 2. But secondly, there is another ancient interpretation of these words, which cuts off the whole force of this argument, viz. Those he glorified, by giving them that Spirit of glory, and of God, who is the earnest of their future inheritance. He glorified them (say St. Chrysostom,* Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact), by the Spirit of adoption, calling them sons, and giving them the grace of the Holy Spirit. To strengthen this interpretation, let it be considered, that our Saviour is said, whilst he was on earth, to have wrought his miracles by the Spirit of God; and by those miracles he is said sometimes to be δοξαζόμενος glorified, (Luke iv. 15.) sometimes to shew forth τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ his glory, (John ii. 11.) and sometimes it is said that God ἐδόξασε glorified him. (John viii. 54. xi. 4. xiii. 31, 32. xvi. 14.) And when Christ gave to his apostles and believers the Holy Spirit, to enable them to work the like miracles, he expresses himself thus to his Father, The glory which thou gavest me I have given them, that the world may know that thou hast sent me. (John xvii. 22, 23.) Moreover, by reason of this Spirit given with the gospel, the ministration of justification is said to be ἐν δόξῃ, with, or in glory, (2 Cor. iii. 8—11.) as being the ministration of the Spirit; and believers, by the participation of this Spirit of the Lord, are said not only to behold the glory of the Lord, but also to be changed into the same image with him from glory to glory, (ver. 18.) and so to be conformed to the image of his Son. And thus, saith Origen on this place,† they may be said to be glorified in this life. Note also, that when the apostle speaks of our final glorification in this chapter, he still speaks of it as a thing future, saying, We shall be glorified with him, (ver. 17, 18. 21.) whereas here he speaks of it as a thing past already, saying, οὓς δὲ ἐδικαίωσε, τούτους καὶ ἐδόξασε, whom he hath justified, them he hath also glorified; which confirms this interpretation. And, lastly, thus it connects well with the foregoing words, The Spirit which helpeth our infirmities, intercedeth according to the mind of God for the saints; Οἴδαμεν δὲ, we know therefore that all things shall work together for good to them who love God, who are called according to his purpose (of making them the sons of God by adoption, and giving them the Spirit of his Son in their hearts, Gal. iv. 6. Eph. i. 5. 13.) for whom he (thus) foreknew, them he predestinated (or appointed) to be thus conformed to the image of his Son; and whom he (thus) predestinated, them he also called (to the Christian faith); and whom he called (upon their cordial embracing of that faith) he justified, (we being made the sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus, Gal. iii. 26.) and whom he (hath thus) justified, them he hath also glorified.

§. VIII. Obj. 2. It may be said, that not only our justification, but salvation, is by the apostle ascribed to faith: as when he says, By grace ye are saved through faith, Eph. ii. 8, 9. and, If thou believest with the heart, thou shalt be saved, Rom. x. 9. Tit. iii. 5. whereas doubtless salvation dependeth on our works, which therefore must be included in this faith.

Ans. To this objection I answer, that salvation may very well in Scripture be ascribed to faith upon these two accounts:

1. Because faith puts us in the way of salvation; that way of owning the Saviour of the world, and subjecting ourselves to his government, which gives us a present right to salvation, should God take us hence soon after baptism into this faith, or a sincere belief in Christ; as in the case of those many martyrs who believed and suffered the same day; and if we live by, and suitably to, this faith, still owning the Lord Jesus, and still subjecting ourselves to his laws and government, will keep us in the state of salvation; for he that (thus) believeth in the Son hath eternal life, John iii. 36. (see ver. 16.) i. e. he hath a present right to it, and may rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, and by continuing so to do, he shall receive the end of his faith even the salvation of his soul. It puts us in a present state of freedom from condemnation, by procuring the pardon of all our past sins; for he that thus believeth shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death to life. (John v. 24. iii. 18.) It doth at present save us from the wrath of God, he being only angry with us on the account of sin unpardoned; for being justified (saith the apostle) by faith in his blood, we shall be saved from wrath by him. (Rom. v. 9.) Now this is all which very frequently is signified by the words saved and salvation: as when it is said of Zaccheus, This day is salvation come unto this house; and the Lord daily added to the church τοὺς σωζομένους, the saved, Acts ii. 47. and again, The word of the cross is τοῖς σωζομένοις ἡμῖν, to us the saved, the power of God, 2 Cor. i. 18. See this farther proved in the notes on Eph. iii. 8. Tit. iii. 5.

Secondly, Salvation may be well ascribed to faith, not indeed in opposition to, or exclusion of, works, but rather as the cause and the producer of all works of piety and righteousness: and both the wisdom and the excellency of this method for the procuring the great ends of Christian piety, of purity of life, and of sincere obedience to the whole will of God, will be extremely evident from these considerations:

1. That this faith consigned by baptism doth lay the highest obligations on us to a life of holiness and obedience, under the pain of forfeiting all the blessings of the new covenant, or all the privileges of Christianity. For, (1.) faith in him as the true Messiah, the Prophet sent from God to declare his will, and make known his precepts, and to lay down the terms on which we may expect salvation from him, must surely oblige us to perform that will, and to submit to the terms on which alone salvation is thus tendered to us, not only that we may not miss of that salvation, but that we may not be condemned as despisers of so great salvation.

Again, Faith in him as our Saviour, one who hath, by his death, purchased deliverance to us from death, and from the wrath to come, must surely oblige us, as well in point of duty as of gratitude, to live to him who died for us, (2 Cor. v. 15.) and being bought with such a price, to glorify him with our souls and bodies which are his; (1 Cor. vi. 20.) especially when we consider, that this was one great end of these his sufferings; he having died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live to themselves, but to him that died for them; that he might redeem us from this present evil world, (Gal. i. 4.) and purify us to himself, a people zealous of good works, (Eph. v. 25, 26.) and that we being dead to sin, might live to righteousness: (1 Pet. ii. 24.) and surely, they cannot expect the blessings of his salutary passion, who defeat the design and frustrate the purpose of it.

Faith in him, as our Lord and King, as it doth presuppose his right to require service from, and prescribe laws to us, so must it engage us to the honour and service of this Lord, (for why, saith he, call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things that I say? Luke vi. 46.) to fear and to obey this King of saints, as knowing he will say to all his disobedient subjects, Bring these mine enemies, which would not I should reign over them, and slay them before me. (Luke xix. 27.)

Faith, lastly, in him as our Judge and our Rewarder, must cause us herein to exercise ourselves always to have consciences void of offence towards God and man, (Acts xxiv. 16.) as we desire to be found blameless at that day, and to be steadfast and abounding in the work of the Lord, which will so plentifully be rewarded. (1 Cor. xv. 58.)

In a word, to what other end can we think a holy God was so concerned that we should firmly be persuaded of, and yield a free assent to, these things? Can it be only this, that he should fill our heads with notions, but leave us still at liberty to disobey the message sent us from heaven by his only Son? why then, said he, This is my beloved Son, hear him? (Matt. xvii. 5.) Can he suffer us to slight the terms on which alone salvation is thus tendered to us? why then were they at all propounded? Can he permit us to be disobedient to this Lord, or rebels to this King of saints? why then was this authority conferred upon him? Hath he made him the judge and rewarder of all men at the great day? and will he not reward them all according to their works?

But then if we consider farther this faith, as it hath baptism annexed to it, according to these words of Christ, He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved; our obligation to obedience by it will still be more evident. For, is not our baptism in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, an entire dedication of ourselves to the service of the blessed Trinity, a solemn entrance into covenant that we will own no other God, will serve no other Lord, will not be led by the unclean, but by the conduct of the good and Holy Spirit? Did not Christ command his disciples to teach them whom they baptized, to observe all things which he commanded? (Matt. xxviii. 20.) and must they not be obliged to obey what they were to be taught in his name? What is it to baptize, but μαθητεύειν, to make disciples to the holy Jesus? and hath he not said, Then only are ye my disciples indeed, when ye continue in my word? (John viii. 31.) What is it to be baptized, but to make the stipulation of a good conscience towards God? (1 Pet. iii. 21.) and are not we obliged to be true to this solemn promise made to God? or can we neglect to do so without mocking him, and taking his sacred name in vain? Are we not baptized into the name of Christ? and are not they who name that name engaged to depart from all iniquity? (2 Tim. ii. 19.) Hath not St. Paul informed us, that as many as are baptized into Christ, are baptized into his death? (Rom. vi. 3.) and so are by that baptism obliged to die to sin, (ver. 6. 11.)

not to obey it in the lusts thereof; not to yield their members instruments of sin to unrighteousness, but to walk in newness of life; (ver. 12, 13.) to live to God, and to present their members instruments of righteousness to God, (ver. 4. 10. 13.) and to have their fruit to holiness, that the end may be eternal life; (ver. 22.) and that upon this conformity to Christ's death and resurrection depends our hope that we shall live with him? (ver. 8.) So that it is evident to a demonstration, that both our faith and baptism do lay upon us the strictest obligations to depart from all iniquity, and yield sincere obedience to the laws of God and Christ, as we expect the blessings purchased by him for, or promised to, believers. As then St. Peter saith on this account, that baptism now saveth us, (1 Pet. iii. 21.) so may salvation be on the same account ascribed to our faith in Christ.

Secondly, Faith is the spring and the foundation of all the obedience we afterward perform, and therefore may be well said to save as many as obtain salvation, because it worketh in them that obedience by which they are saved, and moves them to perform those conditions on which their actual salvation doth depend. Thus of faith in God, the apostle teacheth, that it must be necessarily laid as the foundation of all the service we perform unto him; for he that cometh to God must believe that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek (to please) him. (Heb. xi. 6.) And thus he shews it was with all the patriarchs and holy people of God before the revelation of the gospel; they by that faith, which was the expectation of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen, obtained testimony that they were righteous, (Heb. xi. 4.) and that they pleased God, (ver. 5. 8. 18, 19.) obeyed his call in the most difficult instances, chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; wrought righteousness, and suffered death, not accepting a deliverance: (ver. 25, 26. 33. 35.) And so it is with faith in Christ; it is the foundation of all our obedience, which therefore is in Scripture styled the obedience of faith, Rom. i. 5. xvi. 26. and of all our good works, they being all the work of faith, 2 Thess. i. 11. It is by virtue of this faith that we are enabled to overcome the world, to resist the devil, and to quench all the fiery darts of Satan. (1 John v. 5. 1 Pet. v. 9. Eph. vi. 16.) It is faith that works by love to God, and to our brother; which love we testify to God, by keeping his commandments, and to our neighbour, by fulfilling the laws of justice and charity; and this is very evident, even from the nature of faith: for can any man obey the precepts this Prophet hath delivered in his Father's name, unless he believes he was that Prophet which was sent by him to reveal his will, and that King by whose laws we must be governed? Can he submit to the terms of salvation propounded by him, till he believes he is the author of salvation to all that obey him? Can he herein exercise himself to have always a conscience void of offence towards God and man, but by that faith which doth assure him, that he will judge all men by these laws, awarding glory and immortality to every man that worketh righteousness, (Rom. ii. 8.) and punishing them with everlasting destruction from his presence that obey not his gospel? (2 Thess. i. 8.) And is not then this faith the true foundation of all Christian piety? Thus doth the just man live by his faith, and doing so, believeth to the salvation of his soul. As therefore we are said to be saved by hope, Rom. viii. 24. because it is the motive to steadfastness in our obedience, so may we be said to be saved by faith upon the same account. And,

Thirdly, We may be well said to be saved by faith, because where faith is hearty and constant, it will produce sincere obedience, and holiness will follow in the life: and when it doth not follow, this is to be ascribed to the want of faith. This will be evident, if we consider the material objects of our faith, the blessings promised to the obedient, and the evils threatened to the disobedient: for it is certain, that the blessings promised in the gospel do far exceed all other blessings that we can enjoy; and that the evils threatened there are far more lasting and intolerable than any other evils we can suffer: and it is no less certain that these blessings are by our Lord confined to the obedient; for not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter (saith he) into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven; (Matt. vii. 21.) and it is as sure that these tremendous evils are entailed upon the wicked, Christ having solemnly declared he will say to them at the great day, Depart from me, I know ye not, ye workers of iniquity: (ver. 23.) and if we do believe our Saviour was a prophet sent from God, we must believe these revelations he hath made concerning both our future happiness and misery, and the conditions on which alone the one can be obtained, and the other is to be avoided. Now, can a man at the same time believe these are the greatest blessings that he can enjoy, and yet prefer a lesser good before them? if not, whenever he doth this, he ceases in effect to have this faith. Can a man fully be persuaded, that what he is about to do, will render him obnoxious to the worst of evils, and yet be moved to do it to avoid a lesser evil? if not, whenever he doth choose to do what renders him obnoxious to the worst of evils, he ceaseth to believe they are so. When therefore we neglect to do that which is by our Lord declared absolutely necessary to obtain and to secure our eternal interests, and venture upon that to which he threateneth everlasting misery, it is certain that we have no lively full persuasion of these truths then present to our minds, and therefore do not actually believe them then. So that although we may have still such an habitual assent to all that this great Prophet hath delivered, as that we do not doubt the truth of what he taught; yet doth not Christ dwell in our hearts by faith, nor have we any living sense or permanent persuasion of these truths on our souls, but faith is at the present dead, and so no more deserves the name of faith, than a dead man can properly be called a man. Thus, for example, when Christ saith to his disciples fearing to perish in the storm, How is it that ye have not faith? (Mark iv. 40.) he lays this to their charge, not that they disbelieved his power to save them, for this they testify, by saying, Master; save us; but they did not actually exert this trust by an entire commission of themselves to the protection of his providence. As therefore, when we do what is contrary to our love to God, or to our hope, and our affiance in him, there always is a want of love and hope and trust in God: so when we do what is opposite to the great objects of our faith, there must be in us a like want of faith; and so when this is customarily done, there must be a defect as to the habit, or the grace of faith.

Secondly, This will be still more evident, if we consider all the glorious things which are ascribed in Scripture to this faith, and do compare them with other passages of the same Scripture: for instance, Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God, saith the apostle John, 1 Epist. v. 1. but then he adds in the same chapter, Whosoever is born of God overcometh the world, ver. 5. by virtue of this faith: and again, We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not; but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and the wicked one toucheth him not, ver. 18. iii. 9. Whence it must follow, that he believeth not in the apostle's sense, that Jesus is the Christ, who overcometh not, by virtue of that faith, the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil. Whosoever confesseth (saith the same apostle) that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God, (1 John iv. 15.) but then he also saith, He that abideth in him ought also to walk as he walked, 1 John ii. 6. that we do hereby know that we are in him, by keeping of his word, ver. 5. that whosoever abideth in him sinneth not, and he that sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him; that if we say we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie: so that if this faith doth not preserve us from sin, and engage us to walk in the light, and as he walked, it is not that faith in the Son of God the apostle speaks of. We are not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus, saith St. Paul to the Galatians, Gal. v. 6. vi. 15. but then it is, saith he, that faith which works by love, and renders us new creatures. The same he saith in the Epistle to the Romans, declaring that his gospel was the power of God through faith unto salvation, Rom. i. 16. ver. 5. but then it is the obedience of faith, in the same chapter; obedience in word and deed, xv. 18. obeying from the heart the form of doctrine delivered to them, vi. 16. which makes this faith become the power of God to salvation. Whence it is evident, that he esteemed that alone true faith which was productive of obedience, and so doth virtually, although not formally, include obedience, as the effect is virtually contained in the cause: so that the difference between men of judgment, as to saving faith, is more in words than sense, they all designing the same thing, that we cannot be saved by that faith which doth not produce in us a sincere obedience to the laws of Christ.

RELATING TO THE FOREGOING PREFACE

TO THE

EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.*

ONE passage in the preface to the Epistle to the Galatians hath met with very hard usage from different hands; but more especially from one who styles his book, The Preacher, but gives full demonstration that he is no Solomon. His words are these, p. 153.† "And can we imagine that that other author hath a better opinion of the writings of the New Testament, who tells us, that in all the Scriptures of the New Testament, there is not to be found one exhortation to believe in Christ, or to act faith on Christ? and accordingly he adds afterward; Now what account can be given of this thing by those who are so zealous in their sermons to exhort Christians to believe in Christ, and are so full of motives to persuade them so to do? It seems we have been in a great error and mistake hitherto; and all our sermons to our Christian auditors, to persuade them to exert faith in our Lord Christ, have been idle and vain; and the more zealous we have been in this matter, the more foolish we have been; for Christians are no where exhorted in the New Testament to believe in Christ; they are only unconverted Jews and gentiles who are called upon to do this." And such were the apostles and disciples, when our Saviour exhorted them to believe in God, and to believe also in him: "who sees not that is abusing the Scriptures?" Now here,

First, Sure I have reason to complain of very hard measure, and of great injustice, that after all the pains I have taken to prove this proposition, *That the apostles and evangelists indited these Scriptures by the assistance of the Holy Ghost; and that, therefore, I allow no slips of memory, no rules of human prudence, without the guidance and direction of the Holy Spirit, §. 3. I should be publicly traduced as one, that cannot be imagined to have a better opinion of the writings of the New Testament, than one who asserts, that there are several repugnances in several parts of it; that it is altered in very many places, and some of the greatest moment; and hath too many disagreements, which are material and weighty.† How far I am from thinking any thing of this nature, how zealous in my opposition to such sentiments, the world will shortly farther see. And, that the words here cited by the Preacher have no relation to, and contain no detraction either from the authority or veneration due to that inspired book, is evident to all discerning persons: such vile and scandalous suggestions, without all ground or show of reason, is that of which I hope I never shall be guilty.

Secondly, I add, that the assertion here exposed, as a visible abuse of Scripture, is as certain and demonstrable as any proposition in the book of Euclid. Thus,

Definition. A Christian is one that believes in Christ; nor can he cease to do so whilst he is a Christian; as a man cannot cease to have a human nature whilst he lives.

Postulatum. It cannot be consistent with the wisdom of the Holy Ghost, or of the Holy Scripture, to exhort any Christian to do what he knows every Christian must do, and cannot choose to do, any more than a living man can cease to have a human nature.

Ergo, It cannot be consistent with the wisdom of the Holy Ghost to exhort any Christian to believe in Christ; this being the same in effect as to exhort a living man to retain his human nature during life.

Thirdly, To the argument of the Preacher, from John xiv. 1. I have returned a full reply in my answer to a late pamphlet, p. 20—23. to which I add, that it is not certain that these words contain any exhortation to believe in Christ; even the Synopsis informs us, that they may be rendered in the indicative mood thus, Creditis in Deum, et me creditis: in which sense they contain no exhortation, but

* §. 3. Arg. 7. † Pref. p. 255.

* Gen. Preface to the Gospels, §. 1. † Preacher, p. 152.

an assertion only of this great truth, that the disciples of Christ believed in God the Father, and in Christ his only Son; and from that faith had ground of comfort under all the troubles they should meet with in the world.

Fourthly, Had he not changed my words, he would have had no show of ground for his vain imagination, that I count it a great error to persuade Christians to exert faith in our Lord Christ. Now this I no where say, but only that there is no exhortation in the New Testament to any Christian to believe in Christ, or (in the sense of the presbyterians and independents, against whom I there dispute) to act faith on Christ; to exert that faith we have in Christ, by shewing forth the fruits of it, and walking answerably to it, and comforting and supporting ourselves from the consideration of it; and the encouraging ourselves to the performance of all Christian obedience, is the duty of all Christians, to which I there say the Scripture doth exhort them; but to act faith on Christ for justification, or that Christians may be believers, which is the sense those writers put upon the phrase, is an unscriptural expression.

In fine, it might have reasonably been expected, that after all these hideous outcries, after these terrible accusations, that by this assertion I have visibly abused the Holy Scriptures, and made it unimaginable that I have any good opinion of the writings of the New Testament, some plain text should have been produced from those Scriptures, exhorting those, who were already Christians, to believe in Christ; and though I judge my assertion a truth, equally certain to a demonstration, yet when either the Preacher or the Pamphleteer, or any other bold condemner of it, shall shew the contrary by one plain text containing such an exhortation, I promise to renounce it publicly.

CHAP. I.

1. (I) PAUL, (who am) an apostle,[1] not of men, neither by man (for I received not my call or my commission to that office from man, nor was I chosen to it by man, as Matthias was), but by Jesus Christ (appearing to me in person for that end, that he might send me to the gentiles, Acts xxii. 21. xxvi. 16, 17.) and God the Father, (who chose me that I should know his will, and see that Just One, and be his witness to all men, of what I had seen and heard, Acts xxii. 14, 15. and revealed his Son to me, ver. 13. even that God) who raised him from the dead;

2. [2] And all the brethren which are with me (and own the doctrine which I preach, send greeting) to the churches of Galatia:

3. (Wishing that) grace (may be) to you, and peace, from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ,

4. Who gave himself (an expiatory sacrifice) for our sins, [3] that he might deliver us from (the wrath and condemnation of, or from conformity to,) this present evil world, [4] according to the will of God and our Father (Gr. of our God and Father):

5. To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

6. I marvel that ye are so soon removed [5] from him that called you to [6] the grace of Christ to another gospel:

7. Which (whatsoever some may suggest, who preach another thing, under the special title of the gospel) [7] is not (indeed) another (gospel, nor would be so esteemed by any of you); but (that) there be some who trouble you (with false stories), and would pervert the gospel of Christ (by mixing with it the necessary observance of the law of Moses).

8. But (whatsoever they suggest to you of another gospel, taught by Peter, James, and John,) though we (apostles); or (even) an angel from heaven, (should) preach any other gospel to you, than that which we (Paul and Barnabas) have preached to you, let him be accursed.

9. (And that ye may not think this proceeds rashly from me, but may the more regard it,) as we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel to you than that ye have received (from us), [8] let him be accursed.

10. (But this you cannot reasonably suspect concerning me,) for do I now (in the execution of my apostleship) [9] persuade (obey, or seek to please) men, or God? [10] or do I seek to please men? (no sure,) for if I yet pleased men (if I made that my business), [11] I should not be the servant of Christ (in that work of the gospel which creates me so much hazard from them).

11. But (howsoever others may lessen my gospel) I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me (i. e. by me to you and others) is not after man.

12. [12] For I neither received it of man (as the Jews do their traditions from their fathers), neither was I taught it, but by the (immediate) [13] revelation of Jesus Christ.

13. (And of this you may be farther satisfied from my former conversation, and my deportment since I began to preach the faith of Christ;) for (doubtless) ye have heard of my conversation in times past in the Jews' religion, (which was such) that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it: (Acts viii. 3. ix. 1. 13, 14. xxii. 4. xxvi. 10, 11.)

14. And profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals in mine own nation (or above many Jews of the same age with me), being more exceedingly zealous (than they were) [14] of the traditions of my fathers.

15. (Thus, I say, was my conversation in times past;) but when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb (as he had formerly done Jeremiah, to be a prophet of the nations, i. 5.) and (after) called me by his grace (to preach the gospel, Acts xxii. 14.)

16. To reveal his Son [15] (to) me, that I might preach him among the heathen; immediately I conferred not [16] with flesh and blood (i. e. with any man so as to receive any mission from them to that work, or any instructions how to perform it):

17. Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them that were apostles before me (as, if I had wanted either authority or instruction, I should have done), but I went from Damascus (the place of my conversion) to [17] Arabia, and returned again to Damascus (preaching the gospel there).

18. Then after three years (of my conversion) I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days.

19. But [18] other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother (and therefore could not learn my gospel from them).

20. Now (of the truth of) the things which I write to you (you may rest assured, for,) [19] behold, before God I lie not.

21. Afterward I came into the regions of Syria (i. e. to Cæsarea, Acts xxii. 17, 18.) and Cilicia (to Troas, Acts ix. 30. xxii. 3. in Asia Minor):

22. And was (all the while) unknown by face to the churches of Judea which were in Christ.

23. But they had heard only, that he which persecuted us (Christians) in times past, now preacheth the faith [20] which once he destroyed.

24. [21] And they glorified God (for the conversion he had wrought) in me.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. ΟΥ'Κ ἀπ' ἀνθρώπων, οὐδὲ δι' ἀνθρώπου, Not of man, neither by man.] It is no objection against the truth of these words, that the Holy Ghost, saying by the prophets at Antioch, Separate me Barnabas and Saul to the work of the ministry, to which I have called them, they fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, and sent them away: (Acts xiii. 2, 3.) for that this was not a mission to the apostolical office appears, because St. Paul, at least nine years before, was immediately called to it by God, and sent to exercise it by Jesus Christ; and because Barnabas is here equally separated to this office, and sent with him, who yet was never an apostle properly so called. This separation and mission therefore of them was only by way of prayer and benediction of them in their ministry; or by way of special commission to preach in the synagogues of the Jews, (ver. 5.) And this mission they presently completed, and then returned to Antioch, declaring to them what they had done in pursuance of it. (Acts xiv. 26, 27.)

[2] Ver. 2. Καὶ οἱ σὺν ἐμοὶ πάντες ἀδελφοὶ, And all the brethren that are with me.] It is the conjecture of the reverend Dr. Hammond, that the word brethren here denotes those that accompanied St. Paul in his travels, and assisted him in preaching the gospel; in which sense Sosthenes is called a brother, 1 Cor. i. 1. as also Apollos, 1 Cor. xvi. 12. Timothy, 2 Cor. i. 1. Titus, ii. 12. Tychicus, Eph. vi. 23. Epaphroditus, Phil. ii. 25. Onesimus, Colos. iv. 9. Sylvanus, 1 Pet. v. 12. St. Paul, 2 Pet. iii. 15. And in this sense the word brethren seems to be distinguished from that of saints, Phil. iv. 21. and mention is made of the brother whose praise is in the gospel, 2 Cor. viii. 18. of Titus, Paul's fellow-worker; of the brethren, who are the apostles of the church, and of the brethren, who, for his name's sake, went forth to preach the gospel, taking nothing of the gentiles, 3 John 3. 7. or else it may be said, that the apostle writes according to the form of epistles, used in the beginning of Christianity, when bishops sent to other churches, not in their own names only, but in the names of the whole church where they resided: so Clemens* begins his epistle to the church of Corinth thus, The church of God in Rome, to the church of God at Corinth; and so this epistle being writ from Rome, shews the consent of that church with him in his doctrine.

[3] Ver. 4. Ἵνα ἐξέληται ἡμᾶς ἐκ τοῦ ἐνεστῶτος αἰῶνος πονηροῦ, That he might deliver us from this present evil world.] That this present evil age should signify the present Jewish constitution and nation together, is very improbable: for did Christ die for our sins, to deliver the Galatians and other gentiles from the Jewish nation, or from that constitution they were never under? How much more natural is it to say, with the fathers, he died for our sins, that he might deliver us ἐκ τῶν πονηρῶν πράξεων καὶ διεφθαρμένης ζωῆς, from the evil actions and corrupt manners of this present world, or age; from those lusts of the flesh, and that corruption of mind, in which the heathens formerly lived, κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, according to that course of life the men of the world then led, (Eph. ii. 2, 3.) when they were guided by the wisdom, τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, of this world, (2 Cor. iv. 4.) and under the power of the rulers, τοὺ σκότους τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, of the darkness of this world. (Eph. vi. 12.)

[4] Κατὰ τὸ θέλημα τοῦ Θεοῦ, According to the will of God.] These words may refer to our deliverance, ἐκ τῶν πονηρῶν πράξεων καὶ τῆς διεφθαρμένης ζωῆς. Œcum. from the evil manners of this world; this being the will of God, even our sanctification, (1 Thess. iv. 3.) and the great end of our Lord's salutary passion, who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works; and bare our sins in his body on the tree, that we, being dead to sin, might live to righteousness: (1 Pet. ii. 24. 2 Cor. v. 15. Eph. v. 25, 26.) whence it is evident that Christ's inherent righteousness is not imputed to us; for sure he died not to this end, that we might do ourselves what he already had done for us, and so what he had made it needless for us to do. Or else these words may be connected thus; Christ gave himself for us according to the will of God, viz. that he should die for our sins; and then the apostle here asserts, in opposition to the Judaizing Christians, that our justification by faith in Christ's death is according to the will of God, and that he died in pursuance of his decree to establish that new covenant in his blood by faith, by which we are translated from that wrath and state of alienation from God in which the world lies, and have obtained peace with God, and are become his church and people.

[5] Ver. 6. Ἀπὸ τοῦ καλέσαντος ὑμᾶς, From him that called you.] i. e. From God: for the apostle scarce ever ascribes this work to himself, but constantly to God the Father: see Rom. ix. 24. 1 Cor. vii. 15. Gal. i. 15. 1 Thess. ii. 12. iv. 7. v. 24. 2 Thess. ii. 14. 2 Tim. i. 9.

[6] Ἐν χάριτι Χριστοῦ, To the grace of Christ.] Or rather, by, or through, the grace of Christ offered you in the gospel; for though ἐν be often put for εἰς, yet ἐν χάριτι, where it is elsewhere used, doth either signify, in the grace, or through the grace, as Rom. v. 15. 2 Cor. i. 12. 2 Thess. ii. 16. 2 Tim. ii. 1. nor do I find where it is ever used in the Epistles for εἰς χάριν.

[7] Ver. 7. Ὁ οὐκ ἔστιν ἄλλο.] These words cannot signify, which is not any thing else; or, which is not owing to any thing else, as one here thinks: for the pronoun ὃ hath no other antecedent but ἕτερον εὐαγγέλιον, ver. 6. Nor is it any objection against our translation that the apostle doth not say, ὃ οὐκ ἔστιν ἕτερον, as before, but ἄλλο; it being noted by Budæus and others, that the Greeks use, ἄλλο καὶ ἕτερον ἐκ παραλλήλου, these two words as equivalent: and when two allos come together, the second is always rendered, ἕτερος, another, ἄλλος πρὸς ἄλλον λέγοντες, saying one to another, Acts ii. 12. xxi. 34. so ἄλλη σὰρξ ἀνθρώπων, ἄλλη δὲ κτήνων, there is one flesh of men, and another flesh of beasts, &c. 1 Cor. xv. 31. and again, ver. 41. The apostle's meaning then is, that the preaching of the gospel to you, παρ' ὃ εὐαγγελισάμεθα, besides that which we have preached, would be the preaching of another gospel; but that which these perverters of the Galatians taught as such, was not indeed another gospel, but rather a setting up of the law in opposition to the gospel. Note also, that εἰ μὴ here is used as ii. 16. 1 Cor. vii. 17. Rev. ix. 4. 21. 27.

[8] Ver. 9. Ἀνάθεμα ἔστω, Let him be anathema.] Hence it follows, (1.) that the doctrine of justification by faith, as it stands opposed to the contrary doctrine of the necessity of the observance of the Mosaical law to justification, is a fundamental doctrine, to which he that opposeth himself, maintaining the necessity of observing the law of Moses to that end, deserveth an anathema, as introducing another gospel: whence commentators here observe, that the apostle calls not the Galatians saints, because they had begun to decline from the gospel, by seeking thus to be justified by the law; but speaks of them as those who had Christ yet to be formed in them, and who were to be born again, iv. 19.

(2.) Hence it appears that a man may err fundamentally, not only by rejecting a fundamental article of faith, but also by maintaining and teaching in the name of Christ things unnecessary to be necessary, so as to say, salvation cannot be obtained without them: and herein consists the great guilt of the church of Rome, and particularly of the Trent council, that they have added many unnecessary articles to the true Christian creed, and have defined them to be so necessary to be believed by all Christians, that no salvation can be obtained without the belief of them: and so they seem plainly to have fallen under the anathema of St. Paul, more dreadful than all the vain anathemas they have thundered out against the protestants.

Mr. Obadiah Walker and Grotius note, that the apostle speaks here only of doctrines contrary to his gospel; but this exposition is (1.) contrary to the very words of the apostle, who saith not against, but, παρ' ἅ, besides what I have delivered: and it is contrary to the exposition of the fathers,* St. Chrysostom, Œcumenius, among the Greeks, and St. Austin among the Latins, whose note is this: He saith not, If they preach things contrary, but, If they preach things never so little different from the gospel which I have preached to you. It is very true, as Esthius suggests, that the apostle doth not pretend to propound an anathema against any man who shall suggest any thing farther in confirmation of Christ's gospel, as St. John after did, or give any farther rules pursuant to the precepts of it, by the suggestion of that Spirit by which the gospel was indited, for then he would have pronounced an anathema upon all that writ after him, and even upon himself, who writ many Epistles after this; but yet he pronounceth an anathema upon all those who preach a gospel which differed from the gospel which they preached, to whom alone it was by Christ committed to propound the terms of salvation; and this is that of which we do accuse the church of Rome, that they propound terms of salvation no where delivered by Christ or his apostles.

Secondly, This exposition of Mr. Walker will not free them from the anathema of the apostle; for by this very thing, that they add any thing, to the gospel of Christ as necessary to be believed, or done to salvation, they do no less oppose the doctrine of the apostle, than they did who joined the observation of the law of Moses, as necessary to the faith of Christ: for therefore did they oppose his doctrine, because they teaching this was needful to salvation, did thereby teach, that what the apostle had taught as sufficient to salvation, was not so without their additions, which is the very thing the papists do by their new articles and traditionary doctrines; for if they be indeed necessary to salvation, what is delivered in the gospel, in which confessedly some of their doctrines are not, cannot be sufficient to salvation. Moreover, it is extremely evident, that prayer in an unknown tongue is plainly contrary to the apostle's doctrine, 1 Cor. xiv. and that communion in one kind is opposite both to Christ's institution, and to St. Paul's discourse upon that sacrament, 1 Cor. xi.

[9] Ver. 10. Πείθειν, To persuade.] The critics here observe, that the word πείθειν signifies to pacify and appease any one incensed against us. So when David's soldiers, hunted and harassed by Saul, were earnest, when they found Saul in the cave, that they might have liberty to slay him, ἔπεισε Δαβὶδ τοὺς ἄνδρας αὐτοῦ ἐν λόγοις, David pacified his men with words, 1 Sam. xxiv. 7. So, to induce the soldiers to own that Christ's body was stolen away by his disciples from the sepulchre whilst they slept, the chief priests and elders promise, that if this came to the governor's ear, πείσομεν αὐτὸν, we will appease him, Matt. xxviii. 14. And Menelaus promised Ptolemy to give him much money, πρὸς τὸ πεῖσαι τὸν βασιλέα, if he would pacify the king towards him, 2 Macc. iv. 5. Or (2.) the word may signify to obey; for so the word is used by St. Paul in this Epistle, when he says, who hath bewitched you, τῇ ἀληθείᾳ μὴ πείθεσθαι, that you should not obey the truth? iii. 1. and, ye did run well, who hindered you, τῇ ἀληθείᾳ μὴ πείθεσθαι, that you should not obey the truth? v. 7. and elsewhere: so τοῖς ἀπειθοῦσι μὲν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, πειθομένοις δὲ τῇ ἀδικίᾳ, to those who obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness, Rom. ii. 8. πείθεσθε τοῖς ἡγουμένοις, obey your governors, Heb. xiii. 17. (See also Acts v. 36, 37. James iii. 3.) And so is the word often used by heathen authors when they treat of moral subjects: so Plato* saith, philosophy compels the irrational affections to obey reason, and introduceth Socrates† saying, πείσομαι τῷ Θεῷ μᾶλλον ἢ ὑμῖν, I will obey God rather than you. Plutarch ‡ saith, It is the same thing, ἕπεσθαι Θεῷ, καὶ τὸ πείσασθαι λόγῳ, to follow God, and obey reason. So Arrian,§ This is to be placed among the highest pleasures, ὅτι πείθῃ τῷ Θεῷ, that thou obeyest God; I am free, and the friend of God, ἵν' ἑκὼν πείθωμαι αὐτῷ, that I might willingly obey him. I know to whom I ought to be subject, τινὶ πείθεσθαι, τῷ Θεῷ καὶ τοῖς μετ' ἐκεῖνον, and to obey God, and those that are next to him. And Zeno, that it is fit, τὸ πείθεσθαι παῖδας τοῖς παιδαγωγοῖς, that children should obey their masters. (Diog. Laert. lib. vii. p. 432.) So then the import of these words is this; Do I in preaching the gospel act in obedience to men, who every where persecute me and oppose me for it, or in obedience to that God who called me to be an apostle of the gentiles? (ver. 15, 16.) And this sense is confirmed by the verse following.

[10] Mr. Clerc here is positive that πείθω signifies only to persuade; whereas the lexicographers say expressly,* tria significat pareo, morem gero, suadeo, persuadeo. So Hesychius, πείθω σε τόδε τὸ πράγμα, I obey thee in this thing; and πείθομαί σοι τοῦτο, saith Stephanus, ought to be rendered, pareo tibi in hac re, or pareo consilio tuo in hac re. And whereas he fancies an ellipsis of μὴ ἀγανακτεῖν μοι, not to be displeased with me; making the sense to run thus, For do I now persuade men, or God, not to be displeased with me? he is still out; for who can see either any connexion of these with the former words, or any force in the apostle's reason, according to this strained sense? If any man (saith he) preach any other gospel than that which ye have received from us, let him be anathema: (ver. 9.) for do I in preaching this gospel obey men or God? saith our interpretation, making both the connexion clear, and the reason strong; seeing God could not command him to preach one gospel and others another. Let him be anathema, saith Mr. Clerc, for do I now persuade God not to be displeased with me? where, let him that can, shew either reason or connexion. Secondly, How could St. Paul say, he did not persuade men not to be displeased with him, when in this Epistle he so often doth it, saying, Brethren, I beseech you be as I am, iv. 12. Am I therefore become your enemy, because I tell you the truth? ver. 16. From henceforth let no man trouble me, vi. 17. (See v. 11.) And, thirdly, why should he tell the Galatians he persuaded God not to be displeased with him, when he was so honestly discharging his office, that he knew nothing of insincerity by himself in the execution of it, (1 Cor. iv. 4.) and surely had no mind to give them any reason to suspect he had displeased him.

Ἢ ζητῶ ἀνθρώποις ἀρέσκειν;] These words, which Dr. Mills saith crept in from the margin, are owned by all the Greek scholiasts, by the Vulgar, the Cod. Alexandrinus, Hilarius Diac. and St. Jerome. (See Examen Millii in locum.)

[11] Χριστοῦ δοῦλος οὐκ ἂν ἤμην, I should not be the servant of Christ.] That is, say the Greek commentators, I should not have left Judaism to embrace Christianity; i. e. I should not have quitted honour, friends, and kindred, for dangers, persecutions, and dishonours, which I continually suffer for the cause of Christ. And this exposition is confirmed from those words, If I preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution, since then is the offence of the cross ceased? v. 11. and from this account that others preached up circumcision only, lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ, vi. 12.

[12] Ver. 12. Οὐ παρ' ἀνθρώπου, I received it not by man.] In the first verse he saith, he was not an apostle by man, but by Jesus Christ: here, that he was not taught his gospel by man, but by Jesus Christ; whence Chrysostom, Theodoret, St. Jerome, Œcumenius, and Theophylact conclude, that our Lord was not only man, but God; and so Novatian (chap. xiii.) argued before the Nicene council, If St. Paul was not constituted an apostle of, or by man, and yet was constituted such by Jesus Christ, " meritò Christus est Deus," Christ must be God: for though the Scripture sometimes calleth magistrates and judges gods, as Crellius here notes, it never saith, that what was done by them was not done by man. Crellius adds farther, that our Lord being the only-begotten Son of God, and having now obtained his celestial kingdom, was exempted from the common rank of men; and from the state of mortal men, saith Grotius: and so the apostle might speak of him not as a man, as Samson saith of himself, If they bind me with wreaths I shall be as a man, (Judg. xvi. 7. 11. 17.) but chiachad aadam, as one man; i. e. as weak as one man only, or having no more strength than another man. Crellius therefore hath not said any thing apposite in answer to this argument: nor doth the apostle here oppose man to man, or mortal man to those blessed spirits who are immortal, but only to Jesus Christ and God the Father.

[13] Δι' ἀποκαλύψεως, By revelation.] At what time this revelation was made to him is uncertain, but it is probable it must be before he went to preach the gospel to the gentiles; for the words following, I consulted not with flesh and blood, but preached at Damascus, seem plainly to imply this revelation was made to him before he preached there, or went to Jerusalem.

[14] Ver. 14. Τῶν πατρικῶν παραδόσεων, Of the traditions of my fathers.] He being a pharisee, and speaking of the traditions not of the law, but of the fathers, seems to mean the oral traditions that sect so highly magnified, even above the law and the prophets. (See note on Mark vii. 3. Acts xxvii. 17.) Now there is reason to believe, that a man so exceeding zealous for the religion of the Jews, and so full of hatred to that of Christians, would not have renounced a religion he had so great a reverence for, to embrace that he was so incensed against, without some more than human motive.

[15] Ver. 16. Ἐν ἐμοὶ, To me.] So ὁ λαλῶν ὁ ἐν ἐμοὶ, he that speaketh to me shall be a barbarian, 1 Cor. i. 11. (See Mark i. 15. Acts iv. 12. 1 Cor. ix. 15. 2 Cor. iv. 3. viii. 1.)

[16] Σαρκὶ καὶ αἵματι, With flesh and blood.] This phrase in Scripture and among Jewish writers is only a periphrasis for man, as Matt. xvi. 17. 1 Cor. xv. 20. Eph. vi. 12. Heb. ii. 14. Ecclus. xiv. 18. and so all other interpretations of it must be alien from the scope of the apostle.

[17] Ver. 17. Εἰς Ἀραβίαν, Into Arabia.] Of this journey into Arabia, St. Luke, not being with him, saith nothing.

[18] Ver. 19. ἕτερον τῶν ἀποστόλων, Other of the apostles.] Hence it appears,

First, That only Peter and James were then at Jerusalem, for Barnabas brought him to the apostles that were there. (Acts ix. 27.)

Secondly, That James, the Lord's brother, was an apostle in the strict and proper sense of the word, since Peter, who is mentioned with him, was doubtless so, and Barnabas, who brought him to Peter and James, is said to bring him to the apostles; and Peter, James, and John, who are here called the men of reputation, and pillars of the church, ii. 6. 9. seem plainly to be the same persons who, in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians are called λίαν ἀπόστολοι, the chief of the apostles: and Origen* saith expressly of James the Just, This is that James whom Paul in his Epistle to the Galatians saith he saw, citing these very words for the proof of it. See this confirmed in the preface to the Epistle of St. James. Note, Thirdly, That the apostle's argument is to this effect, Having therefore preached the gospel so long before I saw them, and staying so little while with them, and going then only to see, not to learn of them, it cannot be conceived I should receive my instructions how to preach the gospel from them.

* Constantine.

* Ἰάκωβος δέ ἐστιν οὗτος, ὃν λέγει Παῦλος ἰδεῖν ἐν τῇ πρὸς Γαλάτας ἐπιστολῇ, εἰπὼν ἕτερον δὲ τῶν ἀποστόλων, &c. Hom. 13. in Matt. ed. Huet. p. 223. C. et lib. i. contra Celsum, p. 35.

Note also, that Nicephorus * saith, this James was τοῦ μνήστορος τοῦ Ἰωσὴφ παῖς, the son of Joseph, the husband of the mother of our Lord.

[19] Ver. 20. Ἰδοὺ ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, Behold, before God.] Hence it is evident that the apostle, when it was necessary to confirm the truth of the gospel, or of his commission to, or his sincerity in preaching it, i. e. when the benefit of souls required him thus to attest to men, what otherwise they could not be assured of, refused not to swear, and so esteemed not our Saviour's prohibition of an oath to be absolute. (See Rom. i. 2. ix. 1. 2 Cor. i. 23. xi. 31. 1 Thess. ii. 5. see the note on 2 Cor. i. 23.)

[20] Ver. 23. Ἦν ποτε ἐπόρθει;] See this reading vindicated, Examen Millii in locum.

[21] Ver. 24.] This testimony of the Jewish Christians was a confirmation of his doctrine; for if they could have found any just exceptions against it, they would not have glorified God for his preaching of it.

CHAP. II.

1. THEN, [1] fourteen years after (my first journey thither), I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took Titus with me also (though uncircumcised, to shew the liberty I took of conversing with persons not circumcised).

2. And I [2] went up by revelation, and communicated to them (at Jerusalem) that gospel which I preach (every where) among the gentiles; but (this I did) [3] privately to them which were of reputation, (or the chief men there; not that I distrusted my doctrine, or needed their instructions, but) lest by any means (or false suggestions of the Judaizers, that my doctrine was contrary to what they who were called before me preached, and such as they would not own) I should run (hereafter), or had run (hitherto), in vain.

3. But (even then was nothing done by me, which shewed any change in my doctrine or practice, or any opposition made by them to it; for) neither Titus, who was (then) with me, being a Greek, was (upon that account) compelled to be circumcised (as they would have contended he should, had they thought circumcision necessary to the gentiles):

4. And that (which concerns the bringing and retaining Titus with me uncircumcised was done) [4] because of false brethren (who came down to Antioch, Acts xv. 1.) unawares brought in, (Gr. introduced into the assembly, Acts xv. 5. or insinuating themselves into the church of Antioch, ver. 1.) who came in privily to spy out (Gr. to ensnare us in) our liberty (from the observance of the Jewish law) which we have in (and through) Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage (to it, they pleading for the necessity of circumcising the gentiles, and commanding them to keep the law, Acts xv. 1.)

5. [5] To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour (by submission to their demands, but continued firm to our resolution, not to subject the gentiles to this yoke of bondage); that the truth of the gospel (of Christ, which frees the gentiles from the obligation of the law) might continue with (or among) you.

6. But of those who seemed to be somewhat, whatsoever they were (or, but whatsoever they were who seemed to be somewhat), it maketh no matter to me (their seeming, or their real greatness, affects not my doctrine): God accepteth no man's person; for they who seemed to be somewhat in conference added nothing to me (or to my doctrine, nor corrected any thing in it; and so neither am I concerned for their greatness, nor doth God respect them the more upon that account:

7. They added, I say, nothing to my doctrine,) but contrariwise (they approved of it; for) when they saw that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to me (and I was authorized to preach to the gentiles), as the gospel of the circumcision was to Peter (he being appointed to preach to the Jews:

8. As evidently it was;) for he who wrought effectually in (with) Peter towards the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me (Gr. wrought also in me) towards the gentiles: (Rom. xv. 19.)

9. [6] And when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars (of the church), perceived the grace (of God) that was given to me (for the apostolic office), they gave to me and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship; (concluding) that we should (still) go (on to preach) to the heathen, and they (should still continue preaching) to the circumcision.

10. [7] Only they would that we should remember the poor (Christians in Judea), the same which (Gr. which same thing) I also was forward to do:

11. But when Peter was come to Antioch, [8] I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed.

12. For before that certain (brethren of the Jews) came from James, he did (freely) eat with the gentiles; but when they were come, he withdrew, and separated himself (from them), fearing (to exasperate or scandalize) them which were of the circumcision.

13. And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him, insomuch that (even) Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation.

14. But when I saw that (in this matter) [9] they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, I said to Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew (one of that nation to which alone the law of Moses was given), livest after the manner of the gentiles (conversing freely with them, and eating of their meats, as, since the vision which thou sawest, thou hast done), and not as do the Jews (abstaining from their meats and persons as unclean), why (now) compellest thou the gentiles (by thy example) to live as do the Jews?

15. We who are Jews by (birth or) nature, and not [10] sinners of the gentiles (not idolatrous heathens),

16. Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but (only) by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and (thereby have testified to our con- viction, that we could) not (be justified) by the works of the law (as indeed we cannot be): for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

17. [11] But if, while we (thus) seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners (as we must be, if we be still obliged to observe that law we have renounced as unable to justify us), is therefore Christ (who taught us thus to renounce the law, and to seek justification by faith in him) the minister of sin? God forbid (that we should charge this on him.

18. And yet we, by asserting the necessity that the gentiles should observe the law, and so much more the Jews, do in effect say that Christ hath taught us to be sinners;) for if I (thus) build again the things that I destroyed (urging the necessity of observing that law to justification, which I declared unable to justify, and therefore renounced for faith in Christ), I make myself a transgressor (by not observing it to that end.

19. But whatsoever others may think fit to do, far be it from me to imitate them,) for I through the law (teaching me that it condemns all men to death, and bearing witness to the justification which is of God by faith, Rom. iii. 21.) am (become) dead to (the observance of) the law, that I might (for the future) live to God. (Rom. vii. 4.)

20. I am crucified with Christ, (and so dead to the law: Rom. vi. 4.) nevertheless I live; yet not I (as formerly a Jew, and an observer of the law), but Christ liveth in me, (and I am acted by his Spirit: Rom. vii. 6.) and the life that I now (lead) in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me.

21. I do not frustrate the grace of God (as I should do, did I seek for righteousness by the law): for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain (there being then no necessity that he should die to purchase justification for us, and no sufficient virtue in his death to procure it).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. ΔΙΑ' δεκατεσσάρων ἐτῶν, Fourteen years after.] I cannot assent to those critics who, for δεκατεσσάρων, fourteen, would read τεσσάρων, four years after; for not only all the manuscript copies and versions read fourteen, but Irenæus, lib. iii. cap. 13. doth confirm this reading in these words: Then after fourteen years I went up to Jerusalem, &c. if any man carefully examine, by the Acts of the Apostles, the time mentioned of his ascent to Jerusalem for the question aforesaid, he will find the years agreeing with those mentioned by St. Paul. Now these years must be reckoned from the time of his conversion, mentioned here, i. 18. which happened in the year of our Lord 35. his journey to St. Peter was A. D. 38. and then between that and the council of Jerusalem, assembled anno Christi 49. will be fourteen intervening years; for whereas some reckon these fourteen years from the third year of his conversion to the council met at Jerusalem, and so make that council meet anno Domini 52. because it is said here, ἔπειτα afterward, and πάλιν ἀνέβην, I went up again; it may be answered, that the word ἔπειτα, afterward, doth not connect these words with the three years mentioned i. 18. as is evident, because there follows another ἔπειτα, afterward, ver. 21. nor doth πάλιν ἀνέβην, I went up again, relate to his first journey to Jerusalem, mentioned i. 18. for he had been twice at Jerusalem; three years after his conversion to see Peter, and nine years after that to carry alms to the brethren at Jerusalem, (Acts xi. 30.) though, seeing then none of the apostles, he makes no mention of that journey here, as being nothing to his purpose; (see Dr. Pearson's Annal. Paulin. p. 8, 9.) so that whereas he had said, i. 18. that three years after my conversion I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, he saith here, and fourteen years after it I went up again. Now, that the apostle here speaks of the journey to Jerusalem mentioned Acts. xv. will appear,

First, From the agreement of what he here relates with what then happened, as that he communicated to them the gospel, which he preached among the gentiles, ver. 2. as he then did, Acts xv. 4. that circumcision was not then judged necessary to the gentiles, ver. 3. as we find, Acts xv. 24. that when they saw the gospel of uncircumcision was committed to him, they gave to him and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship, ver. 9. as then they did, sending their very decree, with one consent, to the gentiles, by the hands of Paul and Barnabas, Acts xv. 22. 25. who were received by the whole church, ver. 4. and styled beloved, ver. 25.

Secondly, It seems not likely that the apostle, writing this Epistle about nine years after the decree of that council, should make no mention of a thing so advantageous to the cause he is pleading here, and so proper to confute the pretences of the adversaries he disputes against. And Thirdly, James, Peter, and John, being all the apostles that were present at the council then held at Jerusalem, the mention of their consent to his doctrine and practice was all that was necessary to his purpose to be mentioned concerning that council. It is no objection against this opinion, that we find no mention, Acts xv. of Titus's being with him; for he is not mentioned in the whole book of the Acts, during which interval this journey must have happened.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἀνέβην κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν, I went up by revelation.] Made to the apostle, saith Dr. Hammond, to comply with this determination of the church of Antioch; made to the prophets of the church of Antioch, to send them, saith Dr. Lightfoot, which I do not gainsay. But the apostle doth not say he went up, δι' ἀποκαλύψεως, by revelation, but κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν, according to revelation: now he had said before he received not his doctrine or gospel by men, or of men, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ; and here he may be supposed to add, that in his journey he acted suitably to the revelation which constituted him the apostle of the gentiles; telling the church of Jerusalem what things he had done among the gentiles in pursuance of it; not inquiring what they did, but declaring what God did by him, not permitting Titus, a Greek, to be circumcised, not giving place for an hour to the false brethren, &c.

[3] Κατ' ἰδίαν δε τοῖς δοκοῦσι, Privately to them of reputation.] Not that his doctrine might be confirmed by the concurrence of St. Peter, or others with him in it, as Esthius from St. Jerome and St. Austin here suggests; for sure that doctrine, which he received by immediate revelation from Jesus Christ and God the Father, needed no farther confirmation from the authority of man; but only to obviate the cavils of those who laboured to hinder the effect of his gospel, by suggesting that it was contrary to, or disowned by, those apostles who were called before him.

[4] Ver. 4. Διὰ τοὺς ψευδαδέλφους, Because of false brethren.] These false brethren, saith Epiphanius,* were Cerinthus, and those of his party.

Διὰ δὲ, &c.] Here also it seems necessary to supply the sense from the first verse thus; συμπαρέλαβον δὲ Τίτον διὰ τοὺς ψευδαδέλφους; and I took with me Titus, because of the false brethren. Examples of the like ellipsis, or deficiency, to be supplied from the precedent words, in the Old Testament, are very numerous; see Glassius de figuris Grammaticis, lib. iv. tract. 2. observ. 11. So Matt. ii. 10. ἰδόντες δὲ τὸν ἀστέρα, seeing the star, ἐστῶτα ἐπάνω οὗ ἦν τὸ παιδίον, add, standing over the place where the child was, (ver. 9.) they rejoiced. This addition was necessary, because they before saw the star going before them, (ver. 9.) So John ix. 3. Neither hath he sinned, nor his parents; add, from ver. 2. ἵνα τυφλὸς γεννηθῇ, that he should be born blind, ἀλλὰ ἵνα, but add again, he was so born, that the works of God might be made manifest in him. 1 John ii. 19. They went out from us, but they (who thus went out) were not of us; for if they had been of us, they might have remained with us, ἀλλ', supple, ἐξῆλθον ἐξ ἡμῶν, but (they went out from us) that it might appear they all were not of us.

[5] Ver. 5. Οἷς οὐδὲ πρὸς ὥραν εἴξαμεν τῇ ὑποταγῇ.] Here Dr. Mills contends from the authority of the Vulgar, Tertullian, and Hilary D. that οὐδὲ is an addition to the text; though Jerome positively saith, that this was only the reading quorundam Latinorum codicum, reclamantibus Græcis, of some Latin copies against the authority of the Greek fathers: see this reading confuted, Examen Millii in locum. And there also, οἱ δοκοῦντες, ver. 6. is proved against the doctor, not to be irreptitious.

Ver. 6. Οἱ ἀπὸ δε,] As some would read, if not suitable to the Greek idiom; begin the words as you must the construction, ὁποῖοι δέποτε ἦσαν ἀπὸ τῶν δοκούντων εἶναί τι, and the sense is plain, but of what quality they were, who seemed to be somewhat, or were of reputation, οὐδέν μοι διαφέρει, I was not the better for it; where note, that the scholiast on Thucydides saith thus, διαφέρει, i. e. ὠφελεῖ, the word signifies to profit, or be advantageous. Phavorinus and Hesychius say, that it signifies βέλτιον εἶναι, to be the better; so that the words may be thus rendered: It was no advantage to me, I was not the better for it; and this sense is confirmed by the following reason, For they who were of reputation added nothing to me.

[6] Ver. 9.] Note, that the beginning of this verse from the Greek runs thus, And James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars of the church, knowing the grace, &c.

[7] Ver. 10.] Note, that from these four verses, the supremacy of Peter over the rest of the apostles, and the whole church, may be by many arguments refuted. For,

1. James is here mentioned first among the apostles of the circumcision, according to the common doctrine of the ancients, who style him,† the first bishop, archbishop, prince, and bishop of bishops, τὸν τῆς νέας Ἱερουσαλὴμ Ἀρχιστράτηγον, τὸν τῶν Ἱερέων ἡγεμόνα, τῶν ἀποστόλων τὸν ἔξαρχον τὴν ἐν κεφαλαῖς κορυφὴν, the chieftain of the new Jerusalem, the leader of the priests, the prince of the apostles, the top of the heads. And this agrees with the ecclesiastical tradition mentioned by Eusebius,* that the brethren and kinsmen of our Lord, whilst they lived, were preferred before other apostles and bishops, and that therefore Peter and John contended not with James, the Lord's brother, but chose him bishop of Jerusalem, and after his death judged Simeon, his cousin-german, worthy of that see, ὡς ἀπὸ γένους ὄντος τοῦ Κυρίου, as being of the kindred of our Lord.

Secondly, He puts no difference betwixt these pillars or chief of the apostles; which no more agrees with the supposed supremacy of Peter, than it would with the pope's supremacy, to be reckoned among or after some of the cardinals; which as it is never done by them who own the pope's supremacy, so neither would this have been done by St. Paul, had he owned the supremacy of Peter.

Thirdly, He says the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to him, as was that of the circumcision to Peter, by which words he shews himself equal to Peter, say the scholiasts.† By these words, saith Hilary the deacon, Plena autoritas Petri in prædicatione Judaismi data dignoscitur, et Pauli perfecta autoritas in prædicatione gentilium invenitur. So that then Peter's supremacy was not owned at Rome.

Lastly, It makes no matter to me (saith he) what they were; which sure could not fitly be said of him whom Christ had constituted to be his head and judge.

[8] Ver. 11. Αὐτῷ ἀντέστην, I withstood him, &c.] Quis ergo auderet Petro, primo apostolo——resistere, nisi alius talis qui fiduciâ suæ electionis, sciens se non esse imparem, constanter improbaret quid ille sine consilio fecerat? ‡

[9] Ver. 14. Οὐκ ὀρθοποδοῦσι πρὸς τὴν ἀλήθειαν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, They walked not uprightly, &c.] By this action Peter is charged with a sinful fear, ver. 13. not walking uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, ver. 14. with hypocrisy and dissimulation against his own knowledge and practice elsewhere, ver. 13. with building again what he had pulled down, ver. 18. and with compelling the gentiles to live as do the Jews, ver. 14. where observe, that he is said to compel, in Scripture, not only who doth violently force, but who, being of authority, provokes by his example, as here; as also they who lay a necessity on others to do any thing, either by their deportment, as the Corinthians who compelled St. Paul to glory, 2 Cor. xii. 11. or by their doctrine, as did the Judaizers, compelling the gentiles to be circumcised, Gal. vi. 12. and in this sense our Saviour says to his disciples, compel them to come in, Luke xiv. 23.

[10] Ver. 15. Ἁμαρτωλοὶ, Sinners of the gentiles.] This word in the Scripture-phrase signifies a great and habitual sinner; and because the gentiles were by the Jewish nation still esteemed such, and generally were so, therefore the word is used to denote the gentiles that knew not God. So what is ἐθνικοὶ, the heathens, in many copies, Matt. v. 46, 47. is ἁμαρτωλοὶ, sinners, Luke vi. 32—34. and to be delivered εἰς χεῖρας τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν, into the hands of sinners, Matt. xxvi. 45. Mark xiv. 41. is, to be delivered τοῖς ἔθνεσι, to the gentiles, Matt. xx. 19. Mark x. 33. Luke xviii. 32.

[11] Ver. 17, 18.] This exposition of these two verses, which I have taken from Hilary, and all the Greek scholiasts, seems much better than that of late commentators, who make the seventeenth verse to be an objection against

* Καὶ ἄλλοτε στάσις ὁ Κήρινθος, καὶ οἱ μετ' αὐτοῦ εἰργάσαντο, ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ Ἱερουσαλὴμ, ὁπηνίκα Παῦλος ἀνῆλθε μετὰ Τίτου——διὸ καὶ Παῦλος λέγει, ἀλλὰ οὐδὲ Τίτος ὁ σὺν ἐμοὶ, &c. Hær. xxviii. §. 4. p. 112.

St. Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, and the eighteenth an answer to it; for which I see no ground in the apostle's words.

Or these words may be paraphrased thus; εἰ γὰρ ἃ κατέλυσα, If the things which (by Christ's authority committed to his apostles, Matt. xviii. 18.) I have loosed (by declaring men absolved from the ritual precepts of the law of Moses), I again build up (by teaching they are to be observed), I make myself a transgressor.

CHAP. III.

1. [1] O FOOLISH Galatians, [2] who hath bewitched you, (or envied your happiness, and so endeavoured) that you should not obey the truth, [3] before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you?

2. This only would I learn of you, Received you the Spirit (in his gifts and powerful operations) by (obedience to) the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? (i. e. the belief of the gospel: if by the latter, this is a manifest token, that your justification and acceptance with God was the fruit of your faith, and not of your obedience to the law; since God, by giving you his Spirit whilst uncircumcised, as well as to the believing Jews, bare witness to this very thing, that he puts no difference betwixt you and them on that account, Acts xv. 8, 9.)

3. Are ye (then) so foolish? having (thus) begun in the Spirit (as to receive his miraculous gifts by faith, without the works of the law), are ye now (seeking to be) made perfect by the flesh (by circumcision, and observing the carnal ordinances of the law)?

4. Have ye suffered so many things (from the persecuting Jews, Acts xvii. 5.) in vain? [4] if it be yet (or even) in vain.

5. (To reassume my argument:) He therefore that ministereth the Spirit to you (in his extraordinary gifts), and [5] worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by (virtue of your obedience to) the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? (i. e. that faith which taught you to believe in a crucified Saviour.

6. For we must be justified) even as Abraham (the father of the faithful was, who) [6] believed in God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness.

7. Know ye therefore that they who are of faith (and seek justification by it), the same are the (true) children of (faithful) Abraham.

8. And the (Holy Ghost in) Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, [7] preached before (the giving of the law, and before his circumcision) the gospel to Abraham, (by) saying, (Gen. xii. 3.) [8] In thee shall all nations be blessed.

9. So then they which are of faith (and seek justification by it, Rom. ix. 32.) are blessed with faithful Abraham, (and as he was;

10. And not by the works of the law;) for as many as are of the works of the law (and seek to be justified by them) are under the curse (of it, and so incapable of justification by it): for it is written (there), Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them. (Deut. xxvii. 26. Now this being perfectly done by none, all that are under the law are under the curse of it.)

11. But that no man is justified by (observance of) the law in the sight of God, it is (farther) evident: for, (the prophet Habakkuk saith, ii. 4.) [9] The just shall live by faith.

12. And (now, or whereas) the law is not of faith: but (saith), The man that doeth them (i. e. that perfectly observes what is required by the law) shall live in (or by) them.

13. (This being so) Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, (by) being made (according to the sentence of the law) a curse for us: for (there) it is written, [10] Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree (as you know he did upon the cross:

14. And this he suffered,) that the blessing of Abraham might come on the gentiles through (faith in) Jesus Christ, that we (gentiles believing in him) might receive the promise of the Spirit [11] through faith; (for we are all the sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus; and because we are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, Gal. iv. 5, 6.)

15. Brethren, I speak after the [12] manner of men; (using an example taken from the common practice of all men, and speaking what is owned in all civilized nations: see note on 1 Cor. ix. 8.) Though it be but a man's covenant (that is made), yet if it be (legally) confirmed, no man disannulleth (it), or addeth any thing thereto.

16. Now to Abraham and his [13] seed were the promises made. He (God) saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as (speaking) of one, And [14] to thy seed, which is Christ.

17. And this I (farther) say, that the covenant, which was confirmed before of God in Christ (i. e. the covenant made in Christ the promised seed, and confirmed by God to Abraham before the law was given), the law, which was (given) [15] four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, (so) that it should make the promise (be) of none effect (as it must have done, were justification to be obtained by the law; for then none could be blessed in and by the promised seed only, or without the law).

18. For if the inheritance (of the blessing promised to Abraham) be (to be obtained by observance) of the law, it is no more (the effect) of (the) promise: but (that cannot be said, for) God gave it to Abraham by promise.

19. (But you will inquire,) Wherefore then serveth the law? (I answer,) It was added (after the promise made) [16] because of transgressions, until the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained (or delivered, not as the promise, immediately by God himself to Abraham, but) by angels, (it being the word spoken by angels, Heb. ii. 2. not as the promise, without a mediator betwixt God giving and Abraham receiving, but) in the hand of a mediator (even Moses, who stood between them and the Lord at that time, to shew them the word of the Lord, Deut. v. 5. and ratify the covenant on the people's part).

20. Now (but the promise required no mediator, for) [17] a mediator is not of one (party only), but God (who made the promise to Abraham) is one (only).

21. Is the law then against the promises of God, (as it must be, if it condemns them to whom the promise doth assign a blessing? or is it against those promises, which say, The just shall live by faith, and the blessing of Abraham shall come upon us by faith; as it must be, provided we are to be justified not by faith, but by the works of the law? but) God forbid (it should be thought he had given a law which disannulled his promises; as it must have done, had justification to life depended on the observance of it): for if there had been (such) a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness (i. e. justification to life, Rom. v. 18.) should have been by the law; (whereas it subjecting us to death, we may be sure God never did intend it for that end.)

22. But the Scripture hath concluded all (men of all nations) under sin, (and so under condemnation by the law moral and ceremonial, and sentenced not to life, but death by it, and thereby shewed the necessity) that the promise (of justification) by faith of Jesus Christ (the promised seed) might be given to them that believe (in him; and thus the law is not contrary, but subservient to the promises of living by faith).

23. But before faith came (to be revealed), we were kept under (the discipline of) the law, [18] shut up unto the faith which should afterward be revealed.

24. [19] Wherefore the law was (then) our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, (and cause us, thus condemned by the law, to fly to him who is the end of the law for righteousness, Rom. x. 3.) that we might be justified by faith (in him).

25. But (now), after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster, (being no longer children in minority, Rom. vii. 3.)

26. For ye are all the (adult) [20] children of God (and so heirs of God) by faith in Christ Jesus.

27. For as many of you as have (believed in Christ, and upon that faith have) been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ, (and so are become sons of God; for to as many as believed in him, he gave power to be the sons of God, John i. 12.)

28. There is (under the gospel-dispensation) neither (distinction made of) Jew nor Greek, there is neither (of) bond nor free, there is neither (of) male nor female (as under the Jewish economy, the male only bearing the sign of the covenant): for ye are all one (as to the privileges of the gospel) in Christ Jesus.

29. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye (indeed) Abraham's seed (not from Ishmael, but Isaac), and (therefore) heirs [21] according to the promise.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. Ὦ ΑΝΟΗΤΟΙ, O foolish, &c.] The apostle by calling the Galatians foolish, doth not contradict our Saviour's precept, because he doth it not εἰκῇ rashly and without cause, saith Theophylact, nor out of anger and ill-will to them, but from an ardent desire to make them sensible of their folly.

[2] Τίς ὑμᾶς ἐβάσκανε; Who hath bewitched you?] Τίς ἐφθόνησε; who hath looked upon you with an evil or envious eye, as envying you the blessings of the gospel? So the Greek scholiasts. The word also signifies, oculis præstigia imponere, to put delusions, or, as we say, mists before the eyes, which import suits best with the following words. The reverend Dr. Hammond observes here, that this seduction may refer to the Ebionites, if the time would permit, as doubtless it will; for they were only a branch of the Nazarenes or Cerinthians, who were contemporary with St. Paul; and all his Epistles shew that then there were many who maintained and eagerly promoted, among the gentile converts, the chief doctrine of those sects, viz. that they were obliged to observe the legal constitution, as being not capable of salvation only by faith in Christ, and a life agreeable to it.* And if this once be granted, there will be no need of his gnostics in this, and perhaps not in any other of St. Paul's Epistles.

Τῇ ἀληθείᾳ μὴ πείθεσθαι;] These words, saith Jerome, are not extant in exemplaribus Adamantii, in the copies of Origen; but they are extant in the Arabic version, the Vulgar, Hilary D. Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact.

I cannot sufficiently wonder at Mr. Le Clerc's wild conjecture, That the Ebionites were Samaritans, especially after he had given us the words of Origen, in which he twice saith, they were οἱ ἀπὸ Ἰουδαίων εἰς τὸν Ἰησοῦν πιστεύοντες, those of the Jews that believed in Jesus, lib. ii. contr. Cels. p. 56. Had he not read in Irenæus that they did prophetica curiosius exponere, et Judaico charactere vitæ uti, et Hierosolymam adorare, quasi domus sit Dei? lib. i. cap. 26. And could the Samaritans do this? doth not St. Jerome say of them, Dum volunt Judæi esse, et Christiani, nec Judæi sunt, nec Christiani? Ep. ad August. Yea, even his own Epiphanius informs us, (Hær. x. Anaceph. p. 240.) that Ἰουδαῖοι ὄντες, being Jews, they used the gospel.

[3] Οἷς κατ' ὀφθαλμοὺς Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς προεγράφη, ἐν ὑμῖν ἐσταυρωμένος.] These words may bear this construction, Before whose eyes Jesus Christ crucified, hath been evidently set forth to, or among you; viz. in and from the Scriptures of the Old Testament; for the words ἐν ὑμῖν are not in the Alexandrian manuscript, and so may be here omitted, or construed with the word προεγράφη; and so they accord both with the context, and with the way of preaching used by the apostles, whose custom it was to prove, out of the Old Testament, that Jesus was the Christ, and that Christ ought to have suffered for us according to the Scriptures: (Acts xvii. 3.) and then the argument runs thus, If he died to procure the pardon of our sins, and so our justification, why do we render his death upon the cross vain, by seeking to be justified by the law? He having by his sufferings blotted out the hand-writing which was against us, and nailed these ordinances to the cross, why is it that you, who are dead with Christ from these elements of the world, are still subject to ordinances? (Eph. ii. 15, 16. Colos. ii. 14. 20.)

[4] Ver. 4. Εἴ γε καὶ εἰκῇ, If it be in vain.] As it must be upon your hypothesis of the necessity of the observance of the law, for then is the scandal of the cross ceased, (v. 11.) and all necessity of suffering persecution is removed; these deceivers themselves doing and urging others to these things only, lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ: (vi. 12.) for the first persecutions which the church suffered, were either from the Jews in person, or by the incitation of the Jews, (Acts viii. 1. 1 Thess. ii. 14—16. Acts xiii. 15. xiv. 19. xvii. 5. 13.) who being every where dispersed, sent chosen men from Jerusalem to all places, where they and the Christians were, to stir up the heathen governors against them, as Justin Martyr† testifies. Note also, that they were chiefly scandalized at the doctrine of the cross, (1 Cor. i. 23.) not only as it contradicted their pleasant dream of a temporal Messiah, under whom they should live gloriously and triumphantly, but as being that which put an end to the Jewish ceremonies, and taught men to expect justification, not by observance of the law, but by faith in the blood of Christ shed for us; upon which account they were incensed against all who thus taught or thus believed it.

Note also hence, that all the good actions we have done will be done in vain, if we persevere not in well-doing to the end.

[5] Ver. 5. Ἐνεργῶν δυνάμεις, He that worketh miracles among you.] This is the observation of all the ancients,* that comment upon this and the second verse, that to commend the beginning of the Christian faith, the gift of tongues, prophecy, and working of miracles, were vouchsafed to believers, as to the apostles at the beginning, according to our Lord's prediction, Mark xvi. 17, 18.

And let those that question the truth of Christianity observe, that this was the chief argument which carried the cause in the council at Jerusalem, that the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost were equally vouchsafed to the uncircumcised gentile and to Jews, Acts xv. 8, 9. and that this is here urged by St. Paul as a thing undeniable, to confirm the Galatians, and to confute those who endeavoured to prevail on them to admit of circumcision, and the observance of other legal rites. This confirmation therefore of the truth of Christian faith, was such as none, concerned to do it then, were able to gainsay, much less can any now find reason to doubt of it.

[6] Ver. 6. Ἐπίστευσε τῷ Θεῷ, Believed God.] Hence it is evident, that it is the act of faith, and not the object of it, which doth justify; for Abraham believed God ויחשב "et imputavit eam fidem," and he imputed that faith in him for righteousness, Gen. xv. 6. The blessed God (saith R. Salom) imputed this to Abraham for righteousness, for the faith by which he believed in him.

[7] Ver. 8. Preached the gospel to Abraham, saying, &c.] Well might the apostle argue thus from the example of Abraham, he being styled by the Jerusalem Talmud, Abraham the just, Gen. xv. 1. xviii. 2. and these words being paraphrased thus; In thy righteousness shall all the families of the earth be blessed. Here Jerome saith, Hoc autem in omnibus penè testimoniis, quæ de veteribus libris in novo assumpta sunt testamento, observare debemus quod memoriæ crediderunt evangelistæ, vel apostoli, et tantum sensu explicato, sæpe ordinem transmutaverunt, nonnunquam vel detraxerint verba, vel addiderint: for which wild note, this verse ministers no occasion: for though the words, in thy seed, occur not, chap. xxii. yet xii. 2. they are found expressly as they are cited here, only with the addition of ἀπὸ γῆς, of the earth, which adds nothing to the sense. So again, on ver. 10. he makes this note, Incertum habemus utrum Septuaginta interpretes addiderint omnis homo, et in omnibus, an in veteri Hebraico ita fuerit, et postea à Judæis deletum sit, in hanc me suspicionem illa res stimulat, quod verbum omnis, et in omnibus apostolus vir Hebrææ peritiæ, et in lege doctissimus, nunquam protulisset, nisi in Hebræis voluminibus haberentur; whereas, as I have shewed, that nothing is here added, but what was necessarily included in the full sense of the words, and therefore is in the version of the Septuagint; so to imagine, that all the apostles who understood Hebrew must have cited all that they produced out of the Old Testament, exactly according to the Hebrew, and not at all according to the Septuagint, is an imagination contrary to ocular demonstration.

[8] Ἐν σοι, In thee.] That is, in thy seed, ver. 6. so Acts iii. 25. Ye are the sons of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with your fathers, saying, And in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed; that is, in Christ: for so it follows, ver. 26. To you first, God having raised up his child Jesus, sent him to bless you. And this confutes them who, with the Jews, interpret these words as a form of benediction thus, God makes thee like to Abraham.

[9] Ver. 11. Ὁ δίκαιος, &c. The just shall live by faith.] Thus do the Jews themselves expound these words of Habakkuk, Faith is the cause of blessedness, as it is the cause of eternal life, according to these words, The just shall live by his faith. (Sepher Ikkarim, lib. i. cap. 21.)

[10] Ver. 13. For it is written, ἐπικατάρατος πᾶς ὁ κρεμάμενος ἐπὶ ξύλου.] Here again St. Jerome's note is, Scire non possum, quare apostolus in eo, quod scriptum est, 'maledictus à Deo omnis, qui pendet in ligno,' vel subtraxerit aliquid, vel addiderit; si enim semel autoritatem Septuaginta interpretum sequebatur, debuit, sicut ab illis editum est, et Dei nomen adjungere, sin verò, ut Hebræus ex Hebræis, id quod in linguâ suâ legerit, putabat esse verissimum, nec omnis, nec in ligno, quæ in Hebræo non habentur, assumere; ex quo mihi videtur, aut veteres Hebræorum libri (libros) aliter habuisse, quàm nunc habent, aut apostolum sensum scripturarum posuisse, non verba; aut quod magis æstimandum est, post passionem Christi, et in Hebræis, et in nostris codicibus ab aliquo Dei nomen appositum, ut infamiam nobis inureret, qui in ligno Christum maledictum à Deo credimus. But to omit the incredible supposition, that the Jews should have falsified both the Hebrew and Greek text, and the Samaritan copy should agree with them in that falsation;

First, The words ἐπὶ ξύλου are no addition to the text, לע עצ being in the former verse, which saith, you shall hang him on a tree; and ἐπικατάρατος is in effect κατάρατος ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ.

Secondly, The business of the apostle here is, to shew that Christ had redeemed us, ἐκ τῆς κατάρας, from the curse, by being made a curse for us; i. e. by suffering that death, which by the law was counted execrable: now to prove this, it was sufficient to shew, that by being hanged on the tree, Christ suffered that punishment, which by the law was styled execrable.

Thirdly, The Hebrew saith, chilelah heloim, accursed by the judges, is he that is hanged on a tree. Now these judges being the ordinance of God, he that receives an execrable sentence from them, may be said to lie under the curse of God, as receiving that execrable punishment, which his vicegerents do inflict upon him, by the determinate counsel of God; in which sense Christ is said to be smitten of that God, who made our sins to meet upon him, (Isa. liii. 4, 6.) and to be delivered up for our offences; and he who suffers a death which the law styles accursed by the heloim, or magistrates, who are appointed to execute the judgment of the Lord, may be said to undergo his curse.

Ἐπικατάρατος πᾶς, Cursed is every one.] When all were obnoxious to the curse of the law, saith Theodoret, he undertook that death which by the law was accursed, to free us from the curse. To restrain the words, he redeemed us from the curse of the law, to the Jews only, is in effect to say, Christ only suffered for the Jews, seeing he only suffered by hanging on the cross, the tree on which he did expire. The gentiles were not indeed subject to the particular maledictions contained in the law of Moses, because that law was not given to them, but only to the Jews: but they were subject to that death, which was the general punishment threatened to the violaters of the law, and was the curse denounced against Adam and his seed. And since it was by virtue of Christ's hanging on the cross, that the blessing of Abraham came upon the gentiles, he must have been thus made a curse for them also, and not for the Jews only.

Now here seems to be a plain evidence that our Lord suffered in our stead, by way of surrogation, the punishment the law denounced against us for sin: for we were obnoxious by the law to a curse; he, that he might redeem us from it, did for our sakes, and in our stead, willingly submit himself to that death, which by the sentence of the law did render any man accursed; for he bare our sins in his own body on the tree. Now the law expressly saith, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree; and Crellius here is forced to own a double commutation, both of the person suffering and of the evils suffered; for whereas we ought to have suffered, Christ, saith he, suffered for us; and whereas we ought to have suffered a curse, Christ suffered a curse for us. But then he adds, that we ought to have suffered a real curse, Christ only suffered a curse improperly so called for us. The curse threatened by the law to us was death eternal, the curse Christ suffered for us was only temporal death. But,

First, If the curse threatened to us was only the curse of the law, and Christ suffered the curse of the law, both which things the apostle here affirms, what ground hath Crellius to put these differences betwixt the curse Christ suffered, and the curse threatened by the law? or does he not hereby seem to make the apostle's argument sophistical and unconcluding?

Secondly, The sins to which the curse is threatened, Deut. xxvii. were either such to which God elsewhere threatened death, or cutting off, or such as he required them to abstain from, that they might live, and not die. Now seeing the Socinians so stiffly do contend, that the life promised to the observers of the law was only temporal, why should they say, that the death threatened to the violation of it is eternal death? It is true all death must be eternal to them that cannot raise themselves, and have no promise of a resurrection; upon which two accounts our Saviour's death was not eternal, because he had power to revive himself, and had a promise that he should not see corruption; but the death threatened by the law, in its own nature, being only the separation of the soul and body, this our Lord did as truly suffer, as they could do who should never live again.

The distinction therefore which the case requires, is only that which results necessarily from the difference of the person; i. e. we should have suffered the curse of the law for our own sins, and consequently should also have been accursed in the sight of God. Christ actually suffered the legal curse to obtain pardon for the sins of others, and therefore only was accursed in the eye of the law, and in the sight of men; but being in his own person wholly innocent, he could not be accursed in the sight of God: and thus it is, and must be, in all vicarial sufferings, the person sinning, and he that undertakes to suffer for him, are both guilty in the eye of the law, and suffer the punishment the law requires, but one of them alone is guilty in the sight of God. Christ therefore was so made a curse, as he was made sin for us, (2 Cor. v. 20.) not by contracting the guilt, but by suffering the punishment of our sins, by being numbered with transgressors, and condemned with them to the death which the law styles accursed.

[11] Ver. 14. Διὰ τῆς πίστεως, Through faith.] It seems to follow from these words, and from 2 Cor. ii. 7, 8. that the ministration of the Spirit belonged not to the law, but to the gospel, the law being rather the ministration of death: hence the apostle here opposes to the curse of the law, the blessing of Abraham, which (saith he) is the promise of the Spirit through faith.

[12] Ver. 15. Ὅμως ἀνθρώπου κεκυρωμένην διαθήκην οὐδεὶς ἐπιδιατάσσεται.] Here I would read ὁμῶς, which signifies ὁμοίως, similiter, in like manner; in which sense ὅμως is plainly used in these words, ὅμως τὰ ἄψυχα, and is translated, in like manner, 1 Cor. xiv. 7.

[13] Ver. 16. Αἱ ἐπαγγελίαι, The promises] Made to Abraham, Gen. xii. 3. and repeated, Gen. xxii. 18. and to Isaac, Gen. xxvi. 4.

[14] Καὶ τῷ σπέρματί σου, And to thy seed, which is Christ.] This interpretation is owned by the Jews,* who observe, that it is not written here, thy son, but thy seed; that is, the King Messiah. And, as Theodoret observes, the words are capable of no other sense; for by Christ only was the promise fulfilled, and in him alone did the gentiles receive this blessing. He therefore in whom alone this promise was verified, must be the person of whom it was chiefly, if not only, intended. And so St. Peter, assisted by the Holy Ghost, interprets these words, saying, You are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God hath made to your fathers, saying, And in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed: to you first, God having raised up his child Jesus, sent him to bless you: this child therefore is the seed. We need not the gloss of Mr. Clerc, that St. Paul here argues according to the allegorical interpretation of that age; but if it be considered in itself, it cannot be thought of any force by those who have other sentiments, because the Hebrew Zerah is a collective name: for this is the very objection of R. Isaac, that great enemy of the Christian faith, and is answered by the right reverend Bishop of Bath and Wells, by shewing that the Hebrew word is used of one, Gen. iii. 15. iv. 25. xv. 3. xxxviii. 8, 9. and that the Jews themselves so expound it: (Demonstrat. of the Messiah, par. ii. p. 256.) nor his other corrupt gloss, that by Christ is meant Christ's disciples; for is this sense, In thy seed, i. e. in Christ's disciples, shall all the families of the earth be blessed? Is not this to ascribe that to Christ's disciples which belongs to him alone; and to make them the Saviours of the world? And why does he say that nothing was promised to Christ, when the apostle tells us, that in thee and in thy seed signifies Christ, who was to be the blessing both of Jew and gentile? for though indeed the promise was to Abraham, the first subject of it was Christ, which is all the apostle here intends.

[15] Ver. 17. Μετὰ ἔτη τετρακόσια καὶ τριάκοντα, Four hundred and thirty years after.] Hence it is evident, that the apostle here refers primarily to the promise made, Gen. xii. 3. since from that only are the four hundred and thirty years to be computed; for then Abraham was seventy-five years old; (Gen. xii. 4.) from thence to the birth of Isaac, which happened when Abraham was a hundred years old, (Gen. xxi. 5.) is five-and-twenty years; from his birth to the birth of Jacob was sixty years; for Isaac was sixty years old when Rebekah bare him; (Gen. xxv. 26.) from Jacob's birth to his descent into Egypt, was one hundred and thirty years, as he saith to Pharaoh, Gen. xlvii. 9. the abode of him and his posterity in Egypt was two hundred and fifteen years; so that, with their sojourning in Canaan, was four hundred and thirty years, (Exod. xii. 40.) according to the Septuagint.

[16] Ver. 19. Τῶν παραβάσεων χάριν, Because of transgressions.] Maimonides,* in his More Nevochim, acknowledges, that the ceremonial law was given for the extirpation of idolatry: "For (saith he) when God sent Moses to redeem his people out of Egypt, it was the usual custom of the world, and the worship in which all nations were bred up, to build temples in honour of the sun, moon, and stars, and to offer divers kinds of animals to them, and to have priests appointed for that end: therefore God, knowing it is beyond the strength of human nature, instantly to quit that which it hath been long accustomed to, and so is powerfully inclined to, would not command that all that worship should be abolished, and he should be worshipped only in spirit; but that he only should be the object of this outward worship; that these temples and altars should be built to him alone; these sacrifices offered to him only, and these priests should be consecrated to his service." (Exod. xx. 24. xxv. 24. Lev. i. 2. Exod. xxii. 19. xxxiv. 14. Exod. xxii. 41.) And the like is said by Cedrenus† of their festivals, separations, purgations, oblations, decimations, that God enjoined them, that τῆς πολυθέου πλάνης ἐκστήσωνται, being employed in doing these things to the true God, they might abstain from idolatry. And thus, saith Dr. Spencer, were they kept or guarded under the discipline of the law, and shut up from the idolatrous rites and customs of the heathen world, by the strictness of these legal observations, and the penalties denounced against the violaters of them. And it is well known that all the ancient fathers were of this opinion, that God gave the Jews only the decalogue, till they had made the golden calf, and that afterward he laid this yoke of ceremonies upon them to restrain them from idolatry. Thus when God first brought them out of Egypt, and commanded them not to defile themselves with the idols of Egypt, (Ezek. xx. 7.) he is said to have given them his statutes, and shewed them his judgments, which if a man do he shall live in them, (ver. 11.) But, saith he, still their hearts were after their fathers' idols, the Egyptian Apis, &c. wherefore I gave them statutes which were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live, (ver. 24, 25.) that is, that law of carnal commandments, which, saith the apostle, was abolished for the weakness and unprofitableness of it, Heb. viii. 16. 18. And those words of Maimonides give us a clear reason why these rituals were called by St. Paul στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, the rudiments of the world, Gal. iv. 3. Colos. ii. 28. namely, because, for matter, they were the same which heathens used before to their false gods. This is a very ancient exposition, and is partly true, but it containeth not the whole truth; for the apostle, in the Epistle to the Romans, which is the best expositor of this, informs us, that the law entered, that sin might abound, Rom. v. 20. i. e. that it might appear to abound unto death, that sin might appear sin, working death in us, vii. 13. and that the law worketh wrath, iv. 15. iii. 20. by giving us the knowledge of that sin which deserveth it: and this answers to that which the apostle here saith, that the law was added because of transgressions, viz. to discover them and their punishment; that the Scripture hath concluded all men under sin, viz. by virtue of the law; that as many as are under the law are under the curse, ver. 10. and that upon these accounts, the law is our schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ, that we may be justified through faith in him, who are condemned by the law, ver. 24. Christ being the end of the law for justification to every one that believeth, Rom. x. 3.

[17] Ver. 20. Ὁ δὲ μεσίτης.] Perhaps these words may better be expounded thus:* But this mediator (viz. Moses) was only the mediator of the Jews; and so was only mediator of one party, to whom belonged the blessing of Abraham, ver. 8. 14. but God who made the promise, that in one should all the families of the earth be blessed, is one, the God of the other party, the gentiles, as well as of the Jews, and so as ready to justify the one as the other; ἐπείπερ εἷς, ὁ Θεὸς, seeing he is one God who will justify the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith. (Rom. iii. 30.) To strengthen this exposition, let it be noted, that the ancient Jews thought, that in those words, the Lord thy God is one God, (Deut. vi. 4.) was contained this mystery, that God should be owned and celebrated not by the Jews only, but by the gentiles; that he should be the king over all the earth, and in that day the Lord should be one, and his name one. So Jarchius on these words, The Lord our God is one God, says, It is intimated that Jehovah, who is now our God, and not the God of the gentiles, shall hereafter be one God, as it is written, Zeph. iii. 9. Then will I turn to the nations a pure lip, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord; and Zech. xiv. 9. The Lord shall be king over all the earth, and in that day shall the Lord be one, and his name one. (See Campegius Vitringa de Synag. Vet. lib. iii. par. ii. cap. 17. p. 1084. 1086.)

Secondly, This exposition is confirmed from the place parallel to this, Rom. iv. 14. 16. for as there it is argued, that if οἱ ἐκ νόμου κληρονόμοι, they that are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise is of no effect: so here he argues, ver. 18. that if ἐκ νόμου κληρονομία, the inhe- ritance be of the law, it is no more of promise. And as there the apostle adds, ver. 16. That therefore the inheritance is of faith, that the promise might be made firm to all the seed; not to that of the law only, but to that part also which becomes so by the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all: so here he must be supposed to argue, that the inheritance could not be by the law delivered by Moses to the Jews, as the mediator betwixt God and them, because he was not the mediator, παντὶ τῷ σπέρματι, to all the seed of Abraham, but to that part of it only which was of the law, that is, to the Jews only: or the words may be paraphrased thus; The promise, I say, was made to the seed of Abraham, ὡς ἀφ' ἑνὸς, as of one, ver. 16. ὁ δὲ Μεσίτης, but this mediator, Moses, is not the mediator of one (i. e. of that one seed Christ, which was to bring the blessing), but God (who made the promise, that in one seed all the nations of the earth, whether Jew or gentile, should be blessed) is one (and the same, always true to the word). So Dr. Allix.

[18] Ver. 23. Συγκεκλεισμένοι.] The apostle having said in the foregoing verse, συνέκλεισεν, the Scripture hath shut up all, both Jew and gentile, under sin, it seems most reasonable to interpret the word here, of men shut up as prisoners, condemned by the law to death, the punishment of sin, till that faith came to be revealed, by which we obtain a happy freedom from condemnation to death.

Or this may be spoken of the Jews, who only were under the law, and were, by virtue of the peculiar observations it required, an enclosed people, separated from communion with all other nations, till the Messiah, the great object of their faith, should be revealed.

And having thus explained the apostle's argument, it seemeth necessary a little to consider what Mr. Clerc here offers in his notes upon this chapter, from ver. 10. to the end.

1. Therefore when he says, It was very difficult indeed to observe all the rites of Moses, yet he supposes his law might be observed, and that it did not require a degree of holiness above human strength: I answer, with the distinction mentioned note on ver. 24. This is all true as to such a sincere performance of it as God would accept of; but it is not true as to the most exact, perfect, and unsinning observation of it in the highest import of the words.

Obj. But doth then God command what is impossible? Is it not absurd to make laws that cannot be kept, and to punish men for what they cannot do?

Ans. God never commands what is naturally impossible, and which when we offend against, we can justly plead, that had we used our utmost strength and diligence, we could not have avoided the doing what was forbid, or leaving undone what was commanded; for of what is so impossible no man can rationally repent, nor can his conscience condemn him for it; but he may require what, through the weakness of the flesh, is morally impossible to be always done or avoided; v. g. an infinitely holy God cannot but command, that we should not sin against him, sin being a transgression of the law: but though there be no particular sin of which we can truly say, it is impossible we should have avoided it; yet, through the infirmity of human nature, we have too much cause to say, that it is morally impossible we should live without or always be free from sin.

Secondly, When he says, The laws of Moses are not so severe as not to pardon the least sin, God having instituted sacrifices for some sins: his also I grant, according to the distinction mentioned, viz. That God for the sake of those sacrifices cleansed them from ceremonial defilements, and freed them from the civil and ecclesiastical punishments which by the law of Moses they would have been subject to, had no such sacrifice been offered for them. God also fully pardoned the sins of the upright Jews, and freed them from the punishments of the other life, but not by virtue of the blood of bulls and goats, for the reasons there alleged, but by virtue of their faith in the Messiah, owned by them to be the Messiah their righteousness.

Thirdly, When he says, That the Jews in St. Paul's time had got quite another notion of it than the law of Moses, as it is set down in the Pentateuch, had, and boasted it to be the most complete and perfect pattern of sanctity imaginable; as appears by several places in Josephus, and particularly in his books against Appio:

Ans. I answer, That neither is Josephus in this matter of much credit; neither saith he more than Moses had said before him in these words, What nation is there so great that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all the law which I set before you this day? Deut. iv. 8. and much less than David, when he saith, The law of the Lord is perfect, Psal. xix. 8. Besides, our Saviour seems to give us a contrary account of this matter, in his sermon on the mount, where though it be disputed whether he added to the law itself, yet no man questions but that he added to the gross senses the Jews had then of it, and had upon it.

Fourthly, When he adds, That the rabbins used (as appears by the version of the Septuagint and the citations of St. Paul in this place) to interpret Deut. xxvii. 26. as if the meaning of Moses was there, that God required of them the most perfect holiness, which if they did not perform, they must expect to be cursed by him; but in reality all that Moses says, is only, that the people were to curse him that did not confirm the words of the law to do them.

Ans. In all this there is scarce one word of truth: for, (1.) the rabbins were so far from expounding this, or any other text of Moses, in so high a sense, that they thought it sufficient to exempt them from God's curse, that they were of the seed of Abraham, and had him for their father, (Matt. iii. 8, 9.) that they should be accepted for the merit of circumcision, and that it was enough to be hearers of the law, though they were not doers of it, (James i. 22.) and that the observation of some precepts of the law would excuse their neglect of the rest. (See note on Rom. ii. 13. and James ii. 10, 11. and the note there.)

(2.) Whereas he saith, This appears by the version of the Septuagint: if that way of arguing be of any force, then the contrary appears from the Targum of Onkelos, and B. Uziel, who have added nothing to the words. Moreover, what hath the Septuagint here added, which is not necessarily contained in the sense of the words, as they lie in the Hebrew? For (1.) whereas they add, πᾶς ἄνθρωπος, every man; do not all interpreters add he, and is not that the same in sense? Ought not every man, who committed the sins against which any of these curses were denounced, to think himself subject to these curses? (2.) Whereas they add ἐν πᾶσι to the Hebrew, doth not the context plainly lead them to that addition? when it saith, ver. 3. 8. Thou shalt write, כל דברי, all the words of this law, were not the Jews obliged to do all the words of the law, i. e. all things commanded by the law of Moses? Deut. xix. 9. Yea, are not the blessings in the next chapter promised to them only who observe to do all the commandments, ver. 1. and the curses denounced against them who do not observe to do all his commandments and statutes? ver. 15. Doth not the Holy Ghost, assisting the sacred penman, warrant this addition in other places? See that thou make according to the pattern, say the Hebrew and the Septuagint, Exod. xxv. 43. See that thou make πάντα, all things according to the pattern, saith St. Paul, Heb. viii. 5. At the mouth of two or three witnesses shall a word be established, saith the Hebrew; σταθήσεται πᾶν ῥῆμα, shall every word be established, say the Septuagint and St. Paul. Nor (3.) hath St. Paul added any thing to the sense of the words; for all the words of the law being written by Moses in the book of the law, it is plainly the same thing to say, all the words of the law, and all the words written in the book of the law.

(4.) When he saith, Doubtless St. Paul would never have altered any thing in the words of Moses, nor followed the Septuagint at all, but rendered the Hebrew himself exactly, if he had reasoned from the bare authority of the prophet, and not from the opinion of the Jews: I answer,

First, That he casts the vilest imputation on St. Paul, by saying here, that he argues only upon the false supposition of the Jews: for St. Paul lays down this general proposition, As many as are under the law are under the curse: This is false, saith Mr. Clerc: for in reality all that Moses says is only, that the people were to curse him that did not confirm the words of the law to do them. It is so, saith St. Paul, γέγραπται γὰρ, for it is written: By your good leave, St. Paul, you are out again, there is no such thing; but you are guilty of adding to the word of God; if you understand yourself, you do not, and if you understand the words of Moses, you cannot in this argument depend upon what is written, but only on the false and rotten notion of the Jews, touching these words: so Le Clerc.

Secondly, Through the sides of St. Paul here he wounds our blessed Saviour, and all the sacred penmen: for if it be true of St. Paul, it must be also true of them; that if they had reasoned from the bare authority of the prophets, and not from the opinion of the Jews (not grounded on the true sense of the prophets), they would have rendered the Hebrew exactly, and never have altered any thing in the words of Moses, nor followed the Septuagint at all; which seeing ocular demonstration shews, that both our Lord and his apostles have often done, you must not think (saith Mr. Clerc) that they have given us the true sense of the prophets, but only some corrupt opinions which the Jews had of them. And let Mr. Clerc say as dogmatically as he pleases, that it is common with St. Paul to cite the Old Testament, so as it was usually alleged by the doctors of the Jews, whom they call darschanim, that is to say, with little regard to the circumstances of the place, or the proper signification of the words, and to argue from them so alleged, I cannot but look upon it as a very bad suggestion.

[19] Ver. 24.] Note, for the right explication of these words from ver. 21. to this verse,

First, That it cannot be denied that good and holy men under the law were justified, and obtained the pardon of their sins; since otherwise they could not be accepted by God here, or saved hereafter.

Secondly, It also seemeth evident from the discourse of the apostle in this and the Epistle to the Romans, that they could not be justified by the observance of the law; for he lays down this as the foundation of his discourse, that by the works of the law no man is justified, Rom. iii. 20. and no flesh shall be justified, Gal. ii. 16. The proofs he offers to confirm this position, do equally concern all times and persons, from the giving of the law to the revealing of the gospel: as, v. g. (1.) because by the law is the knowledge of sin condemning us to death, Rom. iii. 20. vii. 9—11. 13. Gal. iii. 22. (2.) Because the just (saith the prophet Habakkuk) shall live by his faith, Rom. i. 17. whereas the law is not of faith; whence he infers, that no man is justified in the sight of God by the works of the law, Gal. iii. 11. (3.) Because as many as are under the law are under the curse, ver. 10. (4.) Because it was impossible, through the weakness of the flesh, that the law should justify, (Rom. viii. 3.) or that it should give life, (Gal. iii. 21.) and so it never was designed for that end. It had indeed its expiatory sacrifices, but they procured only pardon of that guilt, which rendered them obnoxious to the violent death threatened by the law to such and such offenders, but gave no remedy against natural death, by the promise of a resurrection to eternal life, and so exempted no man from the punishment of Adam's sin; or they only released offenders from the obligation to civil and ecclesiastical punishments, but could not free them from the punishment of the other life: for the apostle assures us, that the blood of bulls and goats could not take away sin, Heb. x. 4. and that they did only sanctify to the purifying of the flesh, Heb. vii. 13. (See the note there.)

Now, thirdly, hence it follows, that they also must be justified by faith from all those sins by which they could not be justified by the law of Moses. (Acts xiii. 39.)

Obj. But are not the Jews styled righteous before God, by virtue of their obedience to the law of Moses? As in these words of David, The Lord rewarded me according to my righteousness, Psal. xviii. 20. For I have kept the ways of the Lord, and have not wickedly departed from my God, ver. 21. For all his judgments were before me, and I did not put away his statutes from me, ver. 22. I was also upright before him and kept myself from mine iniquity, ver. 23. Therefore hath the Lord recompensed me according to my righteousness, ver. 24. Is it not said of Zacharias and Elisabeth, that they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless? Luke i. 6. Yea, doth not our apostle say, Not the hearers of the law are δίκαιοι, just before God, but the doers of the law δικαιωθήσονται, shall be justified? Rom. ii. 13.

Ans. Now to this I answer, That there is a double justification of which the Scripture speaks: (1.) that which consists in the absolution of a sinner from the guilt of sin, by God's free pardon or remission of it, or his not imputing it to the sinner. And thus no man is or can be justified by the law, either ceremonial or moral, since neither of them does contain any promise of the pardon of it. Now all men being sinners, this justification must be necessary to all men, to put and keep them in a state of favour with God. And this is that justification which St. Paul ascribes to faith, and which, saith he, could never be obtained from the works of the law. But, nouncing them sincere in the performance of their covenants, legal, or evangelical, or in compliance with the laws of nature, Moses, or of grace, the providence of God had placed them under; and in this sense we find mention of men working righteousness under the law of nature, Job i. 1. Acts x. 35. under the law of Moses, Psal. xviii. 20. 24. Luke i. 6. and under the law of grace, 1 John iii. 7. Rev. xxii. 11. And thus all pious persons, who made it their sincere endeavour to obey the law of Moses, were righteous before God; though still the imperfections which cleaved to their obedience, were pardoned through faith. To explain this, note,

(2.) There is a justification to be undergone by all men at the great day of their accounts; and this is only the pro-

First, That the whole nation of the Jews believed in the promised Messiah, or the Messiah that was to come, and that in the seed of Abraham should all the families of the earth be blessed; this being one of their fundamental articles.

Secondly, They believed that this Messiah should confer upon them not only temporal, but spiritual, yea, eternal blessings; they expected spiritual blessings from him, even remission of sins. So Zacharias speaks of the Baptist, that he should go before the Lord to prepare his way, to give knowledge to his people of salvation through the remission of sins, Luke i. 76, 77. To him (saith Peter) give all the prophets witness, that through his name all that believe in him should receive remission of sins, Acts x. 43. So the Jews say, that the Messias* was to remove הרג כולל, the general sin of mankind, or the sin of the first man. 2. They expected by him justification, he being styled by the prophet, The Lord our righteousness, and by the Jews משיח עדקבי, Messiah our justification. Now this, say the ancient fathers, might be a justifying faith in them, without explicitly believing that Christ should die for their sins; though we have no reason to think, that they who were so plainly taught this by the prophet Isaiah, by the type of Isaac, the lifting up of the serpent, and by their sacrifices, should be wholly ignorant of it.

[20] Ver. 26. Υἱοὶ Θεοῦ διὰ τῆς πίστεως, The sons of God through faith.] Hence, saith the antipedobaptist, it appears, that infants cannot be made the sons of God by baptism, because we are all made the sons of God by faith in Christ Jesus: now infants have no faith. Ans. They might as well argue thus: By grace you are saved, through faith, Eph. ii. 7. but infants have no faith, therefore they cannot be saved. Or thus: He that believeth not shall be damned, Mark xvi. 16. no infants do believe, ergo, all infants shall be damned. The apostle plainly speaks here of persons converted from heathenism to Christianity, who were therefore baptized, being adult persons, as he doth in the Gospel of St. Mark and the Epistle to the Ephesians. This place can therefore with no more reason be applied to the case of infants, than the places cited from St. Mark and that Epistle. (See the preface to this Epistle.)

[21] Ver. 29. Κατ' ἐπαγγελίαν κληρονόμοι, Heirs according to the promise.] It is to be observed, for the explication of many places in these Epistles, that there is frequent mention in the New Testament of the promises in the plural number; to the Israelites belong the promises, Rom. viii. 4. Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision to confirm the promises, Rom. xv. 8. To Abraham and his seed were the promises made, Gal. iii. 16. and, ver. 21. Is the law then against the promises? These all died in faith, not having received the promises, Heb. xi. 13. 17. and, ver. 39. They all having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promises.

Now there is mention made in the New Testament of three sorts of promises:

First, The promise of a seed, in which all the families of the earth shall be blessed, viz. in Christ, Acts iii. 25. xii. 23. 33. xxvi. 6. Rom. iv. 13, 14. 20. ix. 9. Gal. iii. 21, 22. (see the note there.)

Secondly, The promise of the Holy Spirit, in his extraordinary gifts and operations, Acts ii. 33. 39. by which believers were then sealed up to the day of redemption, Eph. i. 13. and this is called the promise of the Father, Luke xxiv. 49. Acts i. 4. And this promise was not immediately made to Abraham, but was the consequent of the blessing which God had promised to his seed; the blessing of Abraham being first to come upon the gentiles, that they might receive the promise of the Spirit, i. e. that being made the sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus, the seed promised, God might send the Spirit of his Son into their hearts, crying, Abba, Father, iv. 6.

Thirdly, The promise of a future rest, and an eternal inheritance; there being a promise made of entering into rest, Heb. iv. 3. 9. (see the note there), peculiar to believers, and to the people of God, after the rest which God had given them in Canaan, and a promise of an eternal inheritance, Heb. ix. 15. x. 36. For that the patriarchs did by faith expect a city having foundations, whose builder and maker was God, and a heavenly country, we learn from Heb. xi. 9. 14, 15. yea, they expected to obtain a better resurrection, ver. 35. viz. by virtue of their Messiah, this being their common saying, *The Messiah shall raise up those that sleep in the dust; and one of their fundamental articles is this, That the Messiah will come, וירים אמתא, and will raise the dead, and bring them into paradise. This faith generally obtained among them before our Saviour's advent, as we learn, not only from the book of the Maccabees, but from St. Paul's plain words, Acts xxiv. 15. xxvi. 7, 8. If you inquire, where any such promise was made to Abraham or others? I answer, That such a promise was made to him and to the patriarchs, we are assured from this, that they by faith expected such things, all faith being built upon a promise; this promise therefore might be made to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 7. where God saith, I will establish my covenant betwixt thee and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be thy God, and the God of thy seed after thee; for that to be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is to be the God that will raise them up from the dead, we learn from our Saviour's argument, Matt. xxii. 32. (see the note there,) and that he therefore was called their God, because he had prepared for them a city, from Heb. xi. 15. And in reference to this future recompence, it is that the apostle saith, These all died in faith, not having received the promise, God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect, Heb. xi. 39, 40. (see the note there): now this seems to be the promise mentioned here, of which Christians are said to be the heirs, they being heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ, Rom. viii. 15. Gal. iv. 7.

CHAP. IV.

1. NOW I say, (to shew how you, who are heirs of the promises, should be kept in bondage under a schoolmaster, iii. 23. 25.) That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing (as to the possession and free use of his estate) from a servant, though he be (by right of inheritance) lord of all (his father left);

2. But is under tutors and governors until the time appointed by the father (in his last will and testament).

3. Even so we (the seed of Abraham), when we were children (as till faith came we were), were in bondage under the [1] elements of the world (as servants were of old to their masters):

4. But when the fulness of the time (appointed for the appearance of the Messiah for the benefit of Jew and gentile, that they might be made sons by him,) was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under (subjection to) the law,

5. To redeem them that were under the law (from the bondage of it), that we (together with them) might receive the adoption of sons.

6. And because ye are (now made) sons (of God by faith, iii. 25.) God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father (i. e. witnessing to your spirits that ye are the sons of God, and that he is your Father, Rom. viii. 15, 16. and enabling you to use the language, not of servants, but of sons).

7. Wherefore thou art (after this redemption wrought) no more a servant, [2] but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ.

8. (I say, thou art no more a servant,) howbeit then, when ye knew not God, [3] ye did service [4] to them which by nature are no gods.

9. But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God (being made his sons by adoption), how (after this freedom purchased by Christ) turn ye [5] again to the weak and beggarly elements (of the law), whereunto you desire again to be in bondage?

10. (For) ye observe (the Jewish sabbath) [6] days, and months (the new moons), and times (of their solemn festivals), and (sabbatical) years.

11. [7] I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed on you labour in vain (in preaching the gospel to you).

12. Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am; for [8] I am as ye are: ye have not injured me at all.

13. Ye know how (that) through infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel to you at the first.

14. And (notwithstanding) [9] my temptation which was in my flesh ye despised (me) not, nor rejected (me); but received me (rather) as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus (thinking yourselves very happy in having such an apostle).

15. Where is then the blessedness ye spake of (in having me for your apostle, who taught you no such thing as this, that you were to be justified by the observance of the law)? for I bear you record, (you had once such a great affection to me,) that, if it had been possible, you would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me.

16. (And after this) am I therefore become your enemy (or looked upon as such), because I tell you the truth?

17. They (who seduce you, do indeed) zealously affect you, but not well (and in a due manner); yea, they would exclude us (from your affections), that you might affect them (only).

18. But it is good (for you) to be zealously affected always in a good thing (as your affection to me, and to the truth I preached, is), and not only when I am present with you.

19. My little children, of whom I travail in birth again (to renew you in the faith from whence ye are fallen) till Christ be (fully) formed in you (as the child is in the womb),

20. I desire to be present with you now, and to [10] change my voice; for I stand in doubt of you.

21. [11] Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear (what is contained in the Pentateuch, the book of) the law?

22. For it is (there) written, that Abraham had two sons, the one (to wit, Ishmael) by (Agar) a bondmaid, the other (to wit, Isaac) by (Sarah) a freewoman (a lady or princess, as her name imports).

23. But he that was of the bondwoman [12] was born after the flesh (and so was not to be accounted for the seed); but (whereas) he of the freewoman was by promise, (and so was only to be accounted for the promised seed, Rom. ix. 8.)

24. Which things are an allegory (expressing one thing, and by that hinting another to us): for these (two, Agar and Sarah,) are (intended typically to represent to us) the two covenants; the one (viz. that of the law, given) from Mount Sinai, (is that covenant) which gendereth to bondage, (i. e. subjects its children to bondage, and is the covenant) which is (typified by) Agar (the bondwoman).

25. [13] For this Agar (whose name signifies a rock) is (in the allegory) Mount Sinai in Arabia (whence the law was given), and (so she) answereth to (that) Jerusalem which now is (they living long in the wilderness, and receiving the law from Mount Sinai in Arabia), and is in bondage with her children (to the law given there).

26. (Thus it was and is with the terrestrial Jerusalem,) but (the) [14] Jerusalem which is (from) above (and is signified by Sarah, the type of the second covenant) is free, (is the freewoman, and so her children cannot be in bondage to the law, as the Jews were, and it is this Jerusalem) which is the mother of us all.

27. For (of this Jerusalem, Isa. liv. 1.) it is written, Rejoice, thou barren which bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not (and so in this art like to Sarah): for (now) the desolate hath many more children than she that hath a husband (the gentile, than the Jewish church).

28. Now (to apply these things to us), we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of the promise (as being born, not of the flesh, but of the Spirit, by virtue of the promise, In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed).

29. But as then he that was born after the flesh (i. e. Ishmael) [15] persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, (i. e. Isaac, the seed produced by the Spirit of God, and the representative of us who are born of the Spirit, John iii. 3. 5.) even so it is now; (the Jews, the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, every where persecuting us Christians, 1 Thess. ii. 14—16.)

30. Nevertheless, what saith the Scripture? (i. e. What is contained in the Scripture? even these words, approved by God, Gen. xxi. 12.) Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of the bondwoman [16] shall not be heir with the son of the freewoman.

31. So then, brethren, we (being children of the promise, ver. 28.) are not children of the bondwoman (and so in subjection to the law), but of the free (woman, and therefore at liberty from the obligation or bondage of it).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 3. ΣΤΟΙΧΕΙΑ τοῦ κόσμου, The elements of the world.] i.e. The Jewish rites so called; because, as was observed, iii. 19. they were for matter mostly the same which had before obtained in the world, only they were directed to a better object and a better end.

[2] Ver. 7. Ἀλλ' υἱὸς, But a son.] That the notion of adoption includes a state of immortality; and that the sons of God were to be sons of the resurrection, I have shewed upon the parallel place, Rom. viii. 16—23. and that the Jews were not ignorant of this import of the phrase, we learn from the author of the book of Wisdom, (ii. 12.) who introduced the wicked atheists speaking thus, Let us lay in wait for the righteous, for he calleth himself a child of God. He maketh his boast that God is his Father. Let us see if his works be true——for if the just man be the Son of God, he will help him——Let us condemn him to a shameful death, for by his own saying he shall be respected. Thus (saith he) were they deceived, neither hoped they for the wages of righteousness, nor discerned a reward for blameless souls. For God created man to be immortal, and made him an image of his own eternity.——The souls of the righteous are in the hands of God, and their hope is full of immortality. Having been a little chastised, they shall be greatly rewarded; for God tried them, and found them worthy of himself. And chap. v. he introduced the same wicked persons, saying, We fools counted his life madness, and his end to be without honour; how is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the saints! where,

1. The righteous are represented as the sons and children of God: and it is farther said,

2. That as such they are to be rewarded in their souls, which are to be received into the hands of God, and to be at rest; and in their bodies, which are to be immortal.

3. That, at the day of recompence, they shall stand in great boldness, and shall, as being the sons of God, have their lot and portion with the saints, ἐν ἁγίοις ὁ κλῆρος ἀυτοῦ, that is, he shall be ὁ κληρονόμος, an heir with the saints.

[3] Ver. 8. Ἐδουλεύσατε, Ye did service.] Hence we learn how frivolous is the distinction of the papists, that latria is indeed service proper to God, but dulia is such worship as may be paid to saints and angels; for seeing saints and angels are by nature no gods, the giving dulia to them must be the thing condemned here in the heathens, that being only this, that they did δουλεύειν, give dulia to them which by nature were no gods.

[4] Τοῖς μὴ φύσει οὖσι θεοῖς, To them which are not gods by nature.] Hence we learn the consequence of the Socinian hypothesis, that Jesus Christ is not by nature God, and yet is to be honoured with the same worship, which all Christians give to him who is by nature God, seeing it teacheth us to do what St. Paul here condemneth in the very heathens: and surely it must be absurd to make that an article of Christian faith, and a part of Christian worship, which the apostle here makes a great crime of the heathen world, and a certain evidence of their ignorance of the true God. That the Socinians cannot answer this objection, appears from what they here return to it; viz. that *gods by nature is not here opposed to gods by grace, or to those who have received their divinity from the one true God; for to serve and worship such a God, by reason of the empire which he hath received from God, is not profane and wicked, but pious and necessary. Now in answer to this, I say,

First, That it is very evident from the text, that those who are not gods by nature, are opposed to him who is God by nature; viz. to him whom the heathens knew not, and to him whom the Galatians, being Christians, knew, and by whom they were known. Since then the Socinians' God by grace is not a God by nature; since he is not the God intended in these words, ye know not God; he must be ranked among those who are here opposed to him.

Secondly, I have elsewhere shewn, that the heathens had the very same sentiments with the Socinians, as to the worship of their inferior deities; and it is wonderful to see how they concur in sense, and almost in words.

Indeed, there is scarce any plea they use for the worship of Jesus Christ, as a made God, which was not before used by the philosophers† for the worship of their inferior deities.

Secondly, Hence also it appears to be a mistake, to say that the Galatians, to whom the apostle here writes, before they received the gospel, were, as to the greatest part of them, proselytes of the gate, or also of righteousness; seeing it is plain that they were heathens, not knowing the true God, but serving them which by nature were no gods, iv. 8, 9. and by the gospel were to be delivered ἐκ τοῦ ἐνεστῶτος αἰῶνος πονηροῦ, from the present evil age, i. 4. from which they who were made proselytes of the gate, and worshipped the true God, were in a great measure delivered. Thirdly, The great endeavour of the Judaizers that crept in among them, was to persuade them to be circumcised; (Gal. v. 2. vi. 12.) whereas all the proselytes of righteousness, all the gentiles which had before been subject to the Jewish rites, must be circumcised when they were admitted to be proselytes of righteousness, they being made such by circumcision, and a promise of obedience to the law of Moses.

Obj. It is the Jewish law which is styled the elements of the world, to which they were in bondage, iv. 3.

Ans. The Jewish law is indeed so called, but it was for this reason, that it was made up of ceremonies, which for the matter were the same with those which had been used by other nations of the world, the object of them only being changed: (see the note on iii. 19.) and they are no where called the elements of piety, as Mr. Clerc supposes.

[5] Ver. 9. Πάλιν ἐπὶ τὰ ἀσθενῆ καὶ πτωχὰ στοιχεῖα, Again to weak and beggarly elements.] Here interpreters find great difficulty to shew, how the Galatians, who were never under the law, can be said to be again, and anew, in bondage to these elements. But the observation made on iii. 19. that the rites of the Jews and heathens were for the matter mostly the same, removes that difficulty; and shews that they are said to return to these elements, not because they before observed the Jewish ceremonies, but because the ceremonies of the law, being for the matter mostly the same with those the gentiles used to their heathen deities, by returning to them, they returned to those elements. These rites are also weak and beggarly elements in comparison of the riches of the Holy Ghost, and the power of the Holy Ghost; they are weak, as having no power to cleanse the soul; and beggarly, as not being able to confer upon us the spiritual riches of the gospel, pardon of sins, adoption, the gifts and graces of the Spirit, eternal redemption.

[6] Ver. 10. Ἡμέρας καὶ μῆνας, Days and months.] That this verse is to be interpreted of the Jewish solemn times, and the festivals observed by them, as far as they could be observed out of Judea, the whole drift of this Epistle shews, which is to bring off the Galatians from thinking they were obliged to observe the rites and ceremonies of the law: for that the Jews did ἑορτάζειν, keep their feasts in Egypt and Alexandria, and wherever they were settled among the heathens, we learn from Philo,* in his oration against Flaccus; that they were very numerous in Asia Minor, of which Galatia was a part, see the note on James i. 1. that in those places where they dwelt, they had converted a great many to the Jewish worship, and made them as it were a part of themselves, Josephus testifies; (see note on 1 Pet. i. 1.) and if it were so at Galatia, this might make them so ready to relapse to their old Jewish rites.

[7] Ver. 11. Φοβοῦμαι ὑμᾶς, I am afraid of you.] As well he might; for by this practice they must revolt again from Christ to the Jewish synagogues: for it belonged only to their great Sanhedrin,† or to the doctors of the law, to state the certain times of their new moons and other festivals; so that for the due observation of them they must entirely depend upon the Jewish Sanhedrin.

[8] Ver. 12. Ὅτι κἀγὼ ὡς ὑμεῖς, I am as you are.] That is, say the fathers, I was once zealous for the law as you are; but now I live as do the gentiles, and not as do the Jews; do you who are not Jews, but gentiles, live in like manner, as men exempted from the law: but this exposition seems not to cohere with these words, Ye have not injured me at all. They may therefore be thus interpreted: Brethren, be still as affectionate to me as I am to you, and count me not your enemy, because I tell you the truth; for I am still as affectionate to you, as ever you were to me, (ver. 14.) I do not look upon you as persons who have done any thing with an intent to injure me; and though your false teachers have done you this injury, by their pernicious doctrines, yet have they not prevailed on you to speak evil of me, or act injuriously towards me.

[9] Ver. 14. Τὸν πειρασμόν μου τὸν ἐν τῇ σαρκὶ, My temptation which was in the flesh.] It is the opinion of the Greek commentators, and of the reverend Dr. Hammond, that the ἀσθένεια τῆς σαρκὸς, the infirmity of the flesh, ver. 13. and the temptation in the flesh, here, only signify the persecutions the apostle suffered for preaching the gospel; but that this cannot be the full import of the words, is evident from these considerations: (1.) That the persecutions which he suffered for the cause of Christ, could administer no reason to the Galatians, ἐξουθενῆσαι καὶ ἐκπτύειν, to condemn, vilify, despise him as nothing, and even to spit upon him who preached the gospel, with such great demonstration of the Spirit, and such power of miracles under all his persecutions. Moreover, the apostle, in the Epistles to the Corinthians, represents these sufferings as a vindication of the truth of his apostleship; yea, as an argument of the life and power of that Jesus who did such mighty things by his apostles under all their sufferings, and as that which should create the greater respect to him; and gives them a large catalogue of them, confirming it with an oath, 2 Cor. xi. 31. which shews, that though he sometimes feared the greatness of his tribulations might make them faint, or shake them who were taught, that they must also be partakers of the like sufferings; yet did he not conceive himself more contemptible or vile in his own person for his persecutions: and therefore, as he mentions this to the Thessalonians as a proof of his sincerity, that having before suffered, and been shamefully entreated at Philippi, he was still bold to preach the gospel to them, 1 Thess. ii. 2. as he mentions his sufferings to the Ephesians, as their glory, iii. 13. so here he declares to his Galatians, that he still suffered persecution; and he concludes his Epistle thus, From henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus, Gal. v. 11. insinuating, that these sufferings were so far from giving any person a just reason to despise him, that they were rather an inducement to a more honourable treatment of him.

Secondly, Though ἀσθένεια and πειρασμὸς, infirmity and temptation, absolutely put, do sometimes signify afflictions or persecutions; yet do we never elsewhere read that ἀσθένεια σαρκὸς, πειρασμὸς ἐν σαρκὶ, σκόλοψ ἐν σαρκὶ, an infirmity, temptation, or thorn in the flesh, is used in that sense. Nor was it only the sufferings he endured in his body, but the very presence of his body, which was weak: see note on 2 Cor. xii. 7—9. Having therefore in that place proved, that besides his persecutions, he had a weakness and imperfection in his body; which rendered both his person and his speech contemptible, I think it reasonable to refer these words to it.

Ver. 18. Ἐν καλῷ.] It is thought, that by this expression St. Paul means himself; but it seems not reasonable to think that he would call himself a good man, when he was speaking to them who had so bad an opinion of him; but he might say this of his doctrine, nor will the Greek bear the other sense.

[10] Ver. 20. Ἀλλάξαι τὴν φωνήν.] To temper my voice to you, as your affairs require; lamenting the fall of some, and striving to recover them, and commending the steadfastness of others in the faith.

[11] Ver. 21. Τὸν νόμον οὐκ ἀκούετε; Do not you hear the law?] i. e. Do not you, Christians, to whom the law and the prophets are read every Lord's-day, and which you have the liberty to read at all times, hear what the law speaks? Here, saith Mr. Clerc, it is to be noted, that St. Paul argues from some received midrash vulgarly known; for if that allegory whereof he here speaks, had not been before heard of, he would have had no reason to wonder that the Galatians had never collected any such thing from the story which he refers to.

Ans. 1. To this I answer, That no such interpretation of this passage was vulgarly known among the Jews, is apparent from the silence of all the Jewish paraphrasters upon the place, and of all those interpreters, who have conversed most in the writings of the Jewish rabbins; and yet produce not the least hint of any such thing, nor can Mr. Clerc do it. It is true indeed that the Jews had this canon, that proles sequitur matrem, and so allowed that the offspring of a bondwoman must be born in bondage, the offspring of a freewoman must be free; but it is not true that they ever deemed Agar the representative of those under the first or legal covenant, and Sarah only of those who were under the new and gospel covenant.

Secondly, This supposed midrash is contrary to their known and avowed principle, that their law was to be eternal, and so that there was no new covenant to succeed for the abolishing of it, as is plain from the apostle's dispute against them, both here and in the Epistle to the Romans, and in that to the Hebrews. Moreover, doth not Mr. Clerc tell us, in his annotations on the former chapter, that the law, and a perfect pattern of holiness, was the same in the opinion of the Jews? and must this perfect pattern of holiness here, in the opinion of the same Jews, be only a covenant gendering to bondage, and represented by Agar, a bondwoman?

Thirdly, the apostle doth not wonder that the Galatians had collected no such allegory from the story referred to; but only asks, if they had not heard the words he doth thus allegorically expound to them. He proceeds thus:

Obj. "Farther, seeing this interpretation could not be urged against those who might deny that the Scripture ought to be so understood, and the apostle doth not make use of his authority to confirm it; it is evident, that he argues here from what was generally allowed, which kind of things it is not material should be true, or well-grounded, as long as they contain nothing prejudicial to true piety, and are believed by those against whom we dispute. So that from St. Paul's using such an allegory against the Judaizing Galatians, it does not follow, that we in this age are bound to admit it as a secret revealed from heaven to the apostle."

Ans. To this I answer, (1.) That it is too confidently said, that the apostle doth not make use of his authority to confirm this interpretation; for is it not Paul an apostle, not of man, but of Jesus Christ, and of God the Father, (i. 1.) who writes thus to the Galatians? And had not the apostles from the Holy Ghost the word of wisdom, and of knowledge, to direct them in the understanding the mysteries of the Old Testament? Does he not declare, they spake the wisdom of God in a mystery? 1 Cor. ii. 7. That wisdom which God had revealed to them by his Spirit? ver. 10. that they had received the Spirit which is of God, that they might know the things which are freely given us of God; which things they also spake, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual? see the note, ver. 12, 13. there. And is not this a sufficient confirmation of all which they declared they writ, as the apostles of Jesus Christ?

Secondly, I add, that it cannot reasonably be said, he argues here from what was generally allowed, not only because I have proved that nothing of this nature ever was, or could be, allowed by the Jews; but also because no one instance can be produced where the apostle useth any such argument ad hominem, or from their own mistaken principles; but where it is evident from his own words and declarations that he doth so. Had the apostle said, as he is forced in his paraphrase to make him speak, These things used to be allegorically explained by the Jews, and may be interpreted so as to signify what I a little before said; or, as he begins his Christian allegorist, We take you at your word, O Jews! there might have been some probability in this fancy: but the apostle having not given us the least hint of any thing of this nature, it must pass for mere romance; and the other things he adds, can be no better than a reflection on the authority and writings of the apostles; for do you not hear the law? saith the apostle: No, saith Mr. Clerc, that they do not, yea, they cannot in this case; it being not at all necessary that the words of Scripture should have any such allegorical interpretation, as that which is supposed (here) to belong to them.—Do you not hear the law, for it is written? saith the apostle: What then, saith Mr. Clerc, you grossly impose upon us in these words, connecting them to the former by a γὰρ, for, and saying gravely, it is written; when indeed you argue not from what is written, but from some whimsies of the Jews, perhaps neither true nor well-grounded. These things are an allegory, saith the apostle: So you say, St. Paul, quoth this critic: but if we thoroughly consider it, we shall find that most that hath been said by learned men against this way of interpreting Scripture in the general, may be objected against this particular allegory.—These are the two testaments, saith St. Paul; But (saith Mr. Clerc) we of this age are not bound to admit this as a secret revealed from heaven to you: and by your good leave, this interpretation cannot be urged against those who deny that the Scripture ought to be so understood.

To conclude, what shall we say to the unbelieving Jews, objecting thus from this interpretation? "Finding that your apostle hath produced against us a weak argument, false and ill-grounded, you pretend to help him out by saying, it is a Jewish midrash vulgarly known: this we must take for an officious lie, till you can shew that either we, or our fathers, or Philo the allegorist, who speaks of Agar and Sarah in a quite different way of allegory, had any such sentiments. And if your apostle hath imposed upon you here with such ill-grounded arguments and interpretations, without giving you the least hint that he was arguing only from our concessions; how know you that he hath not often done the like in all his other writings?

[12] Ver. 23. Κατὰ σάρκα γεγέννηται, Was born after the flesh.] i. e. By natural generation, and the strength of the flesh, before Abraham's body became dead: (Rom. iv. 19.) the other by virtue of the promise made to him by God, when his body and Sarah's womb were both dead, (ver. 20.) and only quickened by that Spirit which is the power of God.

[13] Ver. 25. Τὸ γὰρ Ἄγαρ, Σινᾶ ὄρος ἐστὶν, For this Agar is Mount Sinai in Arabia.] i. e. She represents it (1.) in her name, for הגר, in the Arabian language, signifies a rock, as Mount Sinai is called. (2.) By her flight, she flying twice into Arabia from her mistress, Gen. xvi. 7. into the wilderness of Shur, called by the Chaldee Chagra, there and Gen. xxv. 18. and after flying again into the same wilderness. And (3.) by her station, for there dwelt the posterity of Ishmael, called from her name Hagarens, as the oriental writers witness: see Bochart. Geogr. Sacr. lib. iv. cap. 11. p. 255. cap. 27. p. 312. and Grotius here.

Τὸ γὰρ Ἄγαρ, Σινᾶ ὄρος ἐστὶν ἐν Ἀραβίᾳ.] Note, that it seems very unreasonable to me to expunge these words, Σινᾶ ὄρος ἐστὶν ἐν Ἀραβίᾳ, against the plain evidence of all the ancient versions, and the concurrent suffrage of all the ancient interpreters, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, among the Greeks; Ambrose and St. Jerome among the Latins, who take not the least notice of any various reading here; and to add δὲ for γὰρ, only to solve a difficulty: for if this liberty may be allowed, we may take the same liberty in all other places, and strike out such words as spurious or suspected, which create the difficulty. And this is less to be allowed when the words rejected, according to the descants of the ancients, give a plain reason why Agar is made the symbol of the covenant given from Mount Sinai, viz. τὸ γὰρ ὄνομα τοῦ Ἄγαρ, because the name Agar, saith Bochart, is by interpretation a rock; and, say the Greek interpreters, is the name given to Mount Sinai, ἐν Ἀραβῶν γλώσσῃ, in the Arabian tongue. But we need here no various lection, the interpretation which Dr. Mills hath excellently given us of this place, being very clear only by adding κατ' ὑποτύπωσιν, by representation, after the word ἐστὶν, which is the sense it usually bears in allegorical propositions, and by referring συστοιχεῖ δὲ τῇ νῦν Ἰερουσαλὴμ, not to the mountain, but to Agar, for then the sense of the whole runs thus: These two sons of Abraham, Ishmael born of Agar his handmaid, and Isaac born of Sarah the freewoman, contain an allegory, in which the name is put for the thing signified or represented by it; for these two women and their children are, by representation, the two covenants; the one covenant being that from Mount Sinai, gendering to bondage, ἥτις ἐστιν, which is, by representation, Agar the bond-woman, and so bearing a child which also was in bondage, τὸ γὰρ Ἄγαρ, for that which is signified by Agar, from whom Ishmael descended, is Mount Sinai in Arabia, whence the law was given; and this Agar answers to Jerusalem that now is, and is in bondage with her children to the law, as the bondwoman and her child were to Abraham; but the Jerusalem which is above, ἐλευθέρα ἐστὶν, is by representation Sarah the freewoman, whose son was born, not according to the flesh, but according to the promise; and this woman is the mother of us all; for we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of the promise, and so the spiritual seed of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise.. And this interpretation is confirmed by the conclusion of the whole allegory thus: So then, brethren, we are not the children of the bond-woman, but of the free. O si sic omnia!

[14] Ver. 26. Ἡ ἄνω Ἰερουσαλὴμ, The Jerusalem which is above.] As the state of the church under the gospel is styled, by the evangelists, the kingdom of heaven; so here the Jerusalem which is from above, the gospel-state, or new kingdom, being erected by the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, and leading us to it, is styled the heavenly Jerusalem. Note also, that the Jews tell us,* that the inferior Jerusalem is a type of that which is above.

Ver. 27.] Note, that the Jews themselves interpret these words, cited from Isa. liv. 1. of the times of the Messiah. (Midrash shir Hashirim, ad Cant. i. 5.)

[15] Ver. 29. Ἐδίωκε, Persecuted.] St. Jerome here saith, Ishmael struck Isaac; but the text, Gen. xxi. 9. saith only, that he mocked him: this derision therefore must be reputed, as a persecuting him with the tongue.

[16] Ver. 30. Οὐ κληρονομήσῃ, Shall not be heir.] Hence we may learn what that persecution, mentioned ver. 29. was, even a derision of Isaac's pretensions to be the heir of Abraham; (so among the Jews rabbi Salom,† cited by Cartwright on Gen. xxi. 9. and St. Jerome in his Questions and Traditions upon Genesis;) even as the carnal Jews contended with the believing gentiles, that they must be the true heirs of the promise made to Abraham, who were his seed according to the flesh.

10. But) I have confidence in you through the Lord, that (after consideration of what I have written) you will be no otherwise minded (than I exhort you to be): but he that troubleth you shall bear his judgment (τὸ κρίμα, the sentence of condemnation due to him on that account), whoever he be.

11. And (whereas some of the Judaizers have suggested, that I elsewhere preach up that circumcision I oppose in you), brethren, (you may learn the falsehood of that suggestion from my sufferings, for) [6] if I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution (from the Jews; since) then is the offence (they take at preaching) of the cross ceased?

12. [7] I would they were even cut off (from the communion of the church) that (do thus) trouble (and unsettle) you.

13. For, brethren, ye have been called (by Christianity) to liberty (from the Jewish yoke); only (be careful that ye) use not (your) liberty [8] for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another.

14. [9] For all the (moral) law (respecting our neighbour) is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

15. But [10] if you (in contradiction to this law) bite (calumniate) and devour one another, take heed that ye be not (in the issue) consumed one of another.

16. [11] This I say then (to prevent these miscarriages), Walk in the Spirit, (i. e. according to the motions of the Holy Spirit, Rom. viii. 1, 2. 9. 12—14.) and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh: (i. e. these carnal motions, ver. 13. and those uncharitable contentions, ver. 15.)

17. For the flesh (indeed) lusteth against the Spirit (and so incites you to these things), and (but) the Spirit (lusteth) against the flesh; and these (two principles) are contrary one to the other: so that ye (who are led by the Spirit) cannot do the things ye would (according to the flesh; nor ye who are led by the flesh, the things that ye would according to the Spirit).

18. But if ye are led by the (conduct of the Holy) Spirit, ye are not under the law, (and so sin shall not have dominion over you, Rom. vi. 14.)

19. [12] Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness,

20. Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife, sedition, heresy,

21. Envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such-like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in times past, that they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

22. But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith,

23. Meekness, temperance: against such [13] there is no law (that can condemn or render them obnoxious to the wrath of God).

24. And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts (of it).

25. If (then) we (pretend to) live in (and by) the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit (according to the motions, not of the flesh but of the Spirit).

26. Let us not be desirous of vain-glory (Gr. vain-glorious), [14] provoking one another, envying one another.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 3. ΜΑΡΤΥΡΟΜΑΙ πάλιν, I testify again.] These words must not be thought to import, that he had testified this before in this Epistle; and now did it again, there being nothing said before of this matter, but thus, I Paul say to you, that if ye be circumcised Christ shall profit you nothing: and again, I testify that you are debtors, by admitting this circumcision, to yield obedience to the whole law of Moses: for as by baptism we Christians do oblige ourselves to observe all the institutions of the Christian faith; so did the Jews by circumcision oblige themselves to yield obedience to the whole law of Moses. This the apostle elsewhere intimates, by saying to the Jews, Circumcision verily profiteth, if you keep the law, Rom. ii. 25. to which thou art obliged by it; and by objecting to them who were so zealous for the circumcision of others, that they acted insincerely in that zeal, because they themselves did not keep the law, Gal. vi. 13. When any one became a proselyte of justice, or turned from heathenism to Judaism, they first instructed him in the law of Moses, and when he declared himself resolved to obey it, then they circumcised him, and so admitted him into the congregation, and he became as one of them. For circumcision being the sign by which they entered into covenant with God, when the Mosaical law became the covenant betwixt God and the seed of Abraham; that circumcision, by which they entered into covenant with him, must lay an obligation on them to observe the law of Moses. And hence the Judaizing Christians, who held that the law of Moses was an everlasting covenant, thought that the believing gentiles were to be dealt with as their proselytes; that is, unless they were circumcised, and observed the law, they could not be saved. (Acts xv. 1.)

But still it remains a great inquiry, whether the words contained in the second, third, and fourth verses, are to be taken generally, so as to exclude all believing Jews from any benefit by Christ, or by the covenant of grace, who sought for justification by the works of the law? or whether they are to be restrained only to the believing gentiles? Now in answer to this question, let it be noted,

First, That it is not the being circumcised, which is here said to exclude from grace and salvation, but the being circumcised to obtain justification and salvation by it; as is apparent from the words, Christ is become of none effect to you, whosoever of you are justified by the law. Had the bare use of circumcision rendered Christ unprofitable to the Jew and gentile, or put them under the curse of the law, St. Paul would not have circumcised Timothy, nor have owned the believing Jews as Christian brethren, who were still zealous for the law.

Secondly, Observe, that the law of Moses, being given to the Jews, and some of its precepts being styled everlasting covenants and commandments, and they having all engaged to observe it, might think themselves obliged still to be circumcised, and observe the law, by virtue of God's precept, till it was more solemnly by God declared to be abrogated, though they expected not to be justified by it:

for, so we find it was with the believing Jews: they all continued zealous of the law, Acts xxi. 20. and thought all Jews obliged to observe it, ver. 24. but then they thought to be saved, not by the law, but by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, Acts xv. 11. as the believing gentiles were, and they believed in Christ, that they might be justified by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law, Gal. ii. 16. But now the gentiles being not under the obligation of the law of Moses, they having first believed in Christ, and received, upon that faith, the Holy Ghost, they could not afterward submit to the observance of the law; but by so doing, they must testify they thought not faith in Christ sufficient to justification, or acceptance with God, without the observance of the law; and therefore must submit to it for these ends, and so must in effect deny, that faith in Christ would justify them; or, that the giving of the Holy Ghost was a sufficient evidence of their acceptance with God; which was a tempting or distrusting of God, after so full a demonstration of his grace and favour to them. (Acts xv. 8—10.)

I therefore think these words concern as well those Jews as gentiles, who sought for justification still, not by their faith in Christ, but through the works of the law, (Rom. ix. 31, 32.) and held circumcision necessary to all; not by way of precept only, but as a necessary means of salvation: for by these things, saith the apostle, they in effect declared, that Christ was dead in vain, and frustrated the grace of Christ, (Gal. ii. 21.) and so fell from it. Nor is it easy to perceive how they should have justification and salvation from him, from whom, after the revelation of him, they did not expect it; or have faith in him to justification, by whom they thought not that they should be justified.

[2] Ver. 5. Ἐλπίδα δικαιοσύνης, Hope of righteousness.] Or justification, i. e. the hope of glory, the consequent of our justification: for, being justified by faith, we have peace with God, and rejoice in the hope of the glory of God: it is through the Spirit that we wait for, and expect this glory; for he is the pledge and earnest of it; by him we are sealed up to the day of redemption, and wrought up to the expectation of it; (Rom. v. 1. 2. Eph. i. 14. 2 Cor. i. 22. Eph. iv. 33. 2 Cor. v. 5. Rom. v. 5.) and therefore are not ashamed of our hope, because the love of God is shed abroad into our hearts by the Spirit he hath given us: and thus do we, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, wait for the redemption of our bodies, and the glorious liberty of the sons of God. (Rom. viii. 21. 23.)

[3] Ver. 6. Πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη, Faith working by love.] There be great disputes about, and divers interpretations of, these words, which I think may be rendered, Faith working or made active by love, or excited to perform our duty to God, and to our neighbour for his sake, by that love which we bear to him; or from considerations of his great love to us, according to those words of the apostle, The love of Christ constraineth us, 2 Cor. v. 14. And here, The life I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me, Gal. ii. 20.

[4] Ver. 8. This persuasion cometh not of him that calleth you.] Here Jerome's note runs thus: Persuasio nostra non est ex eo qui vocavit nos, sed ex nobis qui consentimus, vel non consentimus vocanti; aliud quippe Dei opus, aliud hominum: Dei opus est vocare, hominum credere, vel non credere; et sicubi aliter de Scripturis liberum hominis affirmatur arbitrium, ut ibi si volueritis, et si audieritis me, Exod. xix. 2. et iterum, et nunc Israel, quid petit à te Dominus Deus tuus? Deut. x. et ex hoc loco vel maximè comprobatur.

Accusat enim, quare non obediverint veritati, ostendens in eorum arbitrio positum vel obedire vel non obedire. And in this he speaks the sense of all the ancients till St. Austin's time.

[5] Ver. 9. A little leaven, &c.] That is, saith Chrysostom, circumcision, though it be but one command, brings us under an obligation to obey the whole Jewish law, as the apostle teacheth, ver. 3.

[6] Ver. 11. Εἰ περιτομὴν ἔτι κηρύσσω, If I yet preach circumcision.] All the Greek interpreters say, this verse returns an answer to the suggestions of the patrons of the law, viz. that * he was a hypocrite, in some places preaching up circumcision, in others not. (See the note on iii. 4.)

[7] Ver. 12. Ὄφελον καὶ ἀποκόψονται, I wish they were even cut off.] The interpretation of all the Greek fathers, and of St. Ambrose, Austin, and Jerome on this place, is this, "Utinam non sol m circumcidantur, sed etiam abscindantur," I wish not only they were circumcised, but even made like the priests of the mother of the gods, worshipped formerly by you of Galatia, who had that member cut off. But if this interpretation seem too light to be affixed to the words of the apostle, I rather choose to interpret them as a wish, that they were cut off from the communion of the church, because this seems agreeable to a like passage, 1 Cor. v. 6, 7. where having said, as here, a little leaven leavens the whole lump, he adds, purge out therefore the old leaven, i. e. put away from yourselves the wicked person, which he himself here would not do alone; because he saw his authority among them was impaired, and he feared this rather might exasperate, than cure their distemper. (See note on 2 Cor. x. 16.) That ὄφελον is sometimes joined with an aorist, and sometimes with an imperfect of the indicative mood, we learn from these examples, ὄφελον ἐν ἅδῃ με ἐφύλαξας, I wish thou wouldest hide me in the grave, Job xiv. 13. ὄφελον γὲ ἐβασιλεύσατε, I wish you did reign, 1 Cor. iv. 8.

[8] Ver. 13. Εἰς ἀφορμὴν τῇ σαρκὶ, For an occasion of the flesh.] This is done (1.) by a carnal use of it to gratify the motions of the flesh, as they who turned the grace of God into lasciviousness, and thought they might sin more freely, because they were not under the law, but under grace: (Rom. vi. 1. 15.) or, (2.) by an uncharitable use of it, to the scandal of their weak brethren; or the contempt of those who did not fully understand their liberty; or by contending with, or biting one another, (ver. 16.) which was an evidence that they were carnal: (1 Cor. iii. 3.) or, lastly, by refusing obedience to their masters, (see note on 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2.) and subjection to superiors; (see note on 1 Pet. ii. 16.) the remedy of which distempers, is true Christian love; for he that loves sincerely, will not refuse to serve him whom he loves.†

[9] Ver. 14. The whole law is fulfilled in this, That thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.] So that if thou be still desirous to fulfil the law, thou mayest do it by observing this comprehensive law of love. So Œcumenius.

[10] Ver. 15. Εἰ δὲ ἀλλήλους δάκνετε, If ye bite, &c.] Theo-

* Ὑποκριτής ἐστιν ἀλλαχοῦ περιτομὴν κηρύσσων, ἀλλαχοῦ δὲ οὔ. Theodoret.

† Ὁ γὰρ εἰλικρίνως ἀγαπῶν οὐδὲ δουλεύειν παραιτεῖται τῷ φιλουμένῳ. Theophylact.

doret here notes, that the contentions and quarrels which arose betwixt them that stood firm, and those who warped to the legal observances, gave occasion to these words: and as I have observed, that the zeal of the Jews would not suffer an uncircumcised person to live among them; so might it be also with these zealous Judaizers.

[11] Ver. 16, 17.] Note, that I have interpreted these verses as most commentators do; but I conceive, they may be best interpreted from Rom. vii. thus:

Ver. 16. But this I say (to take you off from this bondage to the law), Walk in the Spirit (in newness of the Spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter, Rom. vii. 6.) and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh; (i. e. the motions of the flesh shall not have dominion over you, and bring you captive to the law of sin, as it doth in them; because ye are not under the law, but under grace, Rom. vi. 14.)

Ver. 17. For (in them) the flesh lusteth against the Spirit (or inward man not renewed, ver. 23. 25.) and the Spirit lusteth against the flesh, (ver. 19—22.) and these two are contrary; so that ye (who are under the law, and walk not in newness of the Spirit) cannot do the things that ye would, (for the good that ye would, ye do not, ver. 19.)

[12] Ver. 19. Τὰ ἔργα τῆς σαρκός, The works of the flesh.] That some of these may very properly be called works of the flesh, cannot be doubted; but seeing some of these sins seem chiefly to consist in errors of the mind, as heresy and idolatry, and others of them to derive from evil dispositions of the spirit, as envy, malice, witchcraft, it seems not easy to perceive with what propriety they are here called the works of the flesh. But,

1. That strife, contentions, bitter zeal, are indeed works of the flesh, we may discern from a reflection on the usual objects of them; for we do not use to contend with or envy men on the account of things truly spiritual, because they bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, or have the pleasures of an upright conscience; but our contentions generally are about worldly, carnal things, the pleasures, honours, or enjoyments of the present world: for whence come zeal and envy? saith St. James, come they not from your lusts which war in your members? James iv. 1.

Moreover, murder and witchcrafts, or φαρμακεῖαι, as that word imports, those poisonous ingredients which are used to destroy human life, are the fruits of this hatred, envy, malice; and so must have their rise from the same sensual lusts.

The idolatry of the heathens, not only as it was attended with revellings and uncleanness; but as it represented God to corporeal eyes in images, and brought him down unto the senses, may well be deemed a sensual crime.

And, lastly, heresy, according to the Scripture-notion, being not a pure mistake of judgment, but an espousing a false doctrine out of disgust, pride, or envy, or from worldly principles, or to avoid persecution or trouble in the flesh, may well be ranked among carnal lusts. Hence are such men said, not to serve God, but their own belly, (Rom. xvi. 17, 18.) to teach what they ought not for filthy lucre's sake, (Tit. i. 11.) to account gain for godliness, (1 Tim. vi. 5.) and through covetousness, with feigned words, to make merchandise of others; (2 Pet. ii. 3.) and therefore the apostle doth not advise us to convince, but only to admonish and reject the heretic, as knowing that he sins, being convinced of his own conscience. (See note on Tit. iii. 10.)

[13] Ver. 23. Οὐκ ἔστι νόμος, There is no law.] The exposition of those who say, such persons had no law, is not to be approved, because it suits not with the word κατὰ τοιούτων, against such there is no law. Moreover, the law of liberty they are under was given to oblige them to the practice of these virtues; and so was needful to that end.

[14] Ver. 26. Ἀλλήλους προκαλούμενοι, Provoking one another, &c.] Theodoret here observes, that they who stood firm in the faith, and so enjoyed their spiritual gifts, might be apt to condemn, and glory over the weak on that account; and others might envy their gifts: and this shews the seasonableness of this exhortation, and connects these words with the beginning of the following chapter, where the apostle condemns them who had high thoughts of themselves, and upon that account were apt to overlook and to neglect their fallen brother.

CHAP. VI.

1. BRETHREN, if any man be overtaken with [1] a fault, [2] you that are spiritual (endowed with those spiritual gifts which enable you for the public ministrations in the church) restore such a one [3] in the spirit of meekness (to a right understanding of his duty, and a suitable practice); considering thyself, [4] lest thou also be tempted (and so fall as he did).

2. Bear ye one another's burdens (infirmities in judgment or in manners), and so fulfil the law of Christ (which requires you by love to serve one another, v. 13.)

3. For [5] if a man think himself to be something, when (wanting charity, 1 Cor. xiii. 2, 3.) he is nothing, he deceiveth himself.

4. But (to avoid this deceit) [6] let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not (only) in (comparing himself with) another.

5. For every man shall bear [7] his own burden.

(The apostle having thus instructed their teachers, or spiritual men, not to despise or undervalue their Christian brethren, proceeds now to instruct these brethren how to behave themselves towards their teachers, saying,)

6. Let him that is taught in the word [8] communicate to him that teacheth in all good things (he stands in need of, as God's blessing may enable him).

7. Be not deceived (by your false teachers); God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, (of) that (kind) shall he also reap.

8. For he that soweth to the flesh (by doing the works of the flesh, v. 20, 21.) shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit (by bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit, mentioned v. 22, 23.) shall of the Spirit (raising him up to it, Rom. viii. 11.) reap life everlasting.

9. And (but then) let us not be weary of well-doing (or of exercising these fruits of the Spirit): for [9] in due season we shall reap (the rewards of them), if we faint not (but hold out unto the end).

10. As we have therefore opportunity (ability), let us do good (and charitable offices) to all men, [10] especially to them who are of the household of faith.

11. Ye [11] see how large a letter I have written unto you with my own hand.

12. As many as desire to make a fair show in (things concerning) the flesh (endeavouring to gratify men, and avoid their displeasure), they (would) constrain you to be circumcised; only lest they should suffer persecution (from their hands) [12] for the cross of Christ.

13. (I say, it is upon this account, and not out of regard to the law, that they so zealously plead for circumcision, and the observation of it;) [13] for neither do they themselves who are circumcised keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, [14] that they may glory in your flesh.

14. But (whatsoever they may glory in) God forbid that I should glory, save in the (knowledge and in the profession of the) cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified to me, and I unto the world, (ii. 20. as being dead to sin, Rom. vi. 3, 4. to the flesh, Gal. v. 24. to the law by the body of Christ, and separated from the world to live unto God).

15. For [15] in (the economy of) Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature (one dead to sin, the flesh, and the world, but living unto God).

16. And as many as walk according to this rule (being chiefly concerned, that the new creature may be formed in them), peace (shall) be upon them, and mercy, and (or that is) upon the Israel (not of the flesh, but) of God.

17. From henceforth let no man [16] trouble me (with their contentions against my office; because I renounce circumcision, and my legal righteousness): for I bear in my body the marks of (a servant, not of the law, but of) the Lord Jesus (these wounds and stripes which testify me to be a faithful servant of that Jesus, for whose sake I suffer them).

18. Brethren, the grace (favour and good-will) of our Lord Jesus Christ be [17] with your spirit. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

[1] Ver. 1. ΠΑΡΑΠΤΩ'ΜΑΤΙ, With a fault.] They seem not well to have considered the use of this word in Scripture, who say it is, "Lapsus hominis ex improviso impingentis," a fault committed unawares, or for want of circumspection; since the apostle applies it to all the sins of the heathen world, styling them νεκροὶ ἐν τοῖς παραπτώμασι, dead in trespasses, Eph. ii. 1. 5. Colos. ii. 13. and to all the sins forgiven us through faith in Christ, Rom. iv. 25. v. 16. 2 Cor. v. 19. Eph. i. 7. The word προληφθῇ seems rather to import such a surprise.

[2] Ὑμεῖς οἱ πνευματικοὶ, You that are spiritual.] I have noted on 1 Cor. xiv. 32. that in the beginning of Christianity, when churches were first converted, they had for a time no settled church-governors; but all their church-offices were performed by men who had spiritual gifts; and by them are said to prophesy in the church, to their edification, exhortation, and comfort, ver. 3. So I conceive it was when St. Paul writ to the Galatians: for, here is no direction of this Epistle to any stated church-governors; no salutation of any in the close; no charge against any for suffering these great miscarriages in the church; no exhortation to them to take heed of their ministry, and to oppose themselves to these deceivers: and then the spiritual men here mentioned must be the prophets, who then performed all spiritual offices among them.

[3] Ἐν πνεύματι πραΰτητος, In the spirit of meekness,] 2 Tim. ii. 24. that so they may not provoke them to fly off to Judaism, (v. 26.) whom they should restore to a right understanding of their Christian liberty, and to a freedom from that yoke of bondage.

[4] Μὴ καὶ σὺ πειρασθῇς, Lest thou also be tempted.] i. e. Lest thou fall by temptation: for to stand firm against temptation, when it assaults us, is not a proper consideration to engage us to pity those that fall by it. This is the import of the word, when we are taught to pray, That we enter not into temptation, Matt. vi. 13. when the apostle bids the married persons live together, that Satan tempt them not for their incontinence, 1 Cor. vii. 5. when he is solicitous for the Thessalonians, Lest the tempter should have tempted them, and rendered his labours vain, 1 Thess. iii. 3. and when St. James saith, Every man is tempted when he is led away by his own lust, James i. 14.

[5] Ver. 3. Εἰ γὰρ δοκεῖ τις εἶναί τι, μηδὲν ὤν, If a man thinks himself something, being nothing,] Of himself, but by the grace of God being what he is: (1 Cor. xv. 10. 2 Cor. xii. 11.) so some truly, but not so pertinently to the scope of the text: say others, Being nothing in the sight of God; who regards him not for his knowledge, but his charity; (1 Cor. xiii. 2, 3.) i. e. if upon this account he overlooks and despiseth his weak offending brother, not sympathizing with him, (ver. 2.) or endeavouring to restore him, (ver. 1.) but rather glorying in this, that he is a strong Christian in comparison of others; he is then nothing in the sight of God.

[6] Ver. 4. Δοκιμαζέτω ἕκαστος, Let every man prove.] i. e. Let him approve his actions to God and his own conscience; and then he may take comfort simply in himself, that he is a good man, and not in this only, that he is better than others. So the word signifies, Rom. i. 28. οὐκ ἐδοκίμασαν, they approved not of God; Rom. ii. 18. Δοκιμάζεις, thou approvest the things which are most excellent; Rom. xii. 2. Be transformed by the renewing of your mind, εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν, that you may approve the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God: and, xiv. 22. Happy is the man who doth not condemn, or act against his conscience, ἐν ᾧ δοκιμάζει, in that which by his actions he approves of. (See Eph. v. 10. Phil. i. 10. 1 Thess. ii. 4. 1 Tim. iii. 10. and note on 1 Cor. xi. 28.)

[7] Ver. 5. Τὸ ἴδιον φορτίον, His own burden.] i. e. This every man is concerned to do; viz. to make his own work good, and approved in the sight of God: for another man's greater sins will not excuse thee from bearing the burden of thy own.

[8] Ver. 6. Κοινωνείτω, Let him communicate.] This he elsewhere styles communication, εἰς λόγον δόσεως, καὶ λήψεως, by giving their good things, and receiving his good instructions, (Phil. iv. 15.) by sowing spirituals, and reaping of them carnal things: (1 Cor. ix. 11.) and if this was their duty towards such teachers, as had no need of books or study to fit themselves for the work, they being enabled for it by immediate assistance and gifts of the Holy Ghost; how much more towards them, who spend much time and money to fit themselves for that work; and must be still employed in studying and reading, to make themselves such workmen, as need not to be ashamed?

The following words, ver. 7. are by most interpreters referred to the same subject thus, Make no vain excuses in this case, God will not be mocked with false pretences. But I rather think the apostle proceeds to a new general exhortation against the carnal doctrines of their deceivers, the hidden things of dishonesty, which he charges them with, 2 Cor. iv. 2. vii. 1, 2. xii. 21. whose exhortation was attended with uncleanness, 1 Thess. ii. 2. (see note on 2 Cor. iv. 2.) against which doctrines this is his usual preface, Let no man deceive you with vain words, Eph. v. 6. 1 Cor. vi. 9. James i. 16.

[9] Ver. 9. Καιρῷ ἰδίῳ, In due season.] i. e. In the proper time of recompence: for the encouragement Christ gives unto the works of charity is this, Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just, Luke xiv. 14.

[10] Ver. 10. Let us do good to all men.] By this precept, saith Chrysostom, he extends the love of the Christian beyond that of the Jews, which was confined, πρὸς τοὺς ὁμοφύλους, to men of their own nation and religion.

[11] Ver. 11. Ἴδετε πηλίκοις ὑμῖν γράμμασιν ἔγραψα τῇ ἐμῇ χειρὶ, See how large a letter I have written to you with my own hand.] It is true that γράμματα sometimes signifies epistles, as when the Jews say to St. Paul, οὔτε γράμματα περί σου ἐδεξάμεθα, we have received no letters concerning thee, Acts xxviii. 21. but then it is also true, that St. Paul elsewhere uses seventeen times the word ἐπιστολαὶ, but never the word γράμματα, when he speaks of his Epistles. Though therefore it be true that St. Paul wrote his other Epistles by an amanuensis, (Rom. xvi. 22.) adding only in the close of them the salutation with his own hand, as an indication that he indited the Epistles; (see note on 2 Thess. iii. 17.) whereas this whole Epistle was written with his own hand for their greater assurance, and as a testimony of his great affection and concernment for them: yet πήλικα γράμματα, what kind of letters, may not refer to that; but, as the Greek scholiast conceives, to the largeness or inelegancy of the characters in which it was written, this inaccurateness in writing or forming the Greek characters being the most probable account why all his other Epistles were written by another hand.

[12] Ver. 12. Τῷ σταυρῷ, &c. For the cross of Christ.] I have shewed (note on v. 11.) that this was the great stumbling-block of the Jews, partly because their law pronounced a curse on those that hanged on a tree; (see note on 1 Cor. i. 23.) partly because the cross, and sufferings of Christ on it, was the foundation of the doctrine of justification by faith in his blood, of the cessation of the ceremonial law, and the removal of the partition-wall betwixt the Jew and gentile; (Colos. ii. 14. 16.) on which account chiefly they were scandalized at it, and persecuted those who thought that this was the result of our Lord's death and sufferings. St. Jerome here saith, that Octavianus Augustus, Tiberius, and Caius Cæsar, had made laws, that the Jews dispersed through the whole Roman empire should live according to their own laws and ceremonies; whosoever therefore was circumcised, though he believed in Christ, was by the gentiles deemed a Jew; but they who had not this token of a Jew, viz. the circumcision of the flesh, were persecuted both by Jew and gentiles: "has igitur persecutiones hi, qui Galatas depravaverant, declinare cupientes, circumcisionem pro defensione discipulis persuadebant;" and hence they who perverted the Galatians persuaded them to be circumcised, that they might avoid persecution.

[13] Ver. 13. Οὐδὲ γὰρ νόμον φυλάσσουσιν, For neither do they keep the law.] This was unquestionably true of these Judaizing Christians: for how, saith Theodoret, could they in Galatia regularly observe the Jewish feasts, or offer sacrifice, or cleanse themselves from their defilements, by touching any thing that was unclean?

[14] Ἵνα ἐν τῇ ὑμετέρᾳ σαρκὶ καυχήσωνται, That they might glory in your flesh.] i. e. Might boast of this among the Jews, that they promoted circumcision even among the gentiles, and by that pretence might avoid persecution from them.

[15] Ver. 15. Ἐν γὰρ Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ οὔτε περιτομή τι ἰσχύει.] Dr. Mills omits the words scored, and reads οὐ περιτομή τι ἐστίν; but the words, as they are in the text, are not only owned by the Vulgar, Arabic, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, but are exactly the same in v. 6. (See Examen Millii in locum.)

[16] Ver. 17. Let no man trouble me, ἐγὼ γὰρ τὰ στίγματα τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ ἐν τῷ σώματί μου βαστάζω, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.] i. e. Let no man henceforth question, whether I truly style myself Paul the servant of Jesus Christ, or fight the good fight of faith, as a good soldier under this Captain of salvation; seeing whereas servants and soldiers have only one στίγμα, as a mark of their relation to their masters and generals, in their hands or wrists, I bear many marks of these relations to the Lord Jesus, throughout my whole body, in those many wounds and stripes I have received for his sake.

[17] Ver. 18. Μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ὑμῶν, With your spirit.] That is, with you; for in other Epistles it is μεθ' ὑμῶν, with you, 1 Cor. xvi. 23. Colos. iv. 18. 1 Thess. v. 28. or μετὰ πάντων ὑμῶν, with you all, Rom. xvi. 24. 2 Cor. xiii. 13. Phil. iv. 23. 2 Thess. iii. 18. Tit. iii. 15. Heb. xiii. 25.

EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.*

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

§. 1. THAT this Epistle to the Ephesians was indeed written by St. Paul, and directed to them, and not to any other church, we cannot doubt, if we believe either the Epistle or St. Paul himself. For,

First, It begins thus: Paul, an apostle, (writeth these things) to the saints that are at Ephesus. And in this reading all the versions and all the manuscripts agree.

Secondly, In the close of this Epistle he speaks thus to them: That you may know my affairs, and how I do, Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, shall make known to you all things; whom I have sent unto you: vi. 21, 22. and in the Second Epistle to Timothy he saith, Tychicus I have sent to Ephesus, iv. 12.

Moreover, all antiquity agrees in this, that this Epistle was written by St. Paul: Ignatius† is express for it in his Epistle to the Ephesians. Irenæus,‡ Clemens of Alexandria,§ and Origen,‖ in divers places of their works. We learn indeed from the argument of this Epistle in Œcumenius, and more fully from Theodoret,¶ that some of the ancients thought this Epistle was writ by St. Paul before he had seen the Ephesians, or at least before his three years' converse with them: but not any of the ancients, excepting Marcion, ever thought that this Epistle was not written among other churches to that of Ephesus, but that of Laodicea; and therefore Tertullian takes notice of it as a thing proper to those heretics, though indeed both might be true: for this Epistle being writ not only to the saints at Ephesus, but also to the faithful in Christ Jesus, might be writ also to the Colossians, the Laodiceans, and others, who had not seen his face. (Colos. ii. 1. see note on Colos. iv. 16.) And this observation gives a sufficient answer to the arguments from i. 15. iii. 2. from which some have conjectured, that this Epistle could not be writ to them after St. Paul had stayed three years in Asia, though they more fully are considered in their respective places.

§. 2. That this Epistle was written when St. Paul was prisoner at Rome, is evident from iii. 1. where he is styled Paul the prisoner of Jesus Christ; and, iv. 1. a prisoner in the Lord. Now it must be at soonest in the third year of Nero that he was sent prisoner to Rome; for Felix was made procurator of Judea by Nero in his first year, saith Josephus,* and after two years he left Paul prisoner at Cæsarea. (Acts xxiv. 27.) Portius Festus succeeds him, and after some time hears him twice at Cæsarea, and sends him afterward to Rome; which interval, if we consider how long it was before he reached Rome, may very well be supposed to take up another year: he therefore could not write this Epistle till the fourth or fifth of Nero. He did not write it, saith Bishop Pearson, till the eighth of Nero, A. D. 62.

§. 3. That this Epistle was writ against Simon Magus, and his followers, as Esthius hints, none of the ancients say. More probable is the conjecture of Grotius, that the apostle rather designed by it to arm them against the doctrines of the philosophers, and of those Jews who endeavoured to bring them to the observation of their rites; for that there were then many Jews at Ephesus, and throughout Asia, we learn both from the Acts of the Apostles, which inform us, that Paul being at Ephesus, entered into a synagogue of the Jews, (Acts xviii. 19. xix. 8—10.) and discoursed with them, till by their perverseness he was forced to separate from them; and that by his preaching, all that were in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks: as also from Philo,† who informs us, that the Jews inhabited the most and best cities in the provinces and islands both of Europe and Asia. And that these Jews were disturbers of the churches of Asia, and of Ephesus in particular, and sticklers to introduce a mixture of Judaism with Christianity, we learn from both the Epistles to St. Timothy. Against their doctrine of the necessity of the observance of the law of Moses to justification and salvation, he seemeth to oppose these words, By grace ye are saved, not of works, lest any man should boast, ii. 8, 9. which manifestly answer to his discourse upon that subject, Rom. iii,

CHAP. I.

1. PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God (calling me to that office), [1] to the saints that are at Ephesus, [2] and to the faithful in Christ Jesus (throughout all Asia):

2. [3] Grace be (given) to you, and peace, from God our Father, and (from) the Lord Jesus Christ.

3. Blessed be (that) God, and (who is) the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with [4] all spiritual blessings in heavenly places (or, things) in (and through) Christ;

4. According as he hath [5] chosen us (gentiles, iii. 6.) in him before the foundation of the world, (chap. ii. designing) that we (thus chosen) should be [6] holy, and without blame before him in love, (by virtue of our faith in Christ, and love to one another, iii. 17. Gal. v. 6.)

5. Having predestinated (or foreappointed) us to the [7] adoption of children by (through) Jesus Christ unto himself, (Gr. εἰς υἱοθεσίαν εἰς αὐτὸν, unto the adoption of sons to him through Christ Jesus, we being all the sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus, Gal. iii. 26. John i. 12.) according to the good pleasure of his will;

6. (And this he hath done) to the praise of the glory of his grace, where he hath made us accepted (or, with which he hath favoured us, ἐχαρίτωσεν ἡμᾶς) in (and through) the Beloved:

7. In whom we have [8] redemption (from the curse of the law, Gal. iii. 13. and from the condemnation due to us for sin, Rom. iii. 24, 25.) through his blood, (the blood of atonement shed for) the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace;

8. Wherein (or, in which dispensation) he hath abounded to us in [9] all wisdom and prudence;

9. Having made known to us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself, (viz. his secret purpose to choose us gentiles to be fellow-heirs of the same body, iii. 6.)

10. That (so) in the dispensation (which was to be accomplished by sending of Christ) in the fulness of time, he might [10] gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are in earth, even in him:

11. In whom also we (believing Jews) have [11] obtained an inheritance (or, are become his portion), being predestinated (or foreordained to it) according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will;

12. That we should be to the praise of his glory, [12] who first trusted in Christ (the glorious gifts he hath bestowed upon us, and the eminent graces he hath wrought in us, tending highly to the glory of his grace, ver. 6. Phil. i. 11.)

13. In whom ye also (trusted), after that ye heard (or, hearing) the word of the truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed (or, believing) ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, (i. e. the Spirit promised to the sons of God; for because ye are sons, God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, Gal. iv. 6.)

14. Who is the earnest of our inheritance until [13] the redemption of the purchased possession (for the procuring this salutary redemption), to the praise of his glory.

15. Wherefore I also, [14] after I heard (Gr. having heard) of your (steadfast) faith in the Lord Jesus, and (your increasing) love to all the saints (i. e. that the faith and love wrought in you continue steadfast, and abound),

16. Cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers;

17. (Praying) that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you (in greater measure) [15] the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge (or to the farther acknowledgment) of him:

18. The eyes of your understanding being enlightened (or, that he would give you understandings enlightened); that you may know what (i. e. how glorious) is the hope of his calling (i. e. to which he hath called you), and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints (i. e. how great is the inheritance he hath designed for the saints),

19. And what is [16] the exceeding greatness of his power (which he will exert) towards us who believe (by raising us up to the enjoyment of this inheritance), according to the working of his mighty power,

20. Which (power) he (hath already) wrought in Christ (our head) when he raised (Gr. raising) him from the dead, and set him (whom he hath set) at his own right hand in heavenly places,

21. Far above all principalities, and powers, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, [17] not only in this world, but also in that which is to come:

22. And (he) hath put all things under his feet, and hath given him to be the head over all things to (the benefit of) the church,

23. Which is his body, (and so) the fulness of him (even that Jesus) who filleth [18] all in all.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. ΤΟΙΣ ἁγίοις, To the saints.] See the note on 1 Cor. i. 1.

[2] Καὶ, And, that is.] See note on Colos. i. 3.

Καὶ πιστοῖς, And (that is) to the faithful.] So οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς πιστοὶ, are the believers of the circumcision, Acts x. 25. τίς μέρις πιστῷ μετ' ἀπίστου, what portion hath a believer with an infidel? 2 Cor. vi. 15. so Acts xvi. 1. 1 Tim. iv. 3. 10. 12. Tit. i. 6. yet it is very probable, as Mr. L. here suggests, that here and Colos. i. 2. these words may particularly relate to such Christians as kept the doctrine of Christ from the corrupt mixtures of those Judaizers, who went about, καπηλεύοντες, 2 Cor. ii. 17. καὶ δολοῦντες τὸν λόγον, corrupting and handling the work of God deceitfully.

[3] Ver. 2. Χάρις, Grace.] This grace is given by the communication of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son to the church, (John xiv. 23.) which is the reason that the Holy Ghost is not mentioned in these salutations.

* See also the note on iii. 15, 16.

[4] Ver. 3. Ἐν πάσῃ εὐλογίᾳ πνευματικῇ ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις.] These words ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, in heavenly places, may probably refer to the gifts of the Holy Ghost then conferred upon the church, and styled by the prophet, εὐλογίαι Θεοῦ, the blessings of God: Fear not Jacob my servant, and Israel whom I have chosen, for I will put my Spirit on thy seed; καὶ τὰς εὐλογίας μου, and my blessings on thy children, Isa. xliv. 2, 3. where the word in the Hebrew and Chaldee is וּבִרְכָתִי, and my benediction, and so well correspondeth with the words of the apostle, God hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings. The same apostle styles these gifts εὐλογία τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, the blessings of the gospel; for having said to the Romans, I long to see you that I may impart unto you χάρισμα τὸ πνευματικὸν, some spiritual gift, to the end you may be established, i. 11. he adds, When I come to see you, I shall come in the fulness, τῆς εὐλογίας, of the blessing of the gospel, xv. 29. And the promise of the Spirit is styled, εὐλογία τοῦ Ἀβραὰμ, the blessing of that Abraham in whom all the families of the earth were to be blessed, in these words, That the blessing of Abraham might come upon the gentiles through Jesus Christ, that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith, Gal. iii. 14. These gifts are also called ἐπουράνια, heavenly things: thus when our Saviour had discoursed of the Spirit to be received in baptism, he saith, he had told them τὰ ἐπουράνια, heavenly things, John iii. 12. and they who were made partakers of these gifts, were said to have tasted τῆς δωρεᾶς τῆς ἐπουρανίου, of the heavenly gift, Heb. vi. 4. Or (2.) God's blessing us ἐν ἐπουρανίοις, with heavenly things in Christ Jesus, may signify his exalting us to a blessed state of immortality in the heavens through him; his giving us a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens, (2 Cor. v. 1, 2.) and clothing us with a house from heaven; his giving us an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, reserved in the heavens for us; on the account of which incorruptible and immortal bodies, we are styled ἐπουράνιοι, heavenly, as Christ is, 1 Cor. xv. 58. and the apostle saith, that as we have borne the image of the earthly Adam by our mortal bodies, so by our bodies made immortal, we shall bear, εἰκόνα τοῦ ἐπουρανίου, the image of the heavenly Adam, ver. 49. and hence we are said to be partakers, κλήσεως ἐπουρανίου, of our heavenly calling. In a word, Christ having delivered us from that death and mortality, which came upon us by the sin of Adam, hath blessed us with this heavenly blessing, having made us sit together with him in heavenly places, Eph. ii. 6. And this is the hope of our calling, ver. 18. of this chapter.

[5] Ver. 4. Ἐξελέξατο ἡμᾶς.] It was the opinion of the Jews, that God in framing the world had a particular regard for them, and that the world was made for their sakes, (Esd. ii. 55. 59.) and that the Messiah being created before the world, God entered into covenant with him, that he should redeem the world, and them especially. "The holy blessed God (say they) began to covenant with the Messiah when he created him, and said unto him, The sins of those who are laid up in secret with thee, will make thee to come under an iron yoke, and make thee like to this young heifer, whose eyes are dim, and fill thy spirit with anguish; and because of their iniquity, thy tongue shall cleave to the roof of thy mouth: wilt thou undergo their condition for them? The Messiah said, I undertake it with joy, and exultation of heart, on this condition, That not one of Israel may perish; and that not only they may be saved, who live in my days; but also they, who are dead from the days of the first man to this very day."* And again, "When God created the world, he held forth his hand under the throne of glory, and created the soul of the Messiah and his company, and said to him, Wilt thou heal, and redeem my sons after six thousand years? He answered, Yes. God said to him, If so, wilt thou bear chastisement to expiate their iniquities? according to what is written, Isa. liii. 4. Surely he bare our griefs. He answered, I will endure them with joy."† Now because the Jews held, that God thus elected them from the beginning of the world, and sent the Messiah that none of them should perish, the apostle, to take from them all cause of boasting against the gentiles upon that account, declares the gentiles were thus elected in Christ Jesus, even before the foundation of the world; i. e. that he designed then to choose them to be his church and people, i. e. a holy people to the Lord.

[6] That we may be sancti et immaculati, holy and unblameable.] There is a difference, saith St. Jerome, betwixt these two things, "Parvuli quippe immaculati sunt, quia integro corpore nullum fecerunt peccatum; et tamen non sancti, quia sanctitas studio, et labore comparatur;" so children are unblameable, as having done no sin in the body; and yet they are not holy, because holiness proceeds from the will and the endeavour. This in other men would be styled Pelagianism.

[7] Ver. 5. Εἰς υἱοθεσίαν, To the adoption of children.] This in the Scripture-phrase imports adoption to a blessed resurrection, and a state of immortality both of soul and body: for being sons of God, saith St. Luke, (xx. 36.) we are sons of the resurrection; and if sons (saith the apostle), then heirs of God, joint-heirs of Christ. (Rom. viii. 16, 17.) The revelation of the sons of God is their future glory to be revealed at Christ's appearing, (ver. 18, 19. see Colos. iii. 4.) Their adoption is the redemption of their bodies from corruption, (ver. 23.) This being so, God's electing us in Christ before the foundation of the world, is his purpose before the world was made, or from the fall, to give to those that should believe in Christ this adoption, i. e. the redemption of their bodies from that mortality to which the fall of Adam had subjected them; (Gen. iii. 15.) whence he is said to have elected us, προορίσας ἡμᾶς εἰς υἱοθεσίαν, foreordained us to this adoption, κατὰ τὴν εὐδοκίαν, according to the good pleasure of his will, or his free grace and favour, there being nothing in us, or even in our faith, that could deserve this glorious adoption.

[8] Ver. 7. Τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν, Redemption.] All mankind lying under the sentence of condemnation on the account of sin, all having sinned, and fallen short of the glory of God upon that account, (Rom. iii. 23.) it was necessary that something should be done to take away the guilt of sin, and reconcile us to a God displeased with us for it, that so we, as to our persons and performances, might find acceptance with him: this could not be done by any righteousness of our own before faith in Christ, we being in Christ Jesus created to good works, (Eph. ii. 10.) and therefore was necessary to be done by an act of grace on God's part, accepting us as righteous through faith in Christ, and justifying us freely through faith in his blood. Hence do the Scriptures of the New Testament seem plainly to make our reconciliation, and so our access to God, depend on our being purged from the guilt of sin, by an atonement made by the blood of Christ for our iniquities, that so, they being pardoned, we may have peace with God, and freedom of access to him; Christ suffered (saith St. Peter), ἵνα ἡμᾶς προσαγάγῃ τῷ Θεῷ, that he might bring us to God, 1 Pet. iii. 18. i. e. to give us freedom of access to God; for, by him we have, προσαγωγὴν, admission to the Father, Eph. ii. 18. (see the note there;) and God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses to them, 2 Cor. v. 18. 21. and this reconciliation was effected by making Christ ἁμαρτία, a sin-offering for us, though he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God (or righteous with that righteousness which God only will accept through faith) in him. (See the note on that verse.) And the author to the Hebrews having said, that the covenant established in the blood of Christ was this, that he would be merciful to our iniquities, and remember our sins no more, Heb. x. 16, 17. and having thence inferred, that having thus obtained remission for us by his blood, there was no need that he should again make himself an offering for sin, ver. 18. he adds, that therefore we may draw near with full assurance of faith, that we should be accepted through his Beloved, as having our hearts sprinkled by his blood, ver. 19—22. and therefore cleansed from any guilt of conscience on that account. And this remission was also necessary, that we might obtain that adoption of sons to which believers were afore appointed, because into the new Jerusalem can nothing enter that is defiled, or unclean: nor can there be any enjoyment of God till the blood of Christ hath cleansed us from all sin; and therefore, saith the apostle, he became the mediator of the new covenant, that having suffered death for the redemption of us from the sins we formerly had committed under the old covenant, they that were called might receive the promise of an eternal inheritance, Heb. ix. 15.

Redemption through his blood.] Here St. Jerome saith, Dupliciter sanguis Christi, et caro intelligitur, vel spiritualis ista, atque divina, de quâ ipse dixit, Caro mea est verè cibus, et sanguis meus verè est potus, nisi manducaveritis carnem meam et sanguinem meum biberitis, non habebitis vitam æternam, vel caro, et sanguis, quæ crucifixa est, et quæ militis effusa est lanceâ: where he plainly distinguishes the flesh and blood received in the sacrament, from the flesh of Christ crucified, and his blood shed upon the cross; calling the first spiritual, in opposition to his material flesh and blood.

[9] Ver. 8. Ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ καὶ φρονήσει, In all wisdom and prudence.] That is, say some, in the spiritual gifts of wisdom and prudence; but though σοφία be reckoned among spiritual gifts, I find not that φρόνησις is so. Moreover, he hath thus abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence (saith the apostle) by making known to us the mystery of his will; which leads to the other exposition, that refers this to the manifold wisdom of God, shewed in contriving this dispensation, (iii. 10.) and his prudence in executing the counsel of his will by this means, viz. by sending of his Son to be our Saviour. And whereas the deists seem to side with the Socinians, in denying the wisdom of this dispensation of God, in sending his Son into the world to suffer for our sins, and by his sufferings to make an atonement for them, it seemeth easy to demonstrate, as well the manifold wisdom, as the rich grace and favour of God to us in this dispensation. For,

First, It seemeth absolutely requisite, either that the substitution of another to suffer in our stead should be admitted, or that we ourselves should suffer the reward of our iniquities, or that a full remission and free pardon of our sins should be vouchsafed us without any suffering: now the admission of another to suffer in our stead is the thing pleaded for; if therefore that be granted, the wisdom of that God who acteth all things according to the counsel of his will, must also be acknowledged in this dispensation: if we ourselves must suffer the reward of our iniquity, that being death eternal, or death without recovery from it by a blessed resurrection, all mankind must inevitably be subject to that punishment, all having sinned, and fallen short of the glory of God: (Rom. iii. 33.) and, thirdly, should God have issued out a free pardon, and given us a full remission of our sins, without any thing required by way of reparation for the violation of his law, he must have pardoned sinners without any thing required to shew his hatred of sin, and his resolution not to let it go unpunished; and so without sufficient motive to deter us from it for the future, which seems not well consistent with his holiness and justice, and the relation of a governor, which seemeth plainly to require the vindication of his honour, and the preservation of the laws he hath established from contempt: it was then an act of grace not to require we should personally suffer the reward of our iniquities; it was an act of wisdom not to afford a full remission of our sin, without requiring any thing by way of reparation for the violation of his law; it must be therefore an act of wisdom also to admit another to suffer in our stead; especially if we consider,

Secondly, That, by the obedience of our Lord Christ to the death in our stead, all the great ends of punishment designed by governors were very signally obtained, and that with more advantage to God's glory, than if the punishment of our offences had been inflicted upon us, and so God by it may be truly said to have been satisfied; seeing that justice, which consists in punishing for the transgression of a law, is truly satisfied, when all those ends for which the punishment of the offenders could be desired are obtained. Now the ends of punishment are,

1. Παράδειγμα, That they who suffer may be exemplary to others; and may, by what they do endure, deter others from the commission of the offences for which they suffer.

2. Νουθεσία, That the offender may learn wisdom by the rod; that the remembrance of what he suffered for it might prevent the repetition of his sin, and that he may be fitted to embrace the counsel of our Saviour, Sin no more, lest a worse thing come upon thee.

3. Τιμωρία, The vindication of the prince's honour, and the preservation of the laws he hath established from contempt.

Now (1.) God by this dispensation hath given us the most effectual example to deter us from sin. For, 1. by what our Saviour suffered in our stead, we see that God is certainly in earnest when he threateneth death to sinners; that he is thoroughly resolved upon the punishment of sin, since he inflicted so great punishment on the Beloved of his soul, when he became our surety; for if on this account

God spared not his only son, (Rom. viii. 32.) we may be sure he will not spare his stubborn enemies. But let us say with the Socinians, that Christ suffered all his bitter agonies, his ignominious and painful death, not as the punishment of sin, or to make an atonement for it, but from a pure act of God's dominion; how will it follow hence, that God will surely punish sin, and with severity avenge the transgressions of his law, if he laid none of these sufferings on Christ for the punishment of sin? Seems it not strange to say that the severities laid on Christ without respect to sin, should be designed as an instance of God's severity against sin? This shews (saith Crellius*) that he, who laid such bitter sufferings on his innocent and well-beloved Son, will inflict the severest punishments on wicked men.

I answer, This will indeed follow in respect to sufferings for the same cause; for if the righteous be recompensed upon earth, much more the sinner, and the wicked. (Prov. xi. 31.) If good Eli and holy David suffered so great punishments for their sins, much more shall a wicked Cain, and a profane Esau. But will it follow, that because holy Job suffered so much by way of trial, or St. Paul for propagation of the Christian faith, that therefore sinners shall be obnoxious to greater punishment? Crellius † himself saith, Christ's sufferings cannot be an exemplary punishment, because, "abunde fuerint à Deo compensatæ," they were so abundantly rewarded by God; and doth not the same reason shew that they could not be a warning to us, if he only suffered with respect to the recompence of reward? For are the light afflictions which Christians suffer here in prospect of an eternal recompence, ever made an instance of God's severity against sin? Moreover, this example shews how insupportable the punishment will be, which justice will inflict upon the sinner; for if the apprehension of it produced such agonies and consternations in the soul of Christ, that God saw need to send an angel to support him, (Luke xxii. 43.) how must the sinner sink under the burden, when it is laid upon his shoulders? If he, who was the well-beloved Son of God, found it so dreadful to lie under the burden for some hours, to lie exposed for ever to it must be far more intolerable.

Secondly, Whereas inevitable ruin must have followed, upon the execution of the deserved punishment on the offending person, God by this method hath taken a fit way for reformation of the sinner, which was the second end of punishment; for what can be a more effectual motive to abstain from sin than this example, which represents the greatness of the provocation in the greatness of the punishment, and shews it is impossible the guilty person should avoid the stroke of God's vindictive justice, or bear the weight of his almighty arm. But the Socinian tenet, which denies that God was angry with us on the account of sin, or that he did require any punishment or satisfaction, in order to the pardon of it, so far obstructs this reformation, as it affords the sinner hopes that he may not hereafter be angry with him on that account, or require any punishment or satisfaction in order to the pardon of his future sins.

Thirdly, God by this dispensation hath sufficiently consulted the preservation of his honour, and secured the reverence and observation of his laws; which was the third great end of punishment: he, by declaring that he would not pardon our offences, without a satisfaction made for the violations of his law, hath fully vindicated his institutions from contempt, seeing, by this example, he hath let all men know, that though he be a God of mercy and long-suffering, he will by no means clear the guilty, or let the transgressor of them go unpunished.

Again, God by this dispensation hath vindicated his honour more than if he had destroyed the sinner, having more evidently shewed his hatred of, and great displeasure against, sin, by punishing it so severely in his own Son: for the greater is the inducement to remit the punishment of sin, the greater must be his hatred of it who inflicts it. That therefore this consideration, that he who suffered was his only beloved Son, would not induce him to remit the punishment, must be the strongest demonstration of his most perfect hatred of all iniquity.

But now remove this supposition, and say, with the Socinians, That God pardoned all men's sins against him without any valuable consideration, and with an absolute freedom forgave men all the punishments his law had threatened to them; and ceased from all his anger and displeasure against sinners, without any atonement made unto, or required by, him; and how will it appear God was at all concerned to vindicate the honour of his laws, or shew his hatred against sin? Hence Crellius * saw it necessary to own, that the sufferings of Christ are a demonstration of God's hatred of iniquity, because our sins were the cause of them; but then he means not that they were the meritorious, but only that they were the final cause of his sufferings; not that he suffered to prevail with God to pardon sinners, but only to prevail with sinners to break off their sins. Now hence, indeed, we may conclude, that God is very desirous that sinners should desist from sin; but it follows not hence, that they must certainly expect the most heavy punishments if they do not: for if God could freely pardon the sins of the whole world, without any satisfaction made to his offended justice; if there be nothing in God, as rector of the universe, that requires he should punish sin, or shew his displeasure against it; if the punishment of sin depends purely upon his arbitrary will, why may not sinners hope, notwithstanding all that Christ hath suffered for their good, for a like act of his free grace hereafter, in the remission of their sins, without a reformation; and that God may be reconciled to them again, whilst they continue in their sins?

Since then no laws require the punishment of the offender himself, rather than of another who is willing to be his surety, and suffer for him, on any other account than this; that the punishment of the offender, and not another for him, will only answer the forementioned ends of punishment; when that can equally be done by what another suffers, the law given must equally be satisfied, because the ends of the law are equally obtained.

* "Nam si Deus Christo licèt innocentissimo, et unigenito filio suo non pepercit, sed tam diræ, tamque ignominiosæ morti eum subjecit; quanta censemus, quámque acerba supplicia Deum sumpturum de hominibus impiis?" Resp. ad Grot. cap. 1. par. 57.

† Ibid.

* "Hinc enim manifestissime apparet summum Dei adversus peccatum odium, si quidem Deus, ut ab illis nos penitus abstraheret, unigenito filio suo non pepercit." Ibid.

Ver. 9. From this ninth verse it appears, that the election and foreappointment, mentioned ver. 4, 5. is as large as is his manifestation of his will to the gentiles: for as προώρισεν, he foreappointed them to sonship by Jesus Christ, ver. 5. so here, προέθετο, he purposed before to make known his will unto them; ἐν αὐτῷ, in him, according to the same pleasure of his will. Note also, that the words being not ἐν ἑαυτῷ, but ἐν αὐτῷ, should not have been rendered in himself, that is, in God the Father, but in him, that is, in Christ, (ver. 4.) as the following and preceding verses shew.

[10] Ver. 10. Ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι, To gather together in one.] i. e. God hath now by the gospel accomplished the secret purpose of his will; to make the gentiles fellow-heirs of the same body and privileges with the Jews; having reconciled both Jew and gentile to him in one body on the cross, (Eph. ii. 14. 16.) and so gathered together in one all things on earth; and by procuring for us that adoption, which is the redemption of the body from mortality, (Rom. viii. 23.) and making us like to the angels, by being children of the resurrection, he hath summed up in one all things in heaven; for they being styled the sons of God, Job i. 6. ii. 1. xxxviii. 7. because they live already in their Father's house, and are an image of his immortality; when the resurrection hath put us into that happy state, that we can die no more, but are equal to the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection, (Luke xx. 35, 36.) then shall we be made one with them. The interpretation of the ancient fathers seems to give this sense, That God hath by this dispensation gathered under one head, viz. Christ, the head of the church, all things on earth, i. e. Jews and gentiles; and all things in heaven, Christ being the head over angels and principalities; they being all ministering spirits to him. And this sense seems agreeable to the like words, Colos. i. 20. (See the note there.)

[11] Ver. 11. Ἐκληρώθημεν, We have obtained an inheritance.] The Jews were before chosen of God, to be a people of inheritance, Deut. iv. 20. and a peculiar people, Exod. xix. 5. and as such, God provided for them a habitation and inheritance in the land of Canaan; but the Jewish church being now to be dissolved, the Jews being to be banished from their own land, and the unbelieving Jews cut off from their relation to God as his people; the believing Jews were through faith in Christ to be chosen again, to be God's portion, and inheritance, and his peculiar people, (1 Pet. ii. 9. Tit. ii. 14.) and to be admitted to a better inheritance, εἰς μερίδας τοῦ κλήρου τῶν ἁγίων ἐν τῷ φωτί, viz. to the portion of the inheritance of saints in light. (Colos. i. 12.) And to this, saith the apostle, they believing were appointed, God having foreordained, that this inheritance should be the portion of believers, and the consequent of faith in Christ; by virtue of which we become the sons of God.

Ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἐκληρώθημεν.] Note also, that here the Alexandrian copy and the Syriac read ἐκλήθημεν, we are called, and the note of St. Jerome here is this: "Vult Deus quæcunque sunt rationis plena et consilii, vult salvari omnes, et in agnitionem veritatis venire; sed quia nullus absque propriâ voluntate servatur, liberi enim arbitrii sumus, vult nos bonum velle, et cùm voluerimus, vult in nobis ipse suum implere consilium."

[12] Ver. 12. Τοὺς προηλπικότας, Who before trusted in Christ.] I see no reason why us and we, in the first ten verses, may not signify believers in the general, and then us and we, ver. 11. may signify the believing Jews, who literally were προηλπικότας, believers in Christ before the gentiles; nor could any thing tend more to the establishment of the freedom of the believing gentiles from Judaical observances than this consideration, that the Jews themselves could only obtain the benefits of Christianity, by being chosen anew to be God's people through faith in Christ.

[13] Ver. 14. Εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν τῆς περιποιήσεως, Till the redemption of life.] There is a twofold ἀπολύτρωσις, redemption, mentioned here, and in other places of the New Testament. The first consists in the remission of sin, or our redemption from the guilt of it; and of this we have mention, ver. 7. Rom. iii. 24. Colos. i. 14. The second in the redemption of the body from corruption, that it may be partaker of eternal life: and of this the apostle speaks, Rom. viii. 23. calling it the adoption, and ἀπολύτρωσιν τοῦ σώματος, the redemption of the body, or the glorious deliverance of the sons of God from the bondage of corruption, ver. 21. Thus 1 Cor. i. 30. Christ is made to us justification, καὶ ἀπολύτρωσις, and redemption: where redemption being distinguished from, and following justification and sanctification, it must import the redemption of the body from corruption. And Eph. iv. 30. where we are said to be sealed by the Spirit, εἰς ἡμέραν ἀπολυτρώσεως, to the day of redemption: the first delivers us from the guilt which condemns us to death; the second confers the promise of eternal life on them who are thus delivered: Heb. ix. 15. περιποιεῖν, is to save alive, and περιποίησις is preservation; περιποίησις ψυχῆς, the salvation of the soul, Heb. x. 39. So Gen. xii. 12. They will kill me, σὲ δὲ περιποιήσονται, but they will save thee alive; Numb. xxii. 23. I had killed thee, ἐκεῖνον δὲ περιεποιησάμην, but him I have saved alive; Josh. vi. 17. As for Rahab, περιποιήσεσθε αὐτὴν, ye shall save her alive. Go slay Amalek, οὐ περιποίησατε ἐξ αὐτοῦ, ye shall save none of them alive, 1 Sam. xv. 3. but Saul, περιεποιησάτω, saved Agag alive, ver. 9. 15. 2 Chron. xiv. 13. The Ethiopians were overthrown, ὥστε μὴ εἶναι ἐν αὐτοῖς περιποίησιν, so that none of them were left alive. So Phavorinus, περιποιήσαντες ἀντὶ τοῦ διασώσαντες. See also Psal. lxxix. 11. Exod. i. 16. Whence it appears, that ἀπολύτρωσις τῆς περιποιήσεως, is fitly rendered the redemption of life; or, the redemption of those who are to be preserved from death.

Ὅς ἐστιν ἀρραβὼν, &c. Who is the earnest of our inheritance.] It was the custom, both of the Jews and heathens, to confirm a promise or a bargain, by giving something as an earnest of, or an obligation to perform it. This the Latins styled arra, the Greeks ἀρραβὼν, καὶ ἐνέχυρον, (see Plaut. Mostell. act. iii. sc. 1. Miles Glorios. act. iv. sc. 1. the Jews eraban: so when Judah had promised Tamar, a kid, he gives her ἀρραβῶνα, an earnest, that he would perform his promise, Gen. xxxviii. 17, 18. And in like manner God having promised to his faithful servants an eternal inheritance, gives them his Holy Spirit as the earnest of it.

[14] Ver. 15. Ἀκούσας, Having heard.] Hence some infer, that St. Paul could not write this to the church of Ephesus, where he abode about three years, (Acts xx. 31.) and had converted many to the faith throughout most parts of Asia: (Acts xix. 26.) he therefore could not need to hear of their faith.

To this it is answered by the reverend Dr. Hammond, that the word ἀκούειν, as the Hebrew שמע not only signifies to hear, but to understand and know; and therefore should be rendered here, "cum sciverim," knowing, or having known your faith. And indeed the word bears this sense undoubtedly in those words, 1 Cor. xiv. 2. He that speaketh in an unknown tongue, speaketh not to man, οὐδεὶς γὰρ ἀκούει, for no man understands him: so Gen. xi. 7. Let us confound their language, ἵνα μὴ ἀκούσωσιν, that they may not understand one another's speech: and xlii. 23. They knew not, ὅτι ἀκούει, that Joseph understood them, for he spake to them by an interpreter. (See Deut. xxviii. 29. 2 Kings xviii. 29. Jer. v. 15. Ezek. iii. 6.) But,

Secondly, I answer, that this Epistle was writ, not only to the metropolis of Ephesus, but to the faithful in Christ Jesus in the general, and more especially to those of the Lesser Asia; among whom many might have been converted by Apollos, and others, and St. Paul might have only heard of it; he preaching only at Ephesus, and they of Asia hearing the gospel only by their resort unto him there. (See the note on Acts xix. 10.) Yea, he insinuates, that this Epistle was read at Laodicea; and gives order for the reading of it at Colosse, Col. iv. 16. (see the note there;) at both which places he had never been. (Colos. ii. 1.) And,

Thirdly, From the Epistle of St. Paul to Timothy it appears, that a dangerous and almost epidemical apostacy from the purity of the Christian faith happened among the Jewish churches in Asia; which verified St. Paul's prediction concerning them, that after his departure, not only grievous wolves should enter in among them, but that among themselves should arise men speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them, Acts xx. 29, 30. and made it proper for him, after eight years' absence, to give thanks to God for the steadfastness in the faith, which he had heard of in the rest. (See 1 Thess. iii. 6.)

[15] Ver. 17. Πνεῦμα σοφίας, The Spirit of wisdom.] St. Paul having asserted the necessity of the revelation of the Spirit, that we may know the things that are freely given us of God, they being not naturally to be perceived; (1 Cor. vi. 2. 12.) doth therefore pray, that the Spirit of wisdom, knowledge, and revelation, may be imparted to Christians for that end.

[16] Ver. 19. Τὸ ὑπερβάλλον μέγεθος τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ, The exceeding greatness of his power.] Some interpret these two verses of the power of God, working faith in believers, making it equal to that which effected the resurrection of our Lord, and thence concluding, that we are merely passive in the whole work of our conversion: but as this power is not consistent with persuasion and a rational choice, and if it were exerted, would not render it praiseworthy in us to turn to God; nor could it truly and properly be said, that we turned, but only that we were turned to God; so is not this exposition agreeable to the words: for the apostle speaks not of the power exercised on us, to render us believers; but of the power which shall be exercised on us, who believe already: not of the power exercised upon our souls, to raise them from a death in sin; but of the power to be exercised upon our bodies, to give them a glorious resurrection to eternal life.

Καὶ τί τὸ ὑπερβάλλον μέγεθος, And what is the exceeding greatness of his power towards us.] The apostle doth not here pray, as Mr. L. suggests in his paraphrase, that the Ephesians might have the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, that they might know the exceeding greatness of that power God had employed already in bringing them to the faith; for that they knew already; it being the mighty power of those miracles they had seen done before their eyes, which induced the gentiles to believe: (Rom. xv. 18, 19.) but he prays, that by these means they might know, what at present they had no experience of, viz. how glorious was the object of their hope, how great their future inheritance, and how excellent was the power God would shew in raising them up from the dead, as he had done Christ, to the enjoyment of it.

[17] Ver. 21. Οὐ μόνον ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ, Not only in this world.] By comparing these words with Colos. ii. 10. where Christ is said to be the head of all principality and power; and with Phil. ii. 9. where God is said to have given him a name above every name; I am inclined to think these words only signify, that our Lord Christ is exalted above all power that is, or ever shall be; for, not to be done in this world, nor in the world to come, Matt. xii. 32. is never to be done, Luke xii. 32. see note on Matt. xii. 32. Note also, that the word ὄνομα, name, doth also signify persons: (see the note on Acts i. 15.) and that men of great power and dignity are styled both in Scripture, and in other writings, anshe hashem, οἱ ἄνδρες οἱ ὀνομαστοὶ, men of name, that is, renown; so are the giants styled, Gen. vi. 4. and the princes of the congregation, Numb. xvi. 2. so that to be exalted above every name that is named, is to be advanced, even in his human nature, above men and angels of the highest power and dignity, by being exalted to the right hand of the Father. (Heb. i. 4, 5.) After the dignity of Christ was contested by the Arians, the fathers, to avoid their argument from these words, chose rather to interpret this of the name of the Son, mentioned by St. Paul, Heb. i. 5. To which of the angels said he, Thou art my Son? So Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, on this place, and Epiphanius, Hær. lxix. p. 325. though the words, ver. 20. He hath raised him from the dead, and set him on his right hand in heavenly places, strongly plead for the first interpretation. (See the note on Heb. i. 4.)

[18] Πάντα ἐν πᾶσι, All in all.] For he ascended up on high, that he might fill the members of his church with all gifts necessary for the edification of his saints, till they came to the fulness of the measure of the stature of Christ; (iv. 10—12.) In him all fulness dwells, and we are πεπληρωμένοι, filled full in him, who is the head of principalities and powers. (Colos. ii. 9, 10.)

CHAP. II.

1. AND you (also) hath he (raised and) quickened, (with and by Christ, i. 20. ii. 5.) who were [1] dead in trespasses and sins;

2. Wherein (in which sins) in time past ye walked (living) [2] according to the course (and fashion) of this (evil) world, [3] according to (the suggestions of) the prince of the power of the air, the spirit which (even) now worketh in the children of disobedience (the heathen world):

3. Among whom also we all (who are gentiles) had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind (or of our hearts); and were by [4] nature (indeed by birth among heathens, and in our natural estate before Christ) the children of wrath, even as others (of the gentiles were.

4. This, I say, was our former state;) but God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love, wherewith he loved us (gentiles),

5. Even when we were (thus) dead in sins, [5] hath quickened us together with Christ, (through his rich grace; for) by grace ye are saved (i. e. are brought into a state of salvation);

6. And hath raised us up together, (not only by a spiritual conformity to his resurrection, Rom. vi. 5. 11. but also by an assurance of a like resurrection, 1 Pet. i. 3. He being risen as the first-fruits, 1 Cor. xv. 20. and the first-born from the dead, Colos. i. 18.) and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus: (our head thus raised and exalted, and thus ascended into heaven, as our forerunner, Heb. vi. 20. x. 13, 14.)

7. That in (and through) the ages to come he might (by this means) shew the exceeding riches of his grace in (this) his kindness to us through Christ Jesus.

8. (I say, the riches of his grace,) for [6] by grace are ye saved through faith (in Christ); and that (faith is) not of (and from) yourselves: it is the gift of God (the objects of our faith being only made known by Divine revelation, 1 Cor. ii. and only confirmed and so made creditable to us, by the testimony which God hath given to them):

9. Not of works (done before faith by us), lest any man should boast (as doing any thing which might antecedently deserve, or make him meet to be acquainted with, and made partaker of this saving grace:

10. Not of works, for this reason also;) for we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to good works, which God [7] hath before ordained (οἷς προητοίμασεν (sub.) ἡμᾶς ὁ Θεὸς, to which God hath prepared us) that we should walk in them.

11. Wherefore remember, that ye being (were) in times past gentiles in the flesh, who are called the Uncircumcision by that (nation of the Jews) which is called the Circumcision (by reason of their circumcision) made with hands;

12. (And) that at that time ye were without (the knowledge of) Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel (to whom the Messiah primarily belonged), and strangers from the covenants of promise (made to their forefathers), [8] having no (firm and lively) hope (of spiritual and future blessings), and (being) without (the knowledge of the true) God in the world:

13. But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were afar off (from God, and from the blessings imparted to the Jews), are made [9] nigh (to God, as they were) by the blood of Christ.

14. For he is our peace (maker) who hath made both (Jew and gentile) one (as to the privileges of the gospel, John x. 16. Gal. iv. 28.) and hath broken down the [10] middle wall of partition betwixt us (i. e. abolished the ceremonial law, which was a partition-wall betwixt Jew and gentile);

15. Having abolished in (or by) his (own) flesh (that which made) the enmity (betwixt Jew and gentile), even the law of commandments (consisting) in ordinances (peculiar to the Jews); for to make in himself (or create) of two, [11] one new man (to whom as their head they are both united into one body, thus) making [12] peace (betwixt both);

16. And that he might reconcile both unto God, in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity (betwixt both to God) thereby (or upon it; for when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, Rom. v. 10. 2 Cor. v. 18. Col. i. 21. or, having slain, that is, abolished by his cross, those ordinances which were ὑπεναντία ἡμῖν contrary to us, Colos. ii. 14. as excluding us from the society of God's people, and causing the enmity betwixt the Jews and gentiles; ver. 15.)

17. And (having procured this reconciliation, he) came, and (ἐλθὼν εὐηγγελίσατο, he coming by his apostles) preached peace to you (gentiles) which were afar off, and to them that were near (i. e. Jews).

18. For through him (thus reconciling us to God) [13] we both (Jew and gentile) have access by one Spirit (of adoption conferred upon us) to the Father, (and are enabled to come unto him as our Father, Rom. viii. 15.)

19. Now therefore ye (gentiles) are no more (to be reckoned as) [14] strangers and foreigners, but (as) fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God;

20. And are built upon the foundation of the apostles (of the new) and the prophets (of the old covenant), Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone, (who supports and cements the whole building, both of believing Jews and gentiles, and unites both into one body by the Spirit, Psal. cxvii. 22.)

21. In whom all the building, (being thus) fitly framed together (or compacted), groweth into one holy temple in the Lord; (they then belong not to this building, whose bodies are not a holy temple to the Lord:)

22. In whom ye (Ephesians) also are builded together, for [15] a habitation of God through the Spirit.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. ΝΕΚΡΟΥΣ ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις, Dead in sins.] They who interpret this phrase thus, You who are dead to sins by baptism, seem not to have looked to the fifth verse, where they who are here said to be dead in trespasses and sins are said to be quickened; or to the parallel place, Colos. ii. 13. where it is said, you who were dead in sins, and the circumcision of the flesh, he hath quickened; nor indeed to the phrase, which is never used in the plural number in that sense, but only in the singular, viz. Rom. vi. 2. x. 11.

Καὶ, And.] That this glorious hope, this blessed inheritance, this happy resurrection, will be your portion, you may learn from what God hath already done for you; for he hath quickened you who were dead in trespasses and sins, ver. 1. and so hath brought you into a state of salvation, ver. 5. and made you meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, Colos. i. 12. He also hath raised up your head, and placed him, and in him your nature in heavenly places, and so hath, in a manner, raised you up, and made you sit together with him there, ver. 6. You being hence assured that all his living members shall be raised up to live for ever with him; for if we believe that Christ is risen, we must believe that them who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him, to be for ever with the Lord, 1 Thess. iv. 14. 17. And to him that overcometh (saith Christ) will I give to sit down with me on my throne, even as I also have overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne, Rev. iii. 21.

[2] Ver. 2. Κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα, According to the course of this world.] That is, according to the life which men of this world, destitute of faith in Christ, do live: for, as Phavorinus saith, αἰὼν, the word age is ἡ ζωὴ, καὶ ὁ βίος, the life of man, or τὸ μέτρον τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης ζωῆς, the measure of human life. Thus, τὸν αἰῶνα διάγειν, in Isocrates and Xenophon, is to pass the time of life; τελευτῆσαι τὸν αἰῶνα, in Herodotus and Sophocles, is to end this life, or to die.

[3] Κατὰ τὸν ἄρχοντα τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ ἀέρος, According to the prince of the power of the air.] It was the opinion both of Jews and heathens, εἶναι τὸν ἀέρα ψυχῶν ἔμπλεον, that the air was full of spirits, called demons, as Diogenes* saith in the life of Pythagoras: and the Jews in the Pirk Avoth teach, "A terra usque ad firmamentum omnia esse plena turmis et præfectis," that from the earth to the firmament all things were full of these companies and rulers; and that there was a prince over them, who was called ὁ κοσμοκράτωρ, the governor of the world, that is, of the darkness of it, see note on vi. 12. This evil spirit is here said, ἐνεργεῖν, inwardly to work in the children of disobedience; and elsewhere, to lead them captive at his will, 2 Tim. ii. 26. and their conversion is styled, a recovery of them from the power of Satan, Acts xxvi. 18. And hence we may rationally conclude, that the good Spirit doth also inwardly work in pious persons, enabling them to will and to do; it being unreasonable to conceive the evil spirit should have more power over those wicked men in whom he dwells, than the good Spirit hath in those pious persons in whose hearts he is said to dwell.

[4] Ver. 3. Καὶ ἤμεν τέκνα θύσει ὀργῆς, And were by nature children of wrath.] The ancient fathers generally affirm, that sin cannot owe its original purely to that nature, in which we were born, but only τῷ αὐτεξουσίῳ, i. e. to the choice or consent of the will; and that they who make us to be sinners, merely by the derivation of our natures from our progenitors, do make God, the author of our nature, to be the author of our sin. The same they seem to do, who say that sin is propagated by generation, and that an infant is therefore properly by birth a sinner, it being God who hath established that order in the generation of mankind, which neither he that begets, nor he that is begotten, can correct, and by whose benediction mankind increase and multiply: and reason will instruct us, that to be born or not is not in our power, and that what is not in our power to avoid can never be our crime, nor render us obnoxious to the eternal wrath of God.

Moreover, the circumstances of the text demonstrate, that the apostle here intendeth no such thing, because he speaks of persons dead in (actual) trespasses and sins, in which in times past they had walked, according to the course of the (heathen) world, and the suggestions of Satan; of men who had their conversation in times past in the flesh; fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and were, on that account, the children of wrath as well as other heathens. And therefore Suidas, agreeably to the context, saith, that nature is here put for customary practice, according to the frequent import of that word in the profane authors; in Philo,† in whom custom is ἐχθρὰ φύσις ἀληθείας, a nature opposite to truth; and in our common proverb, that custom is a second nature. His words are these;* When the apostle saith, We are by nature the children of wrath, he saith not this according to the proper acceptation of the word nature, for then he had cast the blame on the Author of nature; but he understands by it a long and evil custom. And Didymus Alexandrinus saith,† the apostle intends by it τὸ προκείμενον τῇ φύσει οὐ τὸ κατὰ φύσιν, not that which is according to nature, but that which is accessory to it.

2. The fathers do more generally say, That to be by nature the children of wrath, is here the same as to be truly and indeed so;‡ and that the Ephesians and other nations are styled such here, because in that estate they continually provoked God to wrath by their idolatries and fleshly lusts; and so they are here styled, say they, children of wrath, partly as being born in heathenism, and therefore indole idolatræ,§ and so out of covenant with God (in which estate the whole body of the heathens are represented, as having no hope of the blessings promised to those who were in covenant with God), and without (the favour and protection of) God in the world: and persons so abandoned by him are in Scripture styled, the objects of his hatred, comparatively to those who are in covenant with him, as in these words, Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated, Mal. i. 2. And when God determined to reject and to forsake his people, he styles them, the generation of his wrath, Jer. vii. 29. as being worthy of his wrath, as wicked persons are styled sons of death and of perdition, as having done those things which rendered them worthy of death and destruction, i. e. not for original sin, but for a long series of actual and habitual transgressions. So Abiathar is, ἀνὴρ θανάτου, a man of death, 1 Kings ii. 26. And whereas Esthius saith, that τέκνα, children, shews that this phrase relates to what they were from their nativity; this may be easily confuted from these following expressions, some of them frequent in the Holy Scripture, viz. τέκνα Θεοῦ, the children of God, John i. 12. τέκνα σοφίας, the children of wisdom, Matt. x. 19. τέκνα ὑπακοῆς, children of obedience, 1 Pet. i. 14. τέκνα τῆς ἐπαγγελίας, children of the promise, opposed to children of the flesh, Rom. ix. 1. Gal. iv. 28. κατάρας τέκνα, accursed children, 2 Pet. ii. 14. for we are not sons of God, of wisdom, of obedience, of the promise, or curse, by nativity; but by our own good or evil actions. And whereas he adds, that the apostle writes this in the person of the Jews, this is most plainly false, the Jews being not under the prince of the power of the air, i. e. the conduct and government of Satan, as were those heathens, whose gods were demons, and who sacrificed to devils, and not to God. Moreover, they who are here said to be quickened, when they were dead in trespasses, are said, Colos. ii. 13. to be quickened when dead in trespasses, and the uncircumcision of the flesh, which cannot possibly agree to the Jews. We all here therefore is only all the gentiles, whatsoever Mr. Clerc says to the contrary; nor is there any thing more common than for St. Paul to speak thus. So Tit. iii. 3. We ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived;

serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another; not we apostles, or we Jews, but we gentiles. And this is here evident to demonstration; for what is here we, ver. 2. and 5. is ye, ver. 8. what is we, ver. 10. is again ye, ver. 11, 12, 13. what is we, ver. 18. is ye, ver. 19.

Καὶ ἦμεν τέκνα φύσει ὀργῆς, And were by nature children of wrath.] We were children of wrath, saith Jerome, "vel propter corpus humilitatis, corpusque mortis," by reason of the vile mortal body to which our souls were condemned, which was the opinion of Origen; or, "quòd ab adolescentiâ mens hominum apposita sit ad malitiam," because the mind of man is prone to iniquity from his youth; "vel quòd ex eo tempore, quo possumus habere notitiam Dei et ad pubertatem venimus, omnes aut operâ, aut linguâ, aut cogitatione peccamus;" or, because, when we come to ripeness of years, and attain to the knowledge of God, we offend all in thought, word, and deed: where it is observable, that though he brings in Origen's peculiar opinion, as one reason of this appellation; yet hath he not the least hint of our being the children of wrath, on the account of Adam's sin. See my interpretation confirmed by Mr. Thorndike, &c.

[5] Ver. 5. Συνεζωοποίησε τῷ Χριστῷ, Hath quickened us together with Christ.] Not only by giving us a new birth, or renovation of life, but an assurance also of eternal life; for because I live (saith Christ), you shall live also, (John xiv. 19.) We shall be saved by his life. (Rom. v. 10.)

[6] Ver. 8. Τῇ γὰρ χάριτί ἐστε σεσωσμένοι, For by grace ye are saved.] That we may understand aright how we are here, and in other places, said to be saved by grace and mercy, and not by works, it may deserve to be observed,

First, That though the apostle here saith, By grace ye are saved, not of works; yet, lest any man should hence be tempted to infer, that Christians may be saved without doing works of righteousness, when they have time and opportunity to do them; he expressly adds, and that by way of reason of what he had asserted, that we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to good works, which God hath ordained that we should walk in them. Since then to walk in righteousness, according to the import of that phrase in Scripture, implies, that the tenor of our lives be spent in works of righteousness; surely we cannot reasonably hope to be accepted by God, if we neglect the very end for which we are created in Christ Jesus, or decline that way in which God hath ordained us to walk. Hence the apostle tells the same Ephesians, that if they had been taught the Christian faith, as the truth was in Jesus, they knew themselves obliged to put off the old man, and to put on the new, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness; and that it was their duty to walk as children of light, proving what is acceptable to the Lord, and bringing forth those fruits of the Spirit, which are in all goodness, righteousness, and truth, iv. 21, 22. v. 8, 9.

Note, secondly, that when the apostle saith, We are saved not by works, his meaning is not to exclude all works from having any influence on our salvation; but only to exclude those works, which are done antecedently to faith, and to the renovation of the Holy Ghost, or antecedently to their being called by the gospel to salvation: this is apparent from the reason here assigned, why we are not saved by works, viz. because we were not fitted or prepared to do good works till we were first in Christ; which, as it doth exclude good works performed before faith in Christ, so doth it as effectually establish those, which are afterward to be performed by virtue of the new nature given to us, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost.

Obj. And whereas some object against this answer, that the apostle saith, we are saved by grace, not of works, lest any man should boast, which boasting doth not seem to be excluded, if our salvation doth any way depend on works done by us, whether they be legal or evangelical, done before or after faith:

Ans. To this I answer, That though salvation doth depend upon good works, or on sincere obedience to be performed by us after faith; yet is all boasting utterly excluded; (1.) Because the good works we do proceed not from ourselves, but purely from the grace and Spirit of God, for it is God that worketh in us both to will and to do, of his good pleasure. As therefore the apostle saith, of the gift of tongues, and healing, and the like, which were so frequent in the church of Corinth, and were occasions of their boasting, Who maketh thee to differ in these things from others? or what gift hast thou which thou hast not received? and if thou hast received it, wherefore dost thou boast, as if it were thine own, and thou hadst not received it? 1 Cor. iv. 7. so may we here: What good work dost thou, which thou hast not received grace and the good Spirit to perform? And if thou hast received strength from God, for the performance of them, wherefore dost thou boast? This being the apostle's rule, that we can boast of nothing, but of that which we have not received, or which is purely from ourselves.

(2.) Though God is pleased to make the doing good works a necessary condition of salvation, so that without them we shall not obtain it; yet is all boasting utterly excluded, because it is of grace, that our imperfect works are counted good, and that they are at all rewarded by God. For it is alone through that new covenant, which God hath established in Christ Jesus, that all the imperfections which adhere to our best performances are pardoned; seeing the covenant of works requires perfect obedience, and tendereth no pardon to the least offence. Now upon what account can any of us boast of doing that which in itself deserveth condemnation, though through grace it finds acceptance? Boasting, saith the apostle, is not excluded by the law of works, (Rom. iii. 27. iv. 4.) because to him that worketh, the reward is not reckoned of grace, but of debt, (Rom. xi. 6.) grace and works that deserve justification and salvation, being perfectly opposite to one another. Where therefore the reward is still of grace, and not of debt; where it is given on the account of works imperfect, which deserve nothing from God, there boasting is excluded. Note,

Thirdly, That when the apostle saith, We are saved by grace, there the word saved doth not signify the final and complete salvation which we shall enjoy in heaven; but only our being placed in the way of salvation, and put into that estate, in which if we continue grounded and settled in the faith, and be not moved from the hope of the gospel, (Colos. i. 23.) we shall undoubtedly be saved. That this may be the sense of these expressions, We are saved by grace, and according to his mercy he saved us, (Tit. iii. 5.)

cannot be doubted, if we consider that this is frequently the import of this phrase in other places; as when it is said at the conversion of Zaccheus, This day is salvation come to this house, Luke xix. 3. that baptism doth save us, 1 Pet. iii. 21. that there were added to the church οἱ σωζόμενοι, the saved, Acts ii. 47. (See John iv. 22. Rom. viii. 24. 1 Cor. i. 18.) That this must be the proper import of it in these places, is evident from this consideration, that the persons to whom the apostle here speaks were not actually and completely saved, but only by embracing the gospel, which is styled the word, the gospel of salvation, the power of God through faith to salvation, were placed in that way which leadeth to eternal life, and which is called the way of salvation. It being therefore of God's free grace and mercy that any church or nation is called to the knowledge of salvation, and hath the word of life revealed to them, it being by that faith which is the gift of God that they are justified, and so placed in the way of salvation, and by his free gift that they enjoy the Holy Spirit, by which they are enabled to work out their salvation; they may well be said to be saved by grace, through faith, according to those words of the same apostle, (2 Tim. i. 9.) He hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ. But then this hinders not our complete salvation, at the great day, from being conferred upon us, with respect to our works, by him who hath declared, He will render to every one according to his works: glory, honour, and immortality, to every one that worketh good, and that by patient continuance in well-doing seeketh for it. (Rom. ii. 6, 7.)

[7] Ver. 10. Προητοίμασεν, He hath before prepared us.] i. e. Before we do them, by giving us the knowledge of his will, and the assistance of his Spirit to perform them: i. e. our entire renovation or new creation, by which alone we are enabled to do works good and acceptable in his sight, is from God, who by Christ Jesus hath given us the knowledge of our duty, and by his grace and Spirit hath enabled us for the performance of it. They mislead men who extend this to our whole salvation, from the beginning to the end, which though it be so of grace, as to be carried on from the beginning of the new nature to the end of our life, by the assistance of God's grace and Holy Spirit; yet is not so of grace, as to exclude those works of righteousness God hath prepared us to walk in, they being the conditions requisite to make faith saving, the terms on which alone we are to enter into life, (Matt. vii. 21. Luke x. 25. 28. Rom. ii. 6, 7. 10. 2 Pet. i. 5. 11. Rev. xxii. 14.) and according to which we shall receive our future recompence. (Rom. ii. 6. 1 Cor. iii. 8. 2 Cor. v. 10. Gal. vi. 4, 5.)

[8] Ver. 12. Ἐλπίδα μὴ ἔχοντες; Having no hope] After this life; (1 Thess. iv. 13.) I would not have you sorrowful for them that sleep, as οἱ λοιποὶ, the residue of the world, who have no hope. (See note on 2 Tim. i. 10.)

[9] Ἄθεοι, Without the true God.] For then not knowing God, they served τοῖς μὴ φύσει οὖσι θεοῖς, those which by nature were not gods; (Gal. iv. 8.) even their wise men changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped the vulgar deities; (Rom. i. 25.) they were heathens, carried about to dumb idols. (1 Cor. xii. 2.) Hence at their conversion they are said to turn from idols to serve the living and true God. (1 Thess. i. 9.) In this sense the Christians styled the heathens ἄθεοι, atheists, because τὸν μὲν ὄντως ὄντα θεὸν ἠγνοήκασι, they knew not the true God. So Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 14. and Theodoret here. And the heathens styled the Christians so, because they denied those to be gods whom they esteemed truly such; so Just. Mart. Apol. ii. p. 56. Athenag. p. 6. And the stoics reckoned two kinds of atheists; one that contemned the gods, τόν τε ἐναντίως θείῳ λεγόμενον, the other that spake things contrary to the Deity, Laert. lib. vii. §. 119.

[10] Ver. 13. Ἐγγύς, Nigh.] Those Jews who had no ceremonial defilement to be purged away, and who had made an atonement for their known sins, were admitted to come near to God, as being holy; they had a freedom of access to God in his tabernacle and temple, whence they are styled, ὁ λαὸς ἐγγίζων αὐτῷ, the people that draw near to God, Lev. x. 3. Psal. lxv. 4. cxlviii. 14. and God is said to be, ὁ θεὸς ἐγγίζων αὐτοῖς, a God near to them, Deut. vii. 4. both by relation, as having owned them as his children and family, and entered into covenant to be their God, and by his more especial presence with them; for the Schechinah, or the glorious presence, dwelt among them in the holy place. Now all these privileges, saith the apostle, are equally conferred upon the gentiles, they are now made near to God, ver. 13. have access to him, ver. 18. are fellow-citizens of the saints, and of the family of God, ver. 19. the Schechinah dwells in them as in a temple, and they are made a habitation of God through the Spirit, ver. 21, 22.

[11] Ver. 14. Τὸ μεσότοιχον, The middle wall.] This refers to that partition-wall in the temple which separated the court of the gentiles from that into which the Jews entered, on which was written, That no alien might go into it; it being, saith Josephus,* a sanction of Antiochus, μὴ δεῖν ἀλλόφυλον ἐντὸς τοῦ ἁγίου προσιέναι, that no alien should enter into the court of the sanctuary, which was enclosed with the sept: and this inscription was writ in Greek and Latin.

[12] Ver. 15. Εἰς ἕνα καινὸν ἄνθρωπον, Into one new man.] As being both to walk in newness of life, and by the new law of Christianity, and by Christ's new commandments of love.

[13] Εἰρήνην, Peace.] This peace Christ hath made between Jew and gentile, by abolishing the ceremonial law which made the enmity; and with God, by reconciling both to him by his death.

[14] Ver. 16. Ἐν αὐτῷ.] i. e. Ἐν τῷ σταυρῷ, By the cross. So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, read. Other copies read, ἐν ἑαυτῷ, in himself: but this reading, saith St. Jerome, is only of the Latin copies, and it seems to have had its rise from the former verse. (See Examen Millii.)

[15] Ver. 18. Οἱ ἀμφότεροι, We both.] Hence we learn, (1.) that Christ not only reconciled Jew and gentile to one another, but that he reconciled both to God, for by him we have, προσαγωγὴν, access to the Father, a freedom of access to God, ver. 18. and iii. 12. Now where this phrase in the New Testament is used with respect to Christ, it still imports the freedom of access vouchsafed to them who formerly were by their sins excluded from God's gracious presence: this is obtained, say these words, by virtue of his blood, making our peace by him, reconciling us to God by his cross, and bringing them near to God who were afar off. How is he our peace? because the chastisement which procured our peace was upon him, Isa. liii. 5. How did he reconcile us to God, but by the cross? i. e. by bearing our sins in his body on the cross, 1 Pet. ii. 24. By virtue of his blood the gentiles, who formerly were aliens, are made near to God; they who were strangers, were made God's domestics; they who emphatically were sinners, Gal. ii. 15. were made fellow-citizens of the saints; they who were children of wrath, ver. 2. to them is God reconciled: and after all this can it be reasonably denied, that Christ hath pacified God to the gentiles by his blood? or doth not all this import a reconciliation, on God's part, to them?

To shew the reason of this reconciliation let it be noted, that God being a holy God, none were to come into his presence who had any pollution or defilement on them, upon pain of death, till they were sanctified or cleansed from it by some purification, or atonement made for them to God. He dwelt in the camp of Israel; and so those lepers which were so unclean as to pollute the camp, were driven from it, (Lev. xiii. 46. Numb. v. 2, 3. 2 Kings xv. 5.) and those sin-offerings, which were polluted with the sins of the whole congregation, were carried out of the camp. (Lev. xvi. 21, 22. Heb. xiii. 11.)

God dwelt more especially in the temple, and therefore they who had lesser impurities, i. e. who were defiled by the dead, or by an issue, or a menstruous woman, were not to come thither, till they were cleansed from those defilements. (Lev. xii. 4. xv. 31.)

Moreover, he being a God of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, they who had committed any sin of ignorance, and lay under the guilt of it, were not permitted to come into the court of the men of Israel, till they had brought their offering of atonement. (Ainsworth on Numb. v. 3.)

Now God being still the same holy God, of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, the scriptures of the New Testament seem as plainly to make our freedom of access to God to depend upon our being sanctified, or purged from our defilement, and our being delivered from the guilt of sin, by an atonement made by the blood of Christ for our iniquities; that so they being pardoned, we may have peace with God, and an access to his favour. This plainly seems to be the import of the words, Heb. ix. 13. If the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of a heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, and by so doing procureth an admission of the person cleansed to serve God in the sanctuary, (Numb. xix. 9. 12. 17.) how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works (or works exposing you to death, the punishment of the person who came unclean into God's presence, that so you may be admitted) to serve the living God?

[16] Ver. 19. Ξένοι, Strangers.] The proselytes who joined themselves to the God of Israel, were by the Jews, and by the Scriptures, styled strangers. He that only took upon him to worship the true God, and observe the precepts of Noah, was "ger toshab," a stranger permitted to dwell among them, and to worship in the court of the gentiles: he that was circumcised, and became obedient to the law of Moses, was "ger tzedek," a proselyte of righteousness: but both were called strangers, according to that maxim of the Jews, All the nations of the world are called, גרים, strangers before the God of Israel: but the Jews are said to be קרבים, near to him. But now, saith the apostle, there is no such difference, the believing gentiles being equally admitted with the believing Jews to the privileges of the new Jerusalem, and equally related to God, as part of his family.

[17] Ver. 22.] Thus Philo* saith, that good men are Θεοῦ οἶκος καὶ ἱερὸν, God's house and holy temple. (See note on 1 Cor. vi. 20.)

CHAP. III.

1. [1] FOR this cause, I Paul (am) the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you gentiles,

2. (I am, I say, a prisoner for you gentiles, as you must know,) [2] if (since) ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward (or for you gentiles):

3. How that he (ὅτι, for he, or that he,) by (particular) revelation made known to me the mystery (of the calling of the gentiles, Gal. i. 16. Acts ix. 15. 21, 22.) as I wrote before in few words; (viz. i. 9—12. ii. 19.)

4. Whereby, when you read (εἰς ὃ ἀναγινώσκοντες, to which attending), you may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ (touching the calling of the gentiles),

5. Which in other ages was not made known to the sons of men, [3] as it is now revealed to his holy apostles and [4] prophets by the Spirit (of wisdom and of knowledge, given them to discern all mysteries, 1 Cor. xii. 8. xiii. 2.

6. It being not before revealed as now it is,) that the gentiles should be fellow-heirs (of God with the believing Jews), and of the same body (with them), and partakers of his promise (the promise of his Spirit, Gal. iii. 14.) in (and through) Christ (only) by (virtue of) the gospel (preached to them, and believed by them):

7. Of which (gospel) I was made [5] a minister, [6] according to the gift of the grace of God given to me (to be the apostle of the gentiles; for which work I was enabled) by the effectual working of his power (in signs and wonders, &c. Rom. xv. 19.)

8. Unto me (I say), who (by reason of my former persecutions of the church of Christ, 1 Cor. xv. 9.) am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ (i. e. the exceeding blessings to be obtained by faith in him);

9. And to make all men (Jews and gentiles) see what is the fellowship of the mystery (of the calling of the gentiles to be thus fellow-heirs with the Jews), which from the beginning of the world hath been hid (ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων, from former ages) in (the purpose of) God, [7] who created all things (belonging to the old and new creation) by Jesus Christ:

10. To the intent that (Gr. ἵνα, that) now, to the [8] principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the (things done in and by the) church the manifold wisdom of God,

11. [9] According to the eternal purpose which he purposed (or made) in Christ Jesus our Lord:

12. In whom we have boldness (or freedom) and access with confidence (to God the Father) by the faith of him:

* L. de Somnis, p. 456. E.

(i. e. the faith we have in him as our Mediator: see note on ii. 18.)

13. Wherefore I (Paul the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you gentiles, ver. 1.) desire that you faint not (that you be not disheartened) at my tribulation for you, which is (rather matter of) your glory, (you having cause to glory, that I, your apostle, suffer so much for the gospel I preach to you, this being to you a confirmation of the truth of it.

14. And) for this cause I bow my knees to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (praying to him),

15. Of whom [10] the whole family in heaven and earth is named (the angels in heaven and saints on earth being styled the sons of God),

16. That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory (i. e. according to his glorious riches), to be (still more) strengthened with might by his (Holy) Spirit in the inward man;

17. That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that you, being (firmly) rooted and grounded in love (to him, who sent his Son to die for you);

18. May be able to comprehend (together) with all saints what is [11] the breadth, and length, and depth, and height (of this mysterious love towards you),

19. And may (be able to) know the love of Christ, which (in its full extent, even) passeth knowledge, that you may be filled with all the [12] fulness of God.

20. Now, to him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power (of the Holy Ghost) that worketh in us (and so miraculously confirms his doctrine to the world),

21. Unto him (I say) be (ascribed all) glory in the (assemblies of the) church by (and through) Christ Jesus (through whom we offer up all prayers and praises, Heb. xiii. 15. Eph. v. 20.) throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. ΤΟΥ'ΤΟΥ χάριν, For this cause.] i. e. Because I assert that these privileges belong equally to the believing gentiles, though they be not circumcised; this being the reason why the Jews so fiercely persecuted him, and forced him to appeal to Cæsar; (Acts xxii. 22. xxv. 11, 12. xxvi. 17.) and why, after he came to Rome, the Jews preached Christ not sincerely, but out of envy to him, to add affliction to his bonds. (Phil. i. 15, 16.)

[2] Ver. 2. Εἴγε ἠκούσατε, If ye have heard.] Hence some raise a second objection against this Epistle's being written by St. Paul to the Ephesians; for, say they, to them with whom he had so long conversed, there could be no doubt, whether they had heard of the dispensation of the grace of God given him towards them. But indeed this is no objection to them who will consider, that this Epistle was not written to the Ephesians only, but also to all the faithful in Christ Jesus; many of whom had never seen his face, nor heard his voice. And, secondly, if we consider, that he speaks here particularly of the manner of his receiving this dispensation, viz. by immediate revelation from Christ Jesus; of which the Galatians, among whom he had also preached, were ignorant; and therefore the apostle, in his Epistle to them, saith, γνωρίζω ὑμῖν, of this I certify you, confirming his assertion with an oath. (Gal. i. 11, 12. 16.) Add to this, thirdly, that the particle εἴγε, is not here a particle of doubting, but of affirmation, and is to be rendered, as Theophylact doth, ἐπειδή, since: so the Hebrew אם is often rendered quandoquidem; and so Philo uses this particle in these words,* εἴγε τὰ ἀκούσια, καὶ τὰ κατ' ἄγνοιαν οὐδὲ ἀδικημάτων λόγον ἔχειν φασί τινες, seeing some say of things done involuntarily, and out of ignorance, that they are not to be accounted sins; and when he says, Abel yet lives,† εἴγε καὶ ἱκέτης ὢν Θεοῦ καὶ φωνῇ χρώμενος εὑρίσκεται, seeing that he had still a voice to cry to God; and that Sarah is represented by Moses both as barren and very fruitful,‡ εἴγε τὸ πολυανθρωπότατον τῶν ἐθνῶν ἐξ αὐτῆς ὁμολογεῖ γενέσθαι, since he confesses, that from her should proceed the most populous of nations. (See also the note on i. 15.)

[3] Ver. 5. Ὡς νῦν ἀπεκαλύφθη, As it hath been now revealed.] It was in the general made known, that in Abraham should all the families of the earth be blessed; and that Christ should be a light to the gentiles; of which see note on ver. 10. But it was not made known to the Jews, that the gentiles should be fellow-heirs with them of the same salvation and celestial inheritance: for that this was matter of admiration to the first Jewish converts, we learn from these words, Then hath God also given to the gentiles repentance unto life, Acts xi. 18. They did not know, or believe, that the gentiles should be made members of the same body, and admitted to the same privileges, and made partakers of the same Spirit with them. Hence the believing Jews, ἐξέστησαν, were in an ecstasy, when they saw that the gift of the Holy Ghost was poured on the gentiles; (Acts x. 45. Gal. ii. 14.) and much less did they know, that the partition-wall, which made the distance and enmity between them, should be taken away by the Messiah, as the apostle here teacheth, (ver. 14, 15.) that the hand-writing of ordinances was to be blotted out on this account, (Colos. ii. 24.) and that these privileges were to be conferred upon them without circumcision, or observation of the law of Moses. They rather thought they were either first to be made Jews, and then Christians, or only were to come as slaves and drudges to them, who were the children of the kingdom. And hence the apostle spends a great part of the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, to assert this privilege of the gentiles against the Judaizing Christians. In a word, to the Jews anciently belonged υἱοθεσία, the sonship, and so the inheritance, for if sons, then heirs, (Rom. viii. 17.) and promises; (Rom. ix. 4.) and they conceived, that none were ever to be admitted into their body, or partake of those privileges, unless they were circumcised, and became obedient to the law of Moses, (Acts xv. 1.) which they thought never was to cease, or to be antiquated. And therefore, say the Greek fathers, the apostle here declares, that God now, under the gospel-dispensation, equally admitted the believing gentiles to these privileges by faith without circumcision, or obedience to the law of Moses.

[4] Καὶ προφήταις, And to the prophets.] That the apostle here understands the prophets of the New Testament, or those who in the first ages of the church received the prophetical grace, and by it understood all mysteries, (1 Cor. xiii. 2.) the words ὡς νῦν, now it is revealed under the gospel to the prophets, will not suffer us to doubt. And this fully answers all the objections of Esthius against the exposition I have given of the former words.

[5] Ver. 7. Οὗ ἐγενόμην διάκονος, Of which I am made a minister.] Mr. L. thinks, that this strongly implies a denial, that others were made ministers of the same doctrine; but as it cannot imply, that Barnabas, and others appointed to go with him, or that Silas and Timotheus, who preached the same doctrine, (2 Cor. i. 19.) were not also ministers of that doctrine; so the commission Christ gave to all his apostles, being to preach the gospel, and to make disciples through all the gentile world, it is not easy to conceive, that those nine, who were sent to preach to the gentiles, as well as St. Paul, should none of them understand their commission aright; especially if we consider how fully the council met at Jerusalem establish St. Paul's doctrine, with respect to the gentile converts, declaring, as St. Peter doth, that they, being Jews, expected to be saved by faith in Christ, as did the gentiles; that God had put no difference betwixt them and the circumcised Jews, purifying their hearts by faith, and giving them the Holy Spirit, as he had done to his believing Jews; and that therefore to endeavour to put the yoke of circumcision on their necks, was to tempt God; that is, to distrust the evidence that he had given of his acceptance of them without circumcision. (Acts xv. 8—11.) And the whole synod declare, that they who said, they ought to be circumcised, and to keep the law, troubled them with words tending to the subversion of their souls; (ver. 24.) whereas it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to them, to lay upon them none of these burdens, (ver. 28.) And lastly, that they who were pillars of the church of the circumcision, knowing the grace given to St. Paul, approved his commission of preaching to the gentiles, as he did, Gal. ii. 9.

[6] Κατὰ τὴν δωρεὰν τῆς χάριτος, According to the gift of grace.] That the apostulate is by St. Paul oft styled grace, see the note on Rom. i. 5. And that in this sense he understands the gift of grace here, is evident from the following words.

[7] Ver. 9. Τῷ πάντα κτίσαντι, Who created all things.] The ancients commonly say, that God the Father is ὁ πρῶτος δημιουργὸς, the prime and chief Creator of the world, as being the original of all creating power, and he as it were commanding, and the Son executing his command, who is hence styled, * ὁ προσεχὴς δημιουργὸς, the immediate Creator, or αὐτουργὸς τοῦ κόσμου, the Artificer of the world. Hence Irenæus† so often saith, Patrem omnia fecisse per verbum, or verbo virtutis; and that the Son and Holy Spirit are ‡ quasi manus, as it were the hands of God, by which he made all things, and to both which all the angels are subject.

Διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.] See these words vindicated, Examen Millii in locum.

[8] Ver. 10. Ταῖς ἀρχαῖς καὶ ταῖς ἐξουσίαις, To the principalities and powers.] This phrase, though used of evil spirits, vi. 12. may be understood of good angels, the mystery of godliness, being then seen of angels, 1 Tim. iii. 16. and the things which the apostles preached by the Holy Ghost, being such as the angels desired to look into, 1 Pet. i. 12. That the words ἐπουράνιος, and ἐπουράνια, always signify things, or persons in heaven, is very evident. So πατὴρ ἐπουράνιος, is our heavenly Father, Matt. xviii. 25. ὁ ἐπουράνιος, the Lord from heaven, 1 Cor. xv. 48, 49. τὰ ἐπουράνια, heavenly things, to be taught only by him who was in heaven, John iii. 12, 13. σώματα ἐπουράνια, heavenly bodies, viz. the stars, 1 Cor. xv. 40. βασιλεία ἐπουράνιος, the kingdom to be enjoyed in heaven, 2 Tim. iv. 18. Heb. xi. 16. Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐπουράνιος, the Jerusalem that is above, Heb. xii. 22. ὑπόδειγμα τῶν ἐπουρανίων, the pattern of things in heaven, Heb. viii. 5. τὰ ἐπουράνια, heavenly things, Heb. ix. 23. Hence are they distinguished from things on earth, or under the earth, Phil. ii. 10. The words are five times used in this Epistle, and always signify heavenly places. So it doth when we are said to sit down with Christ, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, in heavenly places, ii. 6. when Christ is said to be sat down with God, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, in heavenly places, i. 10. that being the consequence of his ascension into heaven, (1 Pet. iii. 22. Heb. xiii. 10. 12.) and therefore it is well rendered in heavenly places, ver. 3. So it signifies, when the apostle speaks of principalities, powers, and spiritual wickednesses, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, vi. 12. and so it must signify, when he speaks here of good angels in the same places: nor can it be well joined with σοφία, because διὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας intervenes.

To Mr. L.'s objection, that it is not easy to conceive, that the declaration of this mystery should be to this intent, that the angels, good or bad, should be acquainted with it, it may be answered;

First, That the apostle doth not say this was God's sole intent in the revelation of this mystery; but only, that this, amongst others more important, might be one.

Secondly, That the particle ἵνα signifies, "adeo ut," so that; (see note on 1 Cor. xiv. 13.) and then the words will not respect God's intention in this revelation, but only the consequence of it. But whereas from those words, ver. 6. Was not made known, &c. Mr. Le Clerc saith thus, The same thing which is there said in other ages not to have been made known to the sons of men, is said here to have been unknown also to angels; which being so, I confess I do not well understand how they who are neither prophets nor angels can find out so many places in the prophets, in which the calling of the gentiles is manifestly and directly foretold: for certainly if it was revealed to the prophets, they understood it; and if it could be gathered from the literal sense of any prophecies, the angels might have understood it by those prophecies: whereas, I say, he descants thus: What would he have? Would he deny against the plain and frequent sayings of St. Paul, that the calling of the gentiles was revealed to, and plainly foretold by, the prophets, as his words do import? Let him, if he can, confute St. Paul proving it against him, that the Lord had commanded the gentiles should be called in these words of the prophet Isaiah, I have set thee to be a light to the gentiles, and to be for salvation to the ends of the earth: (Acts xiii. 46, 47.) and his four other proofs from the prophets, Moses, David, and Esaias, that the gentiles were to glorify God for his mercy to them, in Christ Jesus, that root of Jesse, who was to rise up to govern the gentiles, and in whom the gentiles were to trust: (Rom. xv. 9—12.) yea, let him confute the apostle James, saying, Simeon hath declared how God at first did visit the gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name: and to this agree the words of the prophets, After this I will build again the tabernacle of David, &c. that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the nations upon whom my name is called. (Acts xv. 14. 17.) Nor doth the apostle any where hint, that the calling of the gentiles was not revealed to or by the prophets; but only that it was not so made known in all the particularities of it, ὡς νῦν, as it is now discovered by the apostles and prophets of the new testament. (See the note on ver. 6.) Secondly, It was also known to, and preached by, the angels, declaring the glad tidings of great joy which should be to all nations through Christ, (Luke ii. 10, 11.) he being as well a light to lighten the gentiles, as the glory of his people Israel. Nor does the apostle here say, as he suggests, that this was unknown to the angels, but only that what was before made known to them by prophecies, was now made known to them by the church, i. e. the gentiles actually called; though all the circumstances mentioned note on ver. 6. might not be fully known before, even to them.

[9] Ver. 11. Κατὰ πρόθεσιν τῶν αἰώνων, According to the foredisposing of the ages.] In the first of the ages his wisdom seeing fit to give the promise of a Saviour to a fallen Adam; in the second age to typify and represent him to the Jews in sacred persons, rites, and sacrifices; and in the age of the Messiah, or the last age, to reveal him to the Jews, and preach him to the gentiles.

[10] Ver. 15. Πᾶσα πατριὰ, The whole family.] It is frequent with the Jews to make mention of the angels as the family in heaven; and of men, especially those that are in covenant with God, as his family on earth; as when they say, God doeth nothing but he first consults with his family שלמעלה above, that is, with the angels: and that he that addicts himself to the study of the Divine law for the sake of the law, conciliates to himself peace with the family above, and with the family below; that is, with angels in heaven, and men on earth. They are also called קדשי מעלה the saints above, Targ. in Job xv. 15. and the sons of God, as in these words of Job i. 6. and ii. 1. And on a day came ἄγγελοι Θεοῦ, the sons of God, and xxxviii. 7. Where wast thou when ἄγγελοί μου, all the sons of God shouted for joy? And so are all true believers styled, for to as many as believed, he gave power to be the sons of God, John i. 12. and they at the resurrection shall be like the angels, and be the sons of God, Luke xx. 36.

[11] Ver. 18. Τὸ πλάτος καὶ μῆκος, &c. The breadth, length, depth, and height.] By the breadth of this love, some of the fathers understand the great extent and generality of Christ's affection; his death being designed for the benefit of all persons, Jew and gentile, through all ages, from Adam to the end of the world, and in all places, he having by it reconciled things in heaven, and things in the earth, (i. 10.) By the depth of it, say they, is signified the greatness of his humiliation; love to mankind having induced him to change the form of God for that of a servant, humbled the Lord of life to an ignominious and painful death, and brought him from the highest heavens to the lowest hell, into which, they conceive, he descended for our sakes. The length of it imports, say they, his love to us from the beginning of the world, we being chosen in Christ from the beginning, (i. 4. iii. 11.) The height of his affection is manifested, say they, in that being now exalted to the right hand of Majesty, he is still there employed in acts of greatest kindness to us, using his whole power in heaven and earth for the benefit of his church. But it seems more natural to say, that the apostle by enumerating these dimensions, only intends to signify the exceeding greatness of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge. Thus Job, speaking of the unsearchable wisdom of God, and his unfathomable perfections, puts these inquiries; Canst thou search him out to perfection? It is higher than the heaven, what canst thou do? deeper than hell, what canst thou know? The measure of it is longer than the earth, and the breadth of it than the sea: (Job xi. 7, 8.) and the son of Sirach saith, The height of heaven, and the breadth of the earth, the abyss and wisdom, who can search out? (Ecclus. i. 3.) and the apostle cries out, O the depth of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how unsearchable are his judgments, &c. (Rom. xi. 33.) And in this sense these four dimensions will chiefly be designed to import what the apostle styles, (ver. 8.) the unsearchable riches of the love of Christ. It therefore seems unreasonable to think, that the love of Christ passing knowledge, should import only the love of Christ passing, i. e. excelling the knowledge or skill in mystical interpretations, which the gnostics pretended to: for, as the word γνῶσις put absolutely hath no such import, that I know of, in the Holy Scripture; so after the mention of all these dimensions, and the unsearchable riches of it, (ver. 8.) it seems a very faint expression to say, it surpasseth that vain and insignificant knowledge to which the gnostics pretended; their mystical interpretations, recorded by Irenæus, being above measure vain and impious, even a mystery of iniquity: and as for the phrase ὑπερβάλλουσα τῆς γνώσεως, it is justified by Aristotle,* who hath it twice in one chapter, viz. ὑπερβάλλειν τῆς συμμετρίας, to exceed the measure, ὑπερβάλλειν τῶν πλωτήρων, to excel other navigators.

[12] Ver. 19. Εἰς πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ Θεοῦ, With all the fulness of God.] Εἰς pro ἐν, (see note on Colos. i. 20.) that is, say some, with the highest degrees of faith and love; or with all fulness of spiritual gifts, especially those of knowledge and wisdom, which might enable them to comprehend the greatness of his love. Thus iv. 10. He ascended up on high, that he might fill all things with spiritual gifts, mentioned ver. 10. that he might give gifts unto men, ver. 8. and i. 23. his church is styled, the fulness of him that filleth all in all; i. e. who filleth all his members with those gifts.

CHAP. IV.

1. I THEREFORE, the prisoner of the Lord (ἐν Κυρίῳ, in bonds for Christ), beseech you that you would walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called,

2. [1] With all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, (and so) forbearing one another in love;

3. Endeavouring (thus) to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

4. (For you know, that) there is one body (of the whole church), and [2] one Spirit (which animates the whole body), even as you are called in one hope of your calling; (i. e. and you know also, that you are all called to the same hope of eternal life.

5. There is also to us Christians) one Lord, [3] one faith (in this Lord), one baptism (by which we do profess this faith),

* Polit. lib. iii. cap. 13. p. 417, 448.

6. [4] One God and Father of all, who is above all (by his essence), and through all (by his providence), and in you all (by his Spirit).

7. But (though the body is but one, yet) unto every one of us (who are members of this body) [5] is given grace (enabling us to serve this body) according to the measure of the gift of Christ.

8. [6] Wherefore (to manifest this) he (the Psalmist) saith, When he (Christ) ascended up on high, he led captivity (Satan and death) captive, (Judg. v. 12. Heb. ii. 14.) and [7] gave gifts unto men (i. e. received them, Psal. lxviii. 19. to give to them).

9. Now that he ascended, what is it but (a demonstration) that he also descended first [8] into the lower parts of the earth?

10. He that descended (thus into the lower parts of the earth) is the same also who (after his resurrection) ascended up [9] far above all heavens, that he might fill all things (with his gifts, according to his promise, that when he was ascended, he would send the Spirit upon his apostles and disciples, John xiv. 17. xv. 26. xvii. 5. Luke xxiv. 49.)

11. And (accordingly) he gave some, apostles (to reveal his will); and some, prophets (to explain the mysteries of faith); and some, evangelists (to propagate this faith to other nations); and [10] some, pastors and teachers (to instruct others in it.

12. [11] And this variety of gifts was conferred upon them) for the perfecting (Gr. compacting) of the saints (into one body), for the work of the ministry (that they who had them might minister to the temporal necessity, as did the deacons, and the spiritual concerns of others, as did the apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and doctors), for the edifying of the body of Christ (in faith and love):

13. Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge (or acknowledgment) of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, (i. e. to perfection in knowledge of the faith and of the will of God, Colos. i. 28.) unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ (i. e. so as to be Christians of a full maturity and ripeness in all the graces derived from Christ Jesus to the body):

14. That (so arriving to perfection in faith and knowledge) we henceforth (may) be no more children tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive (Gr. by the subtilty of men, through their craftiness, for the managing of deceit);

15. But, speaking (or keeping) the truth in love, may grow up into (or increase in) him in all things, who is the head, even (into) Christ:

16. [12] From whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part (Gr. compacted and cemented together by every joint of supply, according to its power in proportion of every part), maketh increase of the body to the edifying of itself in love.

17. This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord, that ye (who have these assistances in faith and piety) walk not henceforth as other (unconverted) gentiles, [13] in the vanity of their (own) mind;

18. Having the understanding darkened, (and) being [14] alienated from the life of God [15] through the ignorance that is in them, because of the [16] blindness of their heart;

19. Who being past feeling (insensible of the vileness of their actions) have given themselves up to work all uncleanness [17] with greediness.

20. But ye have not so learned (the doctrine of) Christ;

21. If so be (or since) that ye have heard him (by our preaching), and have been taught by him (Gr. instructed in him), as the truth is in Jesus:

22. (To wit,) that ye put off, concerning the former conversation (in heathenism) [18] the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; (i. e. the lusts which deceive you, promising that pleasure and satisfaction which they cannot yield; or which you practised whilst heathens, being deceived by your heathen priests, declaring they were acceptable to the gods, and the philosophy and vain deceit of those men who allowed them:)

23. And be renewed in the spirit of your mind;

24. And that ye (may) put on the new man, which after (the image of) God is created in righteousness and true holiness.

25. Wherefore putting away [19] lying (a vice too common among heathens, and opposite to truth and righteousness), speak every man truth with his neighbour: for we are members one of another: (now lying tends to dissolve societies, and hurt the members of the same body.

26. If you) [20] be angry (take heed), and sin not: [21] let not the sun go down upon your wrath:

27. [22] Neither give place to the (temptation of the) devil.

28. [23] Let him that stole (before his conversion) steal no more: but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he [24] may have to give to him that needeth.

29. Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouths, but that which is good to the use of edifying, [25] that it may minister grace unto the hearers.

30. [26] And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed to the day of redemption, (i. 13, 14.)

31. (And to this end) let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil-speaking, be put away from you, with all malice:

32. And be ye kind one towards another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 2, 3.] NOTE here from the fathers, that ἐὰν τὴν ἀγάπην ἔχωμεν ἀνεξόμεθα ἀλλήλων, where love is retained, there will be mutual forbearance; and from Zanchy, that peace cannot be preserved without that mutual forbearance, and that humility, which exclude, and that meekness, which is opposite to, anger and contention.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἓν πνεῦμα, One spirit.] From these and the former words, the unity of the Spirit, it seems plain to me that the union of the mystical body of the church catholic consists in this, that they all have the same Spirit communicated to them from their head Christ Jesus. For the whole body of Christians is here said to have one Spirit, and their unity is styled, the unity of the Spirit. The body is one, saith the apostle, 1 Cor. xii. 12. for by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body, ver. 23. And to the whole body of the church of Corinth he speaks thus, Know ye not that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? 1 Cor. iii. 16. Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, that is in you? vi. 19. Christ, saith the apostle here, ii. 16—18. hath reconciled both Jew and gentile into one body unto God, and hath made peace between them; for by him we have both access by one Spirit to the Father; ἄρα οὖν, and therefore having thus one Spirit, by which we are made one body, and sons of the same Father, we are all fellow-citizens of the saints, and of the family of God; and are built up all together into a habitation of God through the Spirit. Now hence it follows,

First, That only sincere Christians are truly members of that church catholic, of which Jesus Christ is the head, since the whole body is united to him by the communication of the Holy Spirit, whom the wicked of the world cannot receive, (John xiv. 17.) they being sensual, having not the Spirit, (Jude 19.)

Secondly, That nothing can unite any professor of Christianity to this one body, but the participation of the Spirit of Christ; and therefore nothing else can make him a true member of that church which is his body. Hence the apostle doth inform us negatively, That if any man have not the Spirit of Christ dwelling in him, he is none of his, Rom. viii. 9. 11. and affirmatively, that by this we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit that he hath given us, 1 John iii. 24. And again, by this we know that he abideth in us, and we in him, because he hath given us of his Spirit, iv. 13. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are sons of God, Rom. viii. 14. and because we are sons, God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, Gal. iv. 6. It therefore must be owned as a certain truth, that nothing can unite us to that church and body, of which Christ Jesus is the head, but the participation of the Spirit.

Thirdly, That no error in judgment, or mistake in practice, which doth not tend to deprive a Christian of the Spirit of Christ, can separate him from the church of Christ.

Fourthly, Hence it demonstratively follows, that no church-governors, jointly or severally, can be by God appointed to be the living judges, or the infallible directors of our faith. For since in matters of faith we must have a judgment of certainty, we cannot own him as such by virtue of that assistance of the Holy Ghost, which alone can make them such, till we are certain they belong to that church, of which Christ Jesus is the head, and to which only the promise of the Spirit doth belong; i. e. till we are certain they are sincere and upright Christians. Since therefore God hath given us no certain rule to know this by, we may rest satisfied, that he designed no such magisterial guides should be continued in his church.

[3] Ver. 5. Μία πίστις, One faith.] It plainly is asserted in the Holy Scriptures, that there is one common faith, Tit. i. 4. one like precious faith, 2 Pet. i. 1. of all that bear the name of Christians. A unity of faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, to which we must all arrive, Eph. iv. 13. A faith once delivered to the saints, Jude 3. for which we must strive earnestly, and in which we must build up ourselves; a faith of the gospel for which we are exhorted to contend as with one soul, Phil. i. 27. But vain is hence the inference of the papists, that this one faith must be either theirs, and then we cannot be saved without it; or ours, and then they cannot be saved: for this one faith, into which all Christians were baptized, contains neither the doctrines in which they differ from us, nor we from them, but only the Apostles' Creed, which the whole church of Christ, for many centuries, received as a perfect system of things necessary to be believed in order to salvation; as I have fully proved, Treatise of Tradition, par. ii. chap. vii. §. 4—8.

[4] Ver. 6. Εἷς Θεὸς, One God.] Here, say the Socinians, that God who is styled one, is also styled the Father, and to him is ascribed this epithet so common among the philosophers, to denote the Supreme Deity, that he is ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πᾶσι, God over all. But to this it is answered,

1. That we deny not that God the Father is one God over all, or that there is one who is both one God and the Father; only we add, that there is also one, who is one God of the same essence, and the Son; and so also say we of the Holy Spirit: and that as the one Lord, and the one Spirit here, do not exclude the Father from being both Lord and Spirit, so neither doth the one God and Father exclude the Son, or Holy Spirit, from being God, but only from being God the Father. It is also to be noted, that the primitive fathers before the Nicene council did not scruple to distinguish Christ from God the Father, by styling him another God from the maker of all things, ὑπὲρ ὃν ἄλλος Θεὸς οὐκ ἔστι, above whom there is no other God. Justin Martyr* twice describes the Father by this distinctive character, that he is God, ὑπὲρ ὃν ἄλλος Θεὸς οὐκ ἔστι, above whom there is no other God; saying, that Christ did nothing but what ὁ τὸν κόσμον ποιήσας, ὑπὲρ ὃν ἄλλος οὐκ ἔστι Θεὸς, the Maker of the world, above whom there is no other God, would have him do; and yet he at least twenty times asserts, that Christ is God and Lord, and that he is the person, ἀφ' οὗ οὐρανὸν καὶ γῆν,† by whom he made the heaven and earth, and by whom he will renew them; the Word of God; δι' οὗ οὐρανὸς καὶ γῆ, καὶ ἡ πᾶσα κτίσις ἐγένετο, by whom the heaven and the earth, and the whole creation was made. So Irenæus‡ often saith, that the Father is only to be called God and Lord; and yet he adds, that this is not said to exclude the Son, who is in the Father, and hath the Father in him, and hath his principality in all things.

[5] Ver. 7. Ἐδόθη ἡ χάρις, Is given grace.] These graces being therefore the gift of Christ, and not our own, no one should be puffed up, or despise others on the account of them; nor should envy any others to whom he thinks fit to give them in a higher measure.

[6] Ver. 8. Διὸ λέγει, Wherefore he saith.] That this Psalm relates to the Messiah, we learn from the Jews themselves, who interpret this Psalm of him; for the words, ver. 32. are by them thus paraphrased, All nations shall bring gifts to the King Messiah, Schemoth Rabbah. § 15. Let it be also noted, that Christ triumphed over death and Satan on the cross, (Colos. ii. 15.) but he led Satan captive more gloriously, when, after this ascension, he poured his Holy Spirit on his apostles and disciples, and by that Spirit enabled them to cast out devils in his name, and turn men from the power of Satan to God. (Acts xxvi. 18.) He also then triumphed over death most signally, when thus ascending he became Lord over the dead, and had the keys of death and hades in his hand. (Rom. xiv. 9. Rev. i. 18.) Note also, that to lead captivity captive, is a phrase common in the Old Testament, to signify a conquest over enemies, especially over such as formerly had led them captive: so Jndg. v. 12. Arise, Barak, αἰχμαλώτισον αἰχμαλωσίαν, lead captivity captive. (See 1 Kings viii. 46. 2 Chron. xxviii. 5. 11. 17. Numb. xxi. 1. Deut. xxi. 10.)

[7] Καὶ ἔδωκε δόματα, And gave gifts.] That is, saith Dr. Hammond, he received gifts to give to men, from the nature of the Hebrew לקח, which signifies both to give and to receive, and thus it is rendered by the Targum, Syriac, and Arabic: but, saith Mr. Clerc, When the word signifies to give, there follows a dative case, Exod. xxv. 2. whereas the Hebrew here hath באדם, which has made learned men conjecture, that St. Paul read לאדם, to man. But, first, this is not always true, for, Hos. xiv. 2. we read thus, take away iniquity, וקח טוב, and give good; and where a dative case is added, an accusative either goes before it, as, thou hast received, מתות, gifts for men, and Judg. xiv. 2. קחו אותה לי, gave her to me, and ver. 3. or else follows after it, as 1 Kings iii. 24. קחו לי טרב, give me a sword: (see xvii. 10. Exod. xviii. 12. xxv. 2.) and as for ב in באדם, who knows not that it sometimes signifies pro, for, and sometimes only is the sign of the dative case? (See Noldius de Partic. Hebr. p. 158. 163.)

[8] Ver. 9. Εἰς τὰ κατώτερα μέρη τῆς γῆς, Into the lower parts of the earth.] That is, into the grave: so Psal. lxiii. 9. They that seek my soul to destroy it, shall go into the lower parts of the earth, i. e. they shall fall by the sword, ver. 10. Isa. xliv. 23. Sing, O heavens! shout, the lower parts of the earth. "We cannot be assured (saith Bishop Pearson*) that the descent of Christ, which St. Paul here speaketh of, was performed after his death, nor can we be assured that the lower parts of the earth do signify hell; they may as well refer to his incarnation," according to that of David, Psal. cxxxix. 15. My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lower parts of the earth; or to his burial, according to that of the prophet, They that seek my soul to destroy it, shall go into the lower parts of the earth; κατώτερα γὰρ μέρη τὸν θάνατον ἐκάλεσεν, he calls his death his descent into the lower parts of the earth, say Chrysostom and Theodoret on the place.

[9] Ver. 10. Ὑπεράνω πάντων τῶν οὐρανῶν, Far above all heavens.] He being made higher than the heavens, Heb. vii. 26. that is, than the airy and the starry heavens, and ascending above them into the presence of God, who hath set his glory above the heavens, Psal. viii. 1. and is exalted above them, Psal. lvii. 5. 11. cviii. 4, 5.

[10] Ver. 11. Τοὺς δὲ ποιμένας καὶ διδασκάλους, And some pastors and teachers.] That these pastors and teachers were in the first ages men of extraordinary gifts, is evident from this very place; for the preceding words, he gave gifts unto men, some apostles, some prophets, &c. shew that all the persons mentioned here were partakers of the gifts which Christ, ascending up on high and sending down the Holy Spirit, gave to men. Hence, among the different Χαρίσματα, gifts of the Holy Ghost, are reckoned, διδασκαλία, teaching, Rom. xii. 6, 7. and among the gifts exercised in their assemblies, διδαχὴ, doctrine, 1 Cor. xiv. 6. 26. among the persons who had received the διαιρέσεις χαρισμάτων, diversities of gifts, are reckoned, after prophets, διδάσκαλοι, teachers, 1 Cor. xii. 28. Rom. xii. 6, 7. and here: and so Tertullian† makes mention of them, as persons endued with the grace of knowledge. The pastors seem probably the same with the κυβερνήσεις, governments, 1 Cor. xii. 28. and the προεστῶτες, Rom. xii. 8.: and it is evident, from both those places, that there were also men endued with those spiritual gifts there mentioned. Hence it is observable of these doctors, that when the extraordinary gifts of the church ceased, their very names grew out of use, they being very rarely mentioned in the succeeding ages of the church.

[11] Ver. 12—15.] From these five verses the papists argue for an infallible guide, thus: "Christ gave apostles, pastors, and teachers, that Christians might not be tossed to and fro with every wind of doctrine: this end could not be compassed by giving us such guides and instructors in belief as were merely fallible, and who might lead us into circumvention of error. Moreover, God gave such pastors to his church, till we all come to the unity of the faith, which will not be till the last days of all; wherefore, till the end of the world, the world shall be provided of them, and by them be secured from being like children tossed to and fro."

Ans. I answer, That this text is so far from proving a succession of infallible guides, in matters of faith, to the world's end, that it seems rather to establish the doctrine of the protestants, touching the fulness and perspicuity of the Holy Scripture in all necessary articles of Christian faith, and to overthrow the pretended necessity of infallible guides in order to that end. For,

First, To come to a perfect man, as to the unity of faith and knowledge of the Son of God, is, in the Scripture language, to be sufficiently instructed in the articles of the Christian faith and knowledge. Thus, when our Lord saith to the young man, If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast, Matt. xix. 21. by comparing these words with those in St. Mark and St. Luke, Mark x. 21. one thing is lacking, or, is wanting to thee, Luke xviii. 22. it is evident, that to be perfect there, is not to be wanting in the knowledge or practice of any thing to be done, that this young man might have eternal life.

When St. Paul saith, We speak wisdom, ἐν τοῖς τελείοις, among them that are perfect, 1 Cor. ii. 6. the meaning is, say the Greek commentators,‡ παρὰ τοῖς τελείαν παραδεξαμένοις πίστιν, among those who are perfectly instructed in the faith: and when he saith, As many as are perfect, let us mind the same thing, he speaks of persons fully instructed in their Christian liberty: and when he saith, Leaving the principles of the oracles of Christ, let us go on to perfection, he calls us to advance to a more full instruction in the faith and knowledge of Christ. (See note on 1 Cor. ii. 6.)

Secondly, Note, that the apostles and first preachers of the gospel were made ministers of his church, πληρῶσαι τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ, to teach fully the word of God, Colos. i. 25, 26. To teach every man in all wisdom, that they might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus, ver. 28. And accordingly, departing from the churches planted by them, they commended them only to the word of grace, which was able to build them up, and give them an inheritance among all that are sanctified, Acts xx. 32.

Thirdly, Observe, that the apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, here named, were given at our Lord's ascension for these ends; for when he ascended up on high, ἔδωκε, he actually gave some apostles, &c. and that even those pastors and teachers had their Χαρίσματα, or supernatural gifts of the Holy Spirit, to fit them for that end. Whence it demonstratively follows, that these gifts ceasing soon after, a succession of such persons was neither promised nor was necessary to this end; for if so, Christ must be charged with breach of promise, and being wanting to the church in what is necessary for the obtainment of those ends.

Fourthly, Observe, that these apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, endued with these supernatural gifts, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ into a perfect man, not doing all or any of these things in person since their death, and yet being given for the accomplishing these ends, must be acknowledged to have done all these things, as far as they were needful, by some other way. Now there being no other way in which they could do it, but by their writings left behind them as a rule of faith, and by which they being dead yet speak; it follows, that these writings, duly attended to, must be sufficient for these ends; and consequently they must, both with sufficient fulness and perspicuity, instruct us in all the necessary articles of Christian faith and knowledge. Hence Chrysostom* informs us, that they writ the gospel, πρὸς καταρτισμὸν τῶν ἁγίων, for the perfecting the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ. In a word, it is evident this text doth as much prove a necessity of apostles, prophets, and evangelists, in all future ages of the church, to keep her members fixed in the truth, as of pastors and doctors; these apostles, prophets, and evangelists, being here placed in the first rank of those whom God hath given for this end: since therefore these apostles, prophets, and evangelists, were only given in the first ages of the church, it evidently follows, that the persons mentioned in this text were not given them to do this personally to the world's end, but only to do it by the doctrine they then taught.

[12] Ver. 16. Ἐξ οὗ, From whom.] That is, from which head the whole body of Christians, duly compacted together, some sustaining the office of an inferior head, some of an eye, some of a hand, some of a foot, (1 Cor. xii. 15—17.) by the assistance which every of these parts, thus united together, gives to the whole, according to the particular proportion of its gifts, increaseth or grows in love, and so each member edifies one another.

[13] Ver. 17. Ἐν ματαιότητι τοῦ νόος, In the vanity of the mind.] The heathen idols are frequently in the Old Testament styled μάταια, vain things; and the apostles preached to the gentiles to abstain and turn ἀπὸ τῶν ματαίων τούτων, from those vain things, Acts xiv. 15. by compliance with which they became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish hearts were darkened, Rom. i. 22. and this seems to be the vain conversation from which, saith St. Peter, they were redeemed, 1 Pet. i. 18. and the vanity of the mind here mentioned.

[14] Ver. 18. Ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι, Alienated from the life of God.] i. e. Not only from that way of life which God approves of, but which resembles him in purity, righteousness, truth, and goodness.

[15] Διὰ τὴν ἄγνοιαν τὴν οὖσαν ἐν αὐτοῖς, By the ignorance that is in them.] This seems to refer to their ignorance of the nature, the attributes, and the providence of God, and of a future state of happiness and misery.

[16] The blindness of their hearts,] Here mentioned, they had contracted by wicked habits and customs, the frequency of vile examples, and by those corrupt principles which made them insensible of their impurity and lasciviousness; for they committed whoredom and adultery, saith Origen,* Διδάσκοντες μὴ πάντως παρὰ τὸ καθῆκον τοῦτο γίνεσθαι, teaching that in these things they did nothing contrary to good manners.

[17] Ver. 19. Ἐν πλεονεξίᾳ, With greediness.] Hoc totum fecerunt in avaritia, dum nunquam luxuriando saturantur, nec eorum terminum habet voluptas. (Hieronymus in locum.)

[18] Ver. 22. Τὸν παλαιὸν ἄνθρωπον, The old man] Signifies those evil habits they so long practised in the state of heathenism; the new man, that Divine life, that life of righteousness and holiness, which Christianity requires: and it is called holiness of truth, or inward holiness, in opposition to the outward and ceremonial holiness of the Jews.

[19] Ver. 25. Τὸ ψεῦδος, Lying.] Which the heathen philosophers thought lawful, when it was good or profitable for them; as owning that rule of Menander, Κρεῖττον δὲ ἑλέσθαι ψεῦδος, ἢ ἀληθὲς κακόν, A lie is better than a hurtful truth: and that of Proclus, Τὸ γὰρ ἀγαθὸν κρεῖττόν ἐστι τῆς ἀληθείας, Good is better than truth: and that of Darius in Herodotus,† Ἔνθα γάρ τι δεῖ καὶ ψεῦδος λέγεσθαι, λεγέσθω, When a lie will profit, let it be used: and that of Plato,‡ He may lie, who knows how to do it, ἐν δέοντι καιρῷ, in a fit season: for there is nothing decorous in truth (saith Maximus Tyrius§) but when it is profitable: yea, sometimes, saith he, καὶ ψεῦδος ὤνησεν ἀνθρώπους, καὶ τ' ἀληθὲς ἔβλαψεν, truth hurts, and a lie profits men. And to countenance this practice, both Plato‖ and the stoics¶ seem to have framed a Jesuitical distinction between lying in words, and with assent to an untruth, which they called lying in the soul: the first they allowed to an enemy in prospect of advantage; and for many other dispensations of this life: that is, their wise man may tell a lie craftily, and for gain; but he must not embrace a falsehood through ignorance, or assent to an untruth.

sin not.] These words, though spoken imperatively, are not a command to be angry, but a caution to avoid sinful anger; as when the prophet saith to Nineveh, Fortify thy strong holds, the sword shall cut thee off, Nah. iii. 14. i. e. though thou dost fortify them, it shall do so. And the son of Sirach, Cocker thy child, and he shall make thee afraid, xxx. 9. i. e. this will be the issue of it. So Isa. viii. 9, 10.

[21] Ὁ Ἥλιος μὴ ἐπιδυέτω, Let not the sun go down upon thy wrath.] This precept, saith Plutarch,* the scholars of Pythagoras observed, who, when they had been angry, and reproached one another, πρὶν ἢ τὸν ἥλιον δῦναι, &c. before the sun went down, they shook hands, and embraced one another. This must the Christian do, before he offers up to God his evening sacrifice, that so he may lift up to God pure hands without wrath. (1 Tim. ii. 8.)

[22] Ver. 27.] Let a man be always careful that he be not angry, say the Jews;† for whoso is angry, "omnes species gehennæ ei dominantur," is subject to the dominion of the infernal fiends.

[23] Ver. 28. Ὁ κλέπτων, Let him that stole, &c.] This exhortation was needful, because in many nations it was not counted a sin to steal, saith Sextus Empyricus:‡ nor were they much ashamed at it, when it was objected to them, saith Bardesanes.§

[24] Ἵνα ἔχῃ μεταδιδόναι, That he may have to give.] This charity the primitive Christians expected even from them that laboured with their own hands. So Hermas‖ saith, It is good to give liberally to all that are in need, out of the labour of our own hands.

Ver. 29. Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good for edification.] Severe here are the words of St. Jerome; "Quotiens loquimur aut non in tempore, aut opportuno loco, aut non, ut convenit audientibus, totiens sermo malus procedit de ore nostro ad destructionem eorum qui audiunt; consideremus itaque quid loquimur, quia pro omni verbo otioso reddituri sumus rationem in die judicii, et etiamsi non lædamus, non tamen edificemus, mali verbi nobis luenda sit pœna." To qualify the rigid severity of these words, see the note on Matt. xii. 36. See the reading of this and the thirty-second verse vindicated, Examen Millii ibid.

[25] Ἵνα δῷ χάριν, That it may minister grace.] That is, saith Theodoret, that it may be acceptable to as well as good for the hearers: see the note on Colos. iii. 16.

[26] Ver. 30. Καὶ μὴ λυπεῖτε, And grieve not the Holy Spirit.] The Holy Spirit being a Divine person, it is certain that he cannot properly be grieved or vexed as we are. We therefore must remove from this expression, when it is applied to him, all turbulent motions, all real pain, disquiet, discontent, and look upon it as spoken ἀνθρωποπαθῶς, i. e. so as to intimate we do that to him, which, when it is done to men, creates grief to them. As (1.) when we refuse to hearken to his counsels, rebel against his government, and do that which is opposite to his holy nature. (2.) He is said to be grieved, by a metonymy of the effect, when he acts so towards us, as men are wont to do when they are grieved by us, and displeased at us, withdrawing their wonted kindness, flying our company, and abandoning us to our enemies.

CHAP. V.

1. BE ye therefore followers of (this love of) God, as (becomes his) dear children;

2. And walk in love, as Christ also (hath given an example who) hath loved us, and hath given himself for us [1] an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour.

3. But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness (inordinate desire), let it not be once named among you, (that you may walk) [2] as becometh saints.

4. Neither (Gr. καὶ, and let not) [3] filthiness, nor (and) foolish talking, nor jesting, which are (things) not convenient (to your calling, be used among you): but rather (let your employment be that of) giving of thanks.

5. For this ye know, that no whoremonger, or unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God (the Father).

6. [4] Let no man deceive you with vain words (as if these things might be consistent with the favour of God): for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience.

7. Be not ye therefore partakers with them (in those sins).

8. For ye were [5] sometimes (children of) darkness, (being subject to those deeds of darkness, ii. 1—3. iv. 18, 19.) but now are ye (children of the) light (by your faith) in the Lord: walk (therefore) as children of the light:

9. For the fruit [6] of the (Holy) Spirit (by which you are enlightened) is in all goodness, righteousness, and truth, (and so instructs you to avoid these deeds of wickedness.

10. Walk then as children of the light;) proving (δοκιμάζοντες, approving) what is acceptable to the Lord.

11. And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness (committed by the heathens), but [7] rather reprove them.

12. (They being such as deserve to be reproved;) for it is a shame even to speak of those things which are [8] done of them in secret.

13. But all things that are reproved are made manifest by the light (or being discovered by the light are made manifest): for whatsoever doth make (any thing) manifest, is light.

14. Wherefore (to shew that Christians are light, and so obliged to avoid the works of darkness) [9] he (the Lord) saith (to those gentiles who are yet in darkness), Awake thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.

15. See then that ye walk circumspectly (or how exactly you walk), not as fools (running yourselves into unnecessary dangers, by an indiscreet zeal), but as wise (to manage your affairs so as to avoid them by all lawful means).

16. [10] Redeeming the time (i. e. using all prudent means

18. [11] And be not drunk with wine (as the heathens use to be in the festivals of their gods, and especially in their Bacchanalia), [12] wherein is excess (Gr. ἀσωτία, dissoluteness); but be (ye) filled with the (Holy) Spirit, (as Christians use to be in their assemblies. See Prov. xxiii. 30. xx. 1.)

19. Speaking to yourselves [13] in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs (with which the Christians were inspired in their assemblies, 1 Cor. xiv. 15. 26.) singing (them with the mouth), and (also) making melody in your hearts to the Lord;

20. Giving thanks [14] always for all things unto God, and (or, who is) the Father (of us all, iv. 6.) in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;

21. Submitting yourselves one to another (according to the Divine ordinance) in the fear of God, (who is the author of that order.

22. And therefore) wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the (ordinance of the) Lord (the husband of his spouse the church).

23. For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church; and (this) he is (as being) the saviour of the body.

24. Therefore, as the church is subject to Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every (lawful) thing.

25. (And ye) husbands (also, see that you) love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself (up to the death) for it;

26. That he might sanctify (or consecrate and fit it for his service) and cleanse it (Gr. having cleansed it) by the washing of water (i. e. by that baptism which is the laver of regeneration, Tit. iii. 5. and) [15] by the word (of his grace, which is able to sanctify us, Acts xx. 32. John xvii. 17.)

27. That (so) he might present it to himself a glorious church, [16] not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish.

28. So ought men to love their wives [17] as their own bodies, (they two being made one flesh; so that) he that loveth his wife loveth himself.

29. For no man ever yet hated his own flesh; but nourisheth it and cherisheth it, even as (doth) the Lord the church (which is his spouse):

30. For we are members of his body, [18] of his flesh, and of his bones.

31. For this cause (was it said at the production of Eve, and her being given for a meet-help to Adam, Gen. ii. 24. that) shall a man leave his father and mother, [19] and shall cleave to his wife, and they two shall be one flesh.

32. [20] This is a great mystery: but (when I represent it as such) I speak (chiefly of the mystical sense of it) concerning Christ and the church.

33. Nevertheless (on the other account also) let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself; and (let) the wife see that she reverence her husband.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 2. ΠΡΟΣΦΟΡΑΝ καὶ θυσίαν, An offering and oblation.] That the death of Christ is here styled an oblation offered up to God for us, cannot be denied: but Crellius saith, that the apostle speaks not here of an expiatory oblation; because the oblation here mentioned is said to be offered for a sweet-smelling savour, which phrase is scarce ever used concerning expiatory sacrifices, but chiefly of burnt-offerings, which were not of themselves expiatory, and are by Moses distinguished from sacrifices for sin.

But (1.) that sacrifices of a sweet-smelling savour were used to make atonement for, and to expiate the sin of, men, is proved from the sacrifice of Noah: for, whereas in the Greek we read, that when that sacrifice was offered, God smelled ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας, a sacrifice of a sweet savour; in the Hebrew he is said to smell "eth ruach hannica," a savour of rest; that is, which made God's anger to rest, say the Jewish writers. Josephus* informs us, that Noah by this sacrifice entreated that God would now be atoned, and would no more conceive such displeasure against the earth, i. e. the inhabitants of it. And by the Syriac version it is rendered an odour of placability, because, as Vatablus and Munster on the place observe, God then ceased from his anger, and was appeased: so that the first time this phrase is used, it is taken for an expiatory sacrifice, and is designed to appease the wrath of God. The sacrifices which Job offered for his sons and daughters, and for his three friends, were burnt-offerings, as the phrase עלות shews, and yet they were offered, the one to expiate for the sin of his children, (Job i. 5.) the other to appease the wrath of God kindled against his three friends, (xlii. 7.) Moreover, it is evident from Scripture, that this phrase ὀσμὴ εὐωδίας, a sweet savour, is used, not only of burnt-offerings, but of sacrifices for sin: thus, If any people of the land sin through ignorance—when his sin comes to his knowledge, the text saith, he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a female without blemish, περὶ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, a sacrifice for the sin he hath sinned, and the priest shall burn it upon the altar, εἰς ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας, for a sweet savour to the Lord; and the priest shall make atonement for him, and it shall be forgiven him. To this importance of the phrase doth David manifestly allude, when he saith to Saul, If the Lord hath stirred thee up against me, ὀσφρανθείη ἡ θυσία, let him smell an offering. And when this ὀσμὴ εὐωδίας, sacrifice of a sweet-smelling savour is applied to burnt-offerings, they are declared to be favourably accepted, to make atonement for him that offers them. This the son of Sirach seems plainly to say, of their sacrifices of sweet savour in the general, when he speaks thus of Aaron;† He chose him out of all the people to offer sacrifices to the Lord, incense and a sweet savour, for a memorial, to make a reconciliation for his people. Thus of the burnt-offerings in Leviticus it is said, that he that brings them shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt-offering, and it shall be accepted for him to make atonement for him, Lev. i. 4. Now, as the Hebrew doctors* tell us, that this imposition of hands was always joined with confession of sins over the sacrifice, which confession still concluded with a prayer, that the sacrifice might be an expiation for them: so the phrase, It shall be accepted to make atonement for him, Lev. xiv. 20. used here and elsewhere concerning holy things, is as much as is ever said of expiatory sacrifices: nor is it any objection to the contrary, that burnt-offerings are usually distinguished from sin-offerings; the reason of that being this, saith Ainsworth,† that burnt-offerings were for the atonement of general sins, and such as often were unknown to men, whereas for special sins there was appointed a special sacrifice, and sin-offering. This, saith Dr. Outram,‡ was the opinion of the Jews, that burnt-offerings were intended for the expiation of sin. And this, saith Mr. Selden,§ was their practice, to offer these as expiatory sacrifices for strangers.

* Εὐμενῶς οὖν αὐτὸν προσδέχεσθαι τὴν θυσίαν παρεκάλει, καὶ μηδεμίαν ὀργὴν ἔτι τὴν γῆν ἰσοίαν λαβεῖν. Antiq. Jud. lib. i. cap. 4.

† Καὶ εὐωδίαν εἰς μνημόσυνον, ἐξιλάσκεσθαι περὶ τοῦ λαοῦ σου. Eccles. xlv. 16.

[2] Ver. 3. Καθὼς πρέπει ἁγίοις, As becometh saints.] Worthy of observation is the note of St. Jerome here, Ex quo sanctus non potest appellari, quicunque, extra fornicationem, in aliqua immunditia, et avaritia voluptatum, quâ se delectaverit, invenitur.

[3] Ver. 4.] That the words μωρολογία and εὐτραπελία, are to be interpreted to an impure sense, may probably be gathered from the words joined with them, fornication, uncleanness, filthiness, and more probably from the reason rendered for the abandoning them all; viz. That no fornicator, or unclean person, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of God, or of Christ. Μωρολογία is in the rabbinical phrase, נבות פה, turpitudo oris, of which they ‖ proverbially say, בל המנבל פי, quicunque fœdè loquitur, perinde est ac si introduceret porcum in sanctuarium. To commit נבלה, folly in Israel, is to commit whoredom, or adultery: and the word by the Septuagint is sometimes rendered τὸ ἄσχεμον, indecency, sometimes ἀφροσύνη, sometimes μωρία, folly, and sometimes ἀκαθαρσία, filthiness. And the soliciting a woman to fornication by filthy words, is in the Targum expressed thus, חנבל לא "non deturpabis verbum oris," Thou shalt not speak impurely with thy mouth, to cause thy flesh to sin, Eccles. v. 6.

Εὐτραπελία is by Suidas rendered μωρολογία, κουφότης, scurrility, levity; by Phavorinus, βωμολοχία. Now βωμολόχος, is a filthy scurrilous man; and in Aristophanes, βωμολόχοις ἔπεσι χαίρειν, is to be pleased with filthy scurrilous words. Hence Œcumenius and Theophylact reckon them both as ὀχήματα τῆς πορνείας, the forerunners or incentives to fornication.

As for the word πλεονεξία, that it hath sometimes an impure sense, see note on 1 Thess. iv. 6. though being here styled idolatry, it seems more naturally to relate to the love of riches, which renders us most truly guilty of that sin: though it be also true, that he who loveth pleasures more than God is guilty of that sin, and this impurity was a frequent and almost general appendix of idol-worship.

That the Ephesians stood in need of these instructions we learn from Democritus Ephesius,¶ who speaking of the temple of the Ephesian Diana, hath much περὶ τῆς χλιδῆς αὐτῶν, of the softness and luxury of the Ephesians; and from Euacles in his book de Ephesiacis, who saith, ἐν Ἐφέσῳ ἱερὰ ἱδρύσασθαι ἑταίρᾳ Ἀφροδίτῃ, in Ephesus they built temples to Venus, the mistress of the whores; and from Strabo, who informs us, That in their ancient temples there were old images, but in their new σκολιὰ ἔργα, vile works were done, lib. xiv. p. 640.

[4] Ver. 6. Μηδεὶς ἀπατάτω, Let no man deceive you.] Among the heathens, simple fornication was held a thing indifferent; the laws allowed and provided for it in many nations; whence the grave Epictetus counsels his scholars, only to whore, ὡς νόμιμον ἔστι,† according to law: and in all places they connived at it. He that blames young men for their meretricious amours (saith Cicero‡) does what is repugnant to the custom and concessions of our ancestors, for when was not this done? when was it not permitted? This was suitable both to the principles and practices of many of their grave philosophers, especially of the stoics,§ who held it lawful for others to use whores, and for them to get their living by such practices. Hence even in the church of Corinth, some had taught this doctrine. (See note on 1 Cor. vi. 13.)

[5] Ver. 8. Ποτε σκότος, Sometimes darkness.] That the state of the gentile world, both in the Old and the New Testament, is represented by a state of darkness, and that of Christians by a state of light, see note on Rom. xiii. 12.

[6] Ver. 9. Τοῦ πνεύματος, Of the Spirit.] Many Greek copies, and all the Latin and the Syriac, read τοῦ φωτὸς, the fruits of the light, with which you are enlightened; and so doth St. Jerome here, taking no notice of the other reading.

[7] Ver. 11. Ἐλέγχετε.] Reprove them, make them ashamed of them, by bringing them to the light, ἐλέγχειν γὰρ ἀντὶ τοῦ αἰσχύνειν, ἐλέγχω, τὸ κεκρυμμένον ἀτόπημά τινος εἰς φῶς ἄγω. Phavorinus.

[8] Ver. 12. Τὰ κρυφῇ γινόμενα, Done of them in secret.] In their mysteries, which therefore were styled ἀπόῤῥητα μυστήρια, none being permitted to divulge them upon pain of death. Hence even the word μυστήριον hath its name, say grammarians, from μύειν τὸ στόμα, to stop the mouth. The Eleusinia Sacra were performed in the night, agreeably to the deeds of darkness committed in them; so were the Bacchanalia, hence called Nyctelia; and they were both full of detestable iniquity; and upon that account, saith Livy,‖ were banished by the Roman senate out of Rome and Italy: Ἀκόλουθα γὰρ τῷ Διονυσιακῷ πότῳ τὰ ἀφροδίσια, Lust being a consequent on the Bacchanalia, says the scholiast¶ on Aristophanes. Hence is that of Aristippus, ἐν Βακχεύμασιν οὖσ' ἡ σώφρων οὐ διαφθερήσεται, a chaste woman will not be corrupted at the Bacchanalia: and those precepts, that a married woman should abstain†† τοῖς ὀργιασμοῖς καὶ ματρωσμοῖς, from the feasts of Bacchus, and the mother of the gods, because they tended to drunkenness, and the corrupting of chaste women.

[9] Ver. 14. Λέγει, He saith.] Epiphanius* saith these words were spoken by Elias; and Georgius Syncellus,† that they were taken from the apocryphal books of Jeremiah; others think they are cited from Isa. lx. 1. 19. 22.

Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, καὶ ἐπιφαύσει σοι ὁ Χριστὸς, and Christ shall enlighten thee, or shine upon thee: and yet our translation, that Christ shall give thee life, is very justifiable, as giving the true sense of the metaphor: so Psal. xiii. 14. Lighten my eyes, that I sleep not in death, i. e. preserve my life: Prov. xxix. 13. The poor and rich meet together, the Lord enlighteneth both their eyes. (See Job iii. 20. xxxiii. 30.) Mr. Dodwell, citing these words, saith, "Christ shall give thee light, is the same with the immortal light; and this is an address to the dead, who are frequently said to sleep, in the prophetic style of the New Testament; and the light seems to allude to the baptismal illumination of the Spirit, upon owning of the true faith:" but as in this he is singular, and hath not one authority, ancient or modern, agreeing with him in this interpretation, or to the application of it to Christ preaching to the dead in hades, and baptizing them; St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Photius, and Theophylact, among the Greek interpreters, Ambrose, or Hilary the deacon, and St. Jerome among the Latins, all saying positively, that the words are to be understood metaphorically of a sleep, and death in trespasses and sins; so is it also evident, that the words cannot bear this sense: for,

First, If they that sleep, here signifies literally those whose bodies sleep in the grave, the address to them to rise from the dead, must be an address to their bodies to rise from the grave; and so they must be first raised from the dead before Christ gives them light.

Secondly, To sleep, when it is used to signify death, in the New Testament, always relates to the body sleeping in the grave, or in the dust, as John v. 28, 29. 1 Cor. xi. 30. xv. 20. 51. 1 Thess. iv. 14. v. 10. and never to the soul in hades, or to the spirits in prison there: for, as St. Jerome notes on the place, "spiritûs mortem nunquam legimus;" we never read in Scripture of the death of the spirit in the literal sense. And,

Thirdly, The preceding verses plainly shew, that the apostle introduceth these words as a call to the gentiles, sitting in darkness, to awake out of their sleep in sin, their death in trespasses and sins, (ii. 1. 5.) that they might enjoy the light of Christ's gospel: for, saith he, ver. 8. Ye were once darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord; walk as children of the light, and have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them, ver. 11. which you, who are children of the light, and on whom God hath shined to give the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, (2 Cor. iv. 6.) may do; for all that maketh manifest is light, ver. 13. Wherefore, λέγει, the Scripture saith to those gentiles who are yet in darkness, Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light: so again, 1 Thess. v. 5, 6. Ye are the children of the light, and of the day, not of the night, or of darkness; therefore let us not sleep as others do. (See the note on Rom. xiii. 12.) So Clemens Alexandrinus,‡ in his exhortation to the gentiles, saith, ἀφυπνίζει γε τοι, καὶ τοῦ σκότους αὐτοῦ τοὺς πεπλανημένους ἀνίστησιν, He, by his exhortation, raises out of sleep those that erred in and through darkness. See also the reading of the text confirmed, Examen Millii in locum.

[10] Ver. 16. Ἐξαγοραζόμενοι τὸν καιρὸν, Redeeming the time.] Here note,

First, That the times of peril and trouble are styled evil days: in this sense Jacob saith, his days were evil, πονηραὶ ἡμέραι, by reason of the troubles he met with from Laban and his brother Esau, Gen. xlvii. 9. the Psalmist, that the righteous shall not be ashamed, ἐν καιρῷ πονηρῷ, in the evil day, lxxvii. 19. the wise man shall be silent, saith Amos, in that time, for it is, καιρὸς πονηρὸς, an evil time, v. 13. i. e. a time of lamentation, ver. 16. of darkness, ver. 18. and that is by the prophet Micah styled, ὁ καιρὸς πονηρὸς, an evil time, Micah ii. 2. which brought those judgments on them which they could not escape. And in the close of this Epistle, to stand ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ πονηρᾷ, is to stand in the times of fiery trials and severe persecutions, by the instruments of Satan, vi. 13.

Ἐξαγοράζειν τὸν καιρὸν, To redeem the time] Is, by all honest ways and prudent methods, to endeavour to avoid the dangers, and to escape the persecutions, to which these perilous times may render us obnoxious. So when king Nebuchadnezzar had threatened that the Chaldeans and magicians should be cut in pieces, if they declared not his dream, and they still put him off with this answer, Let the king tell the dream, and we will tell him the interpretation: the king replies, Of a truth I know, ὅτι καιρὸν ὑμεῖς ἐξαγοράζετε, that you would gain the time; i. e. you hope by these answers to delay the time of your punishment, and to contrive some way to escape it. So the scholiast upon the place expounds it, καιρὸν ὑμεῖς ἀγοράζετε, τουτέστιν ὑπέρθεσιν ζεράσθε διασκεδάσαι τῇ ἀναβολῇ τοῦ καιροῦ σκωτιοῦντες τὸ παρ' ὑμῶν ζητούμενον, You hunt after delays; seeking, by the protracting of the time, to make me forget what I asked of you: and Theodoret expounds it thus; You prolong the time, τῆς ἐκβάσεως τὸν καιρὸν ἀναμένοντες, hoping for time to escape: so also, Colos. iv. 5. Walk in wisdom towards those that are without, i. e. your heathen governors and magistrates, redeeming the time; i. e. endeavouring, by all Christian prudence, to avoid the calamities they are still ready to bring upon you, answering them with as much wisdom and gentleness of speech as you are able; for walking among wolves, it concerns you to be wise as serpents. And though it may not be so pertinent to this text, yet will it be very profitable to the men of this age to consider the practice of the heathen in this case: for Ælian* informs us of the Lacedemonians, that they were much concerned that men should spend their time well, ταμιεύμενοι πανταχόθεν εἰς ἐπειγόμενα, employing it still upon urgent business, and suffering no man either to be idle, or to employ himself about trifles, ὡς ἂν μὴ πρὸς τὰ ἔξω τῆς ἀρετῆς ἀναλισκόμενος, so that he might employ his whole time in virtuous actions: and Stobæus† saith, that the Lucani, a people of Italy, and the Athenians, punished those that were idle as well as those that were guilty, ἄλλου τινὸς ἀδικήματος, of any other crime. And seeing time is a talent given us by that God in whose hand our lives are, it must be given us for some good end, and must be mispent when it is not employed to such ends.

[11] Ver. 18. Μὴ μεθύσκεσθε οἴνῳ, Be not drunk with wine.] The heathens, who held drunkenness unlawful at other times, thought it a duty at the solemnity of Bacchus, and of other gods. Plato saith, That no man should be allowed to be drunk, but at the solemnities of the god that gave them wine. And when Megillus, the Lacedemonian, had told the Athenians, that he saw their whole cities drunk at the solemnities of Bacchus, and that the inhabitants of Terentum did the same; Marvel not at that (saith the Athenian), for the law with us requires it: and Plutarch* saith, that ὀργιάζοντες ἢ θυσίαις πάροντες, ἢ τελεταῖς, when they celebrated the orgia of Bacchus, or were present at their sacrifices or sacred mysteries, they allowed themselves to be delighted, μέχρι μέθης, even to drunkenness. This was the usual appendix of their sacrifices, they thinking this a duty, saith Athenæus,† in the service of their gods. Hence Aristotle and others say, that drunkenness had its name from the intemperance they used after they had offered sacrifice.

[12] Ἐν ᾧ ἐστιν ἀσωτία, In which is excess.] That ἀσωτία signifies luxury, is proved from the prodigal, of whom it being said, that he lived ἀσώτως, Luke xv. 13. this is interpreted, ver. 30. by devouring his living with harlots; and from Hesychius, who interprets ἀσώτως by the word αἰσχρῶς, filthily. Phavorinus saith, the ἄσωτος is the ἀκόλαστος, ἀσελγὴς, lustful and unchaste person; and hence ἀσώτιον signifies a stew, or brothel-house. Now that this drunkenness ministers to this lasciviousness, as the poets often teach, so the practice and experience of the heathens found it true, their compotation and banquetings seldom concluding without the introduction of lewd women, and their Bacchanalia ending in whoredom and adultery, ἀκόλαστον οἶνος, Prov. xx. 1.

[13] Ver. 19. Ψαλμοῖς καὶ ὕμνοις, In psalms and hymns, &c.] In their Bacchanalia they sung their drunken hymns to Bacchus, saying, Εὐοῖ Σαβοῖ, Εὐοῖ Βακχὲ, and had their Φαλλικὰ ἄσματα. In opposition to which drunken and impure songs, the apostle here exhorts the Christians to sing the psalms of David, or the hymns composed by spiritual men, such as Zacharias and Simeon, or by the afflatus of the Spirit vouchsafed unto them, 1 Cor. xiv. 15. St. Jerome here saith, Canere igitur et psallere, magis animo quàm voce debemus, hoc est, quippe quòd dicitur cantantes, et psallentes in cordibus vestris Domino. Audiant hæc adolescentuli, audiant hi, quibus psallendi in ecclesiâ officium est, Deo non voce sed corde cantandum, nec tragœdorum ad modum guttur et fauces dulci medicamine colliniendas, ut in ecclesiâ theatrales moduli audiantur, et cantica, sed in timore, in opere, in scientiâ Scripturarum; which shews that choristers, or choir-men, had then obtained an office in the church, though he seems not much to approve them.

[14] Ver. 20. Πάντοτε, Always.] See note on 1 Thess. v. 17. ὑπὲρ πάντων, for all things; for his sparing mercies, Psal. ciii. 3, 4. his preventing mercies, Eph. i. 4. Tit. i. 2. his distinguishing and peculiar mercies, Heb. ii. 16. for his common mercies and benefits bestowed daily upon us, as well as his extraordinary favours; for past mercies to be celebrated by annual festivals, Exod. xii. 14. 17. 24. Lev. xxiii. 21. for the mercies we hope for, 1 Pet. i. 3, 4. for adverse as well as prosperous events, blessing him who doth thus give us warning, Psal. xvi. 17. but chiefly for spiritual blessings.

[15] Ver. 26. Ἐν ῥήματι, By the word.] That is, saith Chrysostom, by the words used in the form of baptism; to wit, I baptize thee in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

[16] Ver. 27. Μὴ ἔχουσαν σπίλον, ἢ ῥυτίδα, Not having spot or wrinkle.] This seems to refer to the accuracy of the Jewish baptism, who thought not the person well baptized, if there were any wrinkle which kept the flesh from the water, or any spot or dirt which was not thoroughly washed by it. And thus the church is cleansed at present from the guilt of sin by the blood of Christ, 1 John i. 7. 2 Cor. xi. 2. Colos. i. 22.

[17] Ver. 28. Ὡς ἑαυτῶν σώματα, As their own bodies.] The Jews say, He that loveth his wife as his own body, and honoureth her more than his own body, of him the Scripture saith, Peace shall be in his tabernacle, and he shall visit his tabernacle, and shall not sin. (Talmud. Sanh. fol. 76. 2.)

[18] Ver. 30. Ἐκ τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐκ τῶν ὀστέων αὐτοῦ, Of his flesh, and of his bones.] This phrase being not only used to express an intimate relation, Gen. xxix. 14. Judg. ix. 2. but being the very words which Adam used concerning Eve, made out of his rib, Gen. ii. 23. shews, that the apostle had his eye upon the mystical sense of the production of the woman from the man, of which the Jews speak.

[19] Ver. 31. Καὶ προσκολληθήσεται πρὸς τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ.] Jerome being an enemy to wedlock, insinuates that these words are an addition to the text; but the contrary is evident, they being found in all versions, all the Greek scholiasts, in the Codex Alex. and Hilary D.

[20] Ver. 32. Τὸ μυστήριον τοῦτο μέγα ἐστὶν, This is a great mystery.] He doth not say as Mr. Clerc interprets the words, But I speak concerning the love of Christ to his church; nor was that any mystery at all, as being long ago revealed, and a thing known to all Christians. But this was indeed a mystery, till the apostle here revealed it to the Ephesians, that, as the learned Dr. Allix* saith, The first match between Adam and Eve, was a type of that between Christ and his church; and in this, saith he, the apostle followed the Jewish nations; for the Jews say,† according to Voisin, " Sod Adam hu sod Messiah," The mystery of Adam is the mystery of Messiah, who is the bridegroom of the church. These two great persons therefore confirm the observation of Munster, that the creation of the woman from the rib of the man, was made by the Jews to signify the marriage of the celestial man, who is blessed, or of the Messiah, with the church; whence the apostle applies the very words which Adam said concerning Eve his spouse, to those Christians, who are the spouse of Christ, saying, we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones, ver. 30. For the fuller explication of these words, note from the bishop of Ely,‡ " That the profoundest of the Hebrew divines, whom they now call cabalists, having such a notion as this among them, that sensible things are but an imitation of things above, conceived from thence, that there was an original pattern of love and union, which is between a man and his wife in this world; this being expressed by the kindness of Tipheret and Malcuth, which are the names they give to the invisible bridegroom and bride in the upper world; and this Tipheret, or the great Adam, in opposition to the terrestrial and little Adam here below; as Malcuth (i. e. the kingdom) they call also by the name of "cheneseth Israel," the congregation of Israel, who is united, say they, to the celestial Adam, as Eve was to the terrestrial. So that, in sum, they seem to say the same that the apostle doth, when he tells us, that marriage is a great mystery; but he speaks concerning Christ and his church: for the marriage of Tipheret and Malcuth, or cheneseth Israel, is the marriage of Christ the Lord from heaven, with his spouse the church, which is the conjunction of Adam and Eve, and of all other men and women descended from them." Origen* seems to have had some notice of the relation this passage had to Adam and Eve, when he speaks thus, If any man deride us for using the example of Adam and Eve, in these words, and Adam knew his wife, when we treat of the knowledge of God, let him consider these words, This is a great mystery. Tertullian frequently alludes to the same thing, saying, this is a great sacrament, "Carnaliter in Adam, spiritualiter in Christo, propter spirituales nuptias Christi et ecclesiæ;" carnally in Adam, spiritually in Christ, by reason of the spiritual marriage betwixt him and his church. (Exhort. ad Castitat. lib. v. p. 521. 6. Serve them therefore) not with eye-service (and whilst they behold you), as men-pleasers (use to do), but as (becomes) the servants of Christ, (in this relation) doing the will of God (who requires this obedience to them, 1 Pet. ii. 18—20.) from the heart;

7. With good-will doing (them) service, as (considering you do it) to the Lord (himself), and not to men (only):

8. (And) knowing that whatever good any man doeth, (out of obedience to the Lord, a reward of) the same he shall receive [6] of the Lord, whether he be (a) bond (man) or free.

9. And, ye masters, do the same things to them (shew the like good-will to and concern for them), forbearing threatenings (Gr. ἀνιέντες, remitting oft the evils which you threaten to them): [7] knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons (or conditions) with him.

10. Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might.

11. (And to this end) put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand (your ground) against [8] the wiles of the devil.

12. For we wrestle not (only) against flesh and blood, (i. e. men who are compounded of them, see note on Gal. i. 16.) but (also) against (evil) principalities, and against powers, (such as Christ triumphed over, Colos. ii. 15.) against the rulers of the darkness of this world, (i. e. those evil spirits which still rule in those heathen nations which are yet in darkness, v. 8. 1 Thess. v. 5. see note on Rom. xiii. 12.) and against spiritual wickednesses in high places, (i. e. against those evil spirits which have their stations in the regions of the air: see note on ii. 2.)

13. Wherefore (I again exhort you to) take unto you [9] the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand (these dangerous enemies) in the evil day (of trial, persecution, and temptation), and having done all, to stand (firm against them).

14. Stand therefore, having your loins girt about [10] with truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness;

15. [11] And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;

16. Above all (the rest), taking [12] the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked (one).

17. And take the [13] helmet of salvation, (for a helmet the hope of salvation, 1 Thess. v. 8.) and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, (by hiding which in your hearts you will be preserved from sin, Psal. cxix. 11.)

18. Praying always (see 1 Thess. v. 17.) with all prayer and supplication, (1 Tim. ii. 1.) in the Spirit, (see note on 1 Cor. xiv. 6.) and watching thereunto with all perseverance and (with) supplication, (not for yourselves only, but) for all saints (your charity to others being a means to procure God's favour to yourselves);

19. And for me (in particular), [14] that (a door of) utterance may be given to me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel,

20. For which I am an ambassador in bonds; that therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak.

21. But (and) that ye also may know my affairs, and how I do (at Rome), Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in (the things of) the Lord, shall make known to you all things:

22. Whom I have sent to you for the same purpose, that ye might know our affairs, and that he might comfort your hearts.

* Com. in Joh. p. 264.

23. Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

24. Grace be with all them that love the Lord Jesus Christ [15] in sincerity. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἐν Κυρίῳ, In the Lord.] That is, say Œcumenius and Theophylact, as far as their commandments are consistent with the will of God.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἐν ἐπαγγελίᾳ, With promise.] i. e. A special promise; for that which is annexed to the second commandment, is rather a general assertion than a special promise.

[3] Ver. 3.] The apostle doth not add these words, Which the Lord giveth thee; because they particularly belonged to the Israelites, who were to be excluded from their own land, and he would give them no ground to think they should continue in it. Note also hence, that the gospel hath its temporal promises, as well as spiritual, Matt. vi. 33. 1 Tim. iv. 8. 1 Pet. iii. 10—12. That this promise did not at all concern the Ephesians, is Mr. Clerc's mistake; for God is not the God of the Jews only, but also of the gentiles, and will reward moral duties performed by them as well as by the Jews.

[4] Ver. 4. Provoke not your children to anger.] By disinheriting them, by laying heavy burdens upon them, and using them rather as slaves than sons, but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. For it is not, saith Aristides, a thing of a small consideration, what principles are put into them in their youth; but it is, τὸ πᾶν, the foundation of all they do hereafter. And if lovers of horses, birds, and dogs, are careful of their education; is it not just (saith St. Chrysostom) that Christians should be more careful of the education of their children? especially if they consider, that upon this education depends much their eternal state; and that they will contract the guilt of their eternal ruin, who neglect this duty.

[5] Ἐντρέφετε, Bring them up in the nurture.] This, saith Œcumenius, is the way to make them obedient; and if you furnish them with spirituals, temporal things will follow: Make them read the Scriptures (saith Theophylact), which is the duty of all Christians; for is it not a shame to instruct them in heathen authors, whence they may learn bad things, and not to instruct them in the oracles of God?

[6] Ver. 8. The same shall he receive of the Lord.] So that though he be not rewarded for the good he doth by his earthly and unbelieving master, he will, most certainly, be recompensed by his Lord Christ.

[7] Ver. 9. Εἰδότες, Knowing.] (1.) That you with respect to God are servants, and that as you mete to your servants, he will mete to you. (2.) That his compassion and readiness to forgive your trespasses, should make you also ready to remit the trespasses of your servants. (3.) That the relation of servants doth not make God less ready to shew kindness to them, and own them as his children, and therefore should not induce us to despise and deal severely with them.

[8] Ver. 11. Τὰς μεθοδείας, The wiles.] That is, saith Phavorinus, ἐπιβουλὰς, ἐνέδρας, δόλους, the deceits he puts upon us, the snares he lays for us, the machinations he contrives against us.

[9] Ver. 13. Τὴν πανοπλίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ, The whole armour of God,] Here, and ver. 10, 11. which makes us strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, consists of such things as either are in us, as truth, faith, righteousness, peace, the hopes of salvation; or are to be used by us, as prayer, and attendance on the word of God; and not in any immediate influx of the power of God without the use of these. Yea, this is here styled, the whole armour of God, nothing more being requisite to enable us to come off victors in this combat; so that in these things doth consist the power of his might; or by these it is certainly to be obtained.

That the evil day is the day of trial and persecution, see note on v. 16.

[10] Ver. 14. Ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, With truth.] That the gospel is throughout the Epistles emphatically styled the truth, see note on Rom. ii. 8. And this seems to be the truth here mentioned, viz. a full persuasion of the truth of that religion we profess, or that steadfastness in the faith, by which we are enabled to resist the roaring lion. (1 Pet. v. 8, 9. see 1 Thess. iii. 5. James i. 6.) The breast-plate of righteousness is an exact observance of our duty to God, and a righteous deportment towards men, in all the offices of justice, truth, and charity, which will beget in us that good conscience which will support us in the day of temptation, and procure honour and esteem, love and compassion, from men. The phrase is taken from Isaiah lix. 18.

[11] Ver. 15. Ὑποδησάμενοι τοὺς πόδας, And your feet shod, &c.] For explication of this phrase observe, first, that shoes were anciently a part of military armour; for in the story of Goliath there is mention of his greaves of brass upon his legs, (1 Sam. xvii. 6.) and in the story of the Trojan wars, χαλκοκνημίδες Ἀχαιοὶ, the Grecians which were shod with greaves of brass, are the armed Grecians. Note, secondly, that to be shod doth signify our being ready for the work we go about: thus the Israelites were commanded to eat the passover shod, i. e. ready for their journey out of Egypt; and the apostles are required to be shod with sandals, that they might be ready to go whether their Master should be pleased to send them. (Mark vi. 8.) The gospel of peace is either that gospel which proclaims peace with God, through faith in Christ, or which lays upon us the highest obligations to live peaceably with all men: so that the meaning of these words seems to be this, That ye may be ready for the combat, be ye shod with the gospel of peace, i. e. endeavour after that peaceable and quiet mind the gospel calls for; be not easily provoked or prone to quarrel; but shew all gentleness and long-suffering to all men, and this will as certainly preserve you from many great temptations and persecutions, as did those shoes of brass the soldiers, from those sharp sticks and gall-traps, which were wont to be laid privily in the ways, to obstruct the marching of the enemy.

[12] Ver. 16. Τὸν θυρεὸν τῆς πίστεως, The shield of faith.] That faith which is the confident expectation of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen; (Heb. xi. 1.) for this is the victory over the world, even our faith. (1 John v. 5.)

[13] Ver. 17. Τὴν περικεφαλαίαν τοῦ σωτηρίου, The helmet of salvation.] i. e. We must be well assured, that if we fight the good fight of faith, there will be laid up for us an immortal crown of glory, which God the righteous judge will give us: (2 Tim. iv. 8.) that he who cannot lie, hath promised to him that overcometh, to eat of the tree of life, (Rev. ii. 7.) to taste the hidden manna, (ver. 17.) to be a pillar in the new Jerusalem: (Rev. iii. 12.) that you strive and fight for an incorruptible crown that fadeth not away: (1 Cor. ix. 25.) and this hope will be as a helmet to defend your heads from all the strokes of a temptation. This in Isaiah lix. 17. is περικεφαλαία σωτηρίου, the helmet of salvation upon the head.

[14] Ver. 19. Λόγος ἐν ἀνοίξει στόματος, That utterance may be given to me.] A door of utterance, Colos. iv. 6. This is a rabbinical phrase,* פתחון פה, the opening of the mouth signifying an occasion of speaking, and confidence in speaking: so that the apostle here requests their prayers, that he, being loosed from his bonds, may have again an opportunity of preaching the gospel, and also that he may do it publicly and plainly, μετὰ παῤῥησίας, with due confidence and boldness.

[15] Ver. 24. Ἐν ἀφθαρσίᾳ, In sincerity.] i. e. Not only with a sincere love, uncorrupted by the opposite love of any lust forbidden by him; but with a constant and perpetual love, which no temptation can abate, or cause to cease, or to wax cold. Or, as Mr. L., without the mixture of those legal observations, by which the enemy, saith St. Paul, φθαρῇ, corrupts the minds of Christians from the simplicity of the gospel. (2 Cor. xi. 3. See the note on i. 2.)

EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

IT is the observation of Theodoret, Œcumenius, and others, that Philippi was a city of Macedonia, under the metropolis of Thessalonica, which is confirmed, note on the first verse.

This Epistle is by the same Greek scholiasts said to be written by St. Paul when he was in bonds at Rome. That he has been in bonds some time before, we may gather from i. 12. 14. from the Philippians sending Epaphroditus to him with relief, and his return to them with this Epistle, after a dangerous sickness, and from his hopes to come quickly to them, ii. 24. and therefore he is supposed, by the most exact chronologers, to have writ this Epistle in the eighth year of Nero, and the sixty-second of our Lord.

That the apostle here warns them against the gnostics, or that these gnostics joined with the Judaizing Christians to persuade the gentiles to Judaize, I have not read in any of the ancients; but the Greek scholiasts agree in this, that he warns against † τὴν ἐξαπατὴν τῶν ἐξ Ἰουδαίων μὲν πεπιστευκότων, the deceit of the believing Jews, who endeavoured to corrupt them, προφάσει τῆς σκιᾶς τοῦ νόμου, καὶ περιτομῆς, by imposing on them circumcision, and the shadows of the law, and saying, that without these they could not be justified, (iii. 18, 19.) And this is abundantly confirmed from the whole third chapter, where the apostle declares, he judges it for their safety to write to them to beware of dogs, of evil-workers, and of the concision, and his styling them the enemies of the cross of Christ, ver. 18. (See note on iii. 2, 3. 15, 16.)

And, lastly, it is noted by Theodoret, and others of the fathers, that Epaphroditus, mentioned in this Epistle as their messenger, (ii. 15. and iv. 18.) was also their *bishop, ὃς τῶν ψυχῶν αὐτῶν ἐπιστεύθη ἐπιμέλειαν, or the person to whom the care of their souls had been committed; though, I confess, the words τὸν ἀπόστολον ὑμῶν, your apostle, do not prove it.

CHAP. I.

1. [1] PAUL and Timotheus, the servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at (Gr. in) Philippi, [2] with the bishops and deacons (there:

2. I wish) grace to you, and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3. (And) I (Paul) thank my God upon every remembrance of you (in my prayers),

4. Always in every prayer of mine for you all making request with joy,

5. (Which joy I have) for your [3] fellowship in the gospel from the first day until now (i. e. for your continuance in the faith and the profession of the gospel);

6. [4] Being confident of this very thing, that he who hath begun a good work (the good work of faith) in (or among) you will perform it to the day of Jesus Christ:

7. Even as it is meet for me to think this of you all, (Gr. τοῦτο φρονεῖν, to have this care for you all, which I shew in my prayers, and my continual remembrance of you, ver. 4.) [5] because I have you in my heart (or you have me in your heart); inasmuch as in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, you all are partakers of my grace; (Gr. as those who are all my copartners of grace in my bonds, &c.

* Buxt. Lex. Talm. p. 1872.

† Theod. Chrys. Theoph.

* Ibid.

8. And of this my care for you I can call God to witness:) for God is my record, how greatly I long after you in the bowels of Jesus Christ (or the most passionate degree of Christian love).

9. And this I pray (for you), that your love abound yet more and more in knowledge and all [6] judgment;

10. That ye may approve (the) things that are excellent; [7] that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ;

11. [8] Being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are (taught) by Jesus Christ, to the glory and praise of God.

12. But (to proceed to my own affairs, about which you have been so solicitous, ver. 7.) I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things which have happened to me (through the malice of my adversaries) have fallen out rather to the furtherance (than the hinderance) of the gospel;

13. So that my bonds in (and for the cause of) Christ are manifest in the palace, and in all other places (i. e. it is manifest not only in the palace, but throughout all Rome, that I am in bonds for the faith of Christ);

14. [9] And many of the brethren of the Lord, waxing confident by my (patience and courage in my) bonds, are (become) much more bold to speak the word (of God) without fear.

15. Some indeed (there are who) preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good-will (and kind affection to me and to the gospel):

16. The one (party) preach Christ of contention, not sincerely, (not from love to him, but disaffection towards me,) supposing (by this means) to add affliction to my bonds (or to bring farther tribulation on me now in bonds):

17. But the other (party preach Christ out) of love (to him, and me his servant), knowing that I am set up (or lie in bonds) for the defence of the gospel.

18. What then (shall this afflict me? No, since) notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Christ is (still) preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.

19. For I know that this shall (be so far from accomplishing their end of adding tribulation to my bonds, that it shall) turn to my salvation (i. e. my deliverance) through your prayers (for me), and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, (enabling me to plead so as shall tend to my enlargement; ver. 25.)

20. According to my earnest expectation and my hope, that (through the assistance of the spirit of courage which God hath promised and given to us, 2 Tim. i. 7.) in nothing I shall be ashamed, but (that) with all boldness, as always (hitherto), so now also [10] Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by (my) life (now), or by (my) death (hereafter).

21. For (the motive) to me to live is (the service of) Christ, and to die (for him) is (my greatest) gain.

22. But if (it happen that) I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour (Gr. is worth my labour): yet what I shall choose [11] I know not (i. e. were it left to my choice, I should be in a strait which of the two conditions to choose).

23. For I am in a strait between (these) two, having a desire [12] to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better (for me than continuing here, were I only to respect my own interest):

24. Nevertheless (for me) to abide in the flesh is more needful for you.

25. And having this confidence (that you will receive this advantage by my abiding in the flesh), I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance (in) and joy of faith;

26. That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ by (or through) my coming to you again.

27. Only let (this be your care, that) your conversation be as becometh the gospel of Christ: that whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear (a comfortable account) of your affairs, that you stand fast [13] in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel;

28. And (being) in nothing terrified by (the threats and persecutions of) your adversaries: which is to them an evident token of (your) perdition (viz. that you are an obstinate people, bent on your own ruin), but to you (it is a token) of salvation, and that of God, (it being righteous with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you, but to you rest, 2 Thess. i. 5.)

29. For [14] unto you it is given (by God as an especial favour) in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for his sake;

30. Having the same conflict (with the enemies of the faith) which you saw in me (when I was among you, Acts xvi. 23. 1 Thess. ii. 2.) and now hear to be in me, (ver. 16.)

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1.] NOTE, that Timothy is here joined with Paul in the salutation, not in the writing this Epistle. (See ver. 3.)

[2] Σὺν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις, With the bishops and deacons.] Various are the expositions of these words, and great are the contentions about the true import of them. For,

1. Some, with the Pseud-Ambrosius, interpret these words thus; Paul and Timothy, the servants of Jesus Christ, with the bishops and deacons that are with us, to the saints in Philippi. But as none of the Greek fathers thought fit to take any notice of this strained exposition, so may the harshness of it appear by comparing it with the like prefaces to some of the other Epistles; v. gr. 1 Cor. i. 1, 2. Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the church of God that is at Corinth, σὺν πᾶσι τοῖς ἐπικαλουμένοις τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Κυρίου, with all that call upon the name of the Lord; 2 Cor. i. 1. Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the church of God that is at Corinth, σὺν τοῖς ἐν ὅλῃ τῇ Ἀχαΐᾳ, with all the saints that are in all Achaia; are places exactly parallel to these words, Paul and Timothy, the servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints that are in Philippi, with the bishops and deacons: and yet can any man think, that Paul the apostle, with all that call upon the name of the Lord Christ, or with all the saints that were in all Achaia, writ to the church of Corinth, which was part of that Achaia? (2.) When the apostle takes in those that were with him as copartners in writing to another church, he doth it thus, Paul an apostle, καὶ οἱ σὺν ἐμοὶ πάντες ἀδελφοὶ, and all the brethren that are with me, write to the churches of Galatia,

Gal. i. 1. 3. Had he then intended to greet the Philippians in the like manner, he would have writ in the like style, Paul and Timothy, καὶ οἱ σὺν ἐμοὶ ἐπίσκοποι καὶ διάκονοι, and the bishops and deacons that are with me, to the church in Philippi.

The learned Dr. Hammond saith, that Philippi was a metropolis, which had many bishops under it, on which account it is styled, πρώτη τῆς μερίδος τῆς Μακεδονίας πόλις, the chief city of that part of Macedonia, Acts xvi. 12. and by Photius, τῆς Μακεδόνων ἐπαρχίας μητρόπολις, the metropolis of the province of the Macedonians. And by this (saith he) it appears, that in Philippi there might be more bishops than one, even as many as there were cities under that metropolis. But this solution was,

First, Unknown to the ancient fathers, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and St. Jerome, who all contend that bishops here must signify presbyters, because there could not be more bishops than one, properly so called, in one city; whereas had they known this to have been a metropolis, they must have known that this had been a satisfactory answer to that objection.

Secondly, They tell us, that Philippi was then under the metropolis of Thessalonica, which was the metropolis of all Macedonia. Thus Chrysostom on these words, iv. 16. When I was in Thessalonica ye ministered to my necessity, &c. observes, this was a great encomium of the Philippians, that ἐν μητροπόλει καθήμενος παρὰ τῆς μικρᾶς ἐτρέφετο πόλεως, being in the metropolis, he was nourished by a little city. Thus Theodoret,* in his preface to this Epistle, saith, Φιλιππήσιοι τῆς Μακεδονίας ἦσαν ὑπὸ μητρόπολιν τότε Θεσσαλονίκην, the Philippians were inhabitants of Macedonia, under the metropolis of Thessalonica: and Theophylact, that they were, ὑπὸ μητρόπολιν τότε Θεσσαλονίκην τελοῦντες, then, when the apostle writ this to them, under the metropolis of Thessalonica. That Thessalonica was then the metropolis of Macedonia, is plain from Antipater the Thessalonian poet, who flourished in the time of Augustus Cæsar, and calleth Thessalonica† the mother of all Macedonia. It is called also the metropolis of Macedonia by Socrates: and in the ecclesiastical sense it is so called by Ætius,‡ the bishop thereof, in the council of Sardica: and so say all the Notitiæ Antiquæ, at the end of Carolus Paulus, who saith, that Philippi was no metropolis for the first six centuries; but after that Macedonia was divided into Prima and Secunda, it came to have the honorary title of the metropolitan city, and therefore might be styled so by Photius, who lived in the ninth century: but by St. Luke it is not styled the first city, τῆς ἐπαρχίας, of the province; but τῆς μερίδος, of that part of Macedonia which they that came from Thrace thither touched at; as appears by Dyon's§ description of it, and chiefly from Diodorus Siculus,‖ who saith, ἡ δὲ πόλις αὐτὴ κειμένη κατὰ τῆς Θράκης, that this city, being taken by Philip, was very serviceable to him, as lying near Thrace, and other places very conveniently.

Thirdly, The Greek and Latin fathers do with one consent declare, that τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους οὕτως ἐκάλεσε, the apostle here calls their presbyters their bishops. So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, among the Greeks, and among the Latins, St. Jerome,* Pseud-Ambrosius,† Pelagius, and Primasius; and that not only for the aforementioned reason, that there could be but one bishop properly so called in one city; but for another alleged by them all, that τέως ἐκοινώνουν τοῖς ὀνόμασι, then the names were common to both orders, the bishops being called presbyters, and the presbyters bishops. And this, saith Theodoret, is manifest in this place, because he adds here deacons to the bishops, making no mention of their presbyters.‡ The learned Dr. Pearson therefore seems δουλεύειν τῇ ὑποθέσει, too much to favour his own hypothesis, when, against all these testimonies both of Greek and Latin fathers, he saith, It is not yet proved, that there was then at Philippi any presbyters of the second order; for surely this is proved from the authority of all these fathers. He therefore saith, (1.) That before the converted Jews and gentiles did unite into one church, there were two bishops of the same church. This he proves from those words of Epiphanius,§ Alexandria never had two bishops at a time, ὡς αἱ ἄλλαι ἐκκλησίαι, as other churches had: but if I am not much mistaken, this relates not to the primitive and apostolic time, but to the times of the Meletians, who founded bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and by them ἐκκλησίας ἰδίας, private churches, calling them churches of the martyrs; whereas those of Peter's party called theirs catholic churches. But though this schism continued long, and even in the time of Theodoret prevailed in Egypt, and, as Danæus notes, infected almost all Christian regions; yet, saith Epiphanius, it never so prevailed in Alexandria as in other churches, there being never there two bishops, one of the catholic, another of the Meletian churches, as there were in many other places: and if this be the true import of these words, it is easy to discern how impertinent they are to the true exposition of this place. He adds also from the same Epiphanius, that Paul and Peter were both apostles and bishops of Rome, as doubtless they also were at Antioch, and wherever they met; but they were only bishops there, because apostles there, one of the Jews, the other of the gentiles, and in this they had no successors. St. Jerome‖ indeed takes notice of this evasion, but then he lays the censure of contentious persons upon them that made it.

The same learned bishop adds, That were it true, that there were but one bishop in one city, it would not follow, that the word bishops here could not be taken in the proper sense, because the apostle doth not here call them bishops of the church or city of Philippi, but only saith, they were then at Philippi; he might write therefore to them whom he knew to be then at Philippi, though they were bishops of other churches. But, (1.) as none of the ancients have ever said one word of any other bishops than those met at Philippi, so the words seem not well consistent with this evasion; for writing τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Φιλίπποις, he doubtless writes to the saints dwelling in Philippi; writing therefore to them with the bishops and deacons, he must be supposed to write also to the bishops and deacons dwelling at Philippi.

I therefore acquiesce in the opinion of Theodoret, who says, that St. Paul then writ to the presbyters and deacons of that city, because their bishop Epaphroditus, whom he styles his brother and companion in labour, and fellow-soldier, and their apostle, was then with him at Rome, ii. 25. and that he therefore mentions them, because they were so instrumental in sending the contributions to him, mentioned iv. 15.

[3] Ver. 5. Κοινωνίᾳ.] That fellowship; for that κοινωνία here doth not signify their liberality towards the propagation of the gospel, but their communion with the apostles in the gospel, as it doth, 1 John i. 3. 7. I gather, (1.) from the phrase ἔργον ἀγαθὸν, which is emphatically put to signify τὸ ἔργον πίστεως, the work of faith; as when we are said, καθ' ὑπομονὴν ἔργου ἀγαθοῦ, by patient continuance in the good work to seek for glory, Rom. ii. 7. that being the work of God that we should believe in his Son, John vi. 29. (2.) From the phrase, He that hath begun the good work in you, will perform it to the day of the Lord Jesus Christ, that being still used by the apostle to testify his hopes, that they would continue steadfast in faith and obedience, till they received their crown, 1 Cor. i. 8. 1 Thess. iii. 13. v. 23.

[4] Ver. 6. Πεποιθὼς αὐτὸ τοῦτο, Being confident, &c.] This the apostle speaks, not out of any opinion of the election of all the Philippians to eternal life, or of the certainty of their perseverance to the end by virtue of that election; for then why doth he exhort them to work out their salvation with fear and trembling, ii. 12. to stand fast in the Lord, iv. 1. and to retain the word of life, that he might have joy in the day of Christ, that he had not run in vain, or laboured in vain among them? (ii. 16.) He speaks this therefore from a judgment of charity, ἀπὸ τῶν παρελθόντων καὶ περὶ τῶν μελλόντων στοχαζόμενος, conjecturing, saith Theophylact, from what was past, what they would be for the future; because, saith he, it seems just or fit for me to conceive this good hope of you, by reason of that great affection you retain to me, and your patience in enduring the like afflictions: now he that only gives these reasons of his confidence, gives us just reasons to conceive, he knew nothing of the necessity of their perseverance by virtue of any absolute election to salvation.

[5] Ver. 7. i. e. Because you have had your hearts upon me in my bonds, sending Epaphroditus to minister to me in my necessities, (ii. 25.) and contributing of your own substance to me, (iv. 14.) sending once and again to me, whilst I was in bonds for the defence of the faith, (ver. 15, 16.) those things, which, being a sweet savour, a sacrifice acceptable and well-pleasing to God, (ver. 18.) confirm my hope concerning you; especially when I find you yet standing firm under the like afflictions, having the same conflict which you saw in me, when I was among you, (Acts xvi.) and now hear to be in me, (i. 30.)

[6] Ver. 9. Ἐν πάσῃ αἰσθήσει.] The outward senses being the instruments by which we discern and distinguish material objects; the word αἴσθησις, which is here rendered judgment, is from them derived to the mind discerning and passing judgment on spiritual things; and is by Phavorinus styled ἡ νοὸς γεῦσις ἀκριβὴς τῶν διακρινομένων, the exact taste of things that differ, or are to be discerned by the mind: in which sense the word is often used by the LXX. especially in the book of Proverbs, where it is twenty times so used; and hence it bears the like sense in the apostle; and they, who have this exactness of judgment, are said to have αἰσθητήρια, senses exercised to discern betwixt good and evil. (Heb. v. 14.)

[7] Ver. 10. Ἵνα ἦτε εἰλικρινεῖς, καὶ ἀπρόσκοποι.] Εἰλικρινεῖς πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν, ἀπρόσκοποι κατ' ἄνθρωπον, Sincere in their deportment towards God, inoffensive in their behaviour towards man.

[8] Ver. 11.] For all that Christ does as a prophet sent from God, or as assuming the person of a mediator, must refer ultimately to the glory of the Father, (ii. 11.)

[9] Ver. 14—18.] For explication of these four verses, let it be noted in the general, that they, who preached Christ ἐξ ἐριθείας, out of contention, did not preach Christ, or the gospel in truth, and out of love to it, (ver. 17, 18.) but only in pretence, or upon this occasion, from strife and envy against St. Paul, being grieved that he had free liberty of preaching Christ to all that came to him for two years, (Acts xxviii. 30.) and also that they did not acknowledge St. Paul to be set up, or by God appointed for the defence and propagation of the gospel. Whence it appears, that they could be only the persons, who did contend with St. Paul for the glory of being the most diligent and successful promoters of the gospel; or, as such, envying the apostle's glory, set up for themselves, boasting as if they were the only publishers of the gospel: but yet it is difficult to assign the persons here intended by St. Paul: Œcumenius and Theophylact say, they were the unbelieving Jews, who, by divulging every where about Rome, what was the doctrine of Christianity which Paul preached; how opposite it was to the Roman gods and their worship; what tumults it had caused; how many it had turned from their old religion to the faith of Christ; and who he was in whom the Christians did believe; thought to enrage the emperor against St. Paul, the great promoter of this doctrine: and in this, say they, might St. Paul rejoice, as giving occasion to others to inquire into the Christian faith, and so to come unto it; for, saith Tertullian, "desinunt odisse quod desinunt ignorare;" when they once know, they cease to hate it: but such cannot be said to preach Christ without an intolerable catachresis; nor can St. Paul be supposed to rejoice in such a representation of the Christian faith, as they made. Others therefore say, with a greater likelihood, these were the Judaizing Christians, who with the gospel taught the observation of the law; for from these arose ἔριδες καὶ διχοστασίαι, strife and dissensions, 1 Cor. i. 11. iii. 3. zeal, animosities, and contentions, 2 Cor. xii. 20. and that on the account of this apostle, whom they would scarce own as an apostle of Christ, 2 Cor. vii. 2. but rather looked upon as one that walked according to the flesh, x. 2. and would have excluded him from the churches, Gal. iv. 16, 17. and yet at their preaching Christ, though not sincerely, the apostle may be supposed to rejoice, because he knew the time was near when the hay and stubble they built on the foundation should be revealed, and the destruction of the temple and city of Jerusalem, would sufficiently confute their vain additions to the faith.

[10] Ver. 20. Ἐν τῷ σώματί μου, Christ shall be magnified by me in my body.] For if I live in the body, the power of Christ will be magnified in delivering me out of so great danger: but if I be put to death for his sake, that power will be magnified which enables me so cheerfully to die for the faith, as I am ready to do.

[11] Ver. 22. Οὐ γνωρίζω, I know not.] Ἅπαξ λεγόμενον ἐν τούτῳ τῷ σημαινομένῳ. This γνωρίζω, saith J. Gregory, is but once used in this sense; which is true, if he confines this to the New Testament. But Phavorinus mentions another Gregory who used it in this sense; and Constantine says it occurs thus in Isocrates and Lucian.

[12] Ver. 23. Πολλῷ μᾶλλον κρεῖσσον, To depart and to be with Christ, which is much better.] Because (saith Crellius) the time betwixt death and the resurrection is not to be reckoned, therefore the apostle might speak thus, though the soul hath no sense of any thing after death. But could St. Paul think a state of insensibility much better than a life tending so much, as his did, to the glory of God, to the propagation of the gospel, and the furtherance of the joy of Christians? Could he call such an insensate state, a being with Christ, and a walking by sight, in opposition to the life of faith? (2 Cor. v. 7, 8.) Others say, the apostle speaketh thus, because he expected that the general resurrection, and the day of judgment, should be in his time: but the words will not bear this sense; for the apostle saith, he is in a constraint betwixt these two, whether he should choose that life which would enable him to gain many to Christ, and minister greatly to the necessities of his church; or that which would cause him to live with Christ, viz. as to his better part, i. e. whether his body and soul should be dissolved, or he should still live in the flesh? Now it is impossible that the same man, at the same time, should expect the resurrection and the day of judgment, and yet expect to live in the flesh, and to abide with the church in the flesh, when none of the members of the church should abide in the flesh, but should enjoy that resurrection which would place them with Christ, as well as himself; that he should desire his soul should be dissolved, or separated from the body, that he might be present with the Lord, and yet at the same time expect that day when he should be clothed upon with his celestial body. Moreover, he himself informs us, that the apostles expected only the resurrection, when other Christians should arise, at the great day; for thus he speaks, He that raised up the Lord Jesus from the dead, will raise us also by him, and will present us with you, 2 Cor. iv. 14. and this confutes their gloss, who say the apostle expected to be with Christ, as an especial privilege belonging to him as an apostle, or a martyr for Christ. (See the note on 2 Cor. v. 8.)

[13] Ver. 27. In one spirit, with one mind.] That is, with love and concord, saith Œcumenius, (see note on 1 Cor. i. 10, 11.) or with full consent: so ψυχῇ μίᾳ, 1 Chron. xii. 38. so in Irenæus, lib. i. cap. 3. to act, συμφώνως, with one accord and consent, is to act as having, μίαν ψυχὴν, καὶ τὴν αὐτὴν καρδίαν, καὶ ἓν στόμα, one soul, heart, and mouth.

[14] Ver. 29. To you it is given not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for his name.] Where note, (1.) that to suffer for Christ's sake is, χάρις, grace and favour, ver. 7. it is a gift which is matter of great joy, Matt. v. 12. Rom. v. 13. James i. 2. (2.) That they who, from these words, to you it is given to believe, infer, that faith is so far the gift of God as that men are purely passive in it, have as much reason to infer, that we suffer for the name of Christ without the concurrence of our own wills, both being said to be equally given.

CHAP. II.

1. IF there be therefore any consolation (παράκλησις, any force of exhortation) in (beseeching you in the name of) Christ, if (there be) any comfort of (mutual) love, if (there be) any fellowship of the Spirit (of love exciting you to it), if (ye have) any bowels and mercies (for me the prisoner of Christ),

2. Fulfil ye my joy (in this), that ye be (all) like-minded, having the same love (one to another), being of one accord, of one mind (or minding the same thing).

3. Let nothing be done (among you) through strife (who shall be the greatest) or (through desire of) vain-glory; but in lowliness of mind, [1] let each esteem (an) other better than himself.

4. Look not every man on his own things (or concernments only), but every man also on the things of others (being concerned for their welfare).

5. Let this mind be in you (with respect to these matters), which was also in Christ Jesus:

6. Who, being [2] in the form of God (when he appeared to the patriarchs), [3] thought it no robbery to be [4] equal with God (Gr. did not covet to appear as God):

7. But (divesting himself of his former glory) made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the [5] form of a servant (by ministering to others), and [6] was made in the likeness of man (Gr. being in the likeness of man):

8. And being found in fashion as a (n ordinary) man, he humbled himself (yet more), and became obedient to death, even the death of the cross.

9. Wherefore [7] God also hath highly exalted him (even as to his manhood), and given him a name (a dignity and majesty) which is above every name (of majesty, Eph. i. 21. Heb. i. 4.)

10. That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, (humbly acknowledging his authority, even those) of things in heaven (i. e. the holy angels), and things in earth (i. e. men), and things under the earth, (the dead, who being raised by him, shall acknowledge his power; for to them the apostle doth apply these very words of the prophet Isaiah, Rom. xiv. 11, 12. Rev. v. 13. Isa. xlv. 23.)

11. And that every tongue (i. e. men of all nations and languages, Rev. vii. 13.) should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, [8] to the glory of God the Father.

12. Wherefore, my beloved (remembering the dignity of Christ, and your subjection to him), as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only (when you had me to be your monitor), but now much more in my [9] absence (which God by the workings of his Holy Spirit supplies), work out your own salvation with fear and trembling.

13. For it is God who (in my absence, by his inward teachings) worketh in you both to will and to do of his own good pleasure.

14. (And) [10] do all things without murmurings and disputings (i. e. obey the precepts of the Christian faith and of your spiritual monitors cheerfully, and without grudging, and readily, without exacting a reason of every command they lay upon you):

15. That ye may be blameless and harmless, (as becomes) the sons of God, (being) without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world;

16. Holding forth (ἐπέχοντες, holding fast) the word of life (under all persecutions and temptations); that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, neither laboured in vain.

17. (And as for me, a prisoner, if I not only should continue absent from, ἀλλ' εἰ καὶ,) but if I be (also) [11] offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, (i. e. that I may present you gentiles an acceptable sacrifice to God, through faith, and the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, Rom. xv. 16.) I joy, and rejoice with you all; (I count these sufferings the matter, not of my sorrow, but my joy.

18. And if this come to pass,) for the same cause (or in the like manner) also do ye joy, and rejoice with me.

19. But (though I speak thus) I trust in the Lord Jesus (that he will work such a deliverance for me, i. 19. 25. as that, not needing him so much here, I may be able) to send Timotheus shortly to you, that (whatever be my condition here) I also may (or I may yet) be of good comfort, when I know your state, (i. e. your steadfastness in the faith, and your charity to one another.

20. To send Timothy, I say:) for I have no man (with me) like-minded, who will (so) naturally (and with like affection) care for your estate.

21. For all (here) seek their own (interests and safety, and) not the things which are Jesus Christ's (that is, comparatively to Timothy and Epaphroditus, mentioned ver. 25. for I find others too generally more concerned for their own safety, than for advancing the kingdom of Christ with the hazard of their own lives and fortunes).

22. But ye know the proof (ye have had experience) of him, that, as a son with the father, he hath served with me in the gospel (yielding honour and obedience to me, and with the like spirit labouring to promote the affairs of the gospel).

23. Him therefore I hope to send (to you) presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me (i. e. what will be the issue of my bonds).

24. But I trust (or I trust also) in the Lord, that I also myself (being set at liberty) shall come shortly (to you).

25. Yet (being not hitherto able to come myself, or to send Timothy,) I supposed it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother, and companion in labour, and fellow-soldier, but your [12] messenger, and he that ministered to my wants.

26. For he longed after you all (i. e. desired much to see you), and was full of heaviness, because that ye had heard that he had been sick (as knowing your affection to him would render you full of sorrow upon his account).

27. [13] For (and) indeed he was sick, nigh unto death: but God had mercy upon him; and not on him only, but on me also, lest (by his death) I should have sorrow upon sorrow.

28. I sent him therefore the more carefully, that, when ye see him again (recovered), ye may rejoice (on the account of it), and that I may be the less sorrowful (finding your sorrow for him turned into joy).

29. Receive him therefore in the Lord (and for his sake) with great gladness; and hold such (as stand thus affected to his service) in reputation:

30. Because for the work of Christ (i. e. the promotion of his gospel, and the ministration to me, the prisoner of the Lord) he was nigh unto death, [14] not regarding (but freely hazarding) his (own) life, to supply your lack of service towards me.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 3. LET each esteem, &c.] This refers not to judgment, it being not in our power always thus to esteem of others, but to practice; as if he should have said, Be as ready to assist and help others, as if you were their subjects and inferiors: so the example of Christ requires, and so the precept runs, that he who is the greatest should be a servant to others.

[2] Ver. 6. Ἐν μορφῇ Θεοῦ, In the form of God.] By this expression most interpreters do understand, that the apostle doth intend Christ was essentially and truly God; but though this be a certain truth, yet I conceive this cannot be the import of this expression in this place.

First, Because the apostle exhorteth his Philippians to humility, after the example of our Lord: now humility consists not in the change of nature, but of condition; and therefore his exinanition of the form of God, seems rather to respect our Lord's condition, than his nature.

Secondly, There is no more reason to say, the form of God signifies the essence of God, than that the form of a servant signifies the essence of a servant; but evident it is, that the form of a servant doth not signify the essence, but the state, and the condition of a servant, which is a mere relation; nor doth his manumission change his nature, but his state.

Thirdly, According to this import of the phrase, it cannot well be shewed how he did empty himself, or lay aside this form: for though by taking of a body, he concealed, yet could he not be said to empty himself of, or lay aside, the Godhead; especially when in that body he gave such numerous and signal demonstrations of Divine power and wisdom, both in his miracles, his doctrine, and knowledge of the hearts of men.

Fourthly, This word μορφὴ, form, both in the Old and New Testament, doth often signify the external shape: as when it is said of Belshazzar,* Dan. v. 6. 10. and of Daniel,† vii. 28. that their forms were changed; of Nebuchadnezzar, that ‡ his form returned to him, Dan. iv. 46. of Christ, that he appeared to two of his disciples, ἐν ἑτέρᾳ μορφῇ, in another form, Mark xvi. 12. and that μετεμορφώθη, he was transfigured before three of them, Matt. xvii. 2. but it no where seems to signify the essence of a man either in the Old or the New Testament.

Grotius and the Socinians say, that Christ is said to be in the form of God, by reason of the miracles he wrought on earth, they being indications of the power of God residing in him. But this interpretation cannot stand. For,

First, Christ is here plainly said to have been in the form of God, before he took upon him the form of a servant, or the similitude of a man; for as these words, being found in the fashion of a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, do shew, that he was found in the fashion of a man before he humbled himself to become obedient to the death; so, by parity of reason, these words, being in the form of God, &c. he emptied himself, and took upon him the form of a servant, being found in the likeness of man, do shew that he was first in the form of God, before that being found in the likeness of man, he took upon him the form of a servant.

Secondly, It is plainly here asserted, that Christ emptied himself of this form of God at his humiliation; whereas he never laid aside his power of working miracles, but did continue to exert it to his death.

Thirdly, This power of miracles is never in the Scripture styled the form of God; and were this all that was intended by that phrase, both Moses and Elias, and our Lord's apostles, might upon that account be said to have been in the form of God; seeing both Moses and Elias wrought many miracles on earth, and Christ declared concerning his disciples, that they should work greater miracles than those which he had done, John xiv. 12.

I therefore by this form of God, do understand that glorious form in which God on his throne is represented; that majesty in which he is said to appear in Scripture, and in which the Λόγος, or the Word, did shew himself of old to Moses and the patriarchs. For explication of this sense, I shall shew, (1.) how God in the Old Testament is represented as appearing, shewing his form and glory to the sons of men.

Secondly, That Christ did in this form appear to Moses and the patriarchs of old.

Thirdly, That since our Lord's ascension he hath been invested with the form of God, he hath appeared in it, and hath declared it belongs to him; though, for the time of his humiliation, he was pleased to dispose, or put it off. And,

First, The appearance or similitude of God is represented in the Old Testament in a bright shining cloud or light, a flame of fire, or the attendance of a host of angels. Thus in that vision of the prophet Daniel, The Ancient of days did sit; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire; a stream of fire did issue from before him, thousand of thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him, Dan. vii. 9, 10. Thus God appeared on Mount Sinai, where his presence was attended with a host of angels, according to that saying of the Psalmist, The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels, and the Lord is among them as in Sinai, Psal. lxviii. 18. where the Targum adds, The Word of the Lord desired to place his majesty upon it; Jehovah dwelleth only in the heaven of heavens for ever. He appeared there also in a bright shining cloud, or flame of fire; for the glory abode upon Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six days, and the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire, Exod. xxiv. 16, 17. And seeing of these majestic symbols, is to see God, ver. 12. to see the God of Israel, ver. 10. that is, say Onkelos and Jonathan, the glory of God. And when Moses doth again repeat the decalogue, he adds these words, Deut. v. 22. 24. The Lord spake to all your assembly in the mount, out of the midst of the fire of the cloud: and you said, Behold, the Lord God hath shewed us his glory, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire. We have seen this day that God doth talk with man, and he liveth.—The Word of the Lord our God shewed the Divine majesty of his glory, saith the Targum of Jonathan; and, we heard the voice of his word, saith Onkelos. And the prophet Habakkuk, in his song of God, saith thus, His glory covered the heavens, his brightness was as the light, and bright beams came out of his side, Hab. iii. 3, 4. There he discovereth Shecantiah, his Schechinah, i. e. his glorious majesty, saith the Targum. When Jacob had a vision of angels ascending and descending, he presently cries out, This is no other than the house of God; this is the gate of heaven: surely Jehovah is in this place; and I knew it not, Gen. xxviii. 17. Shechinti Dii, The glory of the Lord is here, say the Targums. And when God shewed himself to the people in the cloud, then did the glory or similitude of God appear, as the expression is, Numb. xii. 8. τὴν δόξαν Κυρίου, The glory of the Lord, saith the Septuagint; so 1 Kings viii. 11. Thus doth the Scripture represent that God who dwelleth in light inaccessible, before whose face the angels do continually stand as ministering spirits. And this also is the rabbinical exposition of the Chabod Dii,* The glory of the Lord; that it is either a ray of Divine light, or a guard of angels.

Secondly, That Christ was in the form of God, even before he took upon him human nature, will be apparent, if we consider, that even before he purged our sins, he was the brightness of his Father's glory, light of light, Heb. i. 3. and, in the language of the book of Wisdom, A pure stream flowing from the glory of the Almighty, the brightness of the everlasting light, Wisd. vii. 25, 26. and that he at the conclusion of his humiliation prays, that God would glorify him with the glory which he had with him before the foundation of the world, John xvii. 5. That it was the opinion both of the ancient Jews and of the Christians, from the beginning, that it was the Λόγος, or the Messiah, who appeared to the patriarchs of old in light and splendour, and sometimes with the attendance of holy angels. And, (3.) that we have great evidence of this matter, both in the Old and New Testament. In the books of Exodus and Numbers we read, that the children of Israel tempted the Lord, saying, Is the Lord among us, or not? Exod. xvii. 7. Numb. xxi. 6. and that the Lord sent therefore fiery serpents among them; but in the tenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, we are informed that they tempted Christ, and were destroyed of serpents. See this reading justified, note on 1 Cor. x. 9. Christ, therefore, as to his Divine nature, was then present with, and tempted by, them. God also saith to his people thus, Exod. xxiii. 20. 23. Behold, I send an Angel before thee to keep thee, in thy way, and to bring thee to the place which I prepared. Beware of him, and obey his voice, provoke him not; he will not pardon your transgressions: for my name is in him. Now the ancient rabbins† say, this was the Angel, the Redeemer; or an uncreated angel, in whom was Jehovah: and the words plainly seem to intimate this to us, seeing the power of remitting sins, ascribed here to him, belongeth only to that God against whom they were committed. Moreover, when God, being incensed against Israel for making the golden calf, had threatened to withdraw himself, and only send an angel before them to drive out the inhabitants of Canaan before them, Exod. xxxiii. 2. this seems an evil word to the people, and they mourn because of it, viz. of those words, I will not go up in the midst of thee; that is, say Onkelos and Jonathan, I will not cause שכינתי, my glorious presence to go up with thee. Nor doth Moses himself rest in this answer, but speaks thus to God, If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence, ver. 15. If the Schechinah go not with us, saith Onkelos, εἰ μὴ αὐτὸς σὺ, If thou thyself go not with us, say the Septuagint, R. Salomon, and Aben Ezra: which sense the following words require, For wherein shall it be known that I and thy people have found grace in thy sight, is it not in that thou goest with us? ver. 16. Whence it is evident, that they were not contented with the promise of a created angel, but required God's presence to go with them; and that God granted this request, ver. 17. Thus Philo Judæus* often informs us, that the angel who went before them was no created angel, but the Divine Word, or God himself: For (saith he) Moses prays to God himself to be his governor, in the way that leadeth to himself, saying, If thou go not with us, carry us not up hence. And again, He uses the Divine Word for a guide, for so speaks the oracle, Behold, I will send my Angel before thy face, to lead thee in the way, Exod. xxiii. 20.

Thirdly, That after his ascension to the right hand of majesty and glory, the Lord Christ did again reassume this form, and appear in this majestic splendour, is evident from the New Testament: thus he appeared to Stephen, who looking up steadfastly to heaven, saw the glory of God, and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God, Acts vii. 55. Thus he appeared to a persecuting Saul, in a light from heaven above the brightness of the sun, saying to him, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest, Acts xxvi. 13. Thus in the vision of St. John, Rev. i. 14. 16. His eyes were as a flaming fire, and his countenance as the sun shining in its strength. Thus he declared he would appear at the destruction of Jerusalem, to punish that rebellious people; The Son of man (saith he) will come in the glory of his Father, with his holy angels, Matt. xvi. 27. Luke ix. 26. 28. And his second advent shall be with the same tremendous glory, for he shall be then revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, 2 Thess. i. 7, 8.

Fourthly, Seeing then this splendour, and this attendance of holy angels, is represented in Scripture as the similitude, the shape, the face, and majestic presence of God; seeing it is evident, that before the incarnation, the Λόγος, or Divine Word, had this glory, and in it did appear to Moses and the patriarchs, and that in order to the exercise of a regal power over his church; seeing it is certain from the New Testament, that after his ascension he again re-assumed this form and power, it is highly probable this was the form of God here mentioned; this was the likeness to God in which, at his humiliation, he did not covet to appear, but rather chose to lay it aside, that so he might appear amongst us, not as the Lord of heaven, attended with a host of angels, or in the dazzling brightness of his Father's glory, but in the fashion of a man.

[5] Οὐχ ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἴσα Θεῷ, Thought it no robbery to be equal with God.] This Greek phrase is only to be met with in Plutarch, saith Grotius (though I cannot find it there), and in Heliodorus; in which writer it plainly signifies, to covet earnestly, or look upon a thing as much to be desired, and snatched at. Thus when Cybele went about to allure Theagenes to the lustful embraces of Arsace, finding him out of the temple, in a by-apartment, she did* ἅρπαγμα ποιεῖν τὴν ξυντυχίαν, i. e. she snatched at the occasion, or looked upon it as a thing desirable for her purpose; and when none of her proposals or allurements would prevail with Theagenes to gratify the queen's desires, she brake forth into this admiration,† What adverseness from love is this? A young man in the flower of his age thrusts from him, or refuses a woman like unto himself, and desirous of him, καὶ οὐχ ἅρπαγμα οὐδὲ ἕρμαιον ἡγεῖται τὸ πρᾶγμα, and does not look upon this as a great offer, and a thing very desirable: and when she had found out that his affection to Chariclea was the cause of this averseness, she proposes to Arsace the death of Chariclea, as an expedient to gain his affection, and ‡ ἅρπαγμα τὸ ῥηθὲν ἐποιήσατο ἡ Ἀρσάκη, Arsace embraces the motion as a thing very desirable, or to be coveted. So that ἅρπαγμα ἡγεῖσθαι, saith Semidius, is rem optatam persequi, et studiosissimè occupare.

[4] Τὸ εἶναι ἴσα Θεῷ,] Is to be, or to appear as God, or in the likeness of God: so the word ἴσα is adverbially used frequently in the Septuagint, answering to the Hebrew caph, Job v. 14. They grope in the noon-day, ἴσα νυκτὶ, as in the night; x. 10. Hast thou not curdled me, ἴσα τυρῷ, as cheese; xi. 12. Man is born, ἴσα ὄνῳ ἐρημίτῃ, like a wild ass's colt; xiii. 12. Your remembrance is, ἴσα σποδῷ, like unto ashes; and, ver. 20. He consumeth, ἴσα ἀσκῷ, as a bottle; xv. 16. Man drinketh in iniquity, ἴσα ποτῷ, as drink; xxiv. 20. Wickedness shall be broken, ἴσα ξύλῳ, as a tree; xxvii. 16. He prepareth raiment, ἴσα πηλῷ, as the clay; xxviii. 2. Brass is molten out of the stone, ἴσα λιθῷ, as the stone; xxix. 14. I put on judgment, ἴσα διπλοΐδι, as a robe; xl. 15. He eateth grass, ἴσα βουσὶν, as an ox; Isa. li. 23. Thou hast laid thy body, ἴσα τῇ γῇ, as the earth; Wisd. vii. 1. I myself am a mortal man, ἴσον ἅπασι, like to all men; and the first voice I uttered was πᾶσιν ἴσα κλαίων, weeping as all others do, ver. 3. So that the sense of these words seems to me to be this, That though Christ in his former appearances still represented himself in the form and likeness of God; yet coming now into the world for the salvation of mankind, he did not covet or desire to appear in that majestic splendour and authority, but rather chose to come in the similitude of a man, and in the form of a servant. Nor doth this exposition give any advantage to the Socinians, but equally confutes their heresy, and gives a better answer to their arguments than the usual exposition can give. For,

First, Hence the pre-existence of Christ, before his being born of the blessed Virgin, is proved to a demonstration.

Secondly, Hence also it is evident, that there must be two natures in Christ; that of the Λόγος, which appeared from the beginning to the patriarchs; and that which he received, when as man he was conceived in the Virgin's womb.

Thirdly, Hence it appears that this nature, in which he appeared before his conception in the Virgin's womb, must be Divine. For what other nature could appear in the form of God, and challenge to itself the glory, which by the Jews was still esteemed a certain indication of the Divine presence, and in the New Testament is styled the glory of the Father? Especially if we consider, that he who thus appeared hath the incommunicable name Jehovah so oft ascribed to him, is styled the Judge of the whole earth, and either challengeth to himself the Divine attributes and offices, or never doth refuse them when they are offered to him by men. Moreover, where is the humiliation, or the exinanition here mentioned, in that Christ would not be, or appear as God in the world, if having only a human nature, he could not do so without being guilty of the blasphemy the Jews laid to his charge, That he being a man, made himself God? Whereas he differed in nothing from an ordinary man, but only in the extraordinary gifts conferred by God upon him. And if his nature was Divine, it of necessity must be eternal, since the Divine nature can have no beginning of existence.

* Διόπερ εὔχεται Μωϋσῆς αὐτῷ τῷ Θεῷ χρῆσθαι ἡγεμόνι πρὸς τὴν αὐτὸν ἄγουσαν ὁδόν· λέγει γὰρ, εἰ μὴ αὐτὸς σὺ συμπορεύσῃ, μή με ἀγάγῃς ἐντεῦθεν, De Migrat. Abrah. p. 334. C. Ἡγεμόνι τῆς ὁδοῦ χρῆται λογῷ θείῳ, χρησμὸς γάρ ἐστιν, Ἰδοὺ ἀποστέλλω τὸν ἄγγελόν μου πρὸ προσώπου σου. Ibid. lit. F.

[5] Ver. 7. Μορφὴν δούλου λαβὼν, He took upon him the form of a servant.] This phrase cannot import only his taking of the human nature, that being sufficiently expressed by saying, that he was made in the likeness of man: besides, he still retains the human nature, but doth not now retain the form of a servant, but of the Lord of all things. Nor are we to understand by it his outward poverty, which equalled him to servants (saith the learned Grotius), as having nothing of his own; for that is not the state of a servant only, but of a son in his minority, and of many unfortunate persons who were never servants. Nor, thirdly, must we understand by it, as the Socinians do, his submission to be used as a slave or servant, by being whipped, and bound, and crucified; for that is the humiliation which he suffered after he had taken upon him the form of a servant, as those words plainly shew, He took upon him the form of a servant, and being found in the fashion of a man, he became obedient to the death: nor is this proper to a servant, but to a malefactor; for a servant is not less a servant when he is not whipped or scourged: he therefore may be rather said to have taken upon him the form of a servant, by ministering to men, and being among them as one that served; for as the business of a servant is to do nothing for himself, but for the good of others, and to spend himself in ministering to their advantage; so the Son of man came not to be ministered to, but to minister, and at the close of that ministry, to give his life a ransom for many.

[6] Ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων γενόμενος, And being in the likeness of man.] That our Lord had the real nature, and not only the outward shape or resemblance of a man; that he had a body consisting of flesh, blood, and bones; a soul and spirit; and so all the constituent parts of a man, the Scripture plainly testifies. Nor doth this phrase ἐν ὁμοιώματι, in the likeness of man, contradict it, it being used of a real likeness by the participation of the same nature as to kind. Thus Adam is said to beget a son, ἐν ὁμοιώματι αὐτοῦ, in his own likeness, who yet was certainly of the same nature with him: and Christ is said, ὁμοιωθῆναι, to be made like to his brethren, by the participation of the nature of Abraham, and his communion with them in the same flesh and blood, Heb. ii. 14. 16, 17. and it was both proper and elegant for the apostle to use this expression here, by reason of the opposition he designed to shew, betwixt Christ's former glorious and his then present humble state, he being then ἐν μορφῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ, in the form of God, now ἐν ὁμοιώματι τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, in the likeness of a man.

[7] Ver. 9. Αὐτὸν ὑπερύψωσε, God hath exalted him.] The fathers on this place advise us, εἰς τὴν ἀνθρώποσιν, καὶ οὐκ εἰς τὴν θεότητα ταῦτα διανοεῖν, to refer these things not to the Divine, but to the human nature, the apostle not speaking here of the exaltation of the Divine nature of Christ, by the manifestation of his concealed glory and power, but of the exaltation of that nature which had suffered; this exaltation being in Scripture represented as the reward of our Lord's salutary passion: for we see him (saith the apostle) who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour, Heb. ii. 9. and again, the elders about the throne say, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, Rev. iv. 11. v. 12. Moreover, St. John declares, that this dominion and power was given to the Son of man because he was so, (John v. 17.) though it was given to the man Christ Jesus, because the fulness of the Godhead dwelled in him.

[8] Ver. 11. Εἰς δόξαν, To the glory.] He does not say, as the Socinians contend, that Christ is exalted to the glory of God the Father, though that be true of the advancement of his human nature; but he saith, that being thus exalted, he is to be acknowledged of all tongues and nations as their Lord, to the glory of the Father; nothing more tending to his glory, than that all persons owning Christ as their Lord, and yielding obedience to him, should abound in these works of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ to the glory of God the Father, i. 11. Eph. i. 12. Moreover, seeing the Father thus exalted the humanity of Christ, since he united the Λόγος to the human nature (for it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell), what hinders that this exaltation should be said to be to the glory of God the Father, from whom he received even the Divine nature?

[9] Ver. 12. Ἐν τῇ ἀπουσίᾳ μου, In my absence.] i. e. When I was present with you, I by my counsels and exhortations stirred you up to desire, and do what was according to the mind of God: he, in my absence, is more immediately present with you, by the inward motions of his Holy Spirit, to excite you both to will and to do what is well-pleasing to him. Having therefore now all things administered more immediately by God, which are requisite to make you willing and able to perform your duty, it doth more highly concern you to work out your salvation. Thus Ignatius * saith, that he being now in chains, and going to Rome to receive the crown of martyrdom, the church of Syria had God, instead of him, to be her pastor, and that Christ alone was bishop over her. This sense I gather from these words, much more in my absence; for what other reason can be offered of these words than that which this interpretation gives?

Hence it is evident, that God worketh in us to will and to do, not by a physical operation, which makes it necessary for us to will and to do what he would have us do; for why then doth the apostle admonish his Philippians, to work out their salvation with fear and trembling? For what is more absurd, than to exhort another to do himself what God doth for him without his concurrence; or to require him to will what he cannot but will and do: for this reason, because another renders it necessary for him so to will? and what ground of fear can there be, lest God should fail in his work? That the word ἐνεργεῖν doth not require this sense, is evident, because in Scripture it occurs very often, where it must be understood, not of a physical, but only of a moral operation; as when Satan is said, ἐνεργεῖν, to work in the children of disobedience, Eph. ii. 2. and of the mystery of iniquity, that, ἐνεργεῖται, it now works, 2 Thess. ii. 7. (2.) When it is attributed to those causes which produce not their effects by any physical, but only by moral operations, as when the word is said to be ἐνεργὴς, powerful, Heb. iv. 12. the word ὃ ἐνεργεῖται, which effectually works in them that believe, 1 Thess. ii. 13. that faith that worketh by love, Gal. v. 6. that charity is ἐνεργὴς, effectual, Philem. 6. and of concupiscence, that, ἐνεργεῖται, it worketh in our members, Rom. vii. 5. (3.) When it is ascribed to God sending upon men ἐνέργειαν πλάνης, the efficacy of deceit; for surely God worketh no evil physically. In a word, did God thus work in us to will and to do, the work could no more be ascribed to us, than the motion which was impressed on the body of Lazarus, when he came out of the grave, or upon Paul, when rapt up to the third heavens, could be ascribed to them; and the will would not deserve that name, as being neither free nor praiseworthy. And therefore all the Greek interpreters observe, that the apostle saith, It is God that worketh in us both to will and to do, οὐχ ὡς ἀφαιρῶν τὸ αὐτεξούσιον, not as denying our free-will, or τοὺς ἄκοντας βιαζόμενος, constraining the unwilling, * ἀλλ' ὅτι προθυμίαν εὑρίσκων, αὔξει ταύτην διὰ τῆς χάριτος· but, because finding a readiness of mind, he increaseth it by his grace; and because he works together with those who work out their salvation with fear and trembling, τοῖς γὰρ τοιούτοις συνεργεῖ, for with such he co-operates, saith Œcumenius.

[10] Ver. 14. Do all things without murmurings, καὶ διαλογισμῶν, and disputings.] That is, say the Greek commentators, without murmuring under your sufferings for the sake of Christ, (i. 20.) or doubtings, or reasonings, whether you should continue steadfast in the faith, or not.

[11] Ver. 17. Εἰ σπένδομαι, If I offered.] The apostle here hath an elegant allusion to the Jewish sacrifices: they were prepared for the altar, on which they were to be offered, by the Levites and the priests, and this was their λειτουργία, service, and there was poured upon the sacrifice oil or wine, which was the σπονδὴ, or libation: if then, saith the apostle, whilst I am thus, λειτουργῶν, wholly employed in rendering you gentiles an acceptable sacrifice to the Lord, my blood should be the libation to be poured out upon this sacrifice; I should rejoice even thus to die in your service, and for the confirmation of your faith. (See Rom. xv. 16.)

[12] Ver. 25. Ὑμῶν ἀπόστολον, Your apostle.] So they were usually styled, who gathered sacred money, and carried it up to Jerusalem: and so, say some, he calls Epaphroditus, because he brought the contributions of the Philippians to him at Rome. But the word apostle is never used in the New Testament, but either of those, who were in the strict sense apostles of the Lord, or else were eminent ministers and preachers of the gospel: thus Titus and the brother of St. Paul (which is the usual appellation of St. Timothy, see note on Heb. xiii. 23.) are ἀπόστολοι, the apostles of the churches, 2 Cor. viii. 22, 23. and Andronicus and Junia, who had long preached the gospel, are styled ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις, eminent among the apostles of Christ. I therefore conclude with Theodoret† upon the place, and upon i. 1. that the episcopal care of this church was committed to him: and that this is the import of the word apostle here. This being the note of the same Theodoret, that formerly, τοὺς νῦν καλουμένους ἐπισκόπους, ἀποστόλους ὠνόμαζον, they who are now called bishops were styled apostles; and Hilary the deacon saying here, "erat enim eorum apostolus, ab apostolo factus," he was constituted their apostle, i. e. bishop, by St. Paul, who therefore commands them to receive him in the Lord, ver. 28. i. e. for the sake of the Lord Christ, whose minister he was.

[13] Ver. 27.] Note, that here we find Epaphroditus was not recovered by the gift of healing, then frequent in the church, that gift being not exercised by them to whom it was imparted at their own pleasure; but as God was pleased, by a special instinct, and a strong faith, to incite them to the exercise of it: these gifts being therefore given for the sake of unbelievers, to convince them of the truth of the Christian faith, God thought not fit that it should be ordinarily exercised upon believers, lest it should be looked upon not as a gift, but as the effect of art or skill, or a thing done among them by confederacy.

[14] Ver. 30. Παραβουλευσάμενος, Not regarding his life;] Or, as others read, παραβολευσάμενος, or παραβολησάμενος, hazarding his life; that is, say the Greek commentators, εἰς κίνδυνον ἔρριψεν ἑαυτὸν, he brought himself in danger of death; not by venturing on the emperor's displeasure, but by labouring so as to contract a dangerous disease (which he did, saith the apostle, to supply your lack of service towards me), which is not so to be understood, as if he charged them with any want of service or affection to him; (see iv. 10.) but thus, that Epaphroditus did this, being present with him, to supply that service, which they, being absent, were not in a capacity to perform. Note also, that παραβουλευσάμενος is the reading of all the Greek scholia, Photius and Cod. Alexand. and, say Hesychius and Phavorinus, is in sense the same with παραβολευσάμενος, and so it is not certain that there was ever any other reading. And therefore Theodoret on the place saith, the apostle speaks thus, οὐκ ἐπειδὰν καὶ τοὺς ἄκοντας βιάζεται, ἀλλ' ὅτι προθυμίαν εὑρίσκων αὔξει ταύτην διὰ τῆς χάριτος, not as if God constrained the unwilling, but because, where he finds a readiness of mind, he increaseth it by his grace.

CHAP. III.

1. FINALLY (τὸ λοιπὸν, henceforth), my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. To write the same things (which I have delivered) to you (by word of mouth), to me is not grievous, but to (for) you [1] it is safe.

2. (I therefore exhort you again, to) beware of [2] dogs, beware of [3] evil-workers, beware of the [4] concision.

3. For we are the (true and spiritual) circumcision, which worship God in the spirit (of our mind, Eph. iv. 23.) and rejoice in Christ Jesus and have [5] no confidence in the (circumcision of the) flesh (as if this would commend us to God).

4. Though (were this any proper ground of confidence) I might also have confidence in the flesh (as well as they who boast of this: for) if any other man think that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I (have) more (reason so to do:

5. For I was) [6] circumcised the eighth day, (the very day prescribed by the law, Gen. xvii. 12.) of the stock of Israel (my parents and ancestors being all of Israel), of the tribe of Benjamin, (that tribe which cleaved to Judah, and revolted not with Jeroboam to the worship of the calves, 1 Kings xii. 21.) a Hebrew of the Hebrews; (both by nation and language, 2 Cor. xi. 22. Acts xxi. 40.) as touching (the observance of) the law, a pharisee; (one of the strictest sects of our religion, Acts xxvi. 5.)

6. Concerning zeal (for the Jewish religion, I have shewed that above others, in) persecuting the church (of Christ, Acts xxii. 3, 4. xxvi. 11.) touching the righteousness which is in (and by) the law (I have lived) blameless (as to that, Acts xxiii. 1.)

7. But what things (of this nature) were (then reputed) gain to me, those I (have) accounted (as) loss for Christ ('s sake.)

8. Yea doubtless, and I count all things (of this world) but loss [7] for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ (i. e. obtain an interest in him, and the blessings purchased by him).

9. And be found in him, not having my own righteousness, which is of the law, (which cannot justify me, but leave me still under the curse of it, Rom. iii. 20. Gal. iii. 10.) but that which is through the faith of Christ, (viz.) [8] the righteousness which is (approved) of God (i. e. the righteousness which is) by faith (in Christ):

10. That I may know him (to be the Messiah, and the Saviour of the world, which knowledge is necessary to life eternal, John xvii. 3. 1 Cor. ii. 2.) and the [9] power of his resurrection, and the [10] fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable to his death;

11. If by (these, or) any (other) means, I might attain to the resurrection of the dead, (promised by him to all his faithful servants and sufferers.

12. [11] For I can) not (look upon myself) as though I had already attained, (or caught hold of the prize of my high calling, ver. 14. the resurrection of the dead, ver. 11.) or were already perfect (i. e. crowned with it); but I follow after (or pursue it), if that I may apprehend (or reach) that (prize) for (the obtaining of) which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. (For when I fled from him, he caught hold on me, converted me to the faith, that believing in him I might obtain life everlasting, 1 Tim. i. 15, 16. εἰ καὶ, if that, or that also: see note on 1 Tim. v. 10.)

13. Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended (i. e. caught hold of the prize): but this one thing I do, forgetting (not looking after) those things which are behind, and reaching forth to those things which are before,

14. I press towards the mark (the goal) for the (obtaining the) prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

15. Let us therefore, as many as be [12] perfect (or thoroughly instructed in our Christian duty) be thus minded (as I have told you I am, i. e. so as to believe the circumcision of the spirit, not that of the flesh, and the righteousness which is of God by faith, are the things especially to be regarded for the obtaining of this prize): and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded (imagining the Judaical performances may also commend you to God), God shall (in due time) reveal even this unto you (i. e. he will convince you of the no necessity of these things in order to his favour).

16. Nevertheless (in the meantime), whereto we have already attained (i. e. as far as we have attained to the knowledge of it), let us walk by the same rule, (viz. that circumcision availeth nothing, but a new creature, Gal. vi. 15, 16.) let us mind the same thing.

17. Brethren, be (ye) followers together of me (in this matter, who have renounced all my Jewish privileges), and mark them (for your patterns) who walk so, as ye have us for an example (of the spiritual circumcision, and of minding the prize of our high calling).

18. For many (zealots for the law so) walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ:

19. [13] Whose end is destruction, whose god is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things.

20. (Imitate us, I say,) for [14] our conversation (or our city) is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ:

21. Who shall change [15] our vile body (now subject to corruption, passions, and sorrows), that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. ΑΣΦΑΛΕΣ, It is safe.] viz. Because things only delivered by word of mouth may slip out of memory, Litera scripta manet. Here is St. Paul's judgment against oral tradition.

[2] Ver. 2. Τοὺς κύνας, Dogs.] It is the observation of the fathers,* that the name of dogs was anciently given to the gentiles, as being without the covenant, according to those words of Christ, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and give it to dogs: but with the things the names are now changed, they being now without the covenant, and the believing gentiles admitted to it; and therefore they are called the children, but the Jews dogs. And it is well noted by Dr. Lightfoot,† that our Lord used this language, Matt. xv. 26. Not to express his own sentiments of the gentiles, but in compliance with the common language of the Jews, who proverbially said, The gentiles are likened to dogs, whereas we are God's peculiar people, even his sons and daughters. Where also is observed by the same worthy person, that even the Talmudists say of the generation in which the Messiah, or the Son of David, should come, that the synagogues should become stews, and the faces of that generation shall be as dogs.

[3] Evil-workers.] For they labour only to pull down God's building, and to destroy the church of Christ. Elsewhere he styles them deceitful workers, 2 Cor. xi. 13. not speaking of the gnostics, as some imagine, but of the Jews; for so it follows: Are they Hebrews? Are they Israelites? so am I, ver. 22.

[4] Τὴν κατατομὴν, The concision.] For circumcision being no longer a rite of entering into covenant with God, it is no better than a cutting off the flesh; and they, who still insisted on it as a thing necessary to justification and salvation, cut themselves off from Christ. (Gal. v. 2, 3.)

[5] Ver. 3. No confidence in the flesh.] That the Jews had a great confidence in the merit of circumcision, see note on Rom. ii. 13.

[6] Ver. 5. Περιτομὴ ὀκταήμερος, Circumcised the eighth day.] The Jews themselves say, that circumcision before that time was no circumcision, and after that time it was of lesser value: (see Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. 4. p. 109.) and Origen* informs us, that the Jews held, that the circumcision performed on the eighth day, was that which was chiefly intended, and that the performing it on any other day was only allowed in case of sickness. Hence they thought it necessary to circumcise a child on the sabbath-day, though all manner of work was forbidden on that day, rather than defer circumcision a day beyond the time, (John vii. 22.) and made it a rule, that † the rest of the sabbath gives place to circumcision. And this opinion, as it agrees with the text, Gen. xvii. 12. so it seems to have obtained long before our Saviour's time; for the Septuagint and the Samaritan version read thus, The uncircumcised male, who is not circumcised, τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ ὀγδόῃ, the eighth day, shall be cut off, he hath broken my covenant, Gen. xvii. 14.

[7] Ver. 8. Διὰ τὸ ὑπερέχον τῆς γνώσεως Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ, For the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus.] There hath been a sharp contention about the import of these plain words; some contending, that the apostle here intends the knowledge of the person of our Lord, and of his offices, and of the benefits which he hath purchased for us in his person, and doth convey to us by his offices: and others pleading, that it is the knowledge of the gospel of Christ which is here intended, and the excellency of it which is here commended; whereas I think there is no real difference betwixt these two opinions: for we know nothing of the person and of the offices of Christ, or of the benefits which he hath purchased for us, and conveys to us by them, but by the revelation of the gospel, and so the excellency of his person and offices, and of that gospel which reveals them to us, must be in effect the same; nor would the knowledge of the gospel be so excellent, were it not for the revelation of the dignity of his person and of his offices, and of the benefits we receive from them.

[8] Ver. 9. Τὴν ἐκ Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην, The righteousness of God.] That the righteousness of God, in St. Paul's style, doth always signify the righteousness by faith in Christ Jesus dying for us, see note on Rom. i. 17. And hence it is evident, that the apostle cannot here speak of the righteousness of Christ imputed to us: for, (1.) he does not oppose to his own righteousness, which is of the law, the righteousness of Christ imputed to him, but his own faith in Christ imputed unto him for righteousness, Rom. iv. 5. (2.) He speaks of his faith in Christ dying and shedding his blood for him; and therefore not of his active obedience, constituting us righteous as Christ was, but of his passive obedience, procuring for us justification, or the remission of sins.

[9] Ver. 10. Καὶ τὴν δύναμιν, &c. The power of his resurrection.] i. e. The power exercised in his resurrection, by which we are begotten to a lively hope of an inheritance incorruptible, (1 Pet. i. 3, 4.) and are assured of our own resurrection, (2 Cor. iv. 14. Colos. ii. 12.) this being that knowledge he so earnestly requests for his Ephesians, (i. 19, 20.) and also the power of it, to assure us of our justification through faith in him, (Rom. iv. 24, 25.) and of our freedom from condemnation. (Rom. viii. 34.)

[10] Τὴν κοινωνίαν, &c. The fellowship of his sufferings.] By being conformed to his death: (1.) spiritually, by dying unto sin; as knowing that if we be thus conformed to him in the likeness of his death, we shall be like unto him in his resurrection, and shall live with him. (Rom. vi. 5. 8.) And (2.) by suffering and taking up the cross for his sake; as knowing that if we thus suffer with him, we shall be also glorified with him. (Rom. viii. 17. 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12. 1 Pet. iv. 13.)

[11] Ver. 12—14. Ὡς ἐπὶ δρόμεως τὰ πάντα λέγει.] He in these verses makes a continual allusion to the race run in the Olympian games, where he that ran was still ἔμπροσθεν ἐκτεινόμενος, upon the stretch, and pressing forwards, without looking back to those whom he had left behind; and pursuing the goal, that first coming to it, he might catch hold of the prize, and so be crowned with it. And two things are here noted by the fathers, worthy of our observation:

(1.) That if this great apostle who had suffered so many things, and was in deaths often, and who had laboured so abundantly; οὔπω ἐθάῤῥει περὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως ἐκείνης, was not yet confident of a blessed resurrection, but only striving, if so be he might attain unto it: such as we must have less ground of confidence.

(2.) What continual diligence and labour this pursuit requires; for you know, saith Chrysostom, with what great stretch the pursuer runs; he looks upon no man, he throws out of the way every thing that might hinder him; he employs his body, eye, strength, soul, and mind, upon the work, πρὸς ἕτερον μὲν οὐδὲν ὁρῶν, πρὸς δὲ τὸ βραβεῖον μόνον, looking to nothing else, but only to the prize.

[12] Ver. 15. Τέλειοι, Perfect.] That to be perfect, is to be sufficiently instructed in the true grounds and principles of Christian faith, hath been shewed, note on 1 Cor. ii. 6. and on Matt. xix. 21. and by comparing this passage with the discourse of the same apostle in his fifth and sixth chapters to the Galatians, we may learn what it is, τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν κάνονι, to walk by the same rule: for as there he sharply inveighs against the Galatians, for hearkening to the teachers of the necessity of circumcision; so here he warns his Philippians to beware of them, and their doctrine, from ver. 2. to 7. as there he opposeth to circumcision the cross of Christ, in which alone he gloried, Gal. vi. 14. so here he opposeth to it, the fellowship of his sufferings, ver. 8, 9. as there he says, he is persuaded of his Galatians, that οὐδὲν ἄλλο φρονήσουσιν, they will be no otherwise minded, Gal. v. 10. so here he exhorts his Philippians, τοῦτο φρονεῖν, to mind the same thing, ver. 16. as there he teaches them by his own example, not to yield to those who urged on them circumcision, Gal. ii. 14. 20. so here he exhorts the Philippians to walk in this case, as they had him for an example, ver. 17. which example he had laid before them, ver. 4. 9. and as there he promised mercy and peace, τῷ κανόνι τούτῳ στοιχήσουσιν, to them that walked by the rule, or canon, he had laid them down, Gal. vi. 15, 16. so here he admonisheth the Philippians, τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν κανόνι, to walk by the same rule: this rule must therefore be that which he there lays down, that in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature. Those who are fully persuaded of this, he styles the perfect, requiring of them a life exactly conformed to this rule, from others only as far as they had attained to the knowledge of it, informing them that the time was at hand, when God, by destroying the Jewish temple, and dissolving the Jewish church and economy, would farther reveal this truth to them, and convince them of the vanity of these Judaical performances.

* Λέγουσι δὲ οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι τὴν μὲν ὀκταήμερον περιτομὴν εἶναι τὴν προηγουμένην, τὴν δὲ μὴ τοιαύτην ἐκ περιστάσεως. Contra Celsum, lib. v. p. 263.

[13] Ver. 19. Ὧν τὸ τέλος, Whose end is destruction.] That the description here given of these men, agrees well with the manners of the gnostics, cannot be denied; but yet that the apostle speaketh not of them, but of the Jews, most ancient and modern commentators do assert: and there seems reason to prefer this latter exposition, (1.) because he saith, he had told his Philippians often of these men: now, ver. 1. he informs them, that he then writ to them of the same things which he had before spoken to them by word of mouth, viz. that they should beware of those Jews whom he there styles dogs, evil-workers, the concision. (2.) He opposes his own example, who had renounced all his Jewish privileges, and the example of those who worship God in the Spirit, and rejoiced in Christ Jesus, and had no confidence in the flesh, ver. 3. 17. to the example of these men. And, (3.) the description he gives of them is agreeable to what he elsewhere saith of the same Jews. For,

First, They were enemies to the cross of Christ; that being not only a stumbling-block to the unbelieving Jews, (1 Cor. i. 23.) but being also overthrown by them who preached up the necessity of circumcision and of legal observations to salvation: from hence, saith the apostle, it follows, that Christ is dead in vain, Gal. ii. 21. and that then the scandal of the cross is ceased, Gal. v. 10. and that Christ would profit them nothing, who were upon this account circumcised, Gal. v. 2. and that they were fallen from grace, ver. 4. And from the apostle's discourse in the beginning of this chapter, it appears, saith Esthius, that he here speaketh of these men.

Secondly, That their end was to be destruction, the apostle teacheth in these words, Such are false apostles, deceitful workers, whose end shall be according to their works, 2 Cor. xi. 13. 15. And this he speaks of them who were Hebrews and Israelites, ver. 22. as also here, ver. 4.

Thirdly, That their god was their belly, i. e. that they chiefly had regard to that, as we learn from the same apostle, saying, These serve not the Lord, but their own bellies; which, saith Theodoret, he speaks of the evil defenders of the law; (see note on Rom. xvi. 18.) and that they were γαστρίμαργοι, slow bellies, or luxurious people (Tit. i. 12. see note there); and that they devoured those they perverted. (2 Cor. xi. 20.) Their glory was in their shame; that is, say the ancient fathers, in the circumcision of the shameful member: say others, in those evil works, (ver. 2.) which ought to be the matter of their shame, they being such as blasphemed the name of God among the gentiles, Rom. ii. 24. they minded earthly things, counting gain godliness, 1 Tim. vi. 5. Tit. i. 11.

[14] Ver. 20. Ἡμῶν γὰρ τὸ πολίτευμα ἐν οὐρανοῖς, Our conversation is in heaven.] So Philo* represents God's priests and prophets; for having said of men, οἱ μὲν γῆς, οἱ δὲ οὐρανοῦ, some are of the earth, some of heaven; he adds, that of the latter sort are priests and prophets, who transcending all sensual things would not be called κοσμοπολῖται, citizens of the world; but translating themselves into the intellectual world, dwell there, ἐγγραφέντες ἀφθάρτων ἀσωμάτων ἰδεῶν πολιτείᾳ, being enrolled in the policy of incorporeal and incorruptible beings. They, saith the apostle, mind earthly things, and so are κοσμοπολῖται, men who have this world for their city; " nos autem civitatem cælum habemus;" but we have heaven for our city (as Budæus renders the words), as living in expectation of a city whose builder and maker is God, Heb. xi. 10.

[15] Ver. 21. Τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν, Our vile body.] The body of our humiliation; that is, saith Methodius, our body which ταπεινοῦται ἀπὸ σφάλματος, is humbled by the fall, and become mortal.—That body (saith Irenæus*) which is humbled by falling into the earth, and which shall be transformed from a mortal and corruptible, into an immortal and incorruptible body.

Note here, (1.) what a value is put upon the resurrection and redemption of the body from corruption, as if it were the chief thing which Christians waited for, and expected from our Saviour at his coming. (Rom. viii. 23.)

(2.) Note, the Divine power is Christ, to whom is here ascribed that resurrection, which is frequently made an indication of the Godhead, it being God who raiseth from the dead, (Rom. iv. 17. Acts xxvi. 6.) and which is ascribed to the exceeding greatness and to the energy of his mighty power, (Eph. i. 19.) and yet is here ascribed to the energy of Christ. And,

(3.) Note the pious observation of the fathers, that their folly can never be sufficiently lamented, who deprive themselves of such a glorious resurrection. So Œcumenius and Theophylact.

Note, (4.) that Philo† and the Platonists so call these bodies, ὡς ταπείνωσιν ἐπάγοντα τῇ ψυχῇ, because these earthly tabernacles do humble and depress the soul. See also the reading of the text defended, Examen Millii, ibid.

CHAP. IV.

1. THEREFORE, my brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved, (as those who do expect his coming to confer these blessings on you, 1 Cor. xv. 58. or, so stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free, as I have taught you, Gal. v. 1.)

2. I beseech Euodias, and beseech Syntyche, that they be of the same mind [1] in (the concerns of) the Lord.

3. And I entreat thee also, true [2] yoke-fellow, help those women who laboured with me in the (promotion of the) gospel, with Clemens also, and others my fellow-labourers, [3] whose names are written in the book of life.

4. Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice.

5. Let [4] your moderation be known unto all men: (for) the [5] Lord is at hand.

6. Be careful (anxiously solicitous) for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication (Gr. deprecation), with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known (i. e. presented) unto God.

7. And [6] the peace of God which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds (steadfast) in Christ Jesus.

8. [7] Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, if there be any (thing) praise-(worthy), think on these things (to do them).

9. Those things, which you have both learned, and received, and heard (from me), and seen in me, do: and the God of peace (the giver of internal peace) shall be with you.

10. But [8] I rejoiced (ἐχάρην δὲ, for this cause I rejoiced) in the Lord greatly, that now at the last your care of me (i. e. to supply my wants) hath flourished again; [9] wherein you were also careful, but you lacked opportunity.

11. Not that I speak (this) in respect of (any desire in me, that you, or others, should supply my) wants: for I learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content.

12. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where, and in all things, I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need.

13. [10] I can do all (these, and other) things (required by Christianity) through Christ that strengthens me.

14. (But) notwithstanding (this my proficiency) ye have well done, that ye did (thus) communicate with (me in) my affliction.

15. Now, ye Philippians, know also (for your honour), that in the beginning of (my preaching) the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me, as concerning giving and receiving, but you only, (i. e. I have received supplies from no other church but yours.

16. You indeed kindly did it;) for even (when I was) in Thessalonica ye sent once and again to (supply) my necessities.

17. (And of this I remind you) not that I desire a (farther) gift (for my own benefit); but (because) I desire fruit that may abound to your account (in the day of the Lord, who will not then forget your labour of love, in ministering to his saints, Heb. vi. 10.

18. I say, not that I desire more:) for I have (received) all (that can be needful for me), and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, (which are) an odour of a sweet smell, [11] a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God.

19. But (and) my God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory, (i. e. his glorious riches) by Christ Jesus (i. e. he shall return you a supply of your spiritual wants, for your charity to me in temporals).

20. Now unto God and (i. e. who is) our Father be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

21. Salute every saint in Christ Jesus. The brethren which are with me greet you.

22. All the saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Cæsar's household.

23. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 2. ΤΟ᾽ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, To mind the same thing,] Here, is not to be of the same judgment in all things; for no man can become of the same judgment with another by entreaty, but only by conviction: the exhortation therefore is, (1.) to have the same love to one another. (ii. 2.) with the same soul and spirit to promote the gospel of Christ, (i. 27.) to walk by the same rule, as far as they have attained to the knowledge of it, (iii. 16, 17.)

[2] Ver. 3. Σύζυγε, Yoke-fellow.] That this yoke-fellow cannot be St. Paul's wife, is certain; because he declares himself an unmarried man, 1 Cor. vii. 7. i. e. either a virgin or a widower. Secondly, Because a woman cannot be styled γνήσιε, but γνησία σύζυγε· it is unlikely he should mean Epaphroditus, he being not then at Philippi, but with him at Rome: (ver. 11.) it may be therefore one of the rulers of the church, whom he saluted in the front of this Epistle.

[3] Ἐν βίβλῳ ζωῆς, Whose names are written in the book of life.] This is a Judaical phrase, viz. they are written for life, Isa. iv. 3. (see the Targum there:) and they shall not be written in the book of eternal life, which is written for the just of the house of Israel, Targum in Ezek. xiii. 9. and it doth not signify the absolute election of any to eternal life, but only their present right to that inheritance, by virtue of the obedience of faith. (Rev. xx. 15. xxi. 7.) For (1.) the apostle declares of all the Jews to whom he writ, that they were come to the general assembly of the first-born, who were written in heaven, Heb. xii. 23. and yet he in the following verse saith to them, See that ye refuse not him that speaketh. (2.) Christ threateneth to some, that he would blot their names out of the book of life, Rev. xxii. 19. and promiseth to him that overcometh, that he would not blot his name out of the book of life, Rev. iii. 5. And God himself saith to Moses, Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of the book which I have written, Exod. xxxii. 32, 33. that is, out of the book of the just, saith the Targum of Jonathan.

The Apostolical Constitutions say,* we come to be written in this book, τῇ ἡμετέρᾳ εὐνοίᾳ καὶ σπουδῇ, by our good affection and industry. St. Basil,† that as men are written in this book, when they are converted from vice to virtue; so may they be blotted out of it, when they backslide from virtue to vice, according to the saying of the Psalmist, Psal. lxix. 28. Let them be blotted out of the book of the living, and not written with the righteous; that is, saith Ainsworth, Let them be cut off from being any longer thy people, or registered in the writing of the house of Israel. And, saith St. Jerome, They were written in the book of God, who in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, "legem fortissimè defenderant," firmly continued in the law, and they were blotted out of it, "qui legis prævaricatores extiterant," who were deserters of it.

[4] Ver. 5. Τὸ ἐπιεικὲς, Your moderation.] Your meekness and patience under all your trials: Be ye patient (saith St. James), for the coming of the Lord is at hand, v. 8. (See Heb. x. 36, 37.) This is almost the constant sense of the Greek word in the Septuagint, where it answers to חנן, and סלח, and signifies to be gracious and propitious, 1 Sam. xii. 22. Ezra ix. 4. Psal. lxxxv. 4. Ἐποίησας εἰς ἡμᾶς κατὰ πᾶσαν ἐπιείκειάν σου, Thou hast dwelt with us according to all thy goodness, and thy great mercy. So Cant. pueror. ver. 18. Let us torture the just man, that we may know, τὴν ἐπιείκειαν αὐτοῦ, his meekness, Wisd. ii. 19. Thou judgest, ἐν ἐπιεικείᾳ, with mildness, xii. 18. He will yield to your desires, ἐπιεικῶς καὶ φιλανθρώπως, favourably and kindly, 2 Macc. ix. 27. So the Syriac and Arabic, who render it mansuetudo vestra. So Phavorinus, ἐπιεικὴς, πραΰς, παρὰ τὸ εἴκειν, τὸ ὑποχωρεῖν; and yet that τὸ ἐπιεικὲς is well rendered moderation, is certain; for, ἐπιείκεια is rendered by Phavorinus, μετριότης, moderation, ἐπιεικῶς by Suidas and Phavorinus, μετρίως ἤτοι συμμέτρως, moderately, or in measure; ἐπιεικὴς and ἐπιεικὸς by Hesychius and Suidas, μέτριος, that is, moderate; and in the same Suidas, ἐπιεικῶς ζῆσεσθαι, is to live moderately, that is temperately; and ἐπιεικῶς γεγράφθαι, is to be written moderately, without bitterness or passion.

Now because this moderation is much talked of, but neither rightly understood, nor duly practised, I shall endeavour to shew what is the proper import of the word, and what are the proper objects of it. And,

First, Moderation is not derived from the word medium, but from modus; and that is from the Hebrew, madad, he measured; or middah, a rule, or measure; and in the Greek is styled, μετριότης, from μέτρον, a measure; whence it is evident, that moderation, properly so called, and in the moral sense of the word, belongs only to things, in which we are subject to a vicious excess; or to act beyond that rule or measure, which Scripture or religion doth prescribe for the due regulation of our actions and passions; and it respects, first and principally, the government of our passions; whence the due government of them, is by philosophers styled μετριοπαθεία, the moderation of our passions. Now they are either our concupiscible passions, that is, passions of desire, and then the moderation required of us must consist in such a government or restraint of our affections and desires, that in our love, desire of, or our delight in, any thing, we never do exceed the worth or excellency of the object, or of the end we do pursue; or,

Secondly, Our angry passions, which render us averse from things or persons, or displeased with them, and then we moderate these passions, when,

(1.) We have no aversion from, or hatred to, or displeasure against, those things, which have no real evil in them, and so can be no proper objects of our aversation, or displeasure: or, (2.) when we are not more displeased at, or grieved for, any thing, than reason, or the laws of Christianity permit us so to be; for then we can never exceed the measure of that aversation and displeasure, which reason and Christianity allow, and so we never should offend in the exertion of our angry passions. And with respect to this, the wise man saith, He that is slow to anger, is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city. (3.) This moderation must be extended to the effects of these passions; (1.) in the tongue, by evil speeches; whence the good man is said to moderate his words with discretion, Psal. cxii. 5. (2.) In his actions proceeding from those appetites, as in our pursuit of temporal good things; and in our strife and contentions about them. And, (3.) in the effects of our angry passions, that is, in our deportment to, and our punishment of, offenders. Now, hence it follows,

First, That moderation can have only place in things which are not always evil in themselves, but become so by exceeding that rule and measure which is prescribed for the due management of them. This word must therefore be abused, and falsely used, when it is applied to things which are always evil in themselves, in what degree soever they are done. They therefore abuse this word, who talk of whoring moderately, or being moderately wicked; for what we neither ought to be, or do at all, can never be done moderately, or without exceeding the rule we ought to walk by.

Secondly, Hence it is demonstratively evident, that moderation is always a virtue, it being always virtuous to restrain the excesses of our passions and appetites, and the exorbitances of our angry passions, and to regulate our words and actions, according to the rule and measure by which we ought to act.

Thirdly, Hence observe, that they who render the word ἐπιείκεια, here used, meekness and patience, mildness or gentleness, mean the same thing as they who render it moderation; for meekness, gentleness, mildness, is only the due moderation of our angry passions, in respect to those injuries and provocations which we meet with in this world. And patience is that virtue which teacheth us to suffer any worldly evil without murmuring, discontent, or discomposing our spirits, and results evidently from a due moderation of our affections to these things; and this seems clearly to be the import of the word in this text: for, saith the apostle, ver. 4. though you are sufferers with me for the sake of Christ, yet rejoice always; and, ver. 6. μὴ μεριμνᾶτε, be not anxious about any temporal concerns, or events; let not either your care for them, or fear of losing them, distract your spirits, but let your moderation, as to these things, be known unto all men, ver. 5. for the Lord is at hand, to protect, preserve, support you, and to reward your patience and resignation, as to these affairs.

Fourthly, And whereas, by a late author, this moderation of the passions, and of our concerns about things suitably to their nature, is commended highly; but, saith he, the moderation pleaded for by many, hath no affinity with this virtue: in this he is exceedingly mistaken, for all the moderation that hath, or can be pleaded for by men of sense and reason, is only this, that men would be concerned for things suitably to their natures; that as for things indifferent and mutable, they would be indifferent in their concerns about them; neither quarrelling with the church established, nor refusing communion with her, because she doth enjoin them; nor being so stiff in the retaining of them, as not to suffer mutable things to be changed by the same power by which they were at first appointed, when the wisdom of our governors shall think this fit for the good of the church, which is the moderation of *the church of England; and that men would set such a true value upon peace, union, and charity, which are great Christian virtues, and very beneficial to the church, as to let indifferent and circumstantial rites give place to those more necessary things, when these governors, the proper judges in that case, think there is ground of hope, that they may be promoted by a little yielding in those things which do not commend us to God, or by a change of some doubtful, and even innocent expressions, into expressions which remove the doubt, and minister no occasion of offence to the weak.

This I conceive is the true import of the word moderation, when it refers to actions and passions, words and censures, subject to a vicious excess.

Sometimes the adjective moderate, or adverb moderately, hath respect to measures either of things dry, or liquid; and then it is not a measure of things moral, or as they are capable of being good or evil; but as they are more or less, great or small, high or low, long or short, or of a middle nature betwixt both; and in this sense, a man is said to be moderately learned, wise, or rich; and hence you may perceive the fallacy they put upon us, who say moderation is not always a virtue, because it is no virtue to be moderately learned, or wise; this being that which logicians call μετάθεσις εἰς ἄλλο γένος, or a transition from one meaning of the word to another, which always makes the syllogism to consist of four terms, and therefore the conclusion false: for whensoever moderation is required, or commendable, there the excess is always vicious and blameworthy; whereas it is rather commendable, and an ornament of the mind, to be more than moderately wise and learned, and no disparagement to be more than moderately rich.

[5] Ὁ Κύριος ἐγγύς, The Lord is at hand.] So the apostle thought, saith Grotius upon the place; tacitly insinuating, that they were mistaken in this matter: but this exposition reflecting very injuriously upon the authority of the apostles, and the Spirit by which they spake; and that of the fathers, ἡ κρίσις ἤδη ἐπέστη, the day of judgment is at hand, being found by experience false, we of necessity must have recourse to some other exposition of their words, when they so often tell the Christians to whom they write, that the Lord is at hand; that he stands even at the door, James v. 9. that the coming of the Lord draweth nigh, ver. 8. that the end of all things is at hand, 1 Pet. iv. 7. that the day of the Lord is near, Heb. x. 25. that it is but a little while, and ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he that is coming will come, and will not tarry: I say, we must of necessity, for exposition of these places, have recourse to some other advent of our Lord: for it is by no means to be granted, that the apostles were mistaken in their apprehensions of this matter, and that they confidently asserted, that the great day of judgment was then at hand; when after sixteen hundred years it is yet far off, the destruction of antichrist, the calling of the Jews, and the millenium, succeeding these great epochas, being to precede that day. For this bold conjecture shakes the foundations of the Christian faith; it imputes not only fallibility, but actual falsehood, to the writers of these Epistles, and makes them guilty of falsehood in the promises of the New Testament, and in the motives which they used, to encourage believers to a Christian patience under the pressures they endured, and renders them deceivers of their hopes. Let it be therefore noted,

First, That these expressions are chiefly used in the catholic epistles, and the Epistle to the Hebrews; that is, in the epistles directed to the Jewish churches, who were no strangers to these phrases, and who were well acquainted with a tremendous advent of the Lord to punish the rebellions and infidelity of that nation: so, for instance, Joel ii. 1. All the inhabitants of the land (of Judah) shall be confounded, ὅτι πάρεστιν ἡμέρα Κυρίου ὅτι ἐγγύς, because the day of the Lord is at hand, a day of darkness and gloominess; a day of clouds and of thick darkness. And, ver. 11. The day of the Lord is great and very terrible, who can abide it? And, ver. 31. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come; Zech. xiv. 1, 2. Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, and I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle; Mal. iii. 2. Who may abide in the day of his coming, and who shall stand when he appeareth? And, iv. 1. Behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven.

Secondly, There is also frequent mention of this time and day in the New Testament, when the Lord would come to destroy the unbelieving Jews, and also of the nearness of that time; for the Baptist calls them to repentance from this very motive, that the axe was then laid to the root of the tree, Matt. iii. 10. that one was coming whose fan was in his hand, ver. 12. Our Saviour spends a whole chapter in speaking, περὶ ἡμέρας ταύτης, of that day, Matt. xxiv. 36. and of the coming of the Son of man to the destruction of that nation, ver. 27. 37. of the coming of the Lord, ver. 42. of the age in which he would thus come, ver. 34. of the signs when his coming was, ἐγγὺς, near at hand, καὶ ἐπὶ θύραις, at the door (which are the very words, both of St. Paul and St. James); when there would be a τέλος, an end of all things belonging to the Jewish temple and constitution, ver. 14. Now to this coming of the Lord, foretold by his own self in the very expressions of the prophets, and in the words used here by the apostles, in their writings to the Jewish converts, we may very well refer the words forecited, and if there be any other of like nature.

And the fitness of these exhortations to meekness and patience, on the account of the nearness of this day, and the advent of the Lord to punish the unbelieving Jews, will be apparent from this consideration, that they were the chief persecutors of those of their own nation who embraced the Christian faith, (Rom. xv. 31. 1 Thess. ii. 14.) and they also sent out their messengers to other nations, to represent the Christians to them as the worst of men, and to excite them to join with them in the persecution of them, as Justin Martyr doth inform us; and therefore it must be very acceptable to the poor persecuted Christian Jews, to hear that these enemies of the cross of Christ, these instigators of the heathen to persecute them, should, by the coming of the Lord to destroy their church and nation, be disabled from doing them any farther mischief; and also, that those deceitful workers of the same nation, who troubled the churches with preaching the necessity of circumcision, and the observation of the law of Moses, should not be able long to instil those doctrines, their church and temple being to be shortly ruined, and they themselves being no longer able to observe the law.

[6] Ver. 7. Εἰρήνη Θεοῦ, The peace of God.] As ἀγάπη Θεοῦ and χάρις Θεοῦ, do generally signify the love and favour of God to us, so εἰρήνη Θεοῦ, the peace of God, most naturally imports the peace and reconciliation which we have with God through faith in Christ; for being justified by faith, we have peace with God: hence is the gospel, which proclaims this pardon and justification to believers, styled the gospel of peace, Eph. vi. 15. the preaching peace by Jesus Christ, Acts x. 30. Eph. ii. 17. who is our peace, ver. 14. and in the preface to all the Epistles, the apostle wisheth to the Christians, χάριν καὶ εἰρήνην, grace and peace through God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ: and this peace is styled, εἰρήνη ψυχῆς, the peace of the soul, Hag. ii. 9. So that the sense of these words seemeth to be this; The sense and experience of the Divine favour, and the inward peace and security which arise from it, shall be sufficient to keep you steadfast in the faith of Christ. He promiseth not deliverance from calamities, but inward peace and tranquillity of mind under them, and that as the effect of constant prayer, and a sense of the Divine favour to them.

[7] Ver. 8.] Hence two things may be noted: 1. That there are things naturally honest, just, lovely, and praiseworthy. 2. That there is no virtue, nothing praiseworthy, but what falls under the compass of this general precept.

[8] Ver. 10. I rejoiced in the Lord.] i. e. In your liberality, not as a thing tending only to supply my wants, but as a thing highly acceptable to the Lord, (ver. 8.) and as a fruit of your affection to him, which he will reward, (ver. 17.)

[9] Ἐν ᾧ ἐφρονεῖτε ἠκαιρεῖσθε δὲ, Of which thing you were still mindful, but you wanted ability.] Οὐκ εἴχετε ἐν χερσὶν, οὐδὲ ἐν ἀφθονίᾳ ἦτε, you had it not in your hands, you were not in a condition to help me; so Theodoret, Chrysostom, Theophilus, though Œcumenius and Phavorinus render it, with our translation, καιρὸν οὐκ εἴχετε, you lacked opportunity.

[10] Ver. 13.] Hence the fathers observe three things: (1.) That the art of contentment requires much learning, exercise, and meditation. (2.) That it is as difficult to learn how to be full, as to be hungry; abundance having destroyed more than penury, and exposed them to more pernicious lusts. (3.) That our proficience in this, or any other virtue, is to be ascribed not to ourselves, but to the Divine assistance.

[11] Ver. 18. Ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας, A sacrifice acceptable.] There were two altars, saith Dr. Hammond, in the temple of the Jews, the altar of incense within the temple, and that of sacrifice without in the court: on these two were offered all things that were offered to God, and under these two heads, an odour of incense and a sacrifice, are works of charity here represented, as being the prime things now under the gospel to obtain God's favour and acceptation.

EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

THAT St. Paul writ this Epistle to the Colossians when he had not yet seen them, is the opinion of most of the ancient scholiasts: this is confessed even by Theodoret, though he saith this doth not follow from the words cited to confirm this opinion, but the contrary. The words are these: I would have you know what great solicitude I have for you, and for them of Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh, Colos. ii. 1. which he renders thus; Not for you only, and for them of Laodicea, but also for them that have not seen my face in the flesh: but the connective particle being not ἀλλὰ, or ἀλλὰ καὶ, but also, but only καὶ, and, seems to favour our translation, and the opinion of the ancients.* He adds, that the apostle went from Phrygia, of which Colosse was the metropolis; whence he collects he must have preached there: but this will not follow; since the first time he only went through Phrygia en passant, Acts xvi. 6. and the second time, xviii. 23. he only stayed to confirm the brethren already converted; but that he came to Colosse, is not said. The arguments offered to prove he had not seen them, seem stronger, as appears not only from the words now cited, but from other expressions in the same Epistle; for he intimates, i. 4. that he had only heard of their faith in Christ; and, ver. 7. that they had learned the faith not from him, but Epaphras, whom he styles, to them a faithful minister of Jesus Christ.

Note also, that this Epistle was writ at the same time with that to the Philippians, and so A. D. 62.

As for the occasion of it, Theodoret* informs us, that it was writ against those Jewish Christians who endeavoured to impose the observation of the law upon the gentile converts, as is apparent from his caution to them, to beware of them who spoiled them after the rudiments of the world, ii. 8. and that because they were circumcised in Christ, ver. 11. and he had blotted out the hand-writing of ordinances which was against them, ver. 14. and from the inference thence made, Let no man judge you therefore in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holiday, or of the new moons, or of the sabbath-days; which are a shadow, ver. 16, 17. The rest say, that it was written against them who sowed among them Jewish and heathenish doctrines;† and in particular against them who endeavoured to bring in the

CHAP. I.

1. PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother,

2. [1] To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ which are at Colosse (writeth thus): Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3. We give thanks to God [2] and (who is) the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you,

4. Since [3] we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints; (which love is still the fruit of a true faith, 1 Cor. xiii. 2. Gal. v. 6.

5. We give thanks, I say,) for the hope (of an eternal inheritance, 1 Pet. i. 3.) which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before (from Epaphras) in the word of the truth of the gospel (preached by him);

6. Which (gospel) is come to you, as it is (also heard of) [4] in all the world; and bringeth forth fruit (in them), as it doth also in you, since the day ye (first) heard of it, and knew (ἐπέγνωτε, acknowledged) the grace (and favour) of God (to you) in truth (and sincerity):

7. As ye (have) also learned of Epaphras our dear fellow-servant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ;

8. Who also declared to us your love (to me) in the Spirit (your spiritual and affectionate love to me, wrought in you by that Spirit whose fruit is love).

9. For this cause we also, since the day we heard of it (i. e. this your affection to us), do not cease to pray for you, and to desire (of God) that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will (advancing) [5] in all (the gifts of) wisdom and spiritual understanding.

10. That (having thus attained to the knowledge of the things of God) ye might walk worthy [6] of the Lord unto all pleasing (i. e. so as to please him in all things), being fruitful in every good work, and increasing (still more) in the knowledge of God;

11. (That knowing the hope of your calling, and the riches of the glory of the inheritance of the saints, Eph. i. 19. Rom. xv. 13. ye may be) strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness; (Eph. iii. 16. i. e. that through the Spirit of glory and power, 1 Pet. iv. 14. 2 Tim. i. 7. given to you, you may be enabled constantly to suffer all afflictions you endure for the sake of Christ, and of the glory he hath promised, with patience and joy.)

12. Giving thanks to the Father, [7] who hath (thus prepared and) made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light (for which we suffer, 2 Thess. i. 5.)

13. Who hath delivered us from the [8] power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son (or the Son of his love):

14. [9] In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of (our) sins: (see note on Eph. i. 7.)

15. [10] Who is the image (and representation to us) of the invisible God, [11] the first-born (or Lord) of every creature:

16. For [12] by him (who is the first-born of every creature) were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible (the sun, moon, and stars,) and invisible (the whole host of angels), whether they be (named) thrones, or dominions, principalities, or powers: all things were created by him (as the cause), and for him (as the end of their creation):

17. And he is before all things (as to his being), and by him all things consist.

18. And he is the head of the body, the church (Gr. of the church, as to government and gracious influences): who is the beginning (of the Christian church), the first-born [13] from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence.

19. [14] For it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness (of Divine power) dwell (all fulness of power to create, redeem, preserve, and raise the church, which is his body);

20. And, having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to [15] reconcile all things to himself (Gr. and by him to make all things friendly in him, making peace betwixt them by the blood of his cross); by him, I say (did he thus reconcile all things), whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven.

21. And you (gentiles), that were sometimes alienated (from the life of God, Eph. iv. 18.) and enemies in your mind (to him) by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled (to the Father)

22. In the body of his flesh through death, to present you (to the Father) holy, and unblamable, and unreprovable, in his sight; (Eph. i. 4. v. 7.

23. [16] As you will be,) if you continue in the faith grounded and settled (in it), and be not moved away (by the floods of affliction, or by the blasts of persecution, which may come upon you, Matt. vii. 24, 25.) from the hope of the gospel, (i. e. the hope laid up for you in heaven, ver. 5.) which you have heard (of from Epaphras, viz. the hope) which was preached to every creature under heaven (i. e. gentile as well as Jew); whereof I Paul am made a minister.

24. Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the [17] afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church:

25. Whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you (gentiles), to fulfil (πληρῶσαι, fully to preach) the word of God;

26. Even the mystery (of the calling of the gentiles to the same hopes and privileges with the believing Jews, Eph. iii. 3—6.) which hath been hid from (past) ages and from (former) generations, (ver. 5.) but now is made manifest (by the apostles and prophets) to his saints:

27. To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the gentiles; (Eph. iii. 8, 9.) which is Christ (preached to, and received) in (i. e. among) you, (as) the hope of glory:

28. Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all (spiritual) wisdom; that (so) we may present every man perfect (i. e. fully instructed, see note on Eph. iv. 13.) in Christ Jesus:

29. Whereunto (εἰς ὅ, for which thing) I also labour, (earnestly) striving according to his working, who worketh in me mightily, (i. e. according to the mighty power of God

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 2. TO the saints.] See note on 1 Cor. i. 1. Note also, that the Holy Ghost is mentioned in these places, because he is the fountain of this grace, and by him God the Father and the Son dwell in us; (John xiv. 23.) so that praying for this grace is praying for the communion of the Holy Ghost.

[2] Ver. 3. Εὐχαριστοῦμεν, We give thanks.] From this and the ninth verse note, that the good shepherd should not only feed his flock, but pray continually for them, and give thanks for the spiritual blessings conferred on them.

Καὶ.] As the Hebrew ו hath oft the import of id est in the Old Testament; (see Noldius, p. 280. 27.) so Matt. xxiii. 5. the King cometh, sitting upon an ass, καὶ πῶλον, i. e. a colt, the foal of an ass: (see Matt. xi. 2. 7. Luke xix. 30. 35. John xii. 14, 15.) and frequently it signifies nempe, to wit: so that mountain, הלבנון, to wit, Lebanon, Deut. iii. 25. so Judg. vi. 25. 2 Sam. xx. 14. Jer. xxi. 7. So John xii. 23. we stone thee for blasphemy, καὶ ὅτι, to wit, because thou, being a man, makest thyself God; Rom. xv. 6. that with one mouth ye may glorify God, καὶ πατέρα, who is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; so Gal. i. 4. Phil. iv. 20. Colos. ii. 2. James vii. 3. 9. As therefore God, who is the God of Israel, was the characteristic of the true God to the Jewish nation; so God, who is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, is the characteristic of the same God to the Christians, who worship him under that title, as being the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in him, our Father, we being the sons of God through faith in him, and deriving all our blessings from the Father through him.

[3] Ver. 4. Ἀκούσαντες, Hearing.] From this verse, and from ii. 1. it is evident, that St. Paul did not in person preach to the Colossians, and indeed that he never had seen them, they being converted by Epaphras, (i. 7. 23.) and perhaps also by the means of Timothy, who therefore is mentioned in the beginning of this Epistle, as saluting them together with Paul.

[4] Ver. 6. Ἐν παντὶ τῷ κόσμῳ, In all the world.] And which is preached to every creature under heaven, ver. 23. This, by a usual hyperbole, is to be understood of the most noted parts of the world, from which the rest might hear of it. In which sense Cyrus saith, that God had given him all the kingdoms of the earth, Ezra i. 2. and God, saith Jeremiah, will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth, xxv. 29. i. e. of the whole kingdom of Babylon; and the slain of the Lord shall be from one end of the earth to the other, over all the kingdoms of the world, ver. 26. and the Romans, Asiatics, Egyptians, &c. are styled, devout men of every nation under heaven, Acts ii. 5.

[5] Ver. 9. Ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ, In all wisdom.] Among the spiritual gifts vouchsafed for the edification of the church, are reckoned the word of wisdom and of knowledge, 1 Cor. xii. 8. whereby they were enabled, through the Spirit, to know the things which are given them of God, 1 Cor. ii. 12. and to compare spiritual things with spiritual, ver. 13. For the abundance of these gifts vouchsafed to the churches, he sometimes gives thanks, as, 1 Cor. i. 4, 5. 7. Eph. i. 3. and for the increase of them he sometimes prays, as here, and Eph. i. 17.

[6] Ver. 10. Περιπατῆσαι ὑμᾶς ἀξίως τοῦ Κυρίου, &c. That you may walk worthy of the Lord, to all well-pleasing.] Note here the end of all our Christian knowledge, viz. a conversation fruitful in good works, and a life acceptable and well-pleasing to God.

[7] Ver. 12. Ἱκανώσαντι ἡμᾶς εἰς τὴν μερίδα τοῦ κλήρου τῶν ἁγίων ἐν φωτὶ, Who has made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light.] The other reading, viz. καλέσαντι, who hath called you, for ἱκανώσαντι, who hath made you meet, is contrary to all the old versions, the Syriac, Arabic, and Vulgar, and all the Greek scholiasts; and therefore not to be admitted as a various lection, but only as the mistake of some copyist. Note also, that here is an allusion to the inheritance of the Jews in Canaan, styled the land of their inheritance; for it was divided into so many μερίδες, or places measured out by line, to be possessed by the several tribes, excepting that of Levi, and then by lot assigned to every respective tribe, (Josh. xiii.) according to God's commandment, Numb. xxvi. 55. xxxiii. 54. and that division which thus came to any of them by lot, was his μερὶς κλήρου, the portion which by lot befel him; but, saith the apostle, We are made meet, not for an earthly inheritance, as that was in Canaan, but for that heavenly portion God hath allotted us in heaven; the region of light and happiness, we being already translated into the kingdom of his son Christ, become his subjects, and so under his care and conduct and protection, ruled by his word, which is the word of life; and by his Spirit, the earnest of this inheritance, and shall hereafter be advanced by him into his heavenly kingdom.

[8] Ver. 13. Ἐκ τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ σκότους, The power of darkness.] That darkness signifies the state of heathen ignorance, see note on Rom. xii. 2. The power of it, is that power which Satan, the prince of darkness, had over the heathen world, to keep them in idolatry and brutish lusts: (Eph. ii. 2.) hence the apostle saith, he was sent unto the gentiles, to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, Acts xxvi. 17. (See Luke xxii. 53.)

[9] Ver. 14. Τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν διὰ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ.] That these words do indeed belong to the text is evident, not only from Theodoret, Œcumenius, Iren. lib. v. cap. 2. p. 395. and the Arabic, but from St. Paul himself, Eph. i. 7.

[10] Ver. 15. Εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ, The image of the invisible God.] The Socinians contend, that Christ is here styled the image of the invisible God, because he, by his gospel, hath made known the will of God unto us: in this sense, say they, he is styled the image of God, 2 Cor. iv. 3. and in this sense he saith to Philip, He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father. Schlictingius notes, that he is called the image of God, now that he is in heaven, and so not according to any thing appertaining to him which is invisible, but according to something by which he may be seen and known, i. e. saith he, as he hath made himself known to us in the gospel.

But the more natural import of the phrase seems to be this, that Christ is the image of God, as making him, who is invisible in his essence, conspicuous to us by the Divine works he wrought, they being such as plainly shewed, that in him dwelt the fulness of the Godhead bodily; for an invisible God can only be seen by his effects of power, wisdom, and goodness, by which, saith the apostle, from the creation of the world, the invisible things of God, to wit, his power and Godhead, have been made known by the things that are made, Rom. i. 20. He therefore, who in the works both of the old and new creation, hath given us such clear declarations of the Divine power, wisdom, and goodness, is upon this account as much an image of God as any thing can be. To this sense the image of God here seems necessarily restrained by the connective particle ὅτι, He is the image of God, for by him all things were created. Moreover, that this place is parallel to that in the Epistle to the Hebrews, the words sufficiently declare: here he is the image of God, there the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person: here he is the first-born, or Lord of every creature; there, the heir of all things: here it is said, that all things were created by him; there, that he made the world: here, that by him all things do consist; and there, that he supporteth all things by the word of his power: now that there he is styled, the image of God's glory, and the character of his person, by reason of that Divine power, wisdom, and majesty, which shined forth in his actions, Schlictingius is forced to confess. It is not therefore to be doubted, that he is here styled the image of God in the same sense; and it is highly probable, that he is called the image of the invisible God, as appearing to the patriarchs, and representing to them that God, who lives in light inaccessible, to which no mortal eye can approach, according to these frequent descants of the Ante-Nicene fathers,* that God the Father being invisible, one whom no man hath seen, or can see, he appeareth to the patriarchs by his Son: and that in this sense Christ saith to Philip, He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father, he himself intimates, by adding, that the Father abiding in him, did the works he performed, John xiv. 9—11. and that they ought to believe he was in the Father, and the Father in him, for the works' sake. And in the Epistle to the Corinthians, he is plainly styled, the image of God, for the like reason, viz. because that God, who at first created light out of darkness, had shined upon the gentiles, to make known to them the glory of God, in the person of Jesus Christ. Now this glory of God is, chap. iii. those miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, by which the gospel was confirmed, and, iv. 7. ἡ ὑπερβολὴ τῆς δυνάμεως τοῦ Θεοῦ, the excellency of the power of God.

[11] Πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, The first-born of every creature.] Since, say the Socinians, the first-born is of the order and number of those things of which he is the first-born; Christ therefore being here styled the first-born of every creature, must be in the order and of the number of creatures. But this inference is neither consistent with their own principles, nor with the words of the apostle. Not with their own principles: for, in what rank of creatures will they place Christ? if among the old, then they must allow him an existence before the beginning of the world, which yet they peremptorily deny; if among the new, they must confess he had a nature, which wanted to be renewed, changed, and reformed; that in him, as well as in us, though in him before us, all old things passed away, and all things became new; since otherwise he cannot be of the order and number of them, who underwent this change.

Secondly, This opinion cannot consist with the words of the apostle, who styles Christ the first-born of every creature, because by him all things were created, ὅς ἐστι πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, ὅτι ἐν αὐτῷ ἐκτίσθη τὰ πάντα. Now he, who is therefore the first-born of the whole creation, because he created all things, cannot himself be any part of the creation, either in heaven or earth, or be numbered amongst his creatures; but only be so called, because he was πρὸ πάντων, before all things: so אני ממך hani mimecka, is πρωτότοκος ἐγὼ ἢ σύ, 2 Sam. xix. 43. I am before thee. 2. Christ, saith our excellent primate, is here styled ὁ πρωτότοκος, the first-born, as being the Lord of all things. For, first, it is reasonable to conceive, that ὁ πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, the first-born of every creature, should be the same in sense with that of the same apostle in the parallel place, where he is styled, ὁ κληρονόμος πάντων, heir of all things. Now thus it will signify in this sense, according to that of Justinian, to act as an heir is to act as lord; for the ancients used the word heir for a lord. "Pro hærede se gerere, est pro Domino gerere; veteres enim hæredes pro Dominis appellabant." (Instit. lib. ii. Tit. 19. §. 6.)

In this sense also is the word primogenitus used in the Scriptures; for because the dominion and principality anciently followed the primogeniture, according to those words, He gave the dominion to Joram, ὅτι οὗτος ὁ πρωτότοκος, because he was the first-born, 2 Chron. xxi. 5. it came in common use to signify that dominion. So of David, saith God, I will give him to be beckor, πρωτότοκον, the first-born, high above the kings of the earth; I will give him τῶν βασιλέων ἁπάντων τὴν ἐξουσίαν, power over all kings, saith Aquilas;* I will set him ἀνώτατον τῶν βασιλέων τῆς γῆς, the supreme over the kings of the earth; so Symmachus. No, saith Mr. Clerc, this doth not signify a lord over other kings, but a most excellent and glorious king. But for this we shall not acquiesce in his bare word against the opinion of all the ancient commentators on the place, seeing the foregoing words, ver. 26. I will set his hand in the sea, and his right hand in the river, are equivalent to these; I will give him power over the kings of the Philistines, on the one hand, (see 2 Sam. viii. 12.) and over the Syrians on the other; (ver. 6.) He shall have (saith the Chaldee), Sultanuhi, his empire over the kings of the earth; I will elevate him over them, saith the Syriac; and so accordingly we find he did; exalting him over the Syrians, who were tributaries to him, (2 Sam. viii. 6.) and over all the kings, which were servants to Hadareser; (2 Sam. x. 19.) and this was necessary to be done, to render him a fit type of that Son of David, who was to be King of kings, and Lord of lords. And thus he is also πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν, the first-born from the dead, (ver. 18.) as being Lord over the dead, since for this cause he died, and rose again, ἵνα κυριεύσῃ, that he might be Lord over the dead, and over the living, (Rom. xvi. 9.) and so might be ἐν πᾶσιν πρωτεύων, "primas tenens, imperium habens in omnibus," pre-eminent in all things. Since then the first-born is naturally the heir, and so the lord of the family, and therefore the word heir amongst the ancients did signify lord; seeing St. Paul, who here styles him the first-born, doth in a place parallel to this, style him the heir of all things, why may we not conceive the person of whom David was a type, may be also here styled the first-born, as being Prince over, and high above, all creatures, they being all the work of his hands? for so the reason follows.

[12] Ver. 16. Ἐν αὐτῷ ἐκτίσθη τὰ πάντα ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, καὶ τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, All things were created by him, that are in heaven, and that are in the earth.] The gloss of Grotius,* and the Socinians,† runs thus: That to Christ is here ascribed, not the creation of the old world and all things that are in it, but only the creation, that is, the renovation of all things under the gospel-state, or the reformation of mankind by Jesus Christ, and the gospel preached to them, and the reconciliation of angels to men. But this interpretation is so forced and remote from the most usual sense of the words, and it is so flat and mean to say, that Jesus Christ was before every new creature; that is to say, before the renovation made by himself, or rather by his apostles after his exaltation; and to prove this by that very renovation, that even Mr. Clerc is forced to reject it as evidently false, which it will certainly appear to be from these considerations;

First, That the apostle speaks here of the creation of such things as are not capable of this moral creation, viz. the creation πάντων τῶν ὁρατῶν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, of all things visible upon earth. Now the τὰ ὁρατὰ, Rom. i. 20. and τὰ βλεπόμενα, Heb. xi. 31. i. e. the things which are made and seen, comprise the whole visible creation, all things without life, metals, stones, elements, all vegetables, and all beasts; and did the gospel come to make a moral renovation among these? did Christ and his apostles preach to stones and trees? 2. Under all things in heaven, and all things invisible, must be comprised all the good angels, which are therefore elsewhere styled κυριότητες, ἀρχαὶ, καὶ ἐξουσίαι, Eph. i. 21. iii. 10. 1 Pet. iii. 22. Now they cannot be proper subjects of this new creation, or moral renovation; for of this new creation the Scripture never speaks, but in relation to an old, which was to be abolished, changed, and done away by it; for in them who are made καινὴ κτίσις, a new creation, all old things are passed away, and all things are become new in them, 2 Cor. v. 17. They put off the old man, and put on the new, which is created after God in righteousness and holiness, Eph. iv. 22. 24. Colos. iii. 9, 10. Now it is manifest that nothing of all this can agree to the good angels, and much less to the evil angels, who are still creatures, and therefore not to be excluded from expressions so general as these are.

Secondly, The words in this sense were far from being true when the apostle spake them; for a very small remnant of the Jews were then converted to the Christian faith, and of the gentiles few, in comparison of those multitudes which afterward embraced the faith; and yet the apostle plainly speaks of a creation wholly past already, using the aorist in these words, ἐν αὐτῷ ἐκτίσθη τὰ πάντα, by him have all things been created; and the perfect tense in these words, δι' αὐτοῦ πάντα ἔκτισται, by him all things were created.

Thirdly, Though the Socinians may be able to produce some few instances where the words κτίσις and κτίζειν are to be taken in a moral sense, yet cannot they shew one instance, where the creation of all things in heaven and in earth, visible and invisible, is ever used in a moral sense, or concerning any other creation than that of which Moses speaks, saying, Thus the heavens and the earth were made, and all the host of them, Gen. i. 2.

Fourthly, The apostle afterward begins his discourse of this moral creation or reconciliation of the world to God by Christ, and the renovation of his church, in these words, ver. 18—20. And he is the head of the body of the church, &c. For it pleased the Father——by him to reconcile all things to himself, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven, ver. 21. And you that were sometimes alienated, and enemies in your minds by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh by death, to present you holy and unblamable, and unreprovable in his sight. Now these things being thus connected by the particle καὶ, to what he had before said of the creation of all things by Christ, demonstratively shew that he was not then speaking of that renovation which he begins to speak of in the following words.

Fifthly, This exposition of this place touching a true and proper creation of all things by Jesus Christ, is by the Father,* from the beginning, laid down as a rule, to which the orthodox keeping close, might easily shew that the heretics, who held the world was created by angels, deviated from the truth. Now this was the heresy of Simon Magus † and Cerinthus, as Irenæus there informs us.

[13] Ver. 18. Πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν, The first-born from the dead.] Εἰς γὰρ ἀθάνατόν τε καὶ ἀφθαρτὸν ζωὴν οὔπω γέγονέ τινος ἡ ἀνάστασις, πλὴν τοῦ Σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, for none besides our Saviour ever yet rose to an immortal and incorruptible life. (Author. quæst. resp. ad Orthod. qu. 85.) See the following note.

[14] Ver. 19.] For explication of these words it is to be noted, That the great end of our Saviour's sufferings was to rescue our bodies, condemned for sin unto death, from that mortality, and to bestow on all, whom God shall give him, eternal life, by raising of their bodies to a state of incorruption; for, because the children were partakers of flesh and blood, and thereby subject to mortality, he also took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and might deliver them who, through the fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage. (Heb. ii. 14, 15.)

That therefore the church, which is his body, is represented as the church of the first-born, enrolled in the heavens, Heb. xii. 23. a church against which the gates of hades, or of death, shall not prevail to hinder their enjoyment of this resurrection to a life of happiness; they are the sons of God, and therefore children of the resurrection, Luke xxi. 36. therefore heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ, who shall be glorified with him, Rom. viii. 17. shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, ver. 21. shall have the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body, ver. 23. and they are also represented as persons foreordained to be conformed to the image of Christ, by having their vile bodies changed into the likeness of Christ's glorious body, ver. 29.

Note, secondly, that to this end was Christ raised, that he, the first-born from the dead, might raise up his whole body from the dead, he being raised from the dead as the first-fruits of them that slept, 1 Cor. xv. 20. for to this end Christ both died and rose again, that he might be Lord both of the dead and of the living, Rom. xiv. 9. and God hath therefore exalted him, that at the name (i. e. the power) of Jesus, every knee should bow, of things in heaven, in the earth, and under the earth, Phil. ii. 10. that is, the bodies of the dead; for by this argument, and from these very words, the apostle proves the resurrection, and a future judgment, Rom. xiv. 10—12. He is therefore so the first-born of the dead, as to be the Lord of them, according to our former interpretation of the word first-born, and as to have power to raise them up who sleep in him, and bring them with him, 1 Thess. iv. 14. to give eternal life unto them, and raise them up at the last day, John v. 28, 29. xvii. 2. And thus hath he the pre-eminence in all things, being Lord of all creatures dead and living, and giving both their first and their new being to them, and rendering his members conformable to his glorious image, that so they may be joint-heirs with him in glory: and this is the constant doctrine of Irenæus,* who informs us, that Christ died, that he might be the first-born from the dead, and the prince of life. That the death of this just man gave him the principality of things under the earth, he having before the principality in heavenly things; that they who denied the resurrection of the flesh, contradicted the salvation of that for which the whole dispensation of the Son of God was designed; that he died, that exiled man might be delivered from condemnation, and might return without fear to his inheritance. †

[15] Ver. 20. Ἀποκαταλλάξαι, To reconcile.] This word, say Hesychius, Suidas, and Phavorinus, signifies φιλοποιῆσαι, to make friends, or to reduce persons to their former amity. This by the fathers, ‡ is thus explained, That whilst man continued in his obedience to God, angels and men were in a perfect friendship; but when men became disobedient to their sovereign Lord, the angels became averse to them, because their Lord was dishonoured by them. But God being reconciled to us by the death of his Son, they also became friends and ministering spirits to us, and we became of the same church and body with them, under the same head Christ Jesus. (Heb. xii. 22.) And so all things in heaven and earth were gathered into one Christ, Eph. i. 10.

[16] Ver. 23.] Note, hence it follows, that they who have true faith, and just ground of hope, may fall away from them.

[17] Ver. 24. Τῶν θλίψεων τοῦ Χριστοῦ, The afflictions of Christ.] Christ having told us, that what was done to his members is done to him, Matt. xxv. 40. 45. the afflictions of his members are styled the persecutions and afflictions of Christ, Acts ix. 4, 5. Now the Jews speak much of the afflictions of Christ and his disciples, comprehending both under the name of חבלי משיח, * the afflictions of the Messiah, dividing them into three parts, of which, say they, the fathers and the preceding generation suffered one part; another part was suffered by the generation of destruction, or the Jews destroyed by Titus; and a third by the generation of the Messiah, or by his disciples. Of these afflictions of Christ, I, saith the apostle, have already had a share, and I go on to fill up the residue of these my sufferings in the flesh, which I am to bear in the discharge of my ministry, for the benefit of his church. And suitable to this interpretation is that of Lyranus on the place, Passiones Christi dupliciter accipiuntur, uno modo pro illis quas sustinuit in corpore proprio, et sic nihil ibi restat ad implendum; alio modo quas in finem usque seculi patietur in corpore mystico, et sic restant multarum passionum reliquiæ adimplendæ.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 2. Ε'ΙΣ ἐπίγνωσιν, for ἐν ἐπίγνωσει, In the knowledge.] See note on i. 20.

[2] Τοῦ μυστηρίου τοῦ Θεοῦ, The mystery of God, even the Father, and of Christ.] i. e. The dispensation of the Divine grace of God, in offering salvation to the gentiles by Christ, and conferring on them, equally with the Jews, the blessings of the gospel. This is the mystery which, saith he, in the former ages was hid, but now is manifested to the saints, to whom God would make known what was the riches of the glory of this mystery among the gentiles, which is Christ (preached) among you (as) the hope of glory, ver. 26, 27. This (saith he) is the mystery, which from the beginning hath been hid in God, Eph. iii. 9. the mystery of God and of Christ, ver. 3—5. That the gentiles should be fellow-heirs (with the believing Jews) and of the same body, and partakers (with them) of his promises in Christ by the gospel, ver. 6. (See also Rom. xvi. 25, 26. Colos. iv. 3.) And that the gentiles might have a perfect knowledge of this mystery, and of the riches of Divine grace, and love to them in it, is the apostle's prayer, Eph. iii. 16—19. But whereas Crellius and Schlictingius here note, that the particle καὶ, and, added to the word Christ, distinguishes him as well from God as from the Father: it doth no such matter, but only distinguisheth the mystery of the Father, sending his Son into the world to be a Saviour to the gentiles, from the mystery of Christ, procuring this salvation for them by his blood. The ecclesiastical tradition (saith Irenæus*) teaches us to believe in God the Father Omnipotent, who made heaven and earth, and in one Jesus Christ the Son of God, incarnate for our salvation, our Lord, God, Saviour, and King. And so these words may be construed, the mystery of both the Father and Christ. (See note on i. 3.)

[3] Ver. 3. Ἐν ᾧ, In whom.] Some make these words relate to the mystery mentioned in the foregoing verse: but it seems rather to respect the person of Christ as Mediator, the knowledge of whom, saith the apostle, hath an excellency beyond all other knowledge. (Phil. iii. 8.) For ἐν ᾧ περιετμήθητε, in whom ye are circumcised, ver. 11. of this chapter, and ἐν ᾧ, in whom ye are risen again, ver. 12. plainly relate to Christ's person and his performances as Mediator; and the whole following chapter speaketh of him, and of the benefits we have received, ἐν αὐτῷ, by him. The apostle also doth apply this to him, by saying, ver. 8. As you have received the Lord Jesus Christ, so walk in him: and by warning us against the deceit of vain philosophy, because in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead. But yet seeing these hid treasures of Christ's wisdom are revealed to us by his gospel only, and thence alone we obtain all our knowledge of him as Mediator, and of all the offices he sustains as such, there seemeth to be no great difference betwixt referring this to his person, and referring it to his doctrine.

* Τὴν εἰς ἕνα Θεὸν πατέρα παντοκράτορα πίστιν, καὶ εἰς ἕνα Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν, τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ τὸν σαρκωθέντα, ὑπὲρ τῆς ἡμετέρας σωτηρίας—ἵνα Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ τῷ Κυρίῳ, καὶ Θεῷ ἡμῶν, καὶ βασιλεῖ—πᾶν γόνυ κάμψῃ. Lib. i. cap. 2.

[4] Ver. 5. Τὴν τάξιν ὑμῶν, Your order.] As, to walk disorderly, in the apostle's style, is not to walk according to the traditions they had received from the apostles, or preachers of the gospel, (2 Thess. iii. 6.) so their order may import their compliance with them in manners, discipline, and union.

[5] Ver. 8. Διὰ φιλοσοφίας, By philosophy, &c.] What is the πιθανολογία, the enticing speech, ver. 4. and the philosophy and vain deceit, which the apostle warns them against, is not so easy to determine. Some good interpreters refer what follows in this chapter to the heresy of Simon Magus, and the gnostics, to which many passages in this chapter may be well applied. Others refer them to the Jewish doctors, who had then mixed the philosophy of the heathens with their ceremonial worship, and had thence learned to allegorize it; and others divide the matter betwixt Jew and gentile. And that the Jewish doctors are very much concerned in this chapter, we learn from ver. 14. to 16. and the rudiments of the world, relate to the legal observations, as being common to them with the gentile world. (See note on Gal. iv. 8.) The commandments of men, or their traditions, may also have respect to them, who were the zealous assertors of them. (Matt. xv. Acts xxi. 21.) And indeed this verse seems to be the key to, or the foundation of, all that follows in this chapter, ranking the discourse of the apostle under these two heads, viz. cautions against the seductions of the Jews, zealous for the observation of their rites and ceremonies; and against the seductions of heathens by their vain philosophy, dressed up by them anew, both as to its doctrines and morals, and set off with the most specious pretences, styled here πιθανολογία, enticing speech.

[6] Ver. 9. Πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα τῆς θεότητος, All the fulness of the Godhead.] This fulness, according to the gnostics, was made up of their thirty Æones. The heathens, besides the Supreme God, owned many other local gods, presiding over nations, and so made up the plenitude of the Godhead of them all, as of so many partial deities. Against such opinions the apostle here asserts, that the whole fulness of the Godhead dwelt in Christ, and that bodily, i. e. in his body, as its temple: and, say the fathers, as the soul dwelleth in the body; say others, bodily, that is, essentially. The apostle doth not roundly say that Christ is God, but expresses his Divine nature thus, partly to represent to the Jews the divinity of Christ, with allusion to the God of Israel dwelling in the temple; partly to oppose him to the πλήρωμα of the gnostics, and to the partial deities of the heathens. Here therefore it is to be observed,

First, That the apostle doth not here say, that the Divinity is assistant to Christ, but that the fulness of it doth κατοικεῖν, reside in him; which is never said in Scripture of any other person, but of him alone, who having styled his body a temple, John ii. 19. 21. the fulness of the Deity may be properly said to dwell in him bodily, as it dwelt symbolically in the ark.

Note, secondly, that Christ is not here said to be filled with the fulness of God, as the church is, by reason of the gifts with which she was replenished, and the doctrine she had received from God, Eph. i. 23. but the whole fulness of the Godhead is here said to reside in him. Now θειότης and τὸ θεῖον do never signify the gifts of God, or the doctrine of the gospel, but the Divine nature only; nor can the will or revelation of God be said to dwell bodily in any person. I conclude, therefore, that * the body born of the Virgin, receiving the whole fulness of the Godhead bodily, was immutably united to the Divinity, and deified; which made the same person, Jesus Christ, both God and man.

[7] Ver. 10. Κεφαλὴ πάσης ἀρχῆς καὶ ἐξουσίας, The head of all principality and power.] Epiphanius informs us,† that Simon Magus devised some names of principalities and powers, saying, that none could be saved, who learned not the sacred discipline, and how to offer his sacrifice to the Father of all things, by these principalities and powers. In opposition to these things, say some, the apostle asserts that Christ created all these principalities and powers, (i. 15.) and was the Head and Lord of them, and so in him, without their assistance, the Colossians were complete, and fully instructed to salvation.

Or else these things may be referred to Cerinthus and his followers. For,

First, he lived in the apostle's times, and was a great opposer of the truth of the gospel, and particularly an enemy to St. Paul,‡ because he contended it was not necessary for the Jews, nor lawful for the gentiles, to observe the law of Moses, for which Cerinthus was a zealot. And he, saith the same Epiphanius, § reproved St. Peter for going into the uncircumcised, and raised the tumult in Antioch about circumcision.

Secondly, He lived long in Egypt, ‖ and was instructed in philosophical sciences, and from thence went and set up his sect in Asia the less, and Syria, say Theodoret and Epiphanius. ¶ Being therefore skilled in philosophy, and setting up his heresy in Asia Minor, where Colosse was, he may well be here reflected on by St. Paul, especially if we consider how much his opinions agreed with those which are here censured by him. For,

Thirdly, He was zealous for circumcision, and other observances of the law of Moses, and so concerned in what is here said, ver. 11. 14—17. (2.) He said, the world was made by angels, or inferior virtues, and not by the supreme God; and that he himself received his doctrine by the revelation of angels. (3.) He held Jesus to be born of Joseph and Mary, as other men, and Christ to have descended upon him, and at his passion to have returned to his pleroma.

And St. John refuted him, saith Irenæus, by establishing the principle of one God omnipotent, who made all things visible and invisible by his word; which is the very thing the apostle in this chapter doth assert.

[8] Ver. 11. Τῇ ἀπεκδύσει, &c. The putting off the body of the sins of the flesh.] Thus Philo informs us,* that circumcision imports the cutting off our sinful pleasures and passions, and our impious opinions. (See Rom. ii. 28, 29. and the reading of the text defended, Examen Millii.)

The apostle here plainly discourseth against those heretics, or false apostles, who laboured to introduce the necessity of circumcision. Now that Cerinthus was one who pleaded for the necessity of it, Epiphanius, St. Austin, and others, do inform us; but that Simon Magus did so, I find not in church-history. The Apostolical Constitutions† speak of some false apostles, who held it necessary περιτέμνεσθαι νομίμως, to circumcise men according to the law; but then they are distinguished from the impure heresy of Simon Magus, who was so far from contending for the observation of the law and prophets, that he taught his followers,‡ νόμῳ καὶ προφήταις, μὴ χρᾶσθαι, not to regard them;§ μηδὲ φρίττειν, not to fear the threats of the law, as being not the law of God, ἀλλ' ἀριστερᾶς δυνάμεως, but of some evil power, saith Theodoret; and declaring, saith Epiphanius,‖ that whosoever believed the Old Testament, incurred death. Note,

Secondly, That the apostle speaking here of the circumcision made without hands, and of the circumcision made in baptism, and consisting in the putting off the sins of the flesh, cannot, by the circumcision of Christ, mean his own personal circumcision which was made with hands, but that which he hath instituted in the room of it, viz. baptism. Note,

Thirdly, That baptism therefore is a rite of initiation to Christians, as circumcision was to the Jews; for by virtue of our spiritual circumcision in baptism, he proves we have no need of the outward circumcision to be a type of the purity obtained by baptism.

Fourthly, Hence I infer, that baptism is Christ's ordinance for infants of believing parents, as circumcision was of old for the infants of the Jews; for if it had been otherwise, and infants under Christianity had not been received by any federal rite into covenant with God, the objection of the necessity of circumcision as to them would have still held, they entering into covenant by no other rite, and so remaining strangers from the church, and as much aliens from the adoption, the covenant, and promises, as the gentiles were; which sure the Jews would have objected, if truly they could have done it, to the reproach of Christianity. That institution therefore must, for the comfort and satisfaction of their parents, afford some way of sanctifying these infants, or of admitting them among the number of God's children, which being confessedly no other than that of baptism, it must be supposed to allow that to them, that by it, in the phrase of Irenæus,* " infantes et parvuli renascantur in Deum," infants and little children may be regenerated.

[9] Ver. 13. Καὶ τῇ ἀκροβυστίᾳ τῆς σαρκὸς, And the uncircumcision of the flesh.] By the defect of circumcision, they being, saith the parallel place, on that account without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise, Eph. ii. 11, 12.

[10] Ver. 14. Χειρόγραφον τοῖς δόγμασιν, The hand-writing of ordinances.] Δόγμα is a rescript or ordinance concerning any thing, a royal or imperial decree. (Dan. ii. 13. iii. 10. 12. 29. vi. 8. 10. 13. 15. 26. Luke ii. 1. Acts xvii. 7.) Hence ritual prescriptions are called δόγματα, Ezek. xx. 26. The hand-writing of ordinances, in the parallel Epistle, Eph. ii. 15. is the law of commandments, ἐν δόγμασι, in ritual ordinances, or the ceremonial law; and it is said here to be against and contrary to the gentiles, as being a middle-wall of partition, hindering them from coming to God, and putting an enmity betwixt them and God's people, (ver. 14, 15.) which Christ hath taken away by abolishing and dissolving the obligation of it, and admitting the gentiles fellow-heirs of the same promises and blessings with the Jews without it; or it is contrary to us, as being the ministration of death and condemnation. (2 Cor. iii. 7. 9.)

[11] Ver. 15. Τὰς ἀρχὰς καὶ ἐξουσίας.] The principalities and powers here mentioned, are the powers of wickedness, the spirits of Satan, who is styled ἡ ἐξουσία τοῦ σκότους, the power of darkness, Luke xxii. 53. and of the air, Eph. ii. 2. ὁ ἄρχων, the prince of the world, John xii. 31. xiv. 30. whose emissaries are the principalities and powers, the rulers of the darkness of this world, the spiritual wickednesses in high places, against which we wrestle, Eph. vi. 12. These powers Christ destroyed by his cross, because, as the apostle saith, Through death he destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and delivered them, who, through the fear of death, were all their lives subject to bondage, Heb. ii. 14, 15. Moreover, the heathens lay under two great infelicities; (1.) that they were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise, and without God in the world. The remedy which Divine wisdom found out, and our Lord's salutary passion effected, with respect to this, is discoursed of in the preceding verse. (2.) That they were subject to the power and delusions of evil and apostate spirits, walking according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience. These principalities and powers Christ despoiled on the cross, by the name of a crucified Jesus, and by the very sign of the cross, casting out the prince of the world from his dominions, temples, and oracles, and from those human bodies he possessed; and so openly convincing the heathens, that the deities they so long had worshipped, were evil spirits, and, by the miracles wrought in his name, drawing them from their heathen worship to him. And this exposition is confirmed from these words, He made a show of them openly, which plainly seemeth to refer to this conquest over them. Moreover, it may be noted, that Simon and Cerinthus held, εἶναι τὸν αἰῶνα ἀπὸ ἀρχῶν τούτων καὶ ἐξουσιῶν τῆς κακίας κατεσκευασμένον, that the world was made by these evil spirits, and men were subject to the power of them; and were "per eum et Helenam suam ex illis Angelicis potestatibus liberandos,"* to be delivered by Simon and his Helen from them. This, saith the apostle, our Lord hath fully done upon the cross, and so we need no assistance of Simon or Cerinthus to perform this work; and much less need we the assistance of those demons which the heathens worshipped as good angels, who had the government of the inferior world committed to them, Christ having triumphed over them, and wholly spoiled them of that power. And from these heathen deities he passes on again to the rudiments of the Jews, making that inference from what had been discoursed from ver. 11. to the 14th, which we see in the following verses.

[12] Ἐν αὐτῷ, In it.] It is certain that Origen† and others of the ancients read, ἐν ξύλῳ, on the wood; so did the Arabic version; others read, ἐν ἑαυτῷ, in himself; but seeing that reading, as St. Jerome testifies, is only in the Latin copies, and since Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, read as we and most copies do, without taking notice of any other reading, we may rely securely on it.

[13] Ver. 17. Σκία τῶν μελλόντων, A shadow of things to come.] Dr. Spencer well observes, that there is no necessity from these words, of asserting that these, and all the ritual constitutions of the law of Moses, shadowed forth some Christian mystery; but only that they were but as mere shadows, compared to that solid and substantial truth Christ by his gospel hath discovered to us, as Josephus, speaking of Archelaus, who exercised the kingly power without the title of it, saith, ἦκει παρὰ τοῦ Δεσπότου σκίαν αἰτησάμενος βασιλείας, τῆς ἥρπασεν ἑαυτῷ τὸ σῶμα, he came to request of Cæsar the shadow of that kingdom, the body of which he had usurped or snatched to himself before. (De Bello Jud. lib. ii. cap. 4. p. 777.)

Note, secondly, that ἐν μέρει ἑορτῆς, is well rendered in respect, or on account of a feast; as when the apostle saith, That which was made glorious was not glorious, ἐν μέρει τούτῳ, in this respect, 2 Cor. iii. 10. and, I have sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be found vain, τούτῳ μέρει, in this respect, ix. 3. and when St. Peter saith, If any man suffer as a Christian, let him glorify God, ἐν τούτῳ μέρει, on this account. So 2 Macc. xv. 18. The care they took for their wives and children, was ἐν ἥττονι μέρει, of no account with them, their chief care being for the temple. Now hence, to make out the argument against the Sabbatarians, note,

First, That the hand-writing of ordinances here mentioned respecteth ceremonial ordinances; for of them only it can be truly said, they were against us, and were contrary to us; they were blotted out, and nailed to the cross of Christ, and were shadows of, or in respect of things to come.

Secondly, That when it is said, Let no man judge you in respect of those things, the meaning is, Let no man censure or condemn the Christian for not observing these new moons, feasts, or sabbaths.

Thirdly, That the apostle here by sabbaths does not mean the first and last days of the great Jewish feasts, which were by them observed as sabbaths; or the sabbath of the seventh year, or of the year of jubilee: but only, or chiefly, the weekly sabbaths of the Jews.

First, Because the apostle having said before, Let no man condemn you for not observing the Jewish festivals, or any part of them, cannot rationally be supposed in the words following to condemn only the same thing.

Secondly, In the New Testament the word sabbath, or sabbaths, is used above sixty times, and in fifty-six of those places it doth unquestionably signify the Jewish weekly sabbaths, and in the other the whole week. Since then the sabbath in the New Testament is never used for the first or last days of the Jewish feasts, but is there ordinarily used for their weekly sabbath, we ought in reason to conclude, it here imports that seventh-day sabbath which it doth usually import in other places; and not those solemn days of the Jewish feasts, those jubilees, or seven years' sabbaths, which it doth never elsewhere signify in the New Testament.

Thirdly, Wherever the word sabbath is mentioned in the Old Testament, in conjunction with new moons, or Jewish feasts, it doth import the seventh-day sabbath distinctly from all others; as will appear from the perusal of all the places where these things are jointly mentioned, as 2 Kings iv. 23. Isa. i. 13. lxvi. 23. Lam. ii. 6. Ezek. xlv. 17. xlvi. 1. Hos. ii. 2. Amos viii. 4. Being then here mentioned with new moons and Jewish feasts, it is reasonable to conceive it signifies the seventh-day sabbath.

Fourthly, The sabbath-day in the Old Testament is often contradistinguished to all other solemn feasts, and more particularly to new moons and anniversary feasts; and therefore being here mentioned with them, we may presume it cannot signify them, or any portion of them, but rather that it doth import that Jewish sabbath, which in other places is put in opposition to them, as 1 Chron. xxiii. 31. 2 Chron. ii. 4. xxxi. 3. Neh. x. 32, 33. Seeing then the word sabbath, wherever it is used in conjunction with new moons or feasts, in Scripture, still signifies the Jewish weekly sabbath, we cannot doubt, but, in conjunction with them here, it signifies the same thing. Seeing the word is often put in opposition to new moons and solemn feasts, indefinitely taken, what reason have we to conceive, that in this place it should be taken for any part or portion of them? Hence then I argue thus:

No man ought to condemn the Christian for not observing the Jewish sabbath, because Christ hath blotted out the hand-writing of ceremonial ordinances which was against them; wherefore the Jewish sabbath being a ceremonial ordinance, therefore it is blotted out; therefore the Christian is not obliged to observe it. Again, that which is joined with meats and drinks, and with new moons, which are things confessedly ceremonial, no difference at all being observed by the apostle, as to their being named hand-writings, things cancelled, shadows, and the like, that must be ceremonial. Lastly, That which is a shadow of, or in respect of things to come, of which Christ by his advent exhibited the body, that must be ceremonial, that must be cancelled and abolished by Christ, and then the Jewish sabbath must be so.

[14] Ver. 18. Καταβραβευέτω, Let no man beguile you of your reward.] So Suidas, παραλογιζέτω, let no man put a cheat upon you. So Phavorinus, ἐπηρεαζέτω, let no man damage you. (Chrysostom and Theophylact.)

Καταβραβεύειν.] This word signifies to give the prize to one, when the victory was obtained by the other; so Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact; accordingly Suidas * saith, This is the thing which the apostle means by the word, and because, by this unjust sentence, the person to whom it is due is deprived of his reward, hence it comes to bear that sense; and so the whole is by Stephanus rendered, nemo vos debito brabio fraudet, which, as it justifies our translation, so it shews the damage Christians will sustain by thus worshipping angels, even the loss of that crown of glory, which Christ hath purchased for his faithful servants.

[15] Θέλων ἐν ταπεινοφροσύνῃ, Pleasing himself in his humility.] Or, affecting it, and so not addressing to God immediately, but by angels; for so the word θέλειν answers to the Hebrew chaphetz, which imports pleasing or delighting ourselves in any thing. So 1 Sam. xviii. 12. Θέλει ἐν σοὶ ὁ βασιλεὺς, The king is pleased with thee; 2 Sam. xv. 26. If he say, οὐκ ἐθέλησα ἐν σοὶ; I am not pleased with thee; Matt. xx. 26, 27. ὃς ἂν θέλῃ ἐν ὑμῖν; Who among you affects to be great or first? and, xxvii. 43. Let him deliver him, εἰ φιλεῖ αὐτὸν, if he delighteth in him. As for the persons here referred to, note,

First, That the Greek commentators affirm generally, that the apostle doth through this whole Epistle oppose himself to some false Christians, who held δεῖν συνάγεσθαι ἡμᾶς πρὸς τὸν Πατέρα διὰ τῶν ἁγίων ἀγγέλων, that we ought to address to the Father by the holy angels. But then some of them add, that the pretence of humility was this,† That it was too much for us to come to God immediately by Christ, this being above our infirmity. But this, though it agrees well with the humility here mentioned, it seems not to accord either with the principles of Simon Magus, who held himself to be both the Father and the Son; or of Cerinthus, who held Christ was only a man, born after the common way of generation, and so could not exalt himself thus above the angels; and much less doth it accord with the sentiments of the heathens. Œcumenius saith, the apostle speaketh here of them who did, τὰς νομικὰς παρατηρήσεις τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ ἐπιμιγνύειν, mix legal observances with the gospel; and Theophylact, that he speaks περὶ τῶν Ἰουδαιζομένων, of the Judaizers. And Theodoret‡ explains this more fully thus: They who were zealous for the law, persuaded men to worship angels, because, say they, the law was given by them: this they advised men to do, pretending humility, and saying, that the God of all things was invisible, and inaccessible, and incomprehensible, and that it was fit we should procure the Divine favour by means of angels. Now if this be so, this passage cannot well agree to Simon Magus and his followers; for though they worshipped angels, as Irenæus,* Tertullian,† Epiphanius,‡ Theodoret§ note, and held that their proarche or propator, was so inaccessible and incomprehensible; yet did they not seem to worship God by angels, but rather to perform their magical operations by invoking them. He also, and his followers, as hath been shewn, were great enemies to the law, and so could not introduce the worship of good angels upon this account, that the law was given by them.

But then as for Cerinthus, and other false apostles of the Jews, they owned Christ Jesus as the Messiah, and yet were stiff assertors of the obligation of the law; and they by their philosophy had introduced the worship of angels, after the heathen manner. For Epiphanius informs us of Cerinthus, that he said,‖ The law and the prophets came from the angels; and that he who gave the law was one of the angels that made the world. They had imbibed the philosophy of Plato,¶ which saith, The demons are of a middle nature betwixt gods and mortals; that they brought our prayers and offerings to them, and their commands to us, and were to be worshipped and invoked upon that account: that God had no immediate commerce with men, but all his converse with us was by the mediation of these demons. And suitably to this philosophy we find the angel, Tobit xii. 12. 15. saying, that he was one of the seven angels, οἱ προσαναφέρουσι τὰς προσευχὰς τῶν ἁγίων, who offered up the prayers of the saints: and that when Tobit and Sara prayed, he brought the memorial of their prayer before the Holy One. And Philo, in several places declares, that as the philosophers said of their demons and heroes, so Moses introduces the angels, πρεσβευομένας, doing the office of ambassadors, καὶ διαγγελλούσας τάτε παρὰ τοῦ ἡγεμόνος τοῖς ὑπηκόοις ἀγαθὰ, καὶ τῷ βασιλεῖ ὧν εἰσιν ὑπήκοοι χρείας, and being messengers of good things from God to his subjects, and carrying back to God their needs. In his book of the Giants †† he styles them ambassadors of good communications of men to God, and of God again to men. And in his book de Somniis,‡‡ he represents them as the ears and eyes of the great King, seeing and hearing all things, for (saith he) they bring the commands of the Father to his children, and the needs of the children to the Father: not that God needs their ministry, but that it is very needful and beneficial for us frail men to have such mediators, as being unable, not only to receive God's chastisements, but even his very benefits, should he immediately confer them on us by himself. If Cerinthus had imbibed this philosophy, which had then obtained among the Jews, and was so well known in the world, that one so much instructed in it, as Theodoret saith he was, could not well be ignorant of it, here is a sufficient foundation for his introducing the worship of those angels which gave the law, under pretence of humility; Philo* declaring, that when the law was first given, the people desired it might be so, and requested of God these mediators; saying, Speak thou to us, and let not God speak to us, lest we die.

[16] Ἃ μὴ ἑώρακεν ἐμβατεύων, Intruding into those things he hath not seen.] So read all the Greek and Latin copies now extant; Esthius. Now this did the philosophers, and those Christians which embraced their sentiments, in all their inducements to worship these angels and inferior spirits; as, v. g.

First, In their pretence that† the Divine nature could not immediately be conversed with, but that all the intercourse betwixt God and men, was by the intermediation of these demons; it being a debasing of the Divine nature, to think we could converse with him, without their intervention.

Secondly, In saying that they were to be worshipped, χάριν τῆς εὐφήμου διαπορείας, for their laudable intercession; and, διὰ τῆς εὐεργεσίας, for the benefits of common life we receive from them.‡

Thirdly, As having from the supreme Deity their power and authority, and presiding over us, κατὰ τάξιν ᾗ ἕκαστος ἐτάχθη, according to the order appointed to them; and being therefore worshipped, θείῳ νόμῳ καὶ θείᾳ βουλήσει, by the Divine law and counsel; and only, saith Celsus, as he will have them to be honoured. (Plato in Phædro, p. 264. Hierocles in Carm. Pythag. p. 9. 18. Celsus apud Orig. lib. viii. p. 381.)

Fourthly, Because, by worshipping these ministers of his, we do a thing, φίλον ἐκείνῳ, grateful to him, saith Celsus.§ Now in all these things they did manifestly ἐμβατεύειν, intrude into things of which they neither had, nor could have, any knowledge from the light of nature. And so do also the Romanists, in saying, that saints and angels see all things, or perceive our prayers, by seeing him who seeth all things; that they are worshipped by the Divine law and counsel; and that by invoking them, we do a thing grateful to him: it being certain that nothing of this nature can be proved from Scripture, or from primitive tradition.

Moreover, Theodoret and Œcumenius here observe, that this worship of angels continued long in Pisidia, Phrygia, and Laodicea, near to Colosse, where they had‖ εὐκτήρια τοῦ ἁγίου Μιχαὴλ, oratories of St. Michael, the captain of the Lord's host, as he is called, Josh. v. 14. which leads us to the very rise of this worship both among Jews and Christians. For the Jews generally held, that he who is styled the captain of the Lord's host, was the angel Michael. (See note on Heb. ii. 5.) And his office, saith Origen,¶ is, "mortalium preces, supplicationésque curare," to present the prayers of men; and in the book of the Pastor we read, saith he, that Christians, ἅμα τὸ πιστεύειν ὑπὸ τοῦ Μιχαὴλ γίνονται, as soon as they believe, are under the government of Michael.—The good messenger (saith Hermas*) being Michael, "qui populi hujus habet potestatem, et gubernat eos," who hath the government over his people. Whence by Nicephorus,† he is styled, ὁ τῆς Χριστιανῶν πίστεως ἔφορος, the president or overseer of the Christian faith.

[17] Ver. 19. Καὶ οὐ κρατῶν τὴν κεφαλὴν, And not holding the head.] Hence it appeareth, first, that the apostle here speaks of such persons as had embraced Christianity, owning Christ Jesus to be the head of the church, and being by profession dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, ver. 20.

Secondly, That the fault they were guilty of, was not the worshipping angels, as mediators of redemption, but of intercession only; i. e. as mediators to bring us to God, and to present our prayers to him, as appears from the foregoing note.

Thirdly, That Jesus Christ is represented in the Holy Scripture as he by whom we have, προσαγωγὴν πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν, access to God in prayer with confidence; (Eph. ii. 18. iii. 12. Heb. x. 19—22.) and so having access to him by prayer, through any other mediator of intercession, must be intrenching on the office of the head of the church, and so not holding the head: and that the practice of the church of Rome, in praying to angels, is here condemned, I have fully proved in a discourse of the idolatry of the church of Rome, chap. xi.

[18] Ἐπιχορηγούμενον, By joints and bands having nourishment ministered.] i. e. From which head communicating the gifts of the Spirit to his mystical, as the head doth its spirits to the natural body, the whole body of Christians (duly compacted together, by the assistance which every part of it gives to the whole; some sustaining the office of inferior heads, some of an eye, some of a hand or foot, 1 Cor. xii. 15—17.) increaseth in that love which proceedeth from the God of love, which he requires and approves, and which tends to his glory, and is therefore styled the increase of God; as that righteousness which he approves, and accepts of, is styled the righteousness of God, Rom. i. 17. 2 Cor. v. 21. Phil. iii. 9. Jam. i. 20. (See the note on Eph. iv. 15, 16.)

[19] Ver. 20. Ἀπὸ τῶν στοιχείων τοῦ κόσμου, From the rudiments of the world.] That these rudiments signify the Mosaical institutions, as being, for matter, mostly the same with the rites used by the heathens, is proved by the note on Gal. iv. 3. And this is also evident from the argument here used, to restrain the Colossians from being still in bondage to them, viz. that they are blotted out, cancelled, and done away by the death of Christ, to which we profess to be conformed, (ver. 14.) To live in the world, is to live after the prescripts of the men of the world, by whom these rites were used.

[20] Δογματίζεσθε; Are ye subject to ordinances?] Δογματίζεσθαι, is to make rules and constitutions concerning these things. Thus of the feast of dedication of the temple purged from defilement, ἐδογμάτισαν μετὰ κοινοῦ προστάγματος, they ordained by a common statute and decree, that every year those days should be kept. (2 Macc. x. 8.) So when Judas had slain Nicanor, ἐδογμάτισαν πάντες μετὰ κοινοῦ ψηφίσματος, they ordained all with a common decree, in no case to [23] Μηδὲ θίγῃς, Handle not] Any thing which may pollute you by touching it, or being offered to idols.

[24] Ver. 22. Ἅ ἐστι πάντα εἰς φθορὰν τῇ ἀποχρήσει, All which things perish in the using.] The word φθόρα is used often by St. Peter speaking of such men, not for a natural, but a moral corruption, as when he saith, they were partakers of the Divine nature, who have escaped τὴν φθορὰν, the pollution which is in the world through lust, 2 Pet. i. 4. and that they, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things they understand not, and shall perish, ἐν τῇ φθορᾷ αὐτῶν, in their own corruption, 2 Pet. ii. 12. and ver. 19. whilst they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants, τῆς φθορᾶς, of corruption. And so the meaning of these words may be, That when these things are observed in compliance with the commands and doctrines of men, as things necessary, they corrupt men who use them thus. But I prefer the other sense, which saith, that these meats perish in the using, according to that aphorism of the civil law,‡ We use those things which remain after the use of them; " his vero abutimur, quæ nobis utentibus pereunt."

[25] Ver. 23. Ἅτινά ἐστι λόγον μὲν ἔχοντα τῆς σοφίας, Which things have a show of wisdom.] These words plainly refer to the former verses; ἐθελοθρησκεία, will-worship, to the θέλων ἐν θρησκείᾳ τῶν ἀγγέλων, pleasing themselves in the worshipping of angels; and so it must be as bad as that; the show of humility, to the doing this from a pretence of humility, ver. 18. the neglecting of the body, and making no provisions for it, to the satisfying of the flesh, to the abstinence from flesh, wine, and women, and from things offered to idols.

It remains only to consider who were the persons here intended. That they were not the gnostics, or followers of Simon Magus, is evident: For they (saith Irenæus§) were men who indulged to the flesh, and who privily corrupted the women whom they taught; they were carefully to meditate upon the mystery of wedlock, and upon that account enticed other men's wives to themselves. And Epiphanius adds,* that they participated of all manner of flesh: that they indulged to drunkenness and venery, execrating them who were used to fastings. They therefore could not be the men who neglected the body, by abstaining from meats, and made no provision for the flesh. They therefore seem to me to have been partly the Essenes, and partly the Pythagorean philosophers. For,

First, Of the Essenes, Josephus saith, that οὐτὲ γαμετὰς εἰσαγονται, &c.† they neither would have wives nor servants; as thinking servitude an injury to our common nature, or tending to injustice; and marriage, to sedition. And again, Γάμου μὲν, ὑποψία παρ' αὐτοῖς,‡ They contemn marriage, not because they would have marriage taken away, or the succession of mankind to cease; but to avoid the intemperance of women, and because they think none of them can keep their faith to one. Philo says,§ They have women with them, but they are only such as are γηραιαὶ, old women, or παρθένοι τὴν ἁγνείαν, virgins as to their chastity, not out of necessity, but, διὰ ζῆλον καὶ πόθον σοφίας, from their zeal to, and desire of, wisdom. He adds, Σιτοῦνται δὲ πολυτελὲς οὐδὲν, ἀλλὰ ἄρτον εὐτελῆ καὶ ὄψον ἁλὲς, &c.‖ They eat nothing that is delicate, having only mean bread, and salt for their meat; and if they be delicate, hyssop for their sauce, and river-water for their drink. ¶ They use no wine in their feasts, οἶνος μὲν γὰρ ἀφροσύνης φάρμακον, for wine (say they) is the incentive to madness. He goes on, τράπεζα καθαρὰ τῶν ἐναίμων, their table is pure from all things that have blood in them, or from the flesh of living creatures; for such things (say they) irritate concupiscence. And of this abstinence from certain meats they are so tenacious, saith Josephus, that they will rather endure all sorts of torments, ἢ φάγωσί τι τῶν ἀσυνήθων, than eat any thing they were not accustomed to eat. Moreover, there were some things they must not touch, as oil;†† for κηλίδα ὑπολαμβάνουσι τὸ ἔλαιον, they look on oil as a defilement; so that if any of them be unwillingly anointed with it, he must wash it off from his body. The younger amongst them must not touch the elders,‡‡ ὥστε εἰ ψαύσειαν αὐτῶν ἐκείνους ἀπολούεσθαι, καθάπερ ἀλλοφύλῳ συμφέροντας, and if they touched them, the elders washed themselves as if they had touched an alien. They were such strict observers of the sabbath, that they would provide no meat for themselves, nor go to stool on that day. They had also§§ τὰ τῶν ἀγγέλων ὀνόματα, certain names of angels which they held in veneration; and also proper δόγματα, opinions or decrees, which they swore never to deliver to others, otherwise than as they had received them. And thus they dogmatized. And, lastly, all this was the effect, τῆς περὶ φιλοσοφίας ὁρμῆς, of their passion for philosophy, of which Philo‖‖ so often speaks in his description of them. So great reason is there to conceive they may be concerned in this chapter.

Secondly, These things being introduced as tho rudiments of the world, and living according to these δόγματα, prescriptions, being living as in the world, I chiefly incline to refer these things to the abstinence from touching and tasting flesh and wine, and handling women, and from all the objects which gratify the senses, the taste, the eye, the touch, taught by the followers of Pythagoras and Empedocles; and defended with such variety of learning by Porphyry, the very title of whose book is, "De abstinentia ab esu animalium," Of abstinence from eating the flesh of any living creature. This he founds upon this principle, that τὸ ζῆν κατὰ τὸν νοῦν,* To live the intellectual life, and to enjoy the contemplation of the most perfect Being, it is necessary we should abstract our minds, as much as is possible, from all sensual objects; from the pleasnres which arise, διὰ γεύσεως, from the taste, particularly of wine; and from the touch: for, saith he, ἁφαὶ, the sensual objects which we touch, are not only σωματοῦσαι τὴν ψυχὴν, such as transform the soul into the body, but also such as stir up swarms of lusts and passions in it. Hence he infers, that all these things are, τὰ αἰσχρὰ, filthy and polluting, and such as hinder, τῆς ψυχῆς καθαρὰν ἐνέργειαν, the pure operations of the soul; therefore, he that would live the intellectual life, must abstain † not only from the use of women, but from all sensual things, they being such as do defile the soul. Moreover, what the apostle speaks of the deceit of philosophy, exactly agrees with the sentiments of those men. Doth he say, that it is κατὰ τὴν παράδοσιν ἀνθρώπων; i. e. according to the tradition of men? this abstinence is styled by Porphyry,‡ νόος ἄγραφος καὶ Θεῖος, a Divine, but unwritten law. Doth he say of them, δογματίζονται, they make decrees and ordinances? this opinion is by Porphyry§ styled δόγμα παλαιὸν καὶ Θεοῖς φίλον, an ancient decree, and acceptable to the gods; and, τὸ διοριζόμενον, a constitution, or a thing defined. Doth the apostle style it ἐθελοθρησκεία, will-worship? it is also by Heraclides Ponticus‖ styled, δεισιδαιμονία, superstition; and said, by Porphyry especially, to be done on the account of wisdom, and the subduing of the body: so full an agreement is there betwixt this philosophy, and that which the apostle hath here said concerning it.

CHAP. III.

1. IF ye then be risen with Christ (through faith, ii. 12. and by newness of life, Rom. vi. 4, 5.) [1] seek those things which are above, where Christ (now raised from the dead) sitteth on the right hand of God.

2. Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth.

3. For ye are dead (to sin, Rom. vi. 6—8. and to the world, Gal. vi. 14. and from the rudiments of it, ii. 20.) [2] and your (future) life is hid with Christ in God.

4. [3] When Christ, who is (the author and purchaser of) our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.

5. [4] Mortify therefore (in order to the enjoyment of this life with God) your members that are upon the earth (i. e. your earthly carnal members); fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, [5] evil concupiscence, and [6] covetousness, which is idolatry:

6. For which things' sake (done by them) the wrath of God cometh upon (men, as being) the children of disobedience (or upon those who obey not the commands of God, to abstain from them).

7. [7] In the which you (of Colosse) also walked sometimes, when ye lived in them.

8. But now also put off all these (following vices; viz.) anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy (i. e. evil-speaking), [8] filthy communication (or reproachful words, which arise from wrath), out of your mouth.

9. (And) [9] lie not one to another, seeing ye have put off the old man with his deeds; (see note on Eph. iv. 22.)

10. And have put on the new man, which is renewed in [10] knowledge (or by the acknowledgment of the truth, Eph. iv. 22.) after the image of him that created him (in righteousness and holiness of truth, Eph. iv. 24.)

11. Where (or under which economy) there is neither (respect had to any man, as being) Greek nor Jew (of the) circumcision nor uncircumcision, (as being) barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but (his belonging to) Christ is all, and in all.

12. Put on therefore, as (becometh new creatures, and) [11] the elect of God (or persons chosen to be his church and people), holy and beloved (of him), bowels of mercy, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering;

13. Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have (ground of) quarrel against any; even as Christ (freely) forgave you (the greatest sins out of mere grace and mercy), so also do ye (to others).

14. And above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness, (i. e. the most perfect bond of union among Christians, Eph. iv. 15, 16. the end, and the perfection of the commandments, 1 Tim. i. 5. that which fulfils the rest, Rom. xiii. 8. Gal. v. 14. and that which renders us perfect, and unblamable in holiness before God, 1 Thess. ii. 12, 13.)

15. And let the peace of God rule (or be the umpire) in your hearts, to which you are called in one body, (by being all made members of one body, Eph. iv. 4.) [12] and be ye thankful (unto him that hath called you to peace, 1 Cor. vii. 15.)

16. [13] Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom, (so that you may be employed in your assemblies, by virtue of this gift of wisdom, in) teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, [14] singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord.

17. And whatsoever you do in word or deed, do all in [15] the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and (or, who is) [16] the Father by him.

18. Wives, submit yourselves (or be subject) to your own husbands (in the offices belonging to that relation), as it is fit (for them to do that are) in the Lord, (that the name of the Lord may not be blasphemed, by your pretending a Christian liberty from the observances of the duty of a wife, Tit. ii. 5. but that by your greater exactness in it, you may commend Christianity to others, 1 Pet. iii. 5. or, in obedience to the Lord, requiring this submission, Eph. vi. 6.)

19. Husbands, [17] love your wives, and be not [18] bitter against them (in the asperity of words, or the severity of

23. And whatsoever you do, do it heartily, as unto the Lord, and not unto men, (having respect to his glory and his recompence. See the notes on Eph. vi. from ver. 1. to ver. 9.)

24. [20] Knowing that of the Lord you shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ.

25. But he (of you) that doeth wrong (to his master) shall receive (of the Lord punishment) for the wrong which he hath done: and (καὶ, for) there is no [21] respect of persons with him.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1, 2. ΤΑ᾽ ἄνω ζητεῖτε, ver. 1. φρονεῖτε, ver. 2.] These phrases seem to import, (1.) that we should put the highest estimate and value on things above. (2.) That we should have them fixed on our spirits, and familiarly occurring to our thoughts, by fervent meditations and serious reflections on them. (3.) That we should have our wills inclined to them, and our affections possessed with frequent love, and passionate desires of them; for φρονεῖν is, saith Phavorinus, λογίζεσθαι, καὶ ἐνθυμεῖσθαι, στέργειν καὶ ἀποδέχεσθαι. (4.) That we should employ our faculties and members in pursuit of them with diligence and constancy; for ζητεῖν is niti, curare, summo studio quærere, as ζητῶ ποιῆσαι in Demosthenes, ζητῶ ἀφελέσθαι, nitor auferre, Plutarch, ζητεῖν δὲ πολυπραγμονεῖν, Schol. Aristoph. p. 289.

[2] Ver. 3. Ἡ ζωὴ ὑμῶν ἐν τῷ Θεῷ.] i. e. Your true life, which consists in fruition of God, and which you shall live for ever with him, is hid with Christ, who is now removed from your sight, and placed at the right hand of God; for it doth not yet appear what we shall be, 1 John iii. 2.

[3] Ver. 4.] Note, hence we learn that Christians are not to expect to reign with Christ on earth a thousand years, because they are not to mind or seek, τὰ ἐπὶ γῆς, the things upon earth, but only those above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God: whereas, were this life on earth a blessing and reward, which God had promised to them for their sufferings, they might mind it, and set their affection on it: as also from all those places where the hope, reward, inheritance of Christians, is said to be reserved in the heavens for them: for, as Œcumenius notes, εἰ ἐν οὐρανοῖς ἡ κληρονομία μυθώδης ἡ χιλιοέτης ἀποκατάστασις, if our inheritance be in heaven, the supposed millenium on earth must be but a fable. Great is your reward in heaven, saith Christ to the Christian sufferer, Matt. v. 12. Luke ix. 23. Your hope is laid up for you in heaven, Colos. i. 5. (See 1 Pet. i. 4.)

[4] Ver. 5. Νεκρώσατε οὖν, Mortify therefore your earthly members.] There being in us naturally the old man, ver. 9. Eph. iv. 22. and the body of sin; the inordinate affections and lustings of it are styled the members of that body; partly, because they exert themselves by the members of the natural body; and partly, because, as the members of the body are employed to fulfil and accomplish the desires of the natural body, so these affections are employed to gratify the desires of the body of sin: these members are styled earthly members, because they respect only earthly things, they fix our hearts upon, and employ our minds about, them; to mortify them is to resist and to suppress their motions that we do not obey them, or gratify them in their inordinate desires and affections, but carefully shun all the occasions of sin, and use those means which tend to the subduing of it. And this exhortation being directed to believers, shews that as they are by profession, and by baptismal obligation, dead to sin, so have they continual need to proceed in the practice of this duty, that they be not overcome by the deceitfulness of sin, by their fleshly lusts, which tend to fornication and uncleanness, their desires of worldly honours and vain-glory, which are evil concupiscences, and by the inordinate love of the world, which is styled covetousness.

[5] Ἐπιθυμία κακὴ, Evil concupiscence.] If hence it follows, that all concupiscence is evil, then from διαλογισμοὶ κακοὶ, mentioned Mark iii. 21. it follows, that all thoughts and reasonings are evil: and from ὁμιλίαι κακαὶ, mentioned 1 Cor. xv. 33. it also follows, that all our conversation with one another must be evil: so certain is it, that this place doth not prove that all concupiscence is evil. And to be sure the very first motions of concupiscence, which arise naturally in the sensual appetite, and prevent our reason and deliberation, cannot be here intended, because the apostle reckons this concupiscence among those members of the body which must be mortified, which the first motions of the body can never be.

Secondly, Because he adds, That because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience: now these first motions, if suppressed, and not consented to when they arise, can never render us children of disobedience, and much less subject to the wrath of God. And if Satan hath the power to inject such motions, or raise such ideas in the brain, if they be our sins, though not consented to, it must be in his power to make us sin, whether we will or no. From all which considerations, it seems necessary to understand this of deliberate fleshly lustings indulged to, and not restrained by us.

[6] Ἥτις ἐστιν εἰδωλολατρεία, Covetousness, which is idolatry.] Because, as heathens place their confidence in idols, even so the avaricious man doth place his confidence in gold and silver, which are the matter of their idols; he chiefly doth pursue them, and for their sakes only doth other matters. And that such actions do partake of the true nature of idolatry, reason as well as Scripture will evince; for reason shews, that love, hope, trust, obedience, are parts of that internal worship which we owe to God in the most excellent degrees, and which he more regards than building temples, or erecting altars, the bending of the knee or body, or any act of outward worship; and therefore in those acts doth more especially consist God's worship; wherefore he that confers them upon any creature in that degree, or in those actions in which they only ought to be ascribed to God, must be as truly an idolater, as he that payeth to a creature any outward act of religious and Divine worship; and as the covetous person, though he doth not indeed believe his riches or his money to be a god, yet by so loving, and so trusting in them, as God only ought to be loved and trusted in, he is as truly guilty of idolatry, as if he so believed. So, though the Roman catholics do not believe their saints and angels to be God, yet by addressing to them even mental prayers,* and giving to them the inward worship of the soul, which, as St. Austin† well observes, the catholic church always reserved to God, they are as guilty of idolatry, as if they did believe them to be gods, since thereby they ascribe to them the knowledge of the heart, and of the inward motions of the soul, which only do belong to God.

[7] Ver. 7.] The Colossians dwelling in Phrygia celebrated the sacra of Bacchus,‡ and of the mother of the gods, called therefore Phrygia Mater, and doubtless complied with all the luxury of Asia Minor, of which they were a part.

[8] Ver. 8. Αἰσχρολογίαν, Filthy communication.] This is usually referred to obscene and impure words; but Hesychius, Phavorinus, and J. Pollux, lib. ii. cap. 4. have informed us, that the word signifies reproachful words, such as tend to put a man to shame; and to this sense the words preceding make it most proper to refer it, wrath, anger, malice, or evil machinations of the heart, being the inward dispositions which render us disaffected to, and prone to do evil to others; railing and opprobrious speeches, which tend to render our brother infamous to others, being the usual effects of these evil dispositions.

[9] Ver. 9.] Hence it appears, that to be addicted to lying is an evidence that we have not yet put off the old man.

[10] Ver. 10. Εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν, In knowledge.] The Christian faith being the knowledge of the truth which is after godliness, Tit. i. 1. it being that by which we escape the pollutions of the world through lust, 2 Pet. ii. 20. and recover out of the snare of Satan, 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26. that by which we have all things given us which appertain to life and godliness, 2 Pet. i. 3. and that, saith the apostle here, by which we are enabled to walk worthy of the Lord unto all well-pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in them, as we increase, εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν τοῦ Θεοῦ, in the knowledge of God: the being renewed in this knowledge, may well import our being renewed in righteousness and true holiness, as the apostle speaks, Eph. iv. 24. especially if we consider, that whilst the judgment still continues to approve the things which are most excellent, the will still chooses, and the inferior faculties will be employed in prosecution of them.

[11] Ver. 12. Ὡς ἐκλεκτοὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ, As the elect of God.] That the apostle speaks not here of any absolute election of some particular persons to eternal life, but of their being chosen out of the heathen world to be his church and people, is evident, because he speaks to the church in general; and yet to these elect he promiseth the blessings of Christianity, only if they continue in the faith rooted and grounded, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, i. 23. ii. 2. 4. 18. expressing his care and fear, lest they should be deceived, and robbed of their rewards.

[12] Ver. 15. Βραβευέτω, Rule.] Μεσιτευέτω, ἰθυνέσθω, saith Phavorinus; i. e. let that peaceable disposition which God requires from all Christians be the umpire and director to compose all differences among you, for peace hath God for its author. He hath called us to it, he hath made us all one body, and nothing is more unseemly or pernicious, than that the members should be at discord with each other. In Josephus* it signifies, let him have the chief place: thus of Jehoshaphat he saith, he did βραβεύειν, ἅπασι ἴσος, excel, as being equal to them all.

[13] Ver. 16. Ὁ Λόγος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, The word of Christ.] The word dictated by the Holy Spirit is therefore the word of Christ, (1 Pet. i. 11.) as proceeding both from the Father and the Son.

[14] Ἐν χάριτι, Singing with grace.] That is, say some interpreters, Χαριέντως, heedfully, so as that their hymns may be grateful to others, and be received by them with spiritual delight; which is, say they, the import of the phrase, Eph. iv. 29. Colos. iv. 6. but this seems rather to depend on others than ourselves. Say others, he exhorts them to sing with a grateful mind, full of the sense of Divine goodness, in which sense Χάρις τῷ Θεῷ is often used: (see 1 Cor. xv. 27. 2 Cor. ii. 14.) but according to the ancients,† he exhorts them, ἀπὸ χαρίσματος ᾄδειν, to sing by the gifts given them by the Holy Ghost, of which one is the word of wisdom; and this exposition is confirmed by the parallel place, Eph. v. 18, 19. Be ye filled with the Spirit, speaking to one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs. Now these gifts being chiefly exercised in their assemblies, where especially they did ψάλλειν τῷ πνεύματι, sing in the Spirit, 1 Cor. xiv. 15, 16. and every one had his psalm, and his διδαχὴ, doctrine, ver. 26. I conceive these spiritual songs, in which they were to teach and to admonish one another, may refer chiefly to their assemblies, then managed by their prophets, in which they met together for that end. So Pliny doth inform us, that the Christians used to meet together on a certain day, "carmenque Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem," and sing a hymn to Christ as God, lib. x. ep. 97.

[15] Ver. 17. Ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου, In the name of the Lord.] To do all in the name of the Lord, is, first, to have respect in all things to his will, as knowing we are obliged to live to him, (2 Cor. v. 14.) to the honour of his name and doctrine. Secondly, To be desirous that our actions may be well-pleasing to him. (2 Cor. v. 8, 9.) Thirdly, To expect acceptance of our actions, prayers, (John xiv. 13—16.) and praises, through him, (Heb. xiii. 15.) and a recompence of them hereafter. (Eph. vi. 8. here, ver. 25.) And, saith Chrysostom,‡ ἐπὶ πάντων πρότερον αὐτῷ εὐχόμενος, praying to him before we begin our work.

[16] Πατρὶ δι' αὐτοῦ, To the Father by him.] It is the manner of the Scriptures (saith Bishop Davenant) to refer our prayers and praises to the person of the Father, because he is the fountain of the Deity; add, and because they are to find acceptance through the intercession of, and the presenting of them by, the Son. (Rev. viii. 3, 4.) Our prayers must be offered to the Father in his name, (John xvi. 23.) and yet the blessing asked is to be given by him; (John xv. 16.) that the Father may be glorified in the Son. (John xiv. 13, 14.) Our praises must be offered up to the Father in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, (Eph. v. 20.) by him we must offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, (Heb. xiii. 15.) these spiritual sacrifices being acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. (1 Pet. ii. 4.) And yet it is very frequent in these Epistles to pray as well to our Lord Jesus Christ as to God the Father; (see note on Rom. x. 13.) and in the Revelation, to give praise and glory to him: (iv. 9. 11. v. 12, 13.) but it is especially to be noted, that all the Greek interpreters here observe, that this is spoken against the worship of angels or demons, which the philosophers, and especially the Platonists, had introduced, as thinking them the persons who carried up all our prayers and praises to God, and conveyed down all his blessings to us.

Do all ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου, in the name of the Lord.] It is well worth the observation, that all the ancient comtators on this Epistle do frequently inform us, that it was written to prevent the worship of angels, and to fix Christians to the worship of Jesus Christ only. Hilary's preface to this Epistle saith, it is an exhortation to the Colossians, "nè alicui præter Christum aliquam esse spem putarent," to place no hope in any other but in Christ. St. Chrysostom notes on the first verse of the first chapter, that the disease of the Colossians being this, that δι' ἀγγέλων προσάγεσθαι ᾠοντο τῷ Θεῷ, they thought they were to come to God by angels; the apostle endeavours to correct this distemper, by telling them, that what he said in this Epistle to them was according to the will of God: and Œcumenius brings in the apostle speaking thus; Know, therefore, that it is according to the will of God: ὑπὸ υἱοῦ ὑμᾶς προσάγεσθαι, that you should come to him by his Son; and then, πῶς δι' ἀγγέλων προσαγωγὴν εἶναι ὑπειλήφατε; how is it that you think you should come to him by angels? And again, This is the will of the Father, δι' υἱοῦ προσάγεσθαι αὐτῷ τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, καὶ μὴ δι' ἀγγέλων, that men should have access to him by the Son, and not by angels. The same words he repeats on ver. 16. and on ii. 3. Chrysostom notes, that by saying, that all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid in him, he teaches πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ αἰτεῖν, to ask all things by Christ: Œcumenius, that the mystery of the Father and the Son is this, τὸ τὴν προσαγωγὴν, τὴν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ γίνεσθαι, καὶ οὐ διὰ τῶν ἁγίων ἀγγέλων, that the introduction to the Father should be by the Son, and not by the holy angels. Theodoret upon this verse saith thus, ἐπειδὴ γὰρ, ἐκεῖνοι τοὺς ἀγγέλους σέβειν ἐκέλευον, αὐτὸς τὸ ἐναντίον παρεγγυᾷ ὥστε καὶ τοὺς λόγους καὶ τὰ ἔργα κοσμῆσαι τῇ μνημῇ τοῦ δεσπότου Χριστοῦ, καὶ τῷ Θεῷ δὲ, καὶ πατρὶ τὴν εὐχαριστίαν δι' αὐτοῦ ἀναπέμπειν, because they (who perverted the Colossians) persuaded them to worship angels, he enjoins the contrary, that they should adorn their words and deeds with the commemoration of the Lord Christ, and send up thanksgiving to God the Father by him, μὴ δι' ἀγγέλων, and not by angels. St. Chrysostom here having said, that he commands us to do all things according to God, μὴ τοὺς ἀγγέλους ἐπεισαγαγεῖν, and not to introduce the angels, adds, that the devil envying our honour, τὰ τῶν ἀγγέλων ἐπεισήγαγε, hath introduced the worship of angels; and concludes thus, Be he an angel, an archangel, or a cherubim, endure it not, ἐπεὶ οὐδὲ αὐτοὶ οἱ δαίμονες καταδέξονται, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀποστήσονται, for neither will they receive, but reject it when they see their Lord dishonoured; ἐγώ σε ἐτίμησα καὶ εἶπον, ἐμὲ κάλει καὶ σὺ ἀτιμάζεις αὐτὸν, I have honoured thee, and said, Call upon me, and thou dishonourest me.

[17] Ver. 19. Ἀγαπᾶτε, Love your wives.] Delighting in their conversation, (Prov. v. 18, 19.) desiring to promote their welfare both temporal and eternal; for this is surely comprehended in loving her as we do ourselves, (Eph. v. 33.) providing for her all things necessary to the happiness and comfort of her life; for this is loving her as Christ did love his church, (ver. 25.) This, say the very heathens, is the property of a * sincere affection in the general, and therefore much more of that affection which we are to bear to our own flesh and body, as the wife is to be esteemed. (Eph. v. 28, 29.)

[18] Καὶ μὴ πικραίνεσθε πρὸς αὐτὰς, And be not bitter against them.] For, as St. Ambrose saith, Non es Dominus, sed Maritus; non ancillam sortitus es, sed uxorem; gubernatorem voluit te esse Deus sexûs inferioris, non tyrannum, Hexam. v. 7. Hence they who sacrificed to Juno Nuptialis, saith Plutarch,† did separate the gall from the sacrifice, and throw it away, signifying, τὸ μηδέποτε δεῖν χόλην μηδὲ ὀργὴν γάμῳ παρεῖναι, that there should be no bitterness or wrath betwixt those that were married.

[19] Ver. 22. Servants obey, &c.] In omnibus ad quæ jus Domini quod in servum habet, extenditur, et in quibus Dominus carnis Domino spiritûs contrarius non est. Hieron.

Κατὰ πάντα, and κατὰ σάρκα, iv. 2. ἐν εὐχαριστίᾳ, ver. 3. τοῦ λόγου, ver. 10. ὁ συναιχμάλωτός μου, are all defended from the censure of Dr. Mills, that they are additions to the text. See Examen Millii.

[20] Ver. 24.] Note, We are (saith Schlictingius, a Socinian) to serve Christ as our heavenly Lord, which (saith he‡) comprehends faith in him, obedience to him, and worship and adoration of him, the giving him the honour which agrees to him, and invocation of him. Now, saith Christ, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve, Matt. iv. 10. and God alone is worthy of religious invocation from all Christians, as being only omniscient, omnipresent, and the searcher of all hearts; Christ therefore must be truly God. Moreover, the apostle reckons it part of the idolatry of the heathens that they served or paid religious worship to them which by nature were no gods, Gal. iv. 8. The Socinians therefore either must confess Christ is by nature, as well as by office, God; or else acknowledge that they are guilty of idolatry, in giving this religious worship to him.

[21] Ver. 25. Προσωποληψία, Respect of persons.] Christ, in judging men at the last day, will have no respect to the quality or external condition of any man's person; but whether he be bond or free, he shall receive recompence for the good that he hath done, in obedience to him; whether he be master or servant, he shall be punished for the wrong that he doth in those relations. It being certain from the second chapter, that the Judaizers were got into the church of Colosse; and that many of them denied, that the Jews ought to be servants to any; and the Essenes judging all servitude unlawful: (see note on 1 Pet. ii. 15. 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2.) this might be the reason why here, and Titus ii. the apostle is so large in charging this duty upon servants.

* Τὸ φιλεῖν ἐστι βούλεσθαί τινι ἃ οἴεται ἀγαθὰ ἐκείνου ἕνεκα, ἀλλὰ μὴ αὐτοῦ, καὶ τὸ κατὰ δύναμιν πρακτικὸν εἶναι τούτων. Arist. Rhetor. lib. ii. cap. 8.

CHAP. IV.

1. MASTERS, give unto your servants that which is [1] just and equal; knowing that you also have a Master in heaven (who, with what measure you mete to others, will mete to you again, Matt vii. 2. and deal with you his servants, as you deal with yours).

2. Continue (instant) in prayer, and watch in the same (γρηγοροῦντες, being vigilant in it) with thanksgiving (for the mercies you have already received);

3. Withal [2] praying also for us, that God would open to us a door of utterance, (by enabling us) to speak (with freedom) the mystery of Christ, for which I am also (now) in bonds: (see note on Eph. vi. 19, 20.)

4. That I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak (it).

5. Walk in wisdom (or discretion) towards them that are without (the church, i. e. the heathens, 1 Thess. iv. 12.) redeeming the time, (i. e. endeavouring to avoid, as much as you are able, by careful circumspection and inoffensive carriage, the dangers you may be exposed to from them. See note on Eph. v. 15.)

6. Let your speech be always [3] with grace (mild and courteous), seasoned with salt (wise and discreet), that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man, (so as conduceth to the credit of Christianity, 1 Pet. iii. 15. and to your own safety in these evil times, Eph. v. 16, 17.

7. And as for what concerns me,) all my state shall [4] Tychicus declare to you, who is a beloved brother, and faithful minister and fellow-servant in the (work of the) Lord.

8. Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that he might know your state, and comfort your hearts (under your pressures;

9. And) with (him I have sent) [5] Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you (being servant to Philemon, a chief man in Colosse). They shall make known unto you all things that are done here (at Rome).

10. Aristarchus my fellow-prisoner saluteth you, and [6] Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, concerning whom (i. e. which Marcus) you received commands, if he come to you (to) receive him (kindly);

11. And Jesus, who is called Justus, (Acts xviii. 5—7.) who are of the circumcision. These [7] only (of the Jews) are my fellow-workers to (the promotion of) the kingdom of God, which have been a comfort to me.

12. [8] Epaphras, who is one of you (a citizen of Colosse, see ver. 9.) a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God.

13. For I bear him record, that he hath a great zeal for you, and for them that are in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis (two other cities of Phrygia).

14. Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you.

15. Salute the brethren which are in Laodicea, and Nymphas, [9] and the church which is in his house (i. e. his Christian household).

16. And when this Epistle is read amongst you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and (see) that ye likewise read [10] the epistle from Laodicea.

17. And say to [11] Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it.

18. The salutation (written) by the hand of me Paul (is in token that this is my Epistle, 2 Thess. iii. 17.) Remember my (being in) bonds (so as to pray for my deliverance, ver. 3. and to prepare for patient suffering, by my example). Grace be with you. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. ΤΟ᾽ δίκαιον, What is just and equal.] Hence it is evident, that justice is to be observed towards servants, and that there be offices of humanity and charity due to them: as, (1.) that we do not look upon them as vile persons, but as partakers of the same grace and nature with us, and so not only servants, but as brethren, Philem. 16 (2.) That we do not always punish all their miscarriages, but sometimes do remit the punishments which in anger we threatened to inflict, Eph. vi. 9. (3.) That we do not make them serve with rigour; οὐ κατατενεῖς αὐτὸν ἐν τῷ μόχθῳ, Thou shalt not oppress, afflict, or wear him out with labour, but shalt fear the Lord, Lev. xxv. 43. (4.) That we permit them to plead their cause, and to defend their right; provided they do it with humility, not contradicting or speaking against the commands of their masters, Tit. ii. 9. If I did despise the cause of my man-servant, or maid-servant, when they contended with me; what then shall I do when God riseth up? and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him? Job xxxi. 13, 14. (5.) That to well-deserving servants we give something even above their wages; and after a long and profitable service, we do not suffer them to go empty from us: When thou sendest him out from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty; thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy wine-press: of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee, thou shalt give unto him, Deut. xv. 13, 14. These things the Lord commanded under the Old Testament, because their servants were his servants also, redeemed by him out of Egypt: (Lev. xxv. 15. Deut. xv. 15.) and therefore they seem as strongly to oblige under that economy, where we are all the servants of Christ, our common Lord, and redeemed by his precious blood. (Eph. vi. 6. 1 Cor. vii. 22, 23.)

[2] Ver. 3. Προσευχόμενοι περὶ ἡμῶν, Praying for us.] That this apostle who so passionately writes to Christians, desiring that they would strive together with him in their prayers to God, Rom. xv. 30, 31. that they would always with all perseverance pray for him; that they would continue in prayer, that God would open to him a door of utterance to speak the mystery of Christ, (Eph. vi. 18, 19. Colos. iv. 2, 3.) and that he might be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men, (1 Thess. v. 25. 2 Thess. iii. 1, 2.) should never pray to the Virgin Mary, and to angels, or to saints departed, for any of these things, is an evidence that he approved not of those prayers.

[3] Ver. 6. Ἐν χάριτι, With grace.] i. e. With sweetness and courteousness, saith Theodoret, that it may be acceptable to the hearers; ἵνα αὐτοὺς κεχαριτωμένους ἐργάζοιτο, that it may render you gracious to and favoured by them; so Theophylact. Seasoned with salt; salt is the symbol of wisdom, and in this sense the word is used, Matt. v. 13. Mark ix. 15. Have (saith Theodoret) σύνεσιν πνευματικὴν, spiritual wisdom, that ye may know, &c.

[4] Ver. 7. Τυχικός.] That this Epistle was written at the same time with that to the Ephesians, is pleaded from this, that it was sent by the same person Tychicus, with the very same words contained in this and the following verse, Eph. vi. 21, 22.

[5] Ver. 9. Onesimus.] Of whom St. Jerome saith, *We read, that of a servant he was made a deacon.

[6] Ver. 10. Μάρκος.] It seems evident hence, that St. Paul's displeasure against him, mentioned Acts xv. 38. lasted not long; for he desires Timothy to bring him with him, as being profitable to him for the ministry, 2 Tim. iv. 11. and styles him his fellow-labourer, Philem. 24.

[7] Ver. 11. These only are my fellow-workers in the (promotion of the) kingdom of God which have been a comfort to me.] Hence it is evident, that either St. Peter was not at Rome when St. Paul was, or that he was no comfort to him, no promoter of the kingdom of God with him: which sure is no compliment to St. Peter.

[8] Ver. 12. Ἐπαφρᾶς.] That Epaphras was about this time prisoner at Rome, is concluded very probably from Philem. 23. where he is styled by St. Paul his fellow-prisoner; for that the Epistle to Philemon and this were written at the same time, may be conjectured, by the naming Timothy at the beginning, and all the same persons, save only Justus, viz. Epaphras, Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, at the end of both of them; but that he was bishop of Colosse, is not said by any of the Greek commentators on the place: he might have this zeal for them mentioned in these two verses, either as being one of them, (ver. 12.) or as being employed in preaching the gospel to them.

[9] Ver. 15. The church which is in his house.] i. e. His Christian household; for all the brethren are mentioned before. So Theodoret, Œcumenius, St. Chrysostom, and Theophylact, note, that, τὸν οἶκον πάντα πιστοὺς εἶχεν, ὥστε καὶ ἐκκλησίαν καλεῖσθαι, he had made his whole family Christians, so as to be called a church.

[10] Ver. 16. Καὶ τὴν ἐκ Λαοδικείας, And that from Laodicea.] Some say, that the epistle here mentioned, as from Laodicea, was the First Epistle of St. Paul to Timothy, because the postscript saith it was written from Laodicea; but that subscription is easily confuted, both from this consideration, that the First Epistle to Timothy was written two or three years after this (see the preface to it); and from this very Epistle, in which the apostle mentions them of Laodicea among those who had not seen his face in the flesh, ii. 1. St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, understood by it some epistle writ by them of Laodicea to St. Paul; but the apostle doth not say, Read the epistle sent from me to Laodicea; nor doth he mention one word of such an epistle sent from them to him here, or elsewhere; nor is it to be doubted but he would have answered their epistle, had they sent any, as he did that which the church of Corinth sent to him. Others understand this of an epistle sent by St. Paul to them which is now lost; but all the ancients are not only silent in this matter, but some of them expressly do explode this imagination, observing, that the apostle proposes to their reading, not τὴν πρὸς Λαοδικείας, ἀλλὰ τὴν ἐκ Λαοδικείας γραφεῖσαν, an epistle writ to the Laodiceans, but only from Laodicea, to be sent to Colosse. I therefore acquiesce in their opinion, who understand this of the Epistle to the Ephesians, sent, by the admonition of St. Paul, from Ephesus, the metropolis of Laodicea, subject to it; as the Epistles to the church of Corinth belonged to all the churches of Achaia, 2 Cor. i. 1. For Tertullian * witnesseth, that this Epistle to the Ephesians, was, by Marcion, styled The Epistle to the Laodiceans; and the place which Marcion cites in Epiphanius,† as from the Epistle to the Laodiceans, is in the Epistle to the Ephesians, iv. 5, 6. viz. There is one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all. Moreover, the Epistle to the Colossians, as I have shewed, and as Theodoret notes, was writ soon after that to the Ephesians, and sent to them both by the hands of Tychicus; and there is a great resemblance observable betwixt them, both in the doctrines and exhortations, and in the very expressions: so that it is not to be wondered, that the apostle would have that Epistle also read to the Colossians, to let them see, that he writ the same doctrine, and gave the same instructions, to other churches of the saints.

[11] Ver. 17. Ἀρχίππῳ, Archippus.] That this Archippus should be then bishop of Colosse, as St. Jerome, on the Epistle to Philemon, thinks; and that St. Paul should not write one word, or send one salutation to him, but send to the people of Colosse to admonish him of his duty, is not very credible in itself, nor do the ancients testify that he bore that character.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

THAT St. Paul laid the foundation of the gospel among the Thessalonians,* ἀντιλεγόντων μὲν Ἰουδαίων, the Jews contradicting, and openly contending against it, we learn from the history of the Acts: and this church consisting, as Œcumenius† notes, partly of Jews, and partly of gentiles, they were persecuted both by the unbelieving Jews and gentiles; the Jews exciting the gentiles to this persecution. (Acts xvii. 5.) The apostle therefore writes, to confirm them in the faith, and to prevent their being shaken by these persecutions; informing them, that it was nothing strange they should thus suffer from those Jews, who had killed the Lord Jesus, and had persecuted both the apostles and their own prophets; or that they should suffer from their own countrymen, as the Jews in Judea did from theirs, (ii. 14.)

Moreover, concerning this Epistle, the first note of the fathers is this;‡ Thessalonica was the metropolis of Macedonia, whence we may certainly conclude that Philippi was not so.

This Epistle must be written after the council held at Jerusalem, A. D. 49. From thence Paul goes to Antioch, Acts xv. 30. stays there some considerable time, ver. 35. from thence goes through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the brethren, ver. 41. thence to Derbe and Lystra, xvi. 1. through Phrygia and Galatia, ver. 6. then to Troas, ver. 8. to Samothracia and Neapolis, ver. 11. and so to Philippi, ver. 12. then to Amphipolis and Apollonia, and so to Thessalonica, xvii. 1. there planting the gospel: thence they are expelled by the Jews and gentiles, and go to Berea, ver. 10. thence to Athens, ver. 15. and from thence to Corinth, xviii. 1. where Timotheus coming to him, and giving him a comfortable account of their faith and constancy, he writes this Epistle to them, iii. 6. Whence it appears, that it could not be written in less time than a year or two after that council; and that the inscription of it running thus, Paul, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, to the church of the Thessalonians, it must be written after their return to him; and so not from Athens, as the subscription hath it, but from Corinth, Acts xviii. 1. 5. A. D. 51. or 52. for it was written after he had been separated from them but a little while, ii. 17.

CHAP. I.

1. (I) PAUL, (the apostle of Jesus Christ), and Silvanus, and Timotheus, (my fellow-labourers, write) [1] to the church of the Thessalonians (established) in (the knowledge and worship of) [2] God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ: (wishing) grace (may) be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and (from) the Lord Jesus Christ.

2. (And advertising you, that) we give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers;

3. [3] Remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, (ver. 10. when we appear) in the sight of God and (even) our Father;

4. (And) knowing, brethren beloved (by your proficiency in these Christian virtues), [4] your election of God.

5. For our gospel came not to you in word only, but also in (the) power (of miracles), and in (or with) the (distributions of) the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance (or full conviction both to you of the truth of our doctrine, and to us, that God had chosen you to be his church and people); as you know what manner of men we were among you for your sake (or how we were enabled by these things to give full proof of our ministry).

6. And ye became followers of us, and of the Lord (in your sufferings for his sake), having received the word in much affliction, (Acts xvii. 5. and yet) [5] with joy of the Holy Ghost:

7. So that ye were examples (of faith and patience) to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia.

8. For from you sounded out the word of the Lord not only in Macedonia and Achaia (and so they could not be ignorant of your good works), but also in every place (the fame of) your faith to God-ward is spread abroad (or hath gone forth); so that we need not to speak any thing (to others of the grace of God given us towards you, Eph. iii. 3. Colos. i. 25.)

9. [6] For they themselves shew of us what manner of entering in we had unto you, (i. e. with what power and assistance of the Holy Ghost we preached the gospel to you, ver. 5.) and how (thereupon) ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God,

10. And to wait for (the coming of) his Son from heaven (to be glorified in his saints, 2 Thess. i. 10.) whom he (hath already) raised from the dead, even Jesus, who (by his death hath) delivered us from the wrath to come.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. ΤΗ ἐκκλησίᾳ Θεσσαλονικέων, To the church of the Thessalonians.] He names not the presbyters and deacons

(saith Grotius), because the church was newly planted, and had not received its full form: and yet in his note on those words, v. 12. I entreat you, brethren, know them that labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, he saith, οἱ κοπιῶντες, the labourers are the princes of the assembly, called bishops; οἱ προϊστάμενοι, they that are over you, are the presbyters; but against this, see the note there.

[2] Ἀπὸ Θεοῦ Πατρὸς, From God the Father, ver. 1. and in the sight of God and our Father, ver. 3.] The Spirit of God vouchsafed under the gospel, enables us to cry, Abba, Father, i. e. to come to God with the assurance of his fatherly affection to us, as being now the sons of God through faith in Jesus Christ; on which account is God our Father, or the Father of us Christians, (Eph. iii. 15.) so often mentioned for their consolation in those times of peril.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἀδιαλείπτως μνημονεύοντες, Remembering without ceasing.] i. e. As often as we appear before God our Father, thankfully remembering your faith, fruitful in good works; your love to the saints making you laborious to promote their good, and your hope in the Lord Jesus, (ver. 10.) rendering you patient in all tribulations for his sake, ver. 17. (See note there.)

Your labour of love and patience.] Œcumenius here notes, that it is the property of true love, τὰ πάντα ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἠγαπημένου πάσχειν, to suffer all things for the sake of the beloved.

[4] Ver. 4. Τὴν ἐκλογὴν ὑμῶν, Your election of God.] The gospel came to some in word only, i. e. they heard the sound of it, but did not believe and obey it, and so the word did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it, Heb. iv. 2. and these were only κλητοὶ, called, but not ἐκλεκτοὶ, chosen, Matt. xxii. 14. To others, the preaching of the apostles was attended with a greater power of miracles, and extraordinary effusions of the Holy Ghost, prevailing on many to embrace it as the word of God; so that from hence the apostles had a full assurance, that it was the good pleasure of God to gather a church of believers, and faithful people there; and these were called the elect, ἐκλογὴ Θεοῦ, the election of God, the election of grace, i. e. men chosen to be partakers of the blessings of the gospel, and to be God's peculiar church and people. For, the apostle doth not here speak of any absolute election of the whole church of the Thessalonians to eternal life, because he could have no certain knowledge of it; or if he had, he could not have been under any just grounds of fear, as we find he was, lest by some means the tempter should have tempted them, and his labour be in vain among them, (iii. 5.) Moreover, the reason of his knowledge here assigned, viz. the miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, with which his preaching was attended, gave him a certain knowledge that God designed to gather there a church of Christians; but it was no certain indication of their election to eternal life, seeing the apostle informs us, that they who had tasted of these powers of the world to come, and received these gifts of the Holy Ghost, might fall away, so as not to be renewed to repentance, (Heb. vi. 4—6.) and many of the converted Jews actually did so afterward.

[5] Ver. 6. Μετὰ χαρᾶς, &c. With joy of the Holy Ghost.] In the foregoing verse he lays before them the outward testimonies of the truth of Christianity from the miracles wrought, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost exercised among them: here he appeals also to the inward testimonies they had received of it, even a strong spiritual joy wrought in them by the Holy Ghost, under the sharpest sufferings, according to those words of St. Peter, If ye suffer for the sake of righteousness, and be reproached for Christ's sake, happy are ye, for the Spirit of glory and of God rests upon you. (1 Pet. iv. 14.)

[6] Ver. 9.] These words, saith Theodoret,* instruct us how to expound our Saviour's words, This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, teaching us that he is so styled, in opposition not to Jesus Christ, but to idols only.

CHAP. II.

1. (WE need not, I say, speak any thing farther of the effectual working of God with us in our entrance in unto you:) for yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not [1] in vain: (i. e. not without demonstration of Divine assistance, i. 5.)

2. But (we had such assurance of God's call to preach to you, that) even after that we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated, as ye know, at Philippi, (Acts xvi. 23.) we were (still) bold in (the strength of) our God to speak unto you the gospel of God, (though this we did) with much contention (and opposition from the unbelieving Jews, Acts xvii. 5.)

3. For our exhortation (made to you to embrace the gospel) was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile (as are the exhortations of the philosophers among you, and the deceitful workers of the Jewish nation, who endeavour to corrupt you):

4. But as we were allowed (Gr. have been approved) of God (as persons fit) to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak (the truth sincerely); not as pleasing men, but (as approving ourselves to that) God who trieth our hearts. (Gal. i. 10.)

5. For neither at any time used we [2] flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloak of covetousness; God is witness: (2 Cor. ii. 17.)

6. Nor of men sought we glory (or high estimation), neither of you, nor yet of others (provisions), when we might (not only with a fair pretence, but with just reason) have been (thus) [3] burdensome, as (being) the apostles of Christ.

7. (I say, we sought not high esteem, or rich provisions:) but we were [4] gentle (meek and unburdensome) among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children, (bearing herself the burden of them, and giving them her milk, as we dispense to you the sincere milk of the word freely:

8. And) so being affectionately desirous of you-(r good), we were willing to have imparted to you, not the gospel of God only, but also our [5] own souls (i. e. to have spent our lives in your service), because ye were dear unto us.

9. (And of this affection you cannot well be ignorant;) [6] for ye remember, brethren, our labour and travail: for labouring night and day, because we would not be chargeable to any of you, we preached to you (freely) the gospel of God.

* Οὐ γὰρ τῷ υἱῷ συγκρίνων, ἀλλὰ τοῖς οὐκ οὖσι Θεοῖς, τὸν ὄντα Θεὸν, Θεὸν ζῶντα, καὶ ἀληθινὸν, αὐτὸν προσηγόρευσε.

10. Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily (towards God) and justly and unblamably we behaved ourselves (whilst we conversed) among you that believe:

11. As (and likewise) you know [7] how we exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children, (Gr. how we loved every one of you as a father doth his children, exhorting you to the performance of your duty, comforting you under your tribulations, and testifying)

12. That ye would (ought to) walk [8] worthy of God, who hath called you to his kingdom and glory.

13. For this cause also (or, and for this thing) thank we God without ceasing, because when you received the word of God which you heard from us, ye received it not as the word of men (speaking from their own human wisdom), but as it is in truth, the word of God, [9] which effectually worketh also in you that believe (the fruits of Christian patience).

14. For ye, brethren, (in this) became followers of the churches of God which in Judea are in Christ Jesus: for ye also have suffered (patiently) like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews (their countrymen):

15. Who both killed the Lord Jesus, and (before him) their own prophets, and have (since) persecuted us (his apostles); and they please not God, and are [10] contrary to all men (who are not of their own nation or religion:

16. And this they shew in) forbidding us to speak to the gentiles that they might be saved (by the preaching of the gospel), [11] to fill up their sins always (i. e. which they are given up to do, to fill up the measure of their sins, which being thus disposed, and thus deserted by God, they will do): for (the) wrath (of God) is come upon them to the uttermost.

17. But we, brethren, being (by their impatient malice) taken from you for a short time (Acts xviii. 5. 10. and this) in presence (only), not in heart, endeavoured the more abundantly to see your face (again) with great desire.

18. Wherefore we would have come unto you, even I Paul, once and again; but [12] Satan (by his ministers still) hindered us.

19. For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? are not even ye (Gr. ἢ οὐχὶ καὶ ὑμεῖς, will it not among others be you also when we stand) in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?

20. For ye are (even at present) our glory and joy.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Ὅτι κενὴ, Not vain.] I grant that the apostle doth not intend to signify by this phrase, only that his word was not ineffectual among them, but also to declare the reason why it was not so; to wit, because it wanted not a demonstration of Divine authority and power to confirm them in the faith that heard it, and those that preached it in their expectations of success, and their assurance that the Thessalonians whereby God designed to receive the faith; as it would have been had it come to them in word only, and not in power, and the Holy Ghost, and much assurance. For the word vain, when it is applied to God's message, signifies the not accomplishing the great ends for which it was designed; so Isa. lv. 11. The word that goeth out of my mouth shall not return to me in vain, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the things whereto I sent it: and, Jer. viii. 8. How do ye say, We are wise, and the law of the Lord is with us? Lo, certainly in vain made he it; the pen of the scribes is in vain: and, Jer. ii. 33. In vain have I smitten your children, they have received no correction. Our entrance therefore to you was not in vain; that is, it was not without such Divine assistance as was sufficient to work conviction in you, and to engage you to embrace the truth to you.

[2] Ver. 5. Ἐν λόγῳ κολακείας,] Here signifies in flattering words, or words that are flattery, as λόγος ἀκοῆς, ver. 13. is the word heard; λόγος ἀληθείας, the word which is the truth, 2 Cor. vi. 7. Colos. i. 5. and πρόφασις πλεονεξίας, is a pretence to gratify their covetousness: for that the apostles never were under a defamation or accusation of these things, neither could the Thessalonians know, nor was it a thing proper to call God to witness to; but that no such guilt could truly be charged upon them, the Thessalonians might know, and that they inwardly designed no such thing God only could be witness, as being alone the searcher of the heart.

[3] Ver. 6. Ἐν βάρει εἶναι, Be burdensome.] This seems not to refer to the censures of the church, but to the apostles living at the charge of their converts; for he saith, ver. 9. that he and his companions laboured night and day, πρὸς τὸ μὴ ἐπιβαρῆσαι, that they might burden none of them. So 2 Cor. xi. 9. Other churches supplied my wants, so that in all things I have kept myself, ἀβαρῆ, unburdensome to you: and 1 Tim. v. 16. If any man or woman that believeth have widows, let them relieve them, καὶ μὴ βαρεῖσθω ἡ ἐκκλησία, and let not the church be burdened with them.

When we might have been burdensome.] Here Theophylact cries out, βαβαὶ τῆς προθυμίας καὶ τῆς ὑπὲρ τοῦ μὴ σκανδαλίσαι τίνα σπουδῆς, O the study and sedulity of the apostle, not to scandalize any person! And the descant of Esthius upon the words is this, we accommodated ourselves to you in all things, "neque jus nostrum, neque imperium urgentes, ut vestram promoveamus salutem," forbearing our own right to promote your happiness! And if the apostles forbore to exercise their own power, that they might not be burdensome to the weak Thessalonians, how much more would they have done it to prevent their ruin?

[4] Ver. 7. Ἤπιοι, Meek.] If the various lection noted by Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, who here read νήπιοι, children, were the original, the sense would run thus: But, we, O children, were among you as a nurse that cherisheth her children. (See ver. 11.) And that Origen read so is certain from his commentary on St. Matthew, p. 372. 375.

[5] Ver. 8. Τὰς ἑαυτῶν ψυχὰς, Our own souls.] i. e. Our own lives; as when Christ is said to give τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ, his life a ransom for many, Matt. xx. 28. To lay down, τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ, his life for the sheep, John x. 11. 15. 17. xv. 13. 1 John iii. 16. and when we are bid, to lay down, τὰς ψυχὰς, our lives for the brethren, 1 John iii. 16. or said to lose or gain, τὴν ψυχὴν, our life, Luke ix. 24. John xii. 15. (See Acts xx. 10. Rom. xi. 3. xvi. 4. 2 Cor. xii. 15. Phil. ii. 13. 1 Pet. iv. 19.)

[6] Ver. 9.] It is the opinion of Dr. Hammond, that the apostle here from the third to the fourth verse refers to the gnostics, and clears himself from the vile arts they used, and ill designs they had, in promoting their delusions. But this Epistle being writ, saith the same reverend person, about the year 50. and whilst Simon Magus was yet living, it cannot be proved that these gnostics were then in being, much less that they ever were at Thessalonica.

We read in Scripture of some teachers of the law, who gave heed to fables, 1 Tim. i. 4. 7. and who counted gain godliness, vi. 5. of some Jews who were deceitful workers, 2 Cor. xi. 13. 22. 1 Cor. iv. 2. and had their πανουργίαι, subtilties, 2 Cor. xi. 3. and who were given to uncleanness, Rom. ii. 22. and taught unclean doctrines, 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17. vi. 13. 19. 2 Cor. xii. 21. (see the note there:) and it is likely the apostle might in these words respect those deceivers.

Or we may refer these things to the philosophers of those times, who did συλαγωγεῖν, make a prey of men by philosophy and vain deceit, Colos. ii. 8. who were, saith the poet in Athenæus,* μειρακιεξαπάται, deceivers of young men, and δοξοματαιόσοφοι, desirous of vain-glory, whose business it was χαριτογλωσσεῖν, to speak to please men,† who taught only for stipends, or ἐργολαβίας ἕνεκεν, as Diodorus Siculus‡ saith of the Grecian philosophers; and τοῦ κατὰ τὴν ἐργολαβίαν κέρδους στοχαζόμενοι, philosophized (saith Plato§) out of love of gain; and who are every where represented as given to impurity,‖ and exercising the vilest practices with those they taught their vain philosophy. Whence they were sometimes banished from the places of their abodes, saith Athenæus,¶ ὡς διαφθείροντες τοὺς νέους, as corrupters of the youth, and did κυνικῶς ζῆν, lead the lives of cynics. And Plato himself confesseth, That one reason why they were so generally decried, was this, that most of them were παμπόνηροι, the worst of men.

[7] Ver. 11, 12. Οἴδατε ὡς ἕνα ἕκαστον ὑμῶν, ὡς πατὴρ τέκνα ἑαυτοῦ παρακαλοῦντες ὑμᾶς, You know how we exhorted, and comforted, and charged every one of you, as a father does his children.] Here our translation puts the μαρτυρούμενοι, persuading, testifying, or charging, which begins the twelfth verse before the beginning of the eleventh, which is an unusual transposition, and changes the participles into verbs, which, though it be usual, cannot here be admitted because of the ὑμᾶς following παρακαλοῦντες· I think therefore it is better to own an ellipsis or deficiency of the word ἐφιλήσαμεν, or ἠγαπήσαμεν, or ἐθάλψαμεν, from ver. 7. of which ellipsis we find many instances; v. g. there is an ellipsis of the verb ἐποίει, Rom. viii. 3. of ἐλπίζετε, Eph. i. 13. (See 1 Cor. iv. 15. Gal. ii. 7. 2 Thess. ii. 7. 1 John ii. 19. Matt. xx. 23.) And then the words may be thus translated, Ye know how I loved every one of you, as a father doth his children, exhorting and comforting you, (ver. 12.) and charging you.

[8] Ver. 12. Ἀξίως τοῦ Θεοῦ, Worthy of God.] i. e. That you would walk, 1. so as is best pleasing to him: 2. as becomes them who are called to enjoy a glorious kingdom: 3. as most conduceth to his glory: and, 4. so as to resemble his imitable perfections in your conversation.

[9] Ver. 13. Ὃς ἐνεργεῖται, Which effectually worketh in you.] For, saith Theodoret, Προφητικῆς καὶ αὐτοὶ χάριτος ἀπολαύσαντες, καὶ προεφήτευον, καὶ γλώσσαις ἐλάλουν, καὶ θαύματα ἐπετέλουν περίδοξα· They partaking of the prophetical grace, both prophesied, and spake with tongues, and did great miracles; for to those, who in those times embraced the gospel, were granted χαρίσματα καὶ ἐνεργήματα, the gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. xii. 6. 10—12. Eph. iii. 20. So that as Satan was πνεῦμα ἐνεργοῦν, a spirit working in the children of disobedience, Eph. ii. 2. and they that were possessed by him were styled ἐνεργουμένοι; so they who had the afflatus of the Holy Spirit, found him effectually working in them. (James v. 16.) And as the antichrists, or adversaries of the truth, wrought lying wonders, κατ' ἐνέργειαν τοῦ Σατανᾶ, according to the deceitful working of Satan, in and by them, (2 Thess. ii. 9. 11.) so had the Christians, from the Holy Spirit, their ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων, miraculous operations, by which they were enabled to confirm their faith: and these spiritual gifts were to them strong confirmations of the faith, the seals, and earnest of the blessings promised; and that which did enable them not only to suffer patiently, but also to rejoice in tribulations, Rom. v. 3—5. 1 Thess. i. 6. 2 Tim. i. 7, 8. 1 Pet. iv. 14.

[10] Ver. 15. Contrary to all men.] Thus Tacitus* saith of them, "Apud ipsos fides obstinata, misericordia in promptu, sed adversus omnes alios hostile odium:" They have great fidelity and kindness towards men of their own nation, but as great hatred to all others. But that which the apostle chiefly here respects, was their fond imagination, that God would grant no salvation to the gentiles upon any other terms than their being circumcised, and obedient to the law of Moses, (Acts xv. 1.) on which account they became enemies to the gospel, and the preachers of it; because they offered salvation to the gentiles, through faith in Christ, without observation of the law. (Rom. xi. 28. Gal. iv. 16.) Hence also note, that none are greater enemies to the good of mankind, than they who do obstruct the preaching and the propagating of the gospel through the world.

[11] Ver. 16. Ἀναπληρῶσαι, To fill up the measure of their sins.] Our Lord had said to them, Fill ye up the measure of your fathers, by adding to the murder of the prophets the murder of me, and of those prophets and wise men I shall send to you, (Matt. xxiii. 32—35.) that upon you of this generation may come all the blood shed from Abel to this present time. (Luke xi. 49. 51.) This prediction, saith the apostle, is now fulfilled; and they, by fulfilling it, have filled up the measure of their sins; and God's wrath is so incensed against them, that it will now destroy their church and nation, εἰς τέλος, to the uttermost; so that it shall not be now as formerly, when they were sometimes in bondage, and again in freedom from their enemies; sometimes were captives, and then returned again, after seventy years, to their own land; found God for awhile angry, and anon reconciled to them: but this wrath shall now remain upon them to the uttermost, till the times of the gentiles are come in, (Luke xxi. 24. see note on Rom. xi. 25.) or, εἰς τέλος, till they be consumed; so the phrase is used often in the Old Testament, as, εἰς τέλος ἀποθάνωμεν, shall be consumed without dying, Numb. xvii. 13. they fell by the sword, εἰς τέλος, till they were consumed, Josh. viii. 24. slaying them, εἰς τέλος, till they were consumed; and, x. 30. i. e. God's wrath hath begun to fall upon them; and they will still continue under it till they be consumed by it.

[12] Ver. 18. Ὁ Σατανᾶς, Satan.] Hence note, that they who obstruct the progress of the gospel, and persecute the promoters of it, are the ministers of Satan, and therefore bear his name. (See iii. 5. 2 Cor. xi. 15. Rev. ii. 10.)

CHAP. III.

1. WHEREFORE, when we could no longer forbear, (μηκέτι στέγοντες, no longer enduring to want the certain knowledge of your affairs, though we had given commandment to Timothy to come quickly to us to Athens, Acts xvii. 15. yet, as for me and Silas,) we thought it good to be left at Athens alone; (rather than to continue ignorant of the state of your faith, ver. 5.)

2. And (therefore) sent Timotheus, our brother (in Christ, Philem. 16. Heb. xiii. 23.) and (the) minister of God, and our fellow-labourer in (advancing) the gospel of Christ, to [1] stablish you (in), and to comfort you concerning your faith:

3. That (so) no man should (might) be moved (from his steadfastness in the faith) by these afflictions (and not you especially): for yourselves know (from us) that we (Christians) are appointed thereunto; (for hereunto are we called, 1 Pet. ii. 21.)

4. For verily, when we were with you, we told you before (it came to pass) that we should suffer tribulation; even as it (shortly after) came to pass, (Acts xvii. 5—10.) and ye know (it did so).

5. For this cause, when I could no longer forbear, I sent (κἀγὼ μηκέτι στέγων ἔπεμψα, I also, not bearing longer the uncertainty of your affairs, have sent) to know (the steadfastness of) your faith, lest by some means the [2] tempter (may) have tempted you, and (so) our labour (among you should) be in vain.

6. But now when Timotheus came from you to us, and brought us good tidings of your faith and charity, and (in particular) that you have (still) good remembrance of us always, desiring greatly to see us, as we also (do to see) you;

7. Therefore (διὰ τοῦτο, by this), brethren, we were comforted over you (ἐφ' ὑμῖν, concerning you, or in you,) in all our affliction and distress by (reason of) your (constancy in the) faith:

8. For [3] now we live (joyfully), if ye stand fast in the Lord.

9. [4] For what (sufficient) thanks can we render to God again for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God;

10. Night and day (also) praying exceedingly that we might see your face, and might perfect that which is (yet) lacking in your faith (by reason of our very small stay with you, Acts xvii. 1. 10.)

11. [5] Now God himself and (or, who is) our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, direct our way unto you.

12. [6] And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one towards another, and [7] towards all men, even as we do (abound in love) towards you:

13. [8] To the end he may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father (τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Πατρὸς ἡμῶν, our God and Father), at the (glorious) coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 2. ΣΤΕΡΙΞΑΙ ὑμᾶς, To establish you] In it, by consideration of that miraculous power and those gifts of the Holy Ghost which accompanied our preaching, and your receiving of it, (1 Thess. i. 5, 6.) and which are still exercised among you, (v. 19, 20.) to comfort you concerning it; by consideration of the joys of the Holy Ghost, which you have found already under your afflictions, (i. 6.) by the salvation you are to obtain by Christ, the life you shall for ever live with him in glory, (iv. 17, 18. v. 9—11.) the eternal rest you shall have when the Lord Jesus Christ shall come to be glorified in his saints; and of which your constancy in the faith under these sufferings will make you to be accounted worthy, 2 Thess. i. 5—7. 10.

[2] Ver. 5. Ὁ πειράζων.] Here note, first, that the persecutions of the saints are ascribed to Satan the tempter, who by his ministers endeavours to hinder the progress of the gospel, (ii. 18.) and by their persecutions to terrify men, and seduce them from the profession of it. (See Rev. ii. 10.)

Secondly, That πειράζειν here doth signify, not barely to tempt, but to succeed in his temptation; for otherwise the labour of the apostle could not be rendered vain among them. (See note on Gal. vi. 1.)

Thirdly, Note, that it is hence evident, that the apostle did not think them secure (by the election of them, mentioned i. 4.) from falling so as that his labour might have been in vain among them.

Fourthly, Note, from Esthius, that a faithful person, truly justified, may so fall from the faith as that it shall become in vain to him.

[3] Ver. 8. Νῦν ζῶμεν, Now we live.] Ζῆν, saith Suidas, is to live, μετὰ τρυφῆς καὶ πολυτελείας, with delight and magnificence; according to that of Horace, vivendum hodiè, which is the frequent import of the Hebrew word chajah, as in that wish, Let the king live, 1 Sam. x. 24. 1 Kings i. 25. 2 Kings xi. 12. i. e. let him have a prosperous and happy reign: and in the words of the Psalmist, xvi. 11. Thou wilt shew me the way of life; in thy presence is fulness of joy: xxxiv. 13. He that would live, i. e. see good days: so xxii. 26. xxxviii. 19. Eccles. vi. 8. vii. 12. Our masters teach (saith Maimonides*) that the just are called living, even in their death; the wicked, dead while they live: because the first are happy in their death; the second, miserable in their life.

[4] Ver. 9.] Esthius observes from the ninth verse, that both the apostle's joy and their faith and constancy were the gift of God; nam gratiarum actio non est nisi de beneficiis acceptis. He might also have observed with others, the excellent pattern the apostle here gives to all the bishops and pastors of the church, to be continually solicitous to know of the welfare of their flock, incessantly praying for it, blessing God daily for it, and looking upon it as the very felicity of their own lives.

[5] Ver. 11.] Here the note of Schlictingius runs thus: You see that our Lord Jesus takes care of our affairs and actions, and therefore we deservedly invoke him in our necessities; as the apostle again doth, ver. 12. But since this invocation of him by all Christians in all places must suppose him omniscient, omnipresent, and the searcher of the heart; and these are the properties of God alone; it also must suppose him to be truly God.

* More Nevoch. lib. i. cap. 43.

[6] Ver. 12. Ὑμᾶς δὲ ὁ Κύριος πλεονάσαι καὶ περισσεύσαι.] These are optative aorists, which signify transitively, μεταβατικῶς, say the grammarians; and therefore are well rendered by our translation, The Lord make you to increase, and make you to abound. (See note on 2 Cor. ix. 8. Ecclus. xlv. 5.)

[7] And towards all men.] This (saith Theophylact*) is the character of Divine love, to comprehend all; whereas human love hath respect to one man, and not to another.

[8] Ver. 13. Ἀμέμπτους, That he may stablish your hearts unblamable in holiness.] Hence note, that a general and abounding charity to all men, being that by which we become most like to God, and that which tends to cover our own sins, (1 Pet. iv. 8.) especially if it be charity to the souls of men, (James v. 20.) tends to stablish our hearts unblamable before God in love, and to procure our acceptance with him at the great day of our accounts. (Matt. xxv. 35, 36.)

Note also, that to stablish our hearts unblamable at Christ's coming, is so to confirm us in holy living, that we may be found unblamable by him at that day. (See note on 1 Cor. i. 8. 1 Thess. v. 23. 2 Pet. iii. 14.)

CHAP. IV.

1. FURTHERMORE then, we beseech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jesus, that as you have received of us (directions) how ye ought to walk and to please God, so you would abound more and more (in your care to conform yourselves to them.

2. In which thing you need no farther instructions:) for ye know what (holy) commandments we gave you [1] by the Lord Jesus.

3. For (we have already told you, that) this is the will of God, even your sanctification, (and this sanctification requires) that ye should abstain from fornication:

4. [2] (And) that every one of you should know how (much it is your duty) to possess his (body, which is the) vessel (of the Holy Spirit), in sanctification and in honour (i. e. free from those lusts which are πάθη ἀτιμίας, Rom. i. 26. dishonourable passions);

5. Not in the lust of concupiscence, [3] even as the gentiles (do) which know not God;

6. That [4] no man go beyond (the bounds of matrimony), or defraud his brother in any matter (Gr. or exceed towards his brother in this matter): because the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we have also forewarned you, and testified.

7. (He is, I say, the avenger of all such Christians, as acting oppositely to their holy calling;) for God hath not called us (Christians) unto uncleanness, but unto holiness.

8. He therefore that despiseth (this command), despiseth not man (only), but God, who hath also given [5] to us his Holy Spirit.

9. (This I thought necessary to say, to warn you against that uncleanness which so reigneth in the heathen world, and to which you so strongly were addicted, whilst you were without the knowledge of God in the world:) but as touching brotherly love, ye need not that I write (so fully) to you; for ye yourselves are [6] taught of God to love one another.

10. And indeed ye do it to all the brethren which are in all Macedonia: but we beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more (in this Christian virtue);

11. And that ye study to be quiet, and [7] to do your own business (not meddling with other men's matters), and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you;

12. That (so) ye may walk honestly (εὐσχημόνως, decently, and in good behaviour) towards them that are without, and that ye may have [8] lack of nothing.

13. But (especially) I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning (the state of) them that are asleep, that ye sorrow not (for them), [9] even as others (other gentiles do) which have no hope (of a resurrection of the body).

14. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, (as the first-fruits of them that slept, 1 Cor. xv. 20.) even so (are we to believe, that) [10] them also which sleep in Jesus, will God bring with him (when he comes to judge the world, and reward all his faithful servants).

15. For this we say unto you, (not from ourselves, but) by the word of the Lord, that [11] we who are (then) alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep (so as to receive our happy change, before their resurrection).

16. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, [12] and with the trump of God: and (then) the dead in Christ shall rise first:

17. Then we which are alive, and remain (on the earth,) shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be [13] with the Lord.

18. Wherefore comfort one another (concerning your deceased friends) with these words.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 2. ΔΙΑ τοῦ Κυρίου, By the Lord.] Note hence, that the instructions and commandments which the apostles gave to the churches, are to be looked upon as the commandments of the Lord, and as the will of God; they being dictated by his Spirit, (ver. 8.) and delivered by his authority, who said, He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that heareth me, heareth him that sent me. (Luke x. 16.)

[2] Ver. 4, 5.] Here note, 1. that these instructions were very necessary for the Thessalonians, ἐκεῖ γὰρ πλείστη ἀταξία, καὶ ἀκαθαρσία, for there was all manner of disorder and impurity, saith Socrates.* And Athenæus† informs us, τὴν τούτων τρυφὴν, that their luxury invited the Persians into Greece: that it was their custom in their banquets to bring in their ‡ wenches dancing naked, and afterward they enjoyed them at their pleasure.

Secondly, Note also, that having mentioned fornication, ver. 3. he seems, ver. 4. and 5. to advance to other heathenish lusts, desiring them to keep their vessels in sanctification and honour: 1. By preserving their bodies from unnatural lusts, which are by the apostle styled πάθη ἀτιμίας, dishonourable passions; and their matrimonial bed from defilement, by the use of other women. (Heb. xiii. 4.) Accordingly, these things in Scripture are expressed by ignominy and vileness: in the Septuagint, by τὰ ἄσχημα, things indecorous and dishonourable; which word the apostle applies to unnatural lusts, Rom. i. 26. and in the language of the Targum and the rabbins, they are styled קלנא, ignominy and vileness. Thus Sychem is said to have wrought קלנא, saith the Chaldee; τὸ ἄσχημον, the Septuagint; i. e. ignominy in Israel, by knowing Dinah. This is the name the Chaldee gives to the adultery committed by the men of Benjamin upon the Levite's concubine, Judg. xix. 24. the incest committed by Amnon on his sister Tamar, 2 Sam. xiii. 1, 2. and in the rabbinical language,* to abuse boys, בקלן, is to use them to the satisfying of unnatural lusts.

* Τοῦτο γὰρ τῆς κατὰ θεὸν ἀγάπης ἴδιον, τὸ πάντας περιπλέκεσθαι· ἰδιον δὲ τὸν θεῖνα μὲν, τὸν δεῖνα δ' οὔ, κατ' ἄνθρωπον ἡ φιλία.

[2] Ver. 5. Καθάπερ τὰ ἔθνη, Even as the gentiles.] Among whom these lusts abounded, and by whom they were allowed. For whoredom was esteemed no crime;† they taught, μὴ πάντως παρὰ τὸ καθῆκον τοῦτο γίνεσθαι. Their orator‡ speaks thus; "Si quis est qui etiam meretriciis amoribus interdictum juventuti putet——abhorret non modo ab hujus seculi licentiâ, verum etiam à majorum consuetudine atque concessis. Quando enim hoc non factum est? quando reprehensum? quando non permissum? quando denique fuit, ut quod licet, non liceret?" Epictetus§ advises them, who cannot abstain, to use it only, ὡς νομιμόν ἐστι, as the laws allowed it. Now that, saith Plato,‖ was τῶν ἐλευθέρων γυναικῶν μὴ ἐρᾶν, not to meddle with free-women, but only libertines and servants, and those that sold themselves to it. And Demosthenes¶ declares of all the Grecians thus: Τὰς μὲν ἑταίρας ἡδονῆς ἕνεκα ἔχομεν, τὰς δὲ παλλακὰς τῆς καθ' ἡμέραν παλλακείας, τὰς δὲ γυναῖκας τοῦ παιδοποιεῖσθαι γνησίως.

The τὸ παρὰ φύσιν τόλμημα, as Plato styles it, obtained in Greece without blame, saith Bardesanes; amongst the Grecians and many barbarians, saith Plato;†† amongst the Cretians and Lacedemonians, saith the same Plato. How prone the Romans, and other nations were to it, Plautus, Petronius Arbiter, Aristophanes, and Athenæus‡‡ sufficiently inform us, as also that it was the sin of the philosophers especially.

[3] Ver. 6. Μὴ ὑπερβαίνειν καὶ πλεονεκτεῖν, Not to go beyond or defraud.] It is the opinion of all the Greek scholiasts, that this verse contains a prohibition of adultery, πλεονεξίαν ἐνταῦθα τὴν μοιχείαν ἐκάλεσε. By the word πλεονεξία, he denotes adultery, say Theodoret and Theophylact. God hath put bounds to this appetite, say Œcumenius and Theophylact, by tying us to one wife, ὥστε ἡ πρὸς ἑτέραν μίξις, παράβασίς τις καὶ πλεονεξία ἐστὶν, so that to be familiar with one another is excess and covetousness; and when this is done to another man's wife, it is to accede to the injury of his brother. And as St. Jerome* hath observed, the words preceding, which speak of abstaining from fornication, and keeping our vessels in sanctification and honour, and not in the lusts of concupiscence; and the words following, which give this reason of the precept, that God hath not called us to uncleanness, but to holiness, seem also plainly to enforce this sense, which the Greek, in the judgment of the forecited fathers, will bear: for,

1. The words ὑπερβαίνειν and ἐπιβαίνειν, bear this sense in other authors. Thus Philo,† speaking of unnatural lusts committed by men, saith, ἄνδρες ὄντες ἄῤῥησιν ἐπιβαίνουσι. And Plutarch‡ saith of the Egyptians, that they call that land which Nile ascends, mixing and engendering with it, the body of Isis. And when Nile is thus, ὑπερβαλὼν καὶ πλεονάσας, filling and ascending, they call this the joining of Osiris with Nephthe. So the Hebrew word בוא from which βῶ and βάω, and from them βαίνω, is derived, hath this signification, as Josh. xxiii. 12. If you contract affinity with the heathens, ובאתם בהם and go in unto them; Εἰ ἐπιγαμίας ποιήσητε, καὶ συγκαταμιγῆτε αὐτοῖς, If you marry and mix with them, saith the Septuagint, the Lord will not drive them out. And in the Misnah, הביעל אחותו is, He that revealeth the nakedness of his sister, and may be rendered ὑπερβαίνων τὴν ἀδελφὴν αὐτοῦ.

2. The word πλεονεξία bears the same sense in that verse, in which Venus promises to him that finds and brings her Cupid to her, not a bare kiss, but something more, saying, οὐ γυμνὸν τὸ φίλαμά τοι ξένε, καὶ πλέον ἕξεις. And Socrates§ tells Callicles, pleading for those pleasures, That men ought not to be ἐπιθυμίας ἀκολάστους, of unbounded lusts; σὺ δὲ πλεονεξίαν οἴει δεῖν ἀσκεῖν, but thou (saith he) thinkest that a man may exceed in these matters. And in the scholiast of Aristophanes,‖ these are put as words equivalent, ὑπερπαίειν, ὑπερβαίνειν, πλεονάζειν.

And whereas against this interpretation it is objected, that the words following, viz. in any matter, being general, will not admit of this restrained sense:

I answer, That in the Greek the words are ἐν τῷ πράγματι, and may be rendered, in this matter, or in the matter, viz. forementioned; or absolutely, in the matter; for so it plainly signifies in these words, 2 Cor. vii. 11. You have approved yourselves clear ἐν τῷ πράγματι, in this matter: and it being observed by Phavorinus and Suidas,¶ that the word πρᾶγμα is used by the ancients in an evil sense; and the Apostolical Constitutions complaining that the younger widows marrying again, under pretence that they  could not contain, were engaged in an evil matter; and by Œcumenius being glossed thus, ἐν τῇ μίξει· I hope I have sufficiently vindicated this interpretation of Dr. Hammond and the ancients, from the exceptions of Mr. Le Clerc.

Ἐν τῷ πράγματι, In this matter.] So it plainly signifies in those words, 2 Cor. vii. 11. You have approved yourselves clear, ἐν τῷ πράγματι, in this matter.

[5] Ver. 8. Εἰς ἡμᾶς, To us.] To us apostles, to enable us to give you these commandments; and to us Christians, to render us the temples of the Holy Ghost, which temples we corrupt by our uncleanness. (1 Cor. iii. 15, 16. vi. 15—17. xi. 19. 2 Cor. vi. 16.)

[6] Ver. 9. Θεοδίδακτοι, Taught of God.] By this new commandment, that we love one another, 1 John iii. 11. 23. iv. 21. Matt. xxii. 39. Θεοδίδακτοι γὰρ ἡμεῖς ἱερὰ ὄντως γράμματα παρὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ παιδεύομενοι, saith Clemens of Alexandria,* We are taught by God having the holy Scriptures; and by the example of that God, who loved us, and gave his Son for us. (Eph. v. 2.) Hence they who are taught of God, are said to hear (his commands), and learn (by his example), John vi. 45.

[7] Ver. 11. Τὰ ἴδια, To do your own business.] I follow here the sense of Dr. Hammond, and other interpreters; though the following words, to work with our own hands, seem to lead to the doing their own business themselves, and not to leave all to slaves and servants, as the idle and luxurious of old were wont to do. (See Athenæus, lib. xii.)

[8] Ver. 12. Καὶ μηδενὸς χρείαν ἔχητε, And that ye may have lack of nothing.] i. e. From the heathen. So the Greek scholiasts: for, say they, if Christians, seeing a Christian beg when he is able to live by his work, are scandalized, how much more will heathens be so? And indeed, this was one objection of the heathens against Christians, that they were† "infructuosi in negotiis," useless creatures. The apostle therefore doth exhort them so to provide for their necessities by their honest labour, that they may not need the help of infidels, and never may be forced by their wants to ask it of them.

[9] Ver. 13. Καθὼς οἱ λοιποὶ, As do others.] Though many heathens believed the immortality of the soul, none of them had any expectation of the resurrection of the body. This the philosophers, who styled the body the prison of the soul, and thought it the great hinderance of knowledge and of virtue, represented as a very despicable thing,‡ τὸ σφόδρα μιαρὸν, καὶ ἀπόπτυστον ἅμα καὶ ἀδύνατον. So Celsus; It is vile (saith he), abominable, and impossible; σκωλήκων ἡ ἐλπὶς, a hope fitter for worms than men. And he confutes the possibility of it, not only from the repugnancy of the thing to nature, but also from the vileness of it, declaring God therefore cannot do it,§ because as he will not do what is against nature, so he cannot do what is vile. Plotinus saith, that such a resurrection would only be ἀνάστασις εἰς ἄλλον ὕπνον, a resurrection to another sleep. And all the other heathens held it a thing impossible, and without example, and therefore made it a matter of their sport; it being (saith Origen), μυστήριον γελώμενον ὑπὸ τῶν ἀπίστων. (See Justin. M. Apol. 2. p. 57. C. D. Theophilus ad Autol. l. p. 77. De Minuc. p. 11. Arnob. lib. ii. p. 51. Lact. lib. vii. cap. 22.)

[10] Ver. 14. Τοὺς κοιμηθέντας διὰ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, Those that sleep in, or through Jesus.] That the martyrs are not here excluded, is certain; but I see no reason to grant, that this expression should peculiarly respect them. All the Greek scholiasts interpret the words generally: Chrysostom and Theophylact say, that they who sleep in Jesus are the faithful, in general: Œcumenius, Those that sleep in the faith of Jesus. The apostle, treating of this subject, calls all the dead, τοὺς κοιμηθέντας ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, those that sleep in Christ, 1 Cor. xv. 18, and the context here requires this sense; for the apostle speaks, ver. 13. of them that sleep in general: and of the hope of the resurrection in general. And when Christ comes to judgment, he will not bring the martyrs only, but all the faithful with him. See ver. 15, 16. where the same persons are the dead with Christ.

[11] Ver. 15. Ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες, We who are alive.] It is well observed by the Greek scholiasts, that the apostle speaks these words, οὐκ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ προσώπου, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τῶν κατ' ἐκεῖνον τὸν καιρὸν περιόντων ἀνθρώπων, not of himself, but of the Christians that were to remain alive at the day of judgment: so Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact; for he well knew he was not personally to live till the resurrection; yea, he himself expected a resurrection, saying to the Corinthians, He that raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you, 2 Cor. iv. 14. he laboured that he might attain to the resurrection of the dead, Phil. iii. 11. Yet there are some divines, who from this and some other places in the Epistles, conceive that the apostles sometimes thought and declared to other Christians, that they themselves might live until the resurrection; and that St. Paul afterward changed this opinion, and admonished the Thessalonians of it, 2 Thess. ii. This I conceive to be a dangerous mistake, and highly prejudicial to the Christian faith, and the authority of the apostles; for if the churches of Christ had once received this doctrine from them, and afterward had understood, even from their own confession, that it was a mistake, this would have naturally led them to conceive that they might have been mistaken also in any other doctrine contained in their Epistles, and to suspect the certainty and truth of all that was contained in them. And this the apostle seemeth to insinuate in these words, 2 Thess. ii. 1, 2. I beseech you, brethren, that you be not soon shaken in mind, or troubled, either by word or letter, as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand: for these words seem plainly to import, that in the apostle's own judgment, the belief that the apostles had taught by word or by epistle this doctrine, would tend to the unsettling of their minds in the faith.

But that St. Paul taught no such doctrine in any of his Epistles to the Thessalonians, will be exceeding evident,

First, From the following words in that chapter: for there, saith he, ver. 3. Let no man deceive you by any means; declaring them deceivers, who either taught this doctrine, or imposed it on them, as spoken or indited by them: there also having said, in opposition to that vain imagination, that day was not to come till there was a falling away first, and the man of sin was revealed, he adds, remember you not that when I was yet with you, I told you these things? (ver. 5.) He therefore had taught them the contrary, before he had indited either of these Epistles, and therefore in them cannot rationally be supposed to contradict himself.

Secondly, From the very words used for proof of this opinion; for they are introduced with this solemnity, This we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we that are alive: in which words he most plainly voucheth the authority of Christ Jesus for the truth of what he saith; and therefore, if he were mistaken, either our Lord himself must err with him, or the apostle must vouch Christ's word and his authority when Christ had spoken no such word, and given him no authority to speak this doctrine in his name; both which assertions overthrow the certainty and truth of all St. Paul's Epistles. Now hence it follows, that the apostle could not deliver this assertion in any other of his Epistles; for all the learned do agree in this, that these Epistles to the Thessalonians were the first Epistles St. Paul wrote; whence it must follow, that he could not deliver in his following writings, to that church or any other churches, that doctrine which he had so industriously before confuted, and declared very dangerous, in his Epistle to the church of Thessalonica.

The truth seems therefore to be this: That as our Lord had told them, it was not for them to know the times and seasons, (Acts i. 7.) so were they left still in the dark, touching the time of the general judgment; and therefore they continually speak of it as a day that was to come upon men, as a thief in the night, ipsis insciis, as here, v. 1. They, perhaps, did not know when it might happen; and so they say nothing at any time dogmatically, but only ἐνδοιάστως, and disjunctly, if we shall be found clothed, and not naked; and here, v. 10. whether we sleep or wake. Nor are these sayings to be taken personally, as meant of the apostles, but rather as spoken by them in the person of Christians in the general, some of which would be then surviving. See a discourse at the end of 2 Thessalonians, by way of inquiry, whether the apostles, in their writings, spake as conceiving the day of judgment might be in their days, &c.

[12] Ver. 16. Καὶ ἐν σάλπιγγι Θεοῦ, And in the trump of God.] Pious here, and fit to be regarded, is the note of Theodoret, That if the loud sound of the trumpet, when the law was given from Mount Sinai, was so dreadful to the Jews, that they said to Moses, Let not the Lord speak to us, lest we die: how terrible must be the sound of this trumpet, which calls all men to the final judgment?

[13] Ver. 17. Σὺν Κυρίῳ, With the Lord.] From which words it may be probably collected, that even the souls of the faithful were not ever with the Lord, or in his celestial presence, before the resurrection.

CHAP. V.

1. [1] BUT of the (exact) times and (critical) seasons, brethren (when the coming of the Lord shall happen), you have no need that I should write unto you.

2. For (you) yourselves know perfectly (from what I taught when present with you) that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night, (of the time of whose coming the master of the house can have no certain knowledge, Matt. xxiv. 42, 43. xxv. 13. Mark xiii. 33. Luke xii. 39, 40. xxi. 36.)

3. [2] For when they (they of the Jewish nation then, and the wicked at the great day of wrath) shall say, Peace and safety (expecting no such thing as wrath and judgment), then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape (it).

4. But ye, brethren, are not (as formerly) in (a state of) darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief (or come upon you unexpected, or unprepared for it).

5. Ye are all (by virtue of your faith, and knowledge, and your profession of Christianity,) the children of light, (as having the light, and believing in it, John xii. 36. Eph. v. 8.) and the children of the day (of grace, Rom. xiii. 12, 13. and of salvation, 2 Cor. vi. 2.) we are not of the night, nor of darkness, (as the Jewish nation at present is, upon whom the darkness is come, John xii. 35. and who are cast into utter darkness, see note on Matt. viii. 12. and as the heathen always were: see note on Rom. xiii. 12.)

6. Therefore let us not sleep, as do others (securely in their sins, without expecting judgment, or preparing for it, Matt. xxviii. 38. Luke xvii. 26. 30.) but let us watch and be sober, (that that day do not come upon us unawares, nor finding us overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, Luke xxi. 34. 36. this being only proper to them who are of the night.)

7. For they that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that are drunken [3] are drunken in the night.

8. But let us, who are (children) of the day, be sober (and vigilant, 1 Pet. iv. 7. v. 8.) putting on the [4] breastplate of faith and love (that firm assurance of faith, which will not suffer us to doubt of the Divine assistance, and that love which casts out fear of any thing we may suffer for the cause of Christ); and for a helmet (to your head), the hope of salvation.

9. (Which hope of salvation we Christians have,) for God hath not appointed us unto wrath (as he hath done the heathen world, who are children of wrath, Eph. ii. 3. and the unbelieving Jews, who are vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, Rom. ix. 22. and upon whom wrath is coming to the end, 1 Thess. ii. 16.) but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ,

10. Who died for us, that, whether we [5] wake or sleep (i. e. whether he come in the night, and so finding us taking our natural rest, or in the day, when we are waking), we may live together with him (when he comes).

11. Wherefore comfort yourselves together (with this hope), and [6] edify one another, even as also you do.

12. And we beseech you, brethren, to know (and reverence) them which labour among you, and [7] are over you in the Lord, and admonish you;

13. And to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. And be at peace among yourselves.

14. Now (παρακαλοῦμεν δὲ, and) we exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly (as walking not according to the doctrine they have received from us, 2 Thess. iii. 6. 14.) comfort the feeble-minded, (who are of a wounded spirit under afflictions, ὀλιγόψυχοι, Prov. xviii. 14. that are of a fearful spirit under them, Isa. xxxv. 4. of a grieved spirit, Isa. liv. 6. whose spirit fails under them, Isa. lvii. 16. whose hands hang down, and whose knees are feeble, Heb. xii. 12.) support the weak (in faith, who are soon scandalized, and apt to perish by it, Rom. xiv. 1, 2. 21. 1 Cor. viii. 7. 9—12.) be patient towards all men.

15. See that none render evil for evil unto any man, (whatever the provocation may be, Rom. xii. 27.) but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves, and to all men, (even them that hate you, Matt. v. 44.)

16. [8] Rejoice evermore.

17. Pray [9] without ceasing.

18. [10] In every thing give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you.

19. [11] Quench not the Spirit.

20. [12] Despise not prophecyings.

21. [13] Prove all things (by the spirit of discretion which is in the church, and the consonancy of their pretended prophecies and interpretations, with what we have delivered to you; and then) hold fast that which is good.

22. (And) [14] abstain from all appearance of evil.

23. And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God (that) your [15] whole spirit, and soul, and body, be preserved blameless to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

24. [16] Faithful is he who calleth you (to this holiness), who also will do (his part towards) it.

25. Brethren, pray for us. (See note on Colos. iv. 4.)

26. Greet all the brethren with a holy kiss.

27. [17] I charge you by the Lord that this Epistle be read to all the holy brethren.

28. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1, 2.] THAT all this, to the twelfth verse, doth evidently belong only to the destruction of the persecuting Jews and gnostics, at the time of Christ's coming to destroy the Jewish church and nation, is confidently asserted by a reverend and learned commentator on this place; but is not once hinted by the ancients, who all interpret these words, περὶ τῆς κοινῆς συντελείας, of Christ's general advent. Nor do his arguments prove his assertion.

Arg. 1. First, Whereas he saith, Ἡμέρα Χριστοῦ, " The day of Christ (here mentioned) is, without question, the same which is so often called, the coming of Christ for the destroying of the enemies of Christianity:"

Ans. It is certain that this day of Christ, in the Epistles, doth almost generally signify the day of our Lord's coming to the final judgment, as in the following words: He shall confirm you unto the end, that you may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ, 1 Cor. i. 8. that the Spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus Christ, 1 Cor. v. 5. You are our rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus, 2 Cor. i. 14. He that hath begun a good work in you, shall perfect it to the day of the Lord Jesus, Phil. i. 6. that ye may be sincere and blameless until the day of Jesus Christ, ver. 10. that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, Phil. ii. 16. (See 2 Tim. i. 12. 18. iv. 8.)

Arg. 2. Secondly, Whereas he adds, " That this cannot belong to the last coming of Christ to judgment, because the apostle had made that the subject of his former discourse, (chap. iv.) and enters upon this as a distinct matter, with a περὶ δὲ," &c.

Ans. It is granted, That the time when this judgment shall be, is a distinct matter from the judgment itself; which is all that this argument proves.

Arg. 3. Thirdly, Whereas he argues this, " From the end of this discourse, which is to comfort the Christians which are under persecution, and give them patience and constancy; for which this was a fit consideration, That this judgment of God would come suddenly, and when it was least expected, and so would surprise them if they were not watchful; all which belonged peculiarly to this doom upon the Jews, and not to the general judgment, which those who then lived were not concerned in:"

Ans. First, It is certain that the apostle, both in this Epistle, iv. 18. and in his other Epistle, chap. i. doth comfort his Thessalonians under their persecutions, from the consideration of Christ's coming to reward them at the day of judgment.

Secondly, It is also certain, that Christ and his apostles exhort Christians to be watchful, that they may not be surprised at the day of judgment. So doth Christ, Matt xxv. 13. Luke xii. 35. 40. so doth St. Paul, 2 Cor. v. 9, 10. so doth St. Peter, 2 Pet. iii. 11, 12. 14. as being that which all men, who must die, and after that be judged according to what they have done in the flesh, must be as well concerned to prepare for, by watchfulness, as if it were to come while they were living; and upon this account it is that the apostle, in this chapter, ver. 23. and in the forecited places, prays so oft that Christians may be confirmed, and kept blameless to the day of the Lord Jesus.

Let it be then observed, that the apostle had spoken, i. 10. of their waiting for the coming of the Lord from heaven, iii. 13. of his coming with all his saints, iv. 16. of his coming with the voice of the archangel, and of the trump of God. He had also hinted, ii. 10. that the unbelieving Jews were, by their opposition to the gospel preached to the gentiles, and by their persecutions of them who had embraced it, filling up the measure of their sins, and drawing down that day of wrath upon them, which is mentioned Matt. xxiv. I therefore shall descant on these words, as relating to both these days of judgment.

[2] Ver. 3.] Josephus* informs us, That when the tumults, foretold by our Saviour, were begun, the Jews were expecting σημεῖα ἐλευθερίας, signs from God of their liberty; and that after all the clear signs God hath given them of their approaching ruin, and when it was even accomplished, they were confidently expecting,† τὴν ἀπὸ Θεοῦ βοήθειαν, the Divine aid: and, which is more remarkable, that the promise of a Messiah, which their sacred books declared was to come, κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν ἐκεῖνον, about that time, was‡ το ἐπάραν αὐτοὺς μάλιστα πρὸς πόλεμον, that which chiefly incited them to the war.

[3] Ver. 7.] Note, O the sad dissoluteness of the manners of the Christians of our age, who frequently are guilty of that drunkenness in the daytime, which heathens only practised in the night!

[4] Ver. 8. Θώρακα, The breastplate of the faith, &c.] This metaphor, relating to our Christian warfare, is taken from soldiers, who anciently watched or kept centinel in their armour, having especially their helmet and breastplate on; for, as Livy notes, " Scuto præ se erecto stabant galeati," They stood with their shield before them, and their helmet on their heads. Whence he says of Paulus Æmilius, that " Milites novo more scutum in vigiliam ferre vetuit;" After a new manner he forbade the soldiers to wear their shield when they watched. Now the head and heart being the two chief fountains of life and sensation, the preserving them safe is, in effect, the preserving of the whole man.

[5] Ver. 10. Εἴτε γρηγορῶμεν, εἴτε καθεύδωμεν.] That is, say some, whether we live or die. And true it is that Christians dying, are said to fall asleep. So 1 Cor. xi. 30. κοιμῶνται ἱκανοὶ, some are fallen asleep: xv. 51. πάντες μὲν οὐ κοιμηθησόμεθα, we shall not all sleep. So here, iv. 13. I would not have you ignorant, περὶ τῶν κεκοιμημένων, concerning them that are fallen asleep; and, ver. 14. τοὺς κοιμηθέντας, them that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him: but because in all these places the Greek word is never καθεύδω, but always κοιμάομαι, I prefer the exposition of the paraphrase.

† Lib. vii. cap. 30. p. 960.
‡ Cap. 61. p. 961. F.

But then, that the hope of salvation, ver. 8. the περιποίησις σωτηρίας, the obtainment of salvation by Christ Jesus, ver. 9. the living with him, ver. 10. should refer chiefly to the purchase of deliverance from Jewish persecutions, and the enjoyment of this present life, I can by no means grant; for the Christian's hope is, the hope of the glory of God, Rom. v. 3. the hope of the redemption of the body from corruption, viii. 23, 24. the hope which is laid up for us in heaven, Colos. i. 5. the hope of glory, ver. 27. a blessed hope, Tit. ii. 13. the hope of eternal life, iii. 7.

The salvation purchased for us by Christ's death, is not deliverance from persecutions; for all that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecutions, 2 Tim. iii. 12. In these we are to be conformed to his death, Rom. viii. 17. 2 Tim. ii. 12. he having suffered; leaving us an example, that we should follow his steps, 1 Pet. ii. 21.

And to live with Christ, is to live in a state of glory with him, and be conformed to his resurrection, Rom. vi. 8. 2 Tim. ii. 12. Colos. iii. 3, 4. 1 Pet. iv. 13. and this is the comfort which the apostle had given them, iv. 18. and to which he now proceeds.

[6] Ver. 11. Οἰκοδομεῖτε εἰς τὸν ἕνα, Edify yourselves into one body,] By your mutual love to one another, as being members of the same body, (Eph. iv. 16.) and by your strict union, and peaceable conversation with one another, which is the edification of one of us unto another, commanded, Rom. xiv. 9. (see note on Rom. xv. 2.)

[7] Ver. 12. Καὶ προϊσταμένους ὑμῶν.] That the persons here mentioned as labouring among them, as being over them, in the plural, should be the bishops of the metropolis of Thessalonica, seems very improbable; there being scarcely any ordinary fixed officers then placed in the church, anno Christi 49. or 51. when this Epistle was written: and therefore the learned Mr. Dodwell,* notwithstanding these words, saith, "Quod nulla sit rectorum mentio in utravis Epistolâ ad Thessalonicenses;" That there is no mention of any fixed rulers in either of the Epistles to the Thessalonians. And (1.) we find no notice taken of them in the front of these Epistles, as there is of the bishops and deacons, Phil. i. 1. No salutation of them in the close of these Epistles, the words of salutation being only these, Salute all the brethren with a holy kiss. (2.) We find no directions given to them in particular (but only to the brethren in general) touching such matters as must have related to their office only, or chiefly, had they been settled rulers in the church. The charge in the very next verse runs thus: We exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak. In the Second Epistle, iii. 6. thus: We command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walks disorderly, and not according to the tradition which ye received from us: and, ver. 13, 14. And ye, brethren,——if any man obey not our word by this Epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed; yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother: and, lastly, to these brethren the adjuration is here directed, ver. 27. charging them by the Lord, that this Epistle be read to all the holy brethren. It is therefore to be noted, that the apostles, prophets, preachers, evangelists, who were all extraordinary officers, are reckoned among those whom God had settled in the church, 1 Cor. xii. 12. and Christ, ascending up on high, had given for the edification of his body, Eph. iv. 11, 12. Some of these prophets and teachers were in most churches, as at Antioch, Acts xiii. 1. and officiated in them, ver. 3. at Rome, xii. 6, 7. at Corinth, 1 Cor. xiv. at Galatia, see note on vi. 1. some of them were itinerants, sent by the apostles, or prophets, to teach other churches, and by the Holy Spirit separated to that work, Acts xiii. 2—4. exhorting and confirming the Christians where they came, as being prophets authorized so to do, Acts xvi. 32. and travelling up and down for the converting and establishing of the gentiles, 3 John 7, 8. (see note on 1 Cor. xii. 28.) Of one of these two kinds of prophets, and teachers, and spiritual men, the apostle may here be understood.

Know them who labour among you, and are over you in the Lord.] Here saith Theophylact, If you honour them who preside over you in temporal affairs, how much more should you respect them who do it in spiritual things, who regenerate you in baptism, pray for you, visit you in sickness, and minister physic to your souls.

[8] Ver. 16. Πάντοτε χαίρετε.] Thus, Κἂν εἰς πειρασμοὺς, κἂν εἰς λύπας ἐμπέσητε, Œcumenius. Though you fall into manifold temptations and afflictions, (James i. 2.) and be brought into a very low condition in this world; yet rejoice in the Lord always, (Phil. iv. 4.) rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, (Rom. v. 3.) and of that great reward you shall receive for all your sufferings, (Matt. v. 11, 12. Heb. x. 34.) and in the spiritual fruits they work in you. (Rom. v. 4. James i. 3.)

[9] Ver. 17. Ἀδιαλείπτως, Without ceasing.] To give, once for all, the true sense of those injunctions, so frequent in the Scripture, to pray, and give thanks always, and without ceasing; observe,

First, That these phrases do, in the mildest sense, import, that these should be the employment of every day, our morning and evening sacrifice; that so beginning and ending the day with them, we may be, in the Scripture language, said to do them always. Thus St. Luke tells us, xxiv. 53. that the apostles were continually in the temple, διαπαντὸς, praising God; that is, they were καθ' ἡμέραν, daily in the temple, Acts ii. 46, 47. resorting thither at the third hour of the morning, and at the ninth of the evening sacrifice. (Acts iii. 1.) The sacrifice which was appointed to be thus offered daily at morning and evening, is, in the Hebrew, התמיד, the continual sacrifice, Dan. viii. 11. and accordingly is rendered by the Septuagint, ἡ θυσία διαπαντός. Thus the mincha, which the high-priest offered every day, half of it in the morning, and half in the evening, is styled by them, ἡ θυσία διαπαντὸς, the continual sacrifice, Lev. vi. 20. The burnt-offering which was offered, without intermission, twice a day, is, in the Hebrew, עַל הַתָּמִיד; and in the LXX. ὁλοκαύτωμα τὸ διαπαντὸς, the continual sacrifice, Numb. xxviii. 24. 31. And in allusion to it, the author to the Hebrews saith of our high-priest, By him let us offer up the sacrifice of praise to God continually. This therefore is the prime import of the phrase.

Secondly, These phrases do import, that we should be employed in the performance of these duties, as Providence doth minister occasion for them. In this sense is the word always used twice, when our Lord saith, I was always in the temple, whither the Jews always resort, John xviii. 20. for neither did the Jews always resort unto the temple, but only at the hours of prayer; nor did Christ always teach in it, but only when he went up to Jerusalem. And thus the Holy Ghost, in Scripture leads us to expound these phrases, enjoining us to abound always in every good work, 2 Cor. ix. 8. and elsewhere, to do good, ὡς καιρὸν ἔχομεν, as we have occasion, Gal. vi. 10. So, to pray always, Luke xviii. 1. is to pray ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ, in every season, xxi. 36. And, to pray without ceasing, here, is to pray, ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ, in every opportunity, Eph. vi. 18. So 1 Macc. xii. 11. Ἡμεῖς οὖν ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ ἀδιαλείπτως, We at all times, without ceasing, both in our feasts and other convenient days, do remember you in the sacrifices which we offer; i. e. we do it as oft as we have occasion to offer sacrifice.

Thirdly, In reference to our prayers particularly, it imports, that we should not grow faint and weary, when Providence seems for a season to defer the blessing we implore, (Luke xviii. 1.) but should still προσμένειν, abide in supplication, 1 Tim. v. 5. and ἀγρυπνεῖν, watch unto it with all perseverance, Eph. vi. 18.

[10] Ver. 18. Ἐν παντὶ, In every thing.] For sparing and preventing, for common and extraordinary, general and special, past and present, temporal and spiritual mercies; not only for prosperous and grateful, but also for afflicting providences, for chastisements, and seasonable corrections, Πάντας γὰρ πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον ποιεῖ ὁ Θεὸς, κἂν ἡμεῖς ἀγνοοῦμεν αὐτοῦ τὰς οἰκονομίας, For God designs them all for our good, though we at present see not how they tend unto it.

[11] Ver. 19. Quench not the Spirit.] Τουτέστι χάρισμα μὴ ἐκφράσσατε καὶ κωλύετε, τῷ ἀποστρέφεσθαι καὶ μὴ ἐᾶν λαλεῖν, Œcumen. i. e. Hinder not the gifts of the Spirit, by turning away from them that have them, and not suffering them to speak. These gifts were quenched by strife, emulation, schisms, and contention about them: (1 Cor. iii. 1. 3.) 2. By a disorderly use of them, not to the edification of the church, but to vain ostentation, confusion in the church, and the scandal of heathens, (1 Cor. xiv.) by a neglect to exercise them: Forbid not to speak with tongues. (1 Cor. xv. 39.)

[12] Ver. 20. Despise not prophecyings.] Προφάσει τῶν ψευδοπροφητῶν, καὶ τοὺς ἀληθεῖς διέπτυον, Œcumenius. Some of these false prophets had crept into the church of Thessalonica, as is hinted in those words, Be not troubled by (them, who pretend a revelation from the) Spirit, as if the day of Christ were at hand, (2 Thess. ii. 2.) which made them less regardful of what was delivered by men pretending to this gift; and made it necessary for St. John to say, Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they be of God: for many false prophets are gone out into the world. (1 John iv. 1.) And to prevent the mischief the Thessalonians might receive from them, the apostle here adds, Try all things, &c. ver. 21.

[13] Ver. 21. Δοκιμάζετε, Try.] Note, That the apostle doth not here bid the guides of the church try all things, and the people hold fast that which they delivered to them; but gives an injunction common to all Christians, having their senses exercised to discern betwixt good and evil; to all who are obliged to hold fast that which is good, and not to believe false prophets; which is a strong argument for the perspicuity and the sufficiency of holy Scripture for this work, and against the necessity of a living judge: for he that must try all things, must also try the doctrine of this living judge; and therefore till he hath made this trial, must not admit his doctrine as an article of Christian faith; for these words plainly teach that what we must hold fast, must first be tried. Hearers (saith St. Basil) who are instructed in the Scriptures, ought to try the things spoken by their teachers, καὶ τὰ μὲν σύμφωνα ταῖς γραφαῖς δέχεσθαι, τὰ δὲ ἀλλότρια ἐκβάλλειν, and receive those doctrines which are consonant, and reject those which are alien from the holy Scriptures; because St. Paul hath said, Try all things; hold fast that which is good. See Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 354. Strom. vi. p. 655. Orig. in Joh. tom. xi. x. ed. Huet. p. 268. and Hom. 2. in. Ezek. F. 135. G. St. Jerom. in Ep. ad Eph. lib. iii. cap. 5. p. 101. Cyril of Alex. in Joh. lib. iv. p. 374. 407. and lib. i. adv. Nestor. p. 2.

[14] Ver. 22. Ἀπὸ παντὸς εἴδους πονηροῦ, From all kinds or sorts of evil.] So the Syriac doth render these words. So Chrysostom and Theophylact upon this place. So St. Basil and Leontius, cited by Dr. Hammond, who descant thus upon the words: Fly not from this or that only, but from every sin. Or, secondly, if the apostle here exhorts us to abstain from all appearance of evil; his meaning cannot be this, that we should abstain from what appears evil to others: it being, in many cases, impossible to know what appears so, and impracticable to act by such a rule; because it would destroy our Christian liberty in things indifferent, and create in our minds continual perplexities, there being scarcely any thing which may not appear evil, to some or other of those numerous sects which swarm among us: he therefore only must enjoin us to abstain from that which, after trial, seems evil to ourselves, and is judged by us so to be; for the apostle makes these two things, the holding that which is good, and the abstaining from all appearance of evil, the consequent of trying all things. Now we try all things, that, after trial, we may hold that which seemeth to us good, and abstain from that which seemeth to us evil, not to abstain from that which seemeth so to others only.

[15] Ver. 23. Ὁλόκληρον ὑμῶν τὸ πνεῦμα, καὶ ἡ ψυχὴ, καὶ τὸ σῶμα. Your whole spirit, and soul, and body.] Here the apostle justifies the ancient and true philosophy, that man is, as Nemesius styles him, τριμερὴς ὑπόστασις, a compound of three differing parts. This was the doctrine of the Pythagoreans, as we learn from Jamblichus,* who, having told us, that man consists of soul and body, adds, That the soul consists of two parts; one endued with reason, and one without reason. This also was the philosophy of the Platonists, as we learn from Nemesius,† Sallust, and Laertius, who inform us, that there is in man a soul irrational, which follows the affections of the body; and a mind, which useth the body as its instrument, and fights against it. This also was the doctrine of the stoics; whence Antoninus saith, the three constituent parts of man are, σῶμα, ψυχὴ, νοῦς, the body, soul, and mind. Irenæus,* and Clemens† of Alexandria, and Origen,‡ say the same. Mr. Le Clerc here is very positive, that this philosophy is false, and that there is nothing in man but his body, and his reasonable soul. But he saith nothingto sustain this confidence against those two excellent philosophers, Gassendus,§ and Dr. Willis,‖ who have established this philosophy beyond all reasonable contradiction. Nor can the conflict betwixt the mind and spirit, and the flesh, mentioned Rom. viii. from ver. 14. to the 25th, and Gal. v. 16, 17. be explained; nor can any man tell what the τὸ ἀρχικὸν, or ruling principle in us, is to govern, without admitting this inferior soul as the fountain of our sensual appetites, or even tell us what it is to die; unless it be to make this inferior soul, which consists in the motion of the animal spirits, and the sensitive appetites they produce in us, to cease to act, or move, as formerly. He will have ψυχὴ here to signify life, as indeed it doth in other places; but never where constituent parts of a man are enumerated, as here they are; and seeing the spirit and the body are unquestionably the constituent parts of a man, it is reasonable to conceive, that the ψυχὴ mentioned here must be so also, especially since it is divided from the spirit and the body by the particle καὶ. Moreover, by following the motions of this brutish appetite, is a man styled ψυχικὸς, the animal man, and by being animated and informed by this ψυχὴ, is the body called σῶμα ψυχικὸν, an animal body, 1 Cor. xv. 44, 45. and by conveying of this ψυχὴ, or inferior soul, to his posterity, is the first Adam said to be made εἰς ψυχὴν ζῶσαν, to convey this animal life to his posterity; though this at last may be only a strife about words, the animal spirits being included in the body.

[16] Ver. 24. Πιστὸς ὁ καλῶν ὑμᾶς, Faithful is he that calleth you.] Who therefore will not be wanting in what is requisite on his part towards it; I say his part, for if the fidelity of God required that he would sanctify and preserve us blameless to the end, without our care and industry, or should work in us absolutely and certainly that care, and the apostle believed this, how could he fear lest the Thessalonians should be so overcome by Satan's temptations, as that his labour with them might have been in vain, (1 Thess. iii. 5.) this being in effect to fear that God might be unfaithful to his promise?

[17] Ver. 27. Ὁρκίζω ὑμᾶς, I adjure you by the Lord.] In judicial oaths the custom among the Jews was, not for the person who came under the obligation of an oath, to pronounce the words of swearing with his own mouth, but an oath was exacted from him by the magistrate or superior, and so he became bound to answer upon oath, by hearing the voice of adjuration, φωνὴν ὁρκισμοῦ, so the Septuagint, Lev. v. 1. So Gen. l. 15. The Father, ὥρκισε, made us swear before he died; Josh. vi. 26. ὥρκισεν Ἰησοῦς ἐναντίον Κυρίου, Joshua adjured them, saying, Cursed is the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth Jericho; 1 Sam. xiv. 24. Saul had adjured the people, ὁρκίσας ὥρκισε τὸν λαὸν, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food; that is, he charged the people with an oath: 1 Kings xxii. 16. Ποσάκις ὁρκίσω σε; How oft shall I adjure thee? So in the New Testament, the high-priest saith to Christ, ὁρκίζω σε κατὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ ζῶντος, I adjure thee by the living God. Now hence two things are evident; 1. That St. Paul did not judge all judicial oaths unlawful, for then he would not have laid this oath upon his Thessalonians. 2. That Christ did not forbid judicial, but only voluntary oaths, because it was not in the power of the Jews, to whom he spake, to avoid judicial oaths, nor would he then have answered to the adjuration of the high-priest.

THE SECOND EPISTLE

TO

THE THESSALONIANS.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

HAVING offered a new interpretation of the second chapter of this Epistle, which treateth of the man of sin, commonly called antichrist, there mentioned, I shall here give the reasons why I could not acquiesce in any of the expositions already given either by protestants or papists, and answer some objections against the exposition I have put upon the words of the apostle in that chapter. And,

§. 1. First, Whereas Mr. Obadiah Walker hath taken a great deal of pains to apply all that the apostle saith to Mahomet and his followers, that vain conceit will be demonstratively confuted from the following considerations:

1. That the apostle here exhorts the Thessalonians not to be shaken in mind, or troubled, either by spirit, or by letter, or by word, as from us (the apostles), as if the day of the Lord were at hand, ver. 2. Now what day doth the apostle mean? Surely that day when the Lord shall consume the wicked one by the breath of his mouth, and by the brightness of his coming, ver. 8. Now sure it is, that Mahomet came not till five hundred and sixty-seven years after the writing this Epistle, viz. A. D. 608. nor is our Lord yet come to consume him with the breath of his mouth, nor know we when he will do so. How therefore could it be, that they, who were foretold so punctually of the apostacy, which should introduce the man of sin, and what yet hindered the revelation of him in his season, as the Thessalonians were, (ver. 5, 6.) should think the day of the Lord's coming to destroy Mahomet and his followers was at hand? Or that they should be led into this apprehension by any word, epistle, or revelation, made, spoken, or written, by the apostles or prophetic men concerning him; Could they then know from the mouth of St. Paul, that this man of sin was one Mahomet, who was not to appear till five hundred and sixty-seven years after his speaking of him; and when he did appear, was to continue above a thousand years before the coming of our Lord to consume him, and yet by any of his words be induced to conceive the day of the Lord was at hand?

Moreover, If the coming of our Lord, here mentioned, was to consume the beast, or Roman antichrist, seeing this beast was to arise out of the ruins of the Roman empire, and if St. Paul had told them any thing from Daniel of this matter, he must have let them know that this was so; and also that this antichrist, when risen out of the ruins of that empire, was to continue for a time and times, and half a time, that is, twelve hundred and sixty years before the coming of our Saviour to destroy him. It is as difficult to conceive how, after this, the Thessalonians could think Christ's coming to consume the beast could be then instant when this Epistle was indited.

§. 2. Arg. 2. I argue, secondly, against this opinion, from those words, Remember ye not that when I was with you, I told you of these things? ver. 5—7. That is, I told you of the apostacy that was to precede the man of sin; how he should exalt himself above all that is called God, &c. and what it was that hindered his being revealed in his season: now can any one believe that the apostle, who was not with the Thessalonians long enough to perfect what was lacking in their faith, (1 Thess. iii. 10.) should yet employ his time in telling them a long story of the apostacy of the Arians and Nestorians, saith Mr. Walker, and of one Mahomet, who should thus exalt himself, and what then hindered his being revealed? Could he say that very mystery of iniquity, this Mahomet was to bring into the world, then wrought, only because there were some heretics, already come, who confessed not that Jesus Christ was come in the flesh, though Mahomet confessed this very freely? As well may it be said, that the mystery of quakerism was wrought in the second and third centuries, because some heretics of those times taught doctrines like those they now profess.

And since it is equally improbable the apostle, in that little time, should speak to them of the apostacy of the church of Rome from the faith, and how the bishop of Rome should lord it over Christian emperors, and over the laws of God and Christ, and wear out the saints of the Most High for twelve hundred and sixty years; and is still more improbable, that he should say all this then to them, and here again bring the same thing to their remembrance, and yet, that not the least intimation of any thing of this nature should appear in any Christian writers on this subject for six following centuries: since, I say, this is so, this argument must be of equal strength against those who conceive the papal antichrist should primarily and chiefly be intended here.

§. Arg. 3. Thirdly, I argue against this opinion from those words, and then shall that wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the breath of his mouth, &c. ver. 8. For hence it seems plain, this wicked one was to be destroyed by the coming of our Lord soon after the time of his revelation, and not above a thousand years after; as both the opinion of those papists, who say that he is Mahomet, and of those protestants, who say that he is the pope and his clergy, must make the interval betwixt his revelation and destruction be; for the same thing that hindered his revelation, hindered the coming of our Lord to destroy him thus revealed; and these two things seem to be thus connected: "The day of the Lord will not come, till there come first an apostacy, and by that a revelation of the man of sin; when therefore this apostacy, and this revelation of the man of sin happens, then will Christ come to consume him." And otherwise the Christians of after-ages might have been subject, from the apostle's words, to a like mistake to that here mentioned, seeing, to tell them they had no reason yet to expect this day of the Lord, because it was not to come till the man of sin was revealed; and to add, when that which hindered the revelation of him in his season was once taken away, then should he also be revealed, whom the Lord should consume with the brightness of his coming; must fairly lead them to expect this day soon after his revelation, and not after he had been thus revealed above a thousand years.

§. 4. Those arguments are such as equally confute the opinion of those protestants, who conceive the apostle primarily to characterize the pope and his clergy, and of those who apply these words to Mahomet.

Arg. 4. But, fourthly, I argue against them who suppose Mahomet to be the man here intended, from these words of the apostle, that the coming of this wicked one shall be according to the working of Satan in all power, signs, and lying wonders, ver. 9. for the words δυνάμεις, σημεῖα, τέρατα, powers, signs, and wonders, are never used in Scripture for any wonderful things done by God upon men, or any ecstasies or conferences of angels with them, but always for outward signs done by men upon other things or persons: such as were the healing of the sick and lame, the casting out of devils, the raising of the dead. (See note on Heb. ii. 4.) Now Mahomet every where professeth that he came not with any such miracles, and therefore he could not be the person here designed: for his opposers demanded of him such miracles, saying, "Moses and Jesus, according to thy own doctrine, wrought miracles to prove their mission from God; and therefore if thou be a prophet, and greater than any that were ever sent before thee, as thou boastest thyself to be, do thou the like miracles to manifest it to us; do thou make the dead to rise, the dumb to speak, the deaf to hear, &c. and then we will believe in thy word." This objection, saith Dr. Prideaux,* he endeavoured to evade by several answers: "one while he tells them, he is only a man sent to preach to them the rewards of Paradise, and the punishments of hell: at another time, that their predecessors contemned the miracles of Salch and the other prophets, and that for this reason God would work no more among them: and a while after, that those whom God had ordained to believe, should believe without miracles; and those whom he had not ordained to believe, should not be convinced, though all these miracles should be wrought in their sight, which they required. But this not satisfying, as being a plain confession that he wanted that power of miracles which all other prophets had to prove their mission, several of those that were his followers departed from him. Having therefore got the sword into his hand, and an army to back his cause, his doctrine then was, that God had sent Moses and Jesus with miracles, and yet men would not be obedient to their word; and therefore he had now sent him, in the last place, without miracles, to force them by the power of the sword to do his will.

"However (says he) it is not to be denied, that there are several miracles reckoned up which Mahomet is said to have wrought; as that he did cleave the moon in two; that the trees went forth to meet him; and that the stones saluted him;" which are the miracles here mentioned by Mr. Walker. But then he adds, that "they who relate them are only such as are reckoned among their fabulous and legendary writers; their learned doctors renounce them all, as doth Mahomet himself, who in several places of his Alcoran owns that he wrought no miracles."

§. 5. Against the opinion of Grotius, that Caius Caligula was the man of sin, it is superfluous to say much, it being grounded upon an error in chronology, that St. Paul writ this Epistle, A. D. 40. when Caius appeared; whereas it is certain, from 1 Thess. i. 5. that Paul had been at Thessalonica before this Epistle was writ; for St. Paul went up to Jerusalem, say the best chronologers, A. D. 49. and it is evident that then he had not been at Thessalonica, and so had writ no Epistle to them, it being writ after his entrance in to them, ver. 9. after he had spoken to them the gospel of God, ii. 2. after he had been taken from them a short time, ver. 17. Now that he had not been at Thessalonica before his going up to the council at Jerusalem, appears from the history of the Acts, which saith, that after this council he went to Antioch, xv. 30. then through Syria and Cilicia, ver. 41. then to Derbe and Lystra, xvi. 1, 2. then through Phrygia, Galatia, and Mysia, and so to Troas, ver. 6—8. then to Samothracia, Neapolis, and Philippi, ver. 11, 12. and having passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, he came to Thessalonica, xvii. 1. He therefore coming only thither eight years after the death of Caius, and not writing this Epistle till after he had left them, could not then write of Caius as the man of sin to be yet revealed.

§. 6. I pass on to the interpretation of Dr. Hammond, which is this:

1. "That the man of sin, the son of perdition, was Simon Magus, together with his followers the gnostics, designed for destruction. (Paraph. on ver. 3.)

2. "That Simon Magus setting himself at the head of them, Christ should destroy him by extraordinary means, as the preaching and the miracles of St. Peter; and the gnostics that adhered to him, at the destruction of the unbelieving Jews. (Paraph. on ver. 8.)

3. "That the falling away first, must be a great departure or defection from the faith to the heresy of the gnostics, or the Christians breaking off their compliance with the impenitent Jews, leaving them as obdurate, and departing avowedly to the gentiles. (Paraph. on ver. 3.)

4. "That which withholdeth, and he that letteth, was the apostles not giving over preaching to the Jews, as hopeless and refractory, and going to the gentiles; (Paraph. on ver. 6.) and the Christians walking warily, and doing nothing contrary to the Mosaical law.

5. "That the mystery already working was this sort of men already formed into a sect, under their ringleaders Simon and Carpocrates." (Paraph. on ver. 7.)

Now against this opinion I argue,

First, From the day of the Lord here mentioned, ver. 1, 2. for that indeed doth often signify in Scripture the day of the Lord's coming to the destruction of the temple, city, and nation, of the Jews; which, saith the reverend Dr. Hammond, is the true import of the phrase here; but it never signifies his coming to destroy Simon Magus. Moreover, it is plain from the eighth verse, that this coming of the Lord is to destroy the man of sin, he being to be destroyed by the brightness of his coming; how then can this day be the time appointed for the destruction of Simon Magus, who perished some years before Christ's coming to the destruction of Jerusalem? for, according to Valesius,* Eusebius, and Symeon Metaphrastes, Simon perished in the reign of Claudius; he coming then to Rome, and St. Peter then also coming after him, to detect his frauds; whence he well argues, that it is not probable he should long there insult over the Christian faith, St. Peter being then present to oppose him.† Now if this be true, he perished at the least sixteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem, and Christ came to destroy him within four years after the writing this Epistle. If he perished, as others will have it, in the fourth of Nero, he must die twelve years before Christ came to destroy Jerusalem; or, if he continued till the twelfth of Nero, opposing Christianity twelve years at Rome, under the very nose of the two chief apostles, which is not very probable, yet must he die four years before Christ's coming to the destruction of Jerusalem, and therefore could not be destroyed by the brightness of his coming.

Must we then refer this only to the destruction of his followers the gnostics? That they were then in being, I could never yet see proved, and much less that any of them perished at the destruction of Jerusalem. I know the doctor cites Eusebius,‡ as saying, that the gnostics, in a moment were utterly extinct; whereas it is manifest, Eusebius says this not of the gnostics, but the Nicolaitans; nor could he say it of them, who flourished chiefly in the second century; whence it is styled, sæculum gnosticum: moreover, it is a plain flaw in this, or any like interpretation, to make the head of any party, with his followers, to be the man of sin to be consumed by the coming of our Lord; and yet to make the antisignanus perish before his coming, and his followers only at it.

Add to this, that the whole foundation of this opinion depends upon the tale of Simon Magus's* flying in the air at Rome, and his falling down and breaking his bones at the prayer of St. Peter;† which is a thing not only uncertain, but, in the judgment of many learned persons, absolutely false. Cotelerius, a Romanist, is forced, ἐπέχειν, to suspend his judgment about it: first, by reason of the original of the story, which, saith he, had its rise, "è libris apocryphis et pseudepigraphis,"‡ from apocryphal and spurious authors.

Secondly, By reason of the great discrepancy to be found among them, in their relations of divers circumstances of this story: some of them saying, that Simon Magus made himself wings to fly; § some, that he was held up by two devils; ‖ others, that he made himself a chariot, ¶ or ascended in a fiery chariot, drawn by four horses; and all say that he did this by magic.

Again, they differ equally as to the effects this fall had upon this magician; some saying that he died by it, and was seen dead upon the spot, that it dashed out his brains,†† broke his whole body, ‡‡ yea, broke it into four parts: §§ others, that Peter prayed he might not die, and so he only broke his thigh, say some; ‖‖ or his hands and feet, as others.

Some tell us, this was done in the reign of Claudius; and others, that it was done in the reign of Nero; some, that it was done by Peter ¶¶ only; others, that it was done by St. Peter and St. Paul; some, that it was done by prayer;††† and others, that they added fasting to their prayer: so little agreement is there amongst them in any circumstance of this action. And,

Thirdly, The story may deserve to be suspected, by reason of the silence of all the ancients of the three first centuries, who speak much of his being at Rome, and of his being honoured with a statue there; but say nothing of his flight or fall, by virtue of the prayers of St. Peter, though they had just occasion to speak of it, had they believed the story. For Justin Martyr,* in his Apology, speaks twice of this statue; and desires the emperor and senate, that, learning the truth, they would abolish that statue; but he saith not one word of this illustrious combat, which was so admirable a conviction of his fraud. Clemens of Alexandria† saith, That Simon heard St. Peter preach a little while, but addeth not one word of what he suffered by St. Peter's prayers. Tertullian ‡ having noted, that after the coming of the gospel, magicians were always punished, speaks only of Simon Magus, as ejected out of the church; though he observes, that Elymas was struck blind: and that in the Acts of the Apostles, § he received a just sentence, and worthy of himself, from the apostle Peter, but addeth not one word of what he suffered from St. Peter at Rome. Origen ‖ proves, that there was οὐδὲν θεῖον, nothing divine in Simon, from the nature of his doctrine, which made idolatry a thing indifferent; and from the success of it, it being in his time almost extinct, and that he perished with his silver; but adds not a hint of his perishing by the prayers of the apostles, which was the strongest proof against his pretensions that he was the power of God. ¶ Eusebius declares, how the devil raised up Simon as the great adversary to the apostles, and how the Divine grace, by their appearance and presence, extinguished that flame; and how the providence of God sent Peter after him to Rome, in the days of Claudius, to set himself against him; and how he prevailed, by causing the light of the gospel to shine there; but gives not the least hint of his being thus overcome, or thrown down, by the prayers of Peter. The bishops of Rome, who, saith Cotelerius, "sua tacere non solent," use not to be silent in matters relating to themselves, say nothing of it. Nor is it credible, saith Hornius, "scriptores Romanos tam memorabilem rem præterituros fuisse;" that all the Roman writers of those times, Suetonius, Tacitus, Pliny, &c. should pass over so memorable a thing in silence; especially if Simon was so honoured by Claudius, and beloved by Nero, as some authors of this story say he was. It seems inconsistent, saith Valesius, with that other story, of Simon's being honoured at Rome as a god, by the emperor, senate, and the people, and the continuance of his statue there in Justin Martyr's days; which sure it would not have done, had he been so remarkably defeated, or destroyed, before their eyes. And, lastly, St. Austin †† freely owns, that at Rome this story was by most people deemed false. And is such a tale fit to be laid as the foundation of the interpretation of this chapter?

§. 7. Arg. 2. This opinion may also be confuted from those words, This day shall not come, unless there be an apostacy first, and the man of sin be revealed. For,

1. It is intolerable to think that act, which was so necessary for the promotion of the gospel among the gentiles, viz. the not imposing on them circumcision and the Jewish yoke, and the ceasing to preach in the synagogues of the Jews, was the apostacy intended by the apostle in these words. The zealots among the Jews might say of Paul, Thou teachest apostacy from the law of Moses; for afterward * the Ebionites rejected all his Epistles, ἀποστάτην ἀποκαλοῦντες αὐτὸν τοῦ νόμου, calling him an apostate from the law; but that St. Paul himself, speaking to the gentiles, should call this his own practice an apostacy, is incredible.

Moreover, What advantage would it do them in this matter, to tell them of an apostacy, which had happened before their conversion, (Acts xiii. 46.) Lo, we turn unto the gentiles, for so hath the Lord commanded us, and happened again about the time of writing this Epistle; (Acts xix. 9.) and finally, saith the doctor, was completed when St. Paul came to Rome, about five or seven years after, at the most? Might not the coming of the Lord be at hand, though an apostacy, so near to be completed, were to go before it? (See James v. 8, 9. 1 Pet. iv. 7.)

2. As for the apostacy of a considerable part of Christians to the abominable impiety of the gnostics, I have all along, in the interpretation of these Epistles, considered that, and find no reason to assert it, nor any thing that favours it, till we come to 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21. It is true, indeed, as Justin Martyr † and Eusebius testify, that most of the Samaritans worshipped Simon as the chief god; but ὀλίγοι ἐν ἄλλοις ἔθνεσιν, few in other nations (say they) did it; but that one single person fell off from Christianity to him, they say not. ‡ Eusebius is express, that neither the heresy of Simon Magus, nor of others, had any prevalency in the times of the apostles. The great apostacy, which, after the writing this Epistle, first appeared, and against which the catholic epistles of St. James, Peter, and St. John, and especially the Epistle to the Hebrews, were written, was that of the converted Jews to Judaism again; and to this Dr. Lightfoot probably refers the apostacy here mentioned; our Lord having foretold, that the devil, once cast out of them by the gospel, should return to them with seven more evil spirits than himself; and concluding that parable with those words, so shall it be with this present generation, Matt. xii. 43—45. Which opinion is well consistent with my interpretation of this chapter, and may be embraced by them who like not my notion of this apostacy.

Secondly, This man of sin was yet to be revealed, ver. 3. and there was yet a season to come, in which he was to be revealed, ver. 6. 8. whereas, by the confession of Dr. Hammond, Simon Magus was revealed as an opposer of Christ, and an ἀντίπαλος, or antagonist to the apostles long before: for he saith, that * being denied the power of working miracles, which he would have bought of the apostles, soon after he set up, and opposed himself against Christ; and accordingly is here called, ὁ ἀντικείμενος, the adversary, or he that opposeth himself. Now the time when he would have bought of them this power of working of miracles, was A. D. 35.; that is, fourteen years before St. Paul wrote this Epistle: if then soon after he set up, and opposed himself against Christ, he must discover himself soon after the year 35. and so before the writing this Epistle. He adds in the same note, that Simon Magus came to Rome in the beginning of Claudius's reign, and there did such miracles by the help of the devils, that he was taken for a god, and accordingly had a statue erected to him, with this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. Eusebius there adds, that the devil had set him up as the great and equal antagonist of the Divine apostles.† St. Jerome also saith, That in the second year of Claudius, St. Peter came to Rome to oppose him. He, therefore, who was then set up as the great adversary of the apostles, and as such opposed by them, in the second year of Claudius, that is, A. D. 42. must be discovered then, that is, nine years before the writing this Epistle. Eusebius there adds, that the flame he had there raised, by the appearance and presence of the apostles, i. e. of Peter, as the words following shew, ᾗ τάχος ἐσβέννυ, was soon extinguished; which seems to prove, that Simon Magus's opposition to Christ, was not only discovered, but even extinguished with his person before the writing this Epistle. And indeed Irenæus and almost all the ancients agree in this, with Dr. Hammond, that Simon Magus, having suffered this repulse from Peter at Samaria, began to search still more into the depths of magic, that he might be more able to contend with the apostles; ‡ and that by this means he astonished many, was honoured by Claudius with a statue, and glorified by many as a god. He soon returned (saith Theodoret§) to his former arts. Now, can we think that a man, who designed to be reckoned μέγας τις, some great one, and to seem glorious in the world, should pursue that design, by hiding, and not discovering himself about fifteen years?

In a word, it cannot reasonably be thought that almost all Samaria should worship him; that he should be honoured in the days of Claudius as a god at Rome, by the emperor, the senate, and the people; and that the devil should set him up as the great adversary of the apostles, long before this time; and that the season of his being revealed, should be yet to come.

§. 8. Arg. 3. Thirdly, I argue against this opinion, from these words, He sitteth in the temple of God, ver. 4. for whether we interpret this of the temple of Jerusalem, or of the church of God, which are all the interpretations known to the ancient fathers, or applied by them to these words, it is certain that neither Simon Magus, nor his followers, sat in any of them. The doctor* therefore is forced to say, this agrees to Simon, as being worshipped at Samaria, in those places which had been set apart to the worship of the true God, they worshipping him there, θυμιάμασι καὶ θυσίαις, καὶ σπονδαῖς, with all sorts of sacrifices. But would St. Paul style the Samaritan temple, had it been then standing, as it was not, the temple of God? Would he have done this, after our Lord's declaration made against them, that they worshipped they knew not what? The truth is, that the temple built upon their holy mountain was long before destroyed by Hyrcanus; and that which Herod built them, they regarded not, as standing not upon that mountain. Where therefore was the temple in which they offered all kind of sacrifices to this magician? Indeed, the doctor useth too much artifice, in thus connecting these things; for that almost all the Samaritans did worship Simon Magus as the first or principal god, Eusebius doth say from Justin Martyr, Hist. Eccl. ii. 13. but that they then worshipped him with any kind of sacrifices, he doth not say; but only, that some of his followers, who pretended to embrace the Christian religion† (which Simon Magus then professedly opposed), fell back to the worship of demons, and had got images of Simon and Helen, which they thus worshipped with sacrifices.

§. 9. Arg. 4. Remember you not (saith the apostle) that I told you of these things? Now is it probable, that in the short time he stayed with them, he should tell them how Simon Magus sat in the temple of God, and that Christ's coming was to destroy him; and that so soon as St. Paul should leave off preaching in the Jewish synagogues, Simon Magus and his followers would be revealed? Credat Judæus Apella. For the mystery of iniquity doth already work, ver. 7. that is, saith Dr. Hammond, this sort of men are already formed into a sect, under their ringleaders, Simon and Carpocrates. Wonderful! that Carpocrates, who, say Clemens of Alexandria,‡ Eusebius, and Theodoret, appeared only in the time of Hadrian, that is, A. D. 107. at the soonest, should be the ringleaders of a sect at the writing of this Epistle; that is, at least fifty-six years before he began his heresy.

It follows, ver. 8. And then shall that wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, &c. "that is (saith Dr. Hammond), then immediately shall ye see the sect of the gnostics shew itself, join with, and stir up the Jews, and bring heavy persecutions upon the Christians; and having this opportunity to calumniate them to the Jews, behave themselves as their professed opposers. And Simon Magus shall set himself forth in the head of them, whom, as a professed enemy of Christ, Christ shall destroy, by extraordinary means, by the preaching and miracles of St. Peter; and for all the apostatizing gnostics that adhere to him, they shall be involved in the destruction of the unbelieving Jews, with whom they have joined against the Christians." In which long paraphrase there is nothing certain, and nothing which can be confirmed, either from Scripture or antiquity. That there were then any gnostics in being; that they ever then did, or were in a capacity to persecute the Christians; that any single person of them perished, at the fatal time of the destruction of the unbelieving Jews, I never yet saw proved. That Simon Magus should set himself at the head of these gnostics, or of any other of his followers, who was extinct before they bore that name, it is not credible. That his followers, who pretended that Simon himself was the chief or principal god; who worshipped him, and the very images of Simon and Helena, with all kind of sacrifices; who held, the law and prophets were not to be regarded, should ingratiate themselves, and join with the Jews, is still more incredible. And, lastly, that Simon Magus perished by the miracles of St. Peter, I have shewed to be improbable. And this I think sufficient to be offered against this interpretation.

§. 10. I should proceed to those considerations which seem to lie against that opinion, which holds, that the apostle primarily intends the papal antichrist; but I have already done this, both in this preface, and in the following annotations; and therefore shall at present only add, that this man of sin is to sit in the temple of God, and probably to do it then when the apostle writ: for he gives it as a character, by which the Thessalonians, to whom he writ, might know him, and then he could be no other than the Jewish doctors. Moreover, this temple of God must either be the temple of God, properly so called, which was destroyed by Titus, A. D. 70. and then again, the man of sin, who was to sit in it, must denote the same persons; or, as some of the most ancient fathers, Irenæus,* Hippolytus,† St. Cyril,‡ and St. Ambrose,§ thought, either the ruins of that temple, or another to be built by antichrist in behalf of the Jews; and then, as it is not reasonable to think the apostle would absolutely style that the temple of God, which had never been so, and which was only built by one who magnified himself against, and openly blasphemed the true God; so is it more unreasonable to think the pope and his clergy should sit in it. They therefore who think that they are here especially intended, embrace the sentiments of the fathers of the fifth and the following centuries, viz. of Chrysostom,‖ Theodoret, St. Austin, and St. Jerome, that by the temple of God, we are to understand the Christian church. But this interpretation is liable to this objection, that it is not reasonable to conceive the Holy Spirit, without any mark of distinction, would give that name to the apostate church, in which the beast and the false prophet did preside, she being by the same Spirit, when he speaks more unquestionably of her, still represented as spiritual Sodom and Egypt, mystical Babylon, and the mother of fornications and abominations, Rev. xi. 8. xvii. 5. Hence Bellarmine¶ makes this inference from the interpretation of the protestants, that, if it be true, the Roman church, in which the pope presides, must be the church of God. To this our writers answer, that this name was given to the church of Rome, because she once was so. But when was that? Was it not before the man of sin sat in her, and exalted himself above God and Christ? and can he properly be said to sit in the church of God, who, whilst he sitteth in it, is not the man of sin, nor does those things which belong to him; and when he is the man of sin, sitteth no longer in the church of God, but in spiritual Egypt, the oppressor of God's people, in mystical Babylon, the mother of idolatry, and the great enemy of the church of God, and in the synagogue of Satan?

But that I may not wholly differ from my brethren in this matter, I grant these words may, in a secondary sense, be attributed to the papal antichrist, or man of sin, and may be signally fulfilled in him, in the destruction of him by the Spirit of Christ's mouth, he being the successor to the apostate Jewish church, to whom these characters agree, as well as to her; and therefore in the annotations I have still given a place to this interpretation also.

§. 11. Lastly, As for the objections which may be raised against the sense which I have put upon these words, I shall answer most of them in the annotations, therefore shall only give a more full answer to these two; viz.

Obj. 1. That all the fathers and ancient interpreters seem not only silent as to this import of these words, but generally seem to refer the τὸ κατέχον, that which withheld this revelation of the man of sin, to the Roman empire.

Ans. To this I answer, (1.) That this objection may be retorted upon all the other opinions with equal strength; for what is there said by any of the fathers or ecclesiastical writers for six hundred years, whence it may be concluded that either Mahomet or the pope of Rome was the man of sin here mentioned? What hint hath any commentator, Greek or Latin, in his notes upon this chapter, for a thousand years, given, that the pope and his clergy were the persons here intended?

If it be here replied, that they do consequentially overthrow this opinion, by making the Roman empire to be the τὸ κατέχον, that which withheld; I answer, that they more fully overthrow the opinion, which saith, the papal government is antichrist, or the man of sin.

1. By saying that antichrist* was coming, and at hand, long before the appearance of the little horn, which sprung up only from the ruins of the Roman empire, which happened A. D. 475.

2. By teaching, so generally as they did, that antichrist, being once revealed, was to continue not twelve hundred and sixty years, but only three years and a half. (See note on ver. 8.)

3. That he was to be of the Jewish extract, one † of the tribe of Dan, who was also to be circumcised. And,

4. That he should be an enemy to ‡ idolatry and image-worship, as Irenæus, Hippolytus, Cyrillus Hieros. St. Chrysostom, and Theodoret, say.

In a word, they generally held, as I have shewed, note on ver. 10. that antichrist was to come with signs and wonders to deceive the Jews, that they might be punished for their infidelity. All which things must be manifestly inconsistent with the common notion, that the pope's hierarchy must be the man of sin here primarily intended by St. Paul.

Thirdly, I answer, that though the fathers do not expressly say, the Jewish nation was the man of sin, which the apostle here intended; yet many of them have said those things on which this our interpretation doth depend; as, v. g. that this man of sin was to be of Jewish extract, that he was to sit in the temple of Jerusalem, and that he was to come chiefly to deceive the unbelieving Jews, that so they might be punished for their infidelity. And,

Lastly, As to the τὸ κατέχον, or rather ὁ κατέχων, he that letteth, I only in this differ from them, that whereas they refer this to the Roman empire, I do refer it to a Roman emperor; and as some of them held that Nero* was this antichrist, and man of sin, and others, that he was Domitian;† so do I hold that Claudius, the predecessor of that Nero, was the person that withheld.

§. 12. Obj. 2. It farther is objected, That the Jews were long before revealed to be the great opposers of Christianity, and the scribes and pharisees had long sat in the temple of God; wherefore the revelation of the man of sin, being only to take place for some considerable time after the writing of this Epistle, the Jewish nation cannot be reasonably deemed the man of sin.

Ans. I shall answer this objection in the paraphrase, by shewing that these are the descriptions of the man of sin, by which the Thessalonians and others might then know him; and that they were all spoken in the present tense, shewing what he already did, and that he was yet more fully to be revealed, either by his actual apostacy from the Roman government, which happened in the twelfth of Nero, or by the great apostacy of the believers of that nation from the faith.

Secondly, I add, That the Jewish nation not only had a great opinion of their dearness to the God of heaven, but were also looked upon by their proselytes, and others, as God's peculiar and beloved people; and therefore such a change of providence as made it appear to all men, they were become the generation of his wrath, must also be a revelation of them as the greatest of sinners. And since this came upon them after they had rejected our Messiah, and crucified the Lord of life, it must be a discovery that they became sons of perdition upon this account; and in this sense the removing that, which letted, must make way for the revelation of that wicked one, whom the Lord would consume with the breath of his mouth. As then the Roman church, though she is thought by us to be the antichrist here spoken of, and the beast mentioned in the Revelation, is yet, by many other Christian churches in the west, thought to be the true catholic church of Christ, and her bishop to be the vicar of Christ, the successor of Peter, and the head of the universal church, and so will only be revealed to them to be what we now deem her, when she shall go into destruction and be destroyed by the sword of Christ, and by the breath of his mouth; so was the church of Jerusalem then only fully revealed to Jew and gentile, and to the Judaizing Christians, to be not what they did erroneously think her, but what the apostle here doth represent her, when our Lord did thus consume her by the breath of his mouth, and God so signally demonstrated she was a vessel of his wrath fitted for destruction. See the parallel betwixt the Jewish and the papal antichrist, &c. as at large set forth after the annotations on 2 Thess.

§. 13. This Epistle seems to have been written soon after the First, and, as Bishop Pearson probably conjectures, in the same year, Silvanus and Timotheus being still with him when he writ it, as they were at the writing of the First Epistle. (2 Thess. i. 1.) Now St. Paul stayed at Corinth only a year and six months, (Acts xviii. 11.) and there he had preached a considerable time every sabbath-day before they came to him, (Acts xviii. 45.) and so before he writ his First Epistle, it being written after that Timothy was come to him, (1 Thess. iii. 6.) and they seem to be gone from him before he left Corinth to go to Syria, for then he had only with him Priscilla and Aquila; (Acts xvii. 18.) so that the interval betwixt these two Epistles could not be above a year.

CHAP. I.

1. PAUL, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, (write) to the church of the Thessalonians (established) in (the kingdom and worship of) God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ:

2. (Wishing) [1] grace to you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3. We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet (for us to do), because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all towards each other aboundeth:

4. So that we ourselves glory in you (or boast of you) in the churches of God for your patience, and (for your) faith (which produceth this patience) in all your persecutions and tribulations which you endure;

5. Which (dispensation of Divine wisdom appointing you to suffer, 1 Thess. iii. 3. and permitting others thus to persecute you) is a manifest token of the [2] righteous judgment of God, (these sufferings befalling you) that you may be accounted worthy of the (celestial) kingdom of God, for which ye also suffer (and so are in assurance of a day when God will thus reward you):

6. [3] Seeing it is a righteous thing with (that) God (to whom belongeth recompence, Rom. xii. 19. and who will avenge his elect, that cry unto him day and night, Luke xviii. 7.) to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you;

7. And to you who are troubled (as we are) rest with us, (which rest we both completely shall enjoy) when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven (attended) with his mighty angels, (as he shall be at the last day, 1 Thess. iv. 16. when he will come to give every one according to his works, Matt. xvi. 27. Mark viii. 38. and gather all the nations of the world before him, Matt. xxv. 32. Jude 14, 15.

8. When he shall come, I say,) in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them (among the heathens) who know not God, and (of those Jews and gentiles) who (having heard) obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ:

9. Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, (from whose blissful presence they shall for ever be excluded, Matt. xxv. 41. 46.) and (shall find that destruction inflicted on them) [4] by the glory of his power; (that being the time when God will make known his power on the vessels of wrath fitted for destruction; Rom. i. 23.

10. And it is also a righteous thing with him, then to recompense to you eternal rest) when he shall come to be glorified in (his dealings with) his saints, and to be admired (for his great love) in (and by) all them that believe (and particularly by you), because our testimony among you was believed in that day.

11. Wherefore also we pray always for you, that our God would count you worthy (ἀξιώσῃ τῆς κλήσεως, would make you worthy, ver. 5.) of this calling (to his kingdom and glory), and fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness in you), and the work of faith with power:

12. That the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified in you (by your continuance in your faith), and ye in him (or by him), according to the grace of our God, and the Lord Jesus Christ (by which you are enabled to continue in the faith, and fulfil the good pleasure of his will).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 2. GRACE and peace from God the Father, καὶ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, and our Lord Jesus Christ.] Because he saith not by our Lord, but, and our Lord Jesus Christ: hence Theodoret pleads for an equality in power, and by consequence in essence of the Father and the Son.

[2] Ver. 5. Τῆς δικαίας κρίσεως, Of the righteous judgment of God, &c.] This place (saith Esthius*) proves against the heretics, that life eternal is not so to be ascribed to the grace of God, as not to be attributed also to the worth and merits of men, proceeding from the grace of God.

But the true import of these words will be sufficiently contained in these following particulars:

First, That the justice of God obligeth him to recompense the obedience and sufferings of his faithful servants, either in this or in the world to come; since, were it otherwise, we could have no sufficient motive to perseverance in obedience to him, or suffering for his sake; and therefore this by the apostle is laid as the foundation of all the service which we pay unto him, even the firm belief that God is and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him, Heb. xi. 6.

Secondly, That since God doth not, and, according to the nature of the thing, he cannot, recompense them in this life, who suffer all calamities and losses they can endure here, and even death itself for his sake, his justice will oblige him to do it in the next. Hence the apostle saith of himself and all his fellow-sufferers, If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men the most miserable, 1 Cor. xv. 19. and puts the question thus, If the dead rise not at all—why stand we in jeopardy every hour? ver. 29, 30. But,

* "Monstrat hic locus contra hæreticos, vitam æternam, quæ in regno Dei intelligitur, non ita gratiæ Dei tribuendam esse, ut non etiam dignitati, et meritis hominum à gratiâ Dei profectis, retribuatur."

Thirdly, That this reward should be for kind so excellent, as is the beatific vision, the being heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ, the being like to him in glory, and for duration should be eternal, can never be on the account of that strict justice which rendereth to every one his due, seeing there can be no proportion betwixt a finite action or passion and an infinite reward; and therefore the same apostles who saith here, ἀξιωθῆναι ἡμᾶς, we, for these sufferings are accounted worthy of this kingdom, doth elsewhere positively declare the sufferings of this present life, οὐκ ἄξια, not worthy of the glory which shall hereafter be revealed, Rom. viii. 18. Nor can the grace of God, vouchsafed to enable us thus to perseverance in sufferings, enhance the merit of those sufferings, or make the reward in justice due unto us; since, if it be of grace that we thus suffer, then it is not of debt that we are thus rewarded; God being not in strict justice obliged to reward his own free gifts and graces he confers upon us. But,

Fourthly, Even this eternal recompence being promised to those who suffer for the sake of Christ, by him who hath said, Be thou faithful to the death, and I will give thee a crown of life, Rev. ii. 10. and propounded as the chief encouragement thus to endure with patience to the end, Matt. v. 12. it may be said, by virtue of that promise, to be in justice due to them who do thus suffer for it, it being a part of justice to perform our promises, and be faithful to our words. This therefore is a faithful saying, If we suffer with him, if we endure, we shall live and reign with him, 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12. and we may rest assured, that God the righteous judge will give this crown of righteousness to us at that day, 2 Tim. iv. 8. that, being approved, we shall receive that crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him, James i. 12. But then God being not obliged in strict justice to promise so great a recompence, he cannot be said to confer it, "ex dignitate, merito, aut æqualitate rei," by reason of the dignity or worth of these our sufferings, or because the reward is only equal to the merit of them, but only, ex justitiâ pacti, because his promise hath made it just and equal for him so to do.

[3] Ver. 6. Εἴπερ δίκαιον, Seeing it is a righteous thing.] Here the Greek scholiasts note εἴπερ is put for ἐπείπερ or ἐπειδήπερ, that is, siquidem for quandoquidem, as it is, Rom. viii. 9. and so the Hebrew im oftentimes signifies: (see Nold. de Partic. Heb. p. 88.) and therefore, say they, it is not a particle ἀμφιβολίας ἀλλὰ βεβαιώσεως, of doubting, but of confirmation.

[4] Ver. 9.] This phrase, καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς δόξης τῆς ἰσχύος αὐτοῦ, and from the glory of his power, is taken from Isa. ii. 19. 21.

See the appendix to this chapter at the end of this Epistle.

CHAP. II.

1. NOW we beseech you, brethren, by (or, concerning) [1] the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together to him, (mentioned Matt. xxiv. 31.)

2. That ye be not soon shaken in mind (ἀπὸ τοῦ νοὸς, from the sentence you formerly received from me), or be troubled, neither by spirit (i. e. by any pretended revelation), nor by word (spoken by us, and by others misunderstood, 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16.) nor by letter as from us, (i. e. by any thing contained in our former Epistle, iv. 15. v. 2. or rather in those words, ii. 16. Wrath is come upon them, εἰς τέλος, to the uttermost, so) as (to conceive) that the day of Christ [2] is at hand.

3. Let no man deceive you (by these pretences) by any means: for that day shall not come, except there come [3] a falling away first (of the Jews from the Roman empire, or from the faith), and (by that means) the [4] man of sin be revealed, (who is) the [5] son of perdition;

4. Who [6] opposeth (himself now to the Christian church), and [7] exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped (Gr. ἢ σέβασμα, or, worshipped); so that he, as God, [8] sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God.

5. Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, [9] I told you (of) these things (viz. of the man of sin to be revealed, and of these characters of him)?

6. And now ye know [10] what withholdeth that he might be revealed [11] in his time.

7. For the [12] mystery of iniquity doth already work (i. e. the Jews are already making some efforts towards this apostacy): only he [13] who now letteth will let (or, only there is that withholdeth as yet, and will continue so to do), [14] until he (or it) be taken out of the way.

8. And then shall [15] that wicked one be [16] revealed, whom the Lord shall [17] consume with the spirit (or breath) of his mouth, and shall [18] destroy with the brightness of his coming:

9. Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan with [19] all power and signs, and lying wonders,

10. And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish, [20] because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved.

11. And for this cause [21] God shall send (among) them strong delusions, (which will have this effect upon them) that they should (shall) believe a lie;

12. That they all might be damned (Gr. judged and condemned), who believed not the truth, (the gospel preached to them, see note on Rom. ii. 8.) but had pleasure in unrighteousness, (or, falsehood, see note on 1 Cor. xiii. 6.)

13. But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because, God hath from the beginning (of our preaching to you, shewed, 1 Thess. i. 4, 5. that he had) chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit (which gives the earnest of it, and makes us meet for it), and belief of the truth (which promiseth it):

14. [22] Whereunto (i. e. to which faith and sanctification) he hath called you by (the preaching of) our gospel, [23] to the obtaining of the glory (Gr. to the glorious salvation) of our Lord Jesus Christ.

15. Therefore, brethren, stand fast (in the faith), and [24] hold the traditions which you have been taught, whether by word (ver. 5, 6.) or (by this) our epistle.

16. Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father (through him), who hath loved us, and hath given us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace,

17. Comfort your hearts, and establish you in every good word and work.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. Ὑπὲρ τῆς παρουσίας τοῦ Κυρίου, By the coming of the Lord.] That ὑπὲρ, with a genitive case, signifies de, or circa, about, or concerning, cannot be doubted. It is rendered concerning, Rom. ix. 27. (See 2 Cor. xii. 5. 8.) It is thrice rendered of, in the same import as 2 Cor. i. 7. Our hope, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, of you is certain; viii. 23. Whether any inquire, ὑπὲρ Τίτου, of Titus; and, ver. 24. Our boasting, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, i. e. concerning you; Phil. i. 7. It is meet for me to think thus, ὑπὲρ πάντων ὑμῶν, of you all. Hence Phavorinus saith it is used, ὁμοίως τῷ περί. (See 2 Cor. vii. 5. ix. 3.)

The coming of Christ, is, by the reverend Dr. Hammond, referred to Christ's coming to destroy the unbelieving Jews, and throw down their temple, and their worship which depended on it. This is the παρουσία τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, the coming of Christ, or of the Son of man, so often mentioned in our Lord's prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the temple, Matt. xxiv. 3. 27. 37. 39. This is most certainly the import of the phrase in St. James twice, when he exhorts the brethren to be patient, ἕως τῆς παρουσίας τοῦ Κυρίου, till the coming of the Lord; adding, that this παρουσία τοῦ Κυρίου, coming of our Lord was at hand, and the Judge stood before the door, James v. 7—9.

As for the phrase, Our gathering together to him, it seems parallel to the words of Christ, Matt. xxiv. 31. ἐπισυνάξουσι τοὺς ἐκλεκτοὺς αὐτοῦ, his angels shall then gather his elect. And to apply it to the Thessalonians, let it be noted, that they were partly converts of the Jews and proselytes. For the converts, made by St. Paul's preaching to them, were of the believing Jews, and the devout Greeks, Acts xvii. 4. who, in expectation of our Lord's prediction, as well as from their observation of the Jewish festivals, might be inclined to go up to Jerusalem. Moreover, till the writing of this Epistle, if not long after, even till the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jewish converts kept up their synagogue-worship; and many proselytes and other Christians did not scruple to assemble with them; the Jewish converts thought themselves obliged to do it, they being all zealous of the law, Acts xxi. 20. and many of the gentile Christians complied with it at Corinth, Galatia, and Philippi; but after the destruction of Jerusalem, there was an end of this synagogue-worship, the day having revealed that God was no longer pleased with it, and then they met together still as churches of Christ, and this might be their ἐπισυναγωγὴ πρὸς αὐτὸν, the gathering together to him, here spoken of.

But yet, considering that this παρουσία, or coming of Christ, in the former Epistle, is used four times with relation to Christ's coming at the day of judgment, viz. ii. 19. iii. 13. iv. 15. v. 23. it may be thought more reasonable to refer this passage to the same advent, and paraphrase it thus; I beseech you, brethren, by (the blessing you expect at) the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and at our gathering together to him.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἐνέστηκεν, Is, or hath been, instant.] To conceive that signal day of the destruction of their enemies the Jews, and the deliverance of the Christians, mentioned Joel ii. 31, 32. Mal. iv. 1, 2. come, and find themselves deceived in that conception, might cause great trouble to them, and even shake their steadfastness in the faith.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἀποστασία πρῶτον, A falling away first.] The rebellion of the Jews against the Chaldeans was always styled apostacy, and the Jews, upon that account, apostates. So Jerusalem is represented as πόλις ἀποστάτις, a city that rebelled against kings; and in which ἀποστάσεις γίνονται, rebellions were found, Ezra iv. 12. 15. 19. Thus, Ezra iii. 2. 18. 22. they are styled Ἰουδαῖοι ἀποστάται, rebellious Jews; and, ver. 27. it is said, that they were given to rebellion and war. (See Nehem. ii. 19. vi. 6. 1 Macc. xiii. 16. 2 Macc. v. 11.) And, in like manner, their revolt from the Roman government, is by Josephus generally expressed by the same word:* Coming from Rome (saith he) in the time of Nero, when Felix was procurator of Judea, I found then the beginnings of innovations, καὶ πολλοὺς ἐπὶ τῇ Ῥωμαίων ἀποστάσει μέγα φρονοῦντας, and many much addicted to apostacy from the Roman government. One Justus† (saith he) provoked the people, εἰς ἀποστασίαν, to rebellion; but John, the son of Levi, seeing some of them, διὰ τὴν ἀποστασίαν τὴν ἀπὸ Ῥωμαίων μέγα φρονοῦντας, prone to apostacy from the Roman government, endeavoured to keep them to their duty.

But if any like not this notion of apostacy, they may understand these words of the great apostacy of the Jews, foretold by Christ, Matt. xxiv. 11, 12. and which happened not only in Judea and Palestine, but throughout Asia, 2 Tim. i. 15. and in all other places where they had embraced the gospel. Of which apostacy, note,

First, That when the apostle writ this Epistle, it was yet to come; for though the mystery of iniquity was already working, in the seductions of the false apostles and deceitful workers of the Jewish nation, endeavouring to corrupt the minds of the gentile converts, from the simplicity that was in Christ, (2 Cor. xi. 3.) and to bring them into bondage to the Jewish law, (Gal. ii. 4.) and so deprive them of that liberty wherewith Christ had made them free; yet the greater defection of the Jewish converts to their old Judaism seems to have had its rise about ten years after the writing this Epistle. For it is certain, that, A. D. 63. when the apostle writ the Epistle to the Hebrews, it was begun already, and many of the Jewish converts then were in great danger of falling back unto perdition, as appears from the vehement admonitions and exhortations of the apostle to them, to beware lest there should be in any of them an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God; and to exhort one another daily to this steadfastness, as knowing we are only partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence firm to the end, iii. 12—14. to labour to enter into that rest Christ had prepared for them, lest any man fall, after the same example of unbelief, iv. 11. Not to forsake the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some was, x. 25. nor to cast away their confidence, ver. 35. To lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees, and make straight paths for their feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way, and to look diligently lest any man fall from the grace of God, xii. 12, 13. 15. As also from the representation of the dreadful state of all who should apostatize after this manner, that it was impossible to renew them to repentance, vi. 46. that they were nigh to cursing, and their end was to be burned, ver. 8. that there was no more sacrifice for their sin, but a fearful looking-for of destruction, and fiery indignation, x. 26, 27. and vengeance from the living God, ver. 30, 31. that it would certainly be a falling back to perdition, ver.

38, 39. that there would be no escaping for them who turned away from him who spake to them from heaven, xii. 25. The same we learn from the like oxhortations of St. James, to joy and patience under their afflictions, i. 1—12. v. 7—12. of St. Peter, 1 Pet. iii. 14, 15. iv. 12—19. v. 8—10. and from St. John's frequent exhortation, to hold to that which they had received from the beginning, and to continue walking in the truth. Now the occasions of this great apostacy seem to have been these three.

First, Their zeal for the observation of the law, which they conceived to be of eternal obligation, especially to the Jews, to whom particularly it was given; and for the covenant of circumcision, which they esteemed highly meritorious, (see note on Rom. ii. 13.) that which made them perfect, gave them life, and delivered them from hell, according to these sayings of theirs,* He that is circumcised is perfect: he that is circumcised shall not go to Gehinnom: and I said unto thee, in thy blood, Live; Ezek. xvi. 6. this is the blood of the circumcision. This they endeavoured to impose upon the gentile converts: and all the myriads of Jewish converts were all zealous for the observation of it by the Jews, and looked upon it as downright apostacy for them to forsake Moses, and not to circumcise their children, and walk according to their customs received from Moses, or from their traditions, ἀποστασίαν διδάσκεις ἀπὸ Μωσέως, Acts xxi. 21. And this seems to be the reason why St. Paul, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, discourseth so largely of the necessity of the change of the law; viz. that by establishing that truth, he might put a stop to the apostacy occasioned by their contrary persuasion.

Secondly, Their beloved dream of a temporal kingdom to be erected by their Messiah at his coming, the halcyon days that were then expected by them, and the dominion they should then have over the nations, who were not, according to their sentiments, to come in to the Messiah, otherwise than as their slaves or servants. How deeply this imagination was fixed even in the hearts of Christ's apostles, we learn, as from many other things, so especially from their question to him after his resurrection: Lord, wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom unto Israel? Acts i. 7. And because our Lord gave this answer to it, viz. It is not for you to know the times and seasons, which the Father hath put in his own hands; but ye shall receive power, the Holy Spirit coming upon you, and ye shall be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and all Judea, and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth, ver. 7, 8. They were prone to think, that, at least, after the apostles had done this, they might expect our Lord should come in the clouds of heaven, to set up this kingdom; they therefore believed in him rather as a temporal, than a spiritual king; they owned him rather as a true prophet, to persuade them to be righteous, than as a Saviour, to procure to them remission of sins, and a new covenant established in his blood. Hence Origen, speaking of those words of Christ, If I say the truth, why do you not believe? which, he conceives, were spoken to those Jews which believed; he saith, they might be said to believe in one sense, and not to believe in another. So, v. g. They that believe in Jesus Christ crucified in the days of Pontius Pilate, but believe him not to be born of the Virgin Mary (i. e. the Ebionites), believe in him, and do not believe in him.† And again, They who believe in Jesus, who did in Judea the signs and wonders which were written of him,‡ but believe him not to be the Son of that God who made heaven and earth, believe in him, and believe not in him; and this relateth to others of the Jews. And hence it seems to be, that the apostle is so large in treating of the sacerdotal office of our Lord, and of the new covenant established in his blood. Moreover, the Jews were generally possessed with this opinion, that about that time their Messiah should set up this temporal kingdom;§ and they generally expected, not a Messiah to suffer for their sins, of whom they seem then to have had no notion, John xii. 34. but a great king to subdue their enemies under them. And this was their great stumbling-block, that ‖ our Jesus appeared not to be such a one; and this was the great thing that animated them to the war. When therefore the gospel had been preached to the world, and there was no appearance of Christ's coming in the clouds to be their king, and their deliverer, but rather to destroy their temple and their nation, they began to fall off from him, as not answering their expectation, or the predictions of their prophets, and to give ear to their false prophets, saying to them, Lo, here is Christ, and there is Christ, according to our Lord's prediction, Matt. xxiv. 22. and promising freedom and deliverance, saith Josephus, ¶ to as many as should follow them.

And, lastly, the great cause of this apostacy, of which the Scriptures take a more special notice, was the grievous persecutions they suffered in all places from their fellow Jews, and from those heathens they had instigated against them. This, by St. Paul, is styled a great fight of afflictions, against which he desires them to arm themselves, by faith and patience, and the consideration of the coming of their Lord, and by the example of that cloud of witnesses, which they had set before them. (Heb. x. 11, 12.) By St. Peter it is styled, the fiery trial, which was come to try them, 1 Pet. iv. 12. and by which they were in heaviness, through manifold tribulations, 1 Pet. i. 6. and against which St. James endeavours to strengthen them, by the consideration of the blessed fruits, and glorious recompence, their patience under them would produce, chap. i. and of the presence of their Lord, who would shortly come to rescue them, and give a happy issue of them, chap. v. By reason of which persecutions some began to use great compliances with the Jews, to avoid their rage; others, to fall away from the Christian faith, hoping perhaps that they might still obtain salvation in that religion, in which they expected to find it before they embraced Christianity.

Others, who refer this to the church of Rome, understand by this apostacy, a falling away from the doctrine, and the true worship of God and Christ, by idolatry in the worship of a consecrated wafer, of angels, saints, images, and relics; on which account that church is represented under the characters of spiritual Egypt, of mystical Babylon, and the mother of fornication, Rev. xi. 8. xvii. 5.

[4] Ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἁμαρτίας, The man of sin.] If you read here, Ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἀνομίας, The man of disobedience, who will not submit to law and government, as do the manuscripts of Stephanus and Lincoln, nothing can more exactly agree to the Jewish nation, which, in the times of Josephus,* had this character, that it was ἔθνος δυσάρκτον καὶ δυσπειθὲς φύσει πρὸς τοὺς βασιλέας, a nation naturally averse from subjection to kings. If we retain the common reading, no nation under heaven more deserved to be styled the man of sin, than did the Jewish nation, after the spirit of slumber and blindness was come upon them, (Rom. xi. 8.) for the rejection of the promised Messiah. Their own Josephus saith, It is impossible to recount severally the particulars of their wickedness; but in the general it may be said, that never any city suffered such calamities, μήτε γενεὰν ἐξ αἰῶνος γεγονέναι κακίας γονιμωτέραν, nor was ever any generation, since the memory of man, more fruitful in iniquity. See this more fully proved, note on Rom. ii. 1. Then therefore more especially was this man of sin revealed to be so. This character doth also very well agree to the beast mentioned in the Revelation, which being spiritual Sodom and Egypt, (Rev. xi. 8.) the mother of fornications, and the abominations of the earth, (xvii. 5.) may very well deserve the title of the man of sin.

Obj. If it be here objected against the application of this character to the Jewish nation, that the man of sin seems to relate to some single person, and therefore cannot be interpreted of a whole nation, especially if they act not under some head or other:

Ans. I answer, That I have for this the authority of the prophet cited here, ver. 8. who saith, He shall smite the land (Chald. the sinners of the land) with the word of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips; Jemoth Reshang, ἀνελεῖ ἀσεβῆ, He shall consume the wicked one; which wicked one, whether we understand it with the fathers of antichrist, or with the Jews of Armillus, i. e. the Romans, or with the protestants of the papal polity, under the name of one, must comprehend all his associates and followers, though they be many nations. Thus also doth the prophet Isaiah introduce God speaking to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judah: And now Josheb, inhabiter of Jerusalem יושב, καὶ ἄνθρωπος τοῦ Ἰούδα, and man of Judah, v. 3. and ver. 7. καὶ ἄνθρωπος, the man of Judah is my pleasant plant. And Jeremiah speaks in the person of the whole Jewish nation, saying, I am the man that have seen affliction, Lam. iii. 1. and so on to ver. 22. So in the parable, Matt. xxii. 11. our Saviour represents the Jewish nation, from whom the kingdom of God was to be taken away, and who were to be cast out into outer darkness, ver. 13. by the man who had not on his wedding-garment. So the two witnesses, Rev. xi. 3. and the woman clothed with the sun, Rev. xii. 1. represent the whole body of true Christians; and the beast, xiii. 1. the woman arrayed in purple and scarlet, xvii. 4. and the great whore, xix. 2. include all the members of the Roman church. And therefore it is evident, that this objection of a single person seems equally to lie against all the other hypotheses. And as they had their heads in which they were united, so had the Jewish nation their high-priest and Sanhedrin, their rulers of the people, their scribes and pharisees, the heads of this man of sin, as the pope and his clergy are the head of the beast.

[5] Ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας, The son of perdition.] This also perfectly agrees to the Jews, not only because Christ was to smite them with the breath of his mouth, (see note on ver. 8.) and to smite the land with a curse, Mal. iv. 6. but because they are set forth as vessels of wrath fitted, εἰς ἀπώλειαν, for destruction, Rom. ix. 22. as men appointed to wrath, 1 Thess. v. 9. to sudden destruction, ver. 4. as men whose end is ἀπώλεια, destruction, Phil. iii. 19. Note also, that this agrees exactly to the great whore, who is to go, εἰς ἀπώλειαν, into destruction, Rev. xvii. 8. 11.

[6] Ver. 4. Ὁ ἀντικείμενος, Who opposeth himself.] This word in the Old Testament represents the adversaries of God and his church. So Isa. lxvi. 6. The voice of the Lord rendering recompence, τοῖς ἀντικειμένοις, to his enemies. And Esth. ix. 2. They who sought the hurt of the Jews are, οἱ ἀντικείμενοι τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις. And in like manner in the New Testament ὁ ἀντικείμενος, is in the general the adversary of Christ, and of Christianity; as in those words, Give no occasion, τῷ ἀντικειμένῳ, to the adversary to blaspheme. (1 Tim. v. 14.) In particular the Jews, as they were οἱ ἀντικείμενοι τῷ Χριστῷ, the adversaries of Christ; (Luke xiii. 17.) so in our Lord's discourse on the destruction of Jerusalem, they are styled the adversaries of the apostles, in these words, I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which οἱ ἀντικείμενοι ὑμῶν, your adversaries shall not be able to resist, or gainsay. (Luke xxi. 15.) They are the ἀντικείμενοι πολλοί, of which St. Paul speaks, saying, A great door and effectual is opened to me in Ephesus, and there be many adversaries; (1 Cor. xvi. 9.) as you may learn from Acts xix. 9. where we find them speaking evil of the way of Christianity before the multitude, and St. Paul separating from them upon that account; and in those words of St. Paul to the Philippians, i. 58. In nothing be ye terrified by (the malice and persecution of) your adversaries, ὑπὸ τῶν ἀντικειμένων, which malice and persecution is to them ἔνδειξις ἀπωλείας, an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation. (See 2 Thess. i. 5.) And with good reason is this name given to them especially, they being the men, who killed the Lord Jesus, and persecuted his apostles; who pleased not God, and were adversaries to all men; forbidding the apostles to preach to the gentiles, that they might be saved. (2 Thess. ii. 15, 16.) When they began to preach the word of life, the high-priest, the captain of the temple, and the sadducees, (Acts iv. 1.) and the whole order of the priesthood, (ver. 6.) styled, τὸ συνέδριον, the Sanhedrin, (ver. 15.) command them, not to speak at all in the name of Jesus, (ver. 18.) on which account these rulers are said to be assembled against the Lord, and against his Christ, (ver. 26.) And the answer of the apostles to them is, That God was rather to be obeyed than man. After this, the high-priest and all his associates place the apostles, ἐν τῷ συνεδρίῳ, in the Sanhedrin, (Acts v. 17. 27.) calling them to an account for disobeying their commands; and having received this answer from the apostles, That God must be obeyed rather than man, they beat them in the Sanhedrin, and again command them not to speak in the name of Jesus, (ver. 40, 41.) Soon after we find Stephen brought before the scribes and elders, εἰς τὸ Συνέδριον, into the Sanhedrin, (vi. 12.) and the high-priest; (vii. 1.) and they who sat ἐν τῷ Συνεδρίῳ, in the Sanhedrin, having examined him, and the witnesses against him, they stoned Stephen, (ver. 59.) which death could only be inflicted on him by the Sanhedrin. After this Saul receives letters from the high-priest, (ix. 1.) and from all the elders, (xxii. 5.) to bind all Christians he could find in any of their synagogues, and bring them to Jerusalem. (Acts ix. 2. 14.) Yea, in the second, or, as Bishop Pearson saith, in the fourth year of Nero, the high-priest, καὶ ὅλον τὸ Συνέδριον, and the whole Sanhedrin meet, (Acts xxii. 30.) and Paul is brought before them, (xxiii. 1.) By all which passages, as we see how they are still shewing themselves adversaries to Christ and his disciples; so we learn the falsehood of that Jewish story, that forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jewish Sanhedrin removed from thence to Joppa; which, saith Mr. Selden,* as I have never read any such thing in the ancients, so may it be confuted from the life of Josephus. It was this Sanhedrin that admitted that public prayer against the Christians called "berachoth haminnim," the cursing of the heretics. They therefore called Jesus accursed, 1 Cor. xii. 2. and so, as Justin Martyr† saith, they dishonoured Christ as much as they could, καταρώμενοι ἐν ταῖς Συναγωγαῖς ὑμῶν τοὺς πιστεύοντας ἐπὶ τὸν Χριστὸν, cursing in their synagogues those that believe in him. Thus did they crucify afresh the Son of God, and put him to an open shame; yea, saith the same Justin,‡ ἄνδρας ἐκλεκτοὺς ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐκλεξάμενοι τότε ἐξεπέμψατε εἰς πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν, they sent chosen men from Jerusalem throughout the whole earth, representing the Christian faith as an atheistical heresy. Now this could be done only by the Sanhedrin. It was, lastly, by the high-priest and his Sanhedrin assembled at Jerusalem, that§ James the brother of our Lord, with some other Christians, is condemned to be stoned for blasphemy against the law. Yea, when the war was begun, affairs seem still to be ordered by the high-priest and Sanhedrin: for it was after the flight of Cestius Gallus from Jerusalem, that Josephus‖ was made governor of Galilee, and thence he writes,¶ τῷ Συνεδρίῳ τῶν Ἱεροσολυμιτῶν, to the Sanhedrin of Jerusalem for instruction. And Ananias the high-priest acknowledges that they had engaged in the war against the Romans only for their liberty. So that things seem to have been managed to that time by the high-priest and Sanhedrin, who appearing thus upon all occasions with the utmost rage against Christ and Christians, might well be deemed not only ἀντικείμενοι, their adversaries, but antichrists. But then the Roman antichrist being also to wear out the saints of the Most High, Dan. vii. 25. and cast down some of the host of heaven, Dan. viii. 10. the beast being to slay the witnesses, Rom. xi. 7. to make war with the saints, and overcome them, xiii. 7. and even to be drunk with the blood of the saints, and of the martyrs of Jesus, xvii. 6. xviii. 24. she doubtless must emphatically deserve this title.

[7] Ὑπεραιρόμενος ἐπὶ πᾶν τὸ λεγόμενον Θεὸν, ἢ σέβασμα, Exalted himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped.] The word λεγόμενος, called, shews the apostle here speaks of magistrates, who are called gods in Scripture, Psal. lxxxii. 6. and particularly of the Roman emperor, whose title was σεβαστὸς, Augustus, and who are here signified by σέβασμα, as God is by the word θεὸς. And how the Jews exalted themselves against every thing that is called God, or the magistracy, we may observe, saith Dr. Lightfoot, in such passages as these, 2 Pet. ii. 10. They despise government; Jude 8. They despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities: and in their own stories to endless examples. How they stood affected to them, we may learn from the question they put to our Saviour, Shall we pay tribute to Cæsar or not? Matt. xxii. 17. for had he answered No, they then thought they should have ground to represent him as an enemy to Cæsar; if Yea, to represent him to the people as a betrayer of his country's liberty and freedom,* τὴν ἐπιτίμησιν οὐδὲν ἄλλο ἢ ἀντικρὺς δουλείαν ἐπιφέρειν λέγοντες, they looking on this tribute-money as a sign of slavery: and from their Talmudical saying, We have no king but God: and from their imagination, that it was a wicked thing† μετὰ τὸν Θεὸν φέρειν θνητοὺς δεσπότας, to own any mortal governor under God. (See note on 1 Pet. ii. 16.) And that the pope and his church have thus exalted themselves above kings and emperors, church-history and their own canon law will not suffer us to doubt. (See Downham de Antichristo, lib. iv. cap. 2, 3.)

[8] Ὥστε αὐτὸν εἰς τὸν ναὸν Θεοῦ ὡς Θεὸν καθίσαι, So that he sitteth in the temple of God as God, shewing himself that he is God.] Only the Jewish Sanhedrin, their priests, high-priests, and doctors, or expounders of the law, sat in the temple of God, then properly so called, and there the high-priest and the Sanhedrin took upon them the power of judging in capital causes. Thus they stoned Stephen; thus also they stoned James the brother of our Lord, and others with him; and St. Paul persecuted the Christians even to death by their authority; (Acts xxii. 4, 5.) and thus they sat in the temple of God as gods. The scribes and pharisees also shewed themselves as God, by setting up their traditions above the commandments of God, pretending to dispense with them, and, by so doing, saith our Saviour, ἀκυροῦν, ἀφιέναι, ἀθετεῖν, to lay aside, reject, and to make void, the commandments of God, (Matt. xv. 16. Mark vii. 8—10. 13.) to establish their traditions. And, secondly, by preferring them to, and requiring greater reverence to be given to their traditions and their doctrines, than to the written word of God; saying, that the words of the scribes are more amiable than the words of the law, and more weighty; that a prophet was not to be believed without a sign or a miracle, but they were to be believed without them; with other blasphemous sayings, cited by Dr. Lightfoot‡ on Matt. xv. 2. and by Dr. Pocock, who shews that they held their vows so sacred, that they were obliged to violate the laws of God to keep them, and that in such cases they could not observe God's precepts without great sin. And, thirdly, this they did by taking to themselves the titles of guide and father, which, in our Saviour's interpretation, belonged only to God and Christ, Matt. xxiii. 8—10. (See the note there.) And, fourthly, as being by their own confession θεόμαχοι, fighters against God, by their opposition to the apostles commissionated by God. (Acts v. 39. xxiii. 9.) Here then let it be noted,

First, That these are the descriptions of the man of sin, by which the Thessalonians might then know him, and they run all in the present tense, shewing what he already did; and therefore it is no objection against my interpretation of these words, that the Sanhedrin, the scribes and pharisees, had long sat in the temple of God, and done the things here attributed to the man of sin.

Secondly, Let it be noted, that it is prophesied, Dan. xi. 35, 36. that a king shall do according to his will, and shall exalt himself, and shall magnify himself above every god; and that this, by St. Jerome and Theodoret upon the place, is interpreted concerning antichrist. And that the pope of Rome hath manifestly not only thus exalted himself above all that is called god, by usurping a power over kings and emperors, as in the former note; but also shewed himself in the church as God, by claiming that infallibility which is the property of God, and by dispensing with his laws, and also by equalling himself to Christ, who is God: (see Downham de Antichristo, lib. iv. cap. 5.) and therefore, according to the sentiments of all those fathers, who by the temple do understand the church of God, he hath by these things shewed himself that he is God.

Ὡς θεόν.] I doubt not, saith Dr Mills, that these words are added to the text, they being wanting in Irenæus, lib. v. cap. 25. in Origen, contra Celsum, p. 89. 307. in Cyril Hieros. p. 161. in the Vulgar, and Cod. Alex. which if true would be a great advantage to my hypothesis; but they being owned by all the Greek scholiasts, the Syriac, and Arabic versions, by Cyril Alex. Glaph. in Gen. p. 178. and by Theodoret Hær. Fab. lib. v. cap. 23. I dare not depend upon his confidence.

[9] Ver. 5. Ταῦτα ἔλεγον ὑμῖν, I told you of these things.] These are the words which seem to me to settle my interpretation of this chapter: for of the Jews, and their opposing of themselves to the doctrine of Christianity, and the professors of it, he told them in his First Epistle; (ii. 15, 16.) and when he was with them, the persecutions that both he and they suffered from them, (Acts xvii. 15, 16.) gave him a just occasion to speak both of their opposition to the gospel, and of the deliverance they shortly might expect from such enraged persecutors; this being hinted for the encouragement of Christians, in most of his Epistles: but that he should tell them any thing of Mahomet or of the papal antichrist, who were not then in being, or to be known then to the Thessalonians by any of the characters here mentioned, is not so easy to conceive. Though since the characters here referred to are partly to be found, Dan. xi. 35, 36. and that place by the ancients * is thought to relate to antichrist, and to be here referred to by St. Paul, this is by some expositors thought to refer to something the apostle might have taught them from the prophet Daniel, touching antichrist. (See the Preface, §. 1—3.)

[10] Ver. 6. Καὶ νῦν τὸ κατέχον οἴδατε, And now ye know what withholdeth.] Or rather, and ye know what now withholdeth; and according to this sense of the words, that which hindered the full revelation of this man of sin, must be in being, and actually withholding, when this Epistle was indited. Some of the fathers * have conjectured, that the τὸ κατέχον, or that which hindered, was the gifts of the Holy Spirit then given to believers, and exercised in the assemblies of Christians; but they more generally do refer this to the Roman empire,† saying, that the apostle here teacheth, that, till that be taken away, antichrist shall not come. This (say they) the apostle here expresseth so covertly and obscurely, ‡ that he might not incense the Roman emperors against the Christians; as he must have done, had he openly and boldly said, antichrist shall not come until the Roman empire be destroyed. (See note on 1 Pet. v. 13.) What I conceive to be the τὸ κατέχον, see note on the verse following.

[11] Ἐν τῷ ἑαυτοῦ καιρῷ, In his season.] i. e. In the time prefixed for the false Christs and antichrists to come, Matt. xxiv. 5. 24. in the last hour of the Jewish church and economy, according to these words of St. John, (1 John ii. 18.) Little children, it is the last hour, and as ye have heard (from Christ) that antichrist shall come, so now are there many antichrists, by which ye may know that this is the last hour.

They, who refer this to the papal antichrist, say that this season relates to the "tempus statutum," the time prefixed; (Dan. xi. 35.) for antichrist, saith he, shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished, or till God's indignation against the Jewish nation ceaseth: and to the time, times, and half a time, mentioned Dan. vii. 25. during which time the little horn was to wear out the saints of the Most High; and to the twelve hundred and sixty days in which the beast should triumph, and the witnesses should be clothed in sackcloth, Rev. xi. 3. or to the time, times, and half a time, mentioned Rev. xii. 6. 14.

[12] Ver. 7. Τὸ γὰρ μυστήριον ἤδη ἐνεργεῖται ἀνομίας, For the mystery of iniquity doth already work.] That is, the Jews have already imbibed their pernicious principles, that it is not lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar, or to be subject to any other government under God: they have already made some seditious attempts, not only in Babylon, but in Judea, under Theudas Gaulonites; § and also have been incited farther to do so by one Dortus, and his associates, who persuaded the multitude, ἐπὶ τῇ Ῥωμαίων ἀποστάσει, to revolt from the Romans. Josephus also doth inform us,‖ that before that time there were many tumults in Judea, καὶ συχνοὺς βασιλείαν ὁ καιρὸς ἀνέπειθε, and that the time prevailed with many to usurp the kingdom. This mystery was also working by the false apostles, and deceitful workers of the Jews, causing some of the gentile Christians to warp from the simplicity of the faith to the Jewish rites, to mix Judaism with Christianity, and so to turn from him that called them to another gospel. The fathers, Theodoret only excepted, say this mystery of iniquity was already working, *in Nero, the forerunner of antichrist, and the calamities he brought upon the Christians; on which account some of them taught that he was antichrist; and others, that he was to be raised again to be so: but this is an extravagancy sufficiently confuted from this one observation, that these words were written in the reign of Claudius, whereas the persecution of the Christians happened only twelve years after, in the reign of Nero. Others, who say this mystery was working in the false prophets then in being, till they can shew us any false prophets then in being, which were not of the Jewish nation, do not contradict, but establish our assertion. And, lastly, others, though they do zealously contend against Dr. Hammond, that Simon Magus could not be the man of sin here mentioned, yet say, it is probable he was the mystery of iniquity then working, and the forerunner of antichrist, because he did set up himself as the supreme God, brought in the invocation of angels, and the worship of images, and taught idolatry to be a thing indifferent, and was the father, as the beast is styled the mother of abominations: but thus they seem to me to build up again what they had so industriously pulled down: for it is highly reasonable to conceive the mystery of iniquity then working, should be that very mystery which after was to be completed by a more full appearance of the man of sin, as will appear from the connexion of the words, Remember ye not, that when I was with you, I told you these things? (who was the man of sin to be revealed, and what were his characters, ver. 3, 4. and what it was that hindered at present the revealing of him:) for the mystery of iniquity is already working (i. e. he is doing that covertly, which when he is revealed he will do more openly); only he that hinders (his full appearance) will do so, till he be taken away; and then shall this wicked one be revealed. Who sees not now, that all those interpretations must be false, which make the mystery of iniquity to be one person, or one kind of persons; and the man of sin, or antichrist, another; as they must do, who make the mystery of iniquity to be Simon Magus, or the false prophets or heretics in being when this Epistle was indited; and the man of sin, the pope of Rome, and his clergy? This mystery of iniquity, saith Dr. Lightfoot, cannot be understood but of the Jewish nation. And so it is explained, again and again, by St. John, saying, This is the last hour; and as you have heard that antichrist cometh, so now are there many antichrists, by which we know this is the last hour, 1 John ii. 18. and chap. iv. Every spirit that confesseth not Jesus Christ, who is come in the flesh, is not of God; and this is the spirit of antichrist; this is the deceiver, and the antichrist, Epist. ii. 7.

Here therefore is a plain account of the working of the mystery of iniquity in the false Christs and prophets of the Jewish nation, who also were the great incendiaries to, and agents in, the apostacy of that nation from the Roman government. (See note on ver. 10.)

[13]. Ὁ κατέχων, He that letteth.] "Quis nisi Romanus status?" Who but the Roman state? saith Tertullian:* so many of the fathers, as hath been noted on the foregoing verse: and whereas it may be objected against this sense, that it seems plainly from the word ὁ κατέχων, that he must be a person, rather than a state; they who are of this opinion, answer, he is here spoken of as one single person, though the government consisted of a succession of emperors, because one of them only reigned at a time, and the government was dissolved, by taking away the last governor. My conjecture is this, He who now letteth, i. e. the emperor Claudius, will let till he be taken away; i. e. he will hinder the Jews from breaking out into an open rebellion in his time, they being so signally and particularly obliged by him, that they cannot for shame think of revolting from his government; for he had made two edicts in their favour, the one concerning the Alexandrian Jews, to this effect, † That the just Jews should suffer nothing, because of the madness of Caius, who would be worshipped as a god, and that they should have liberty to observe their own laws and customs. And that other edict,‡ in which he gives them liberty over his whole empire, without molestation, to observe their own laws and customs; declaring, that he did it, because he judged them worthy of that favour for their affection and fidelity to the Roman government.

After his death, the affairs of the Jews, saith Josephus, became worse and worse, not only by reason § γοήτων ἀνθρώπων οἱ τὸν ὄχλον ἠπάτουν, of those magicians who deceived the people, and of those thieves who stirred them up to the war against the Romans,‖ μηδὲν ὑπακούειν αὐτοῖς λέγοντες; persuading them not to be subject to them; but because Nero, in his third year, sends a letter to Portius Festus, governor of Judea, by which the Jews are deprived of their ἰσοπολιτεία, equal share of government in Cæsarea; whence, saith Josephus, was the rise of all our calamities, the Jews persisting still in sedition, μέχρι δὴ τὸν πόλεμον ἐξῆψαν, till they broke out into the war. In the seventh of Nero, Albinus succeeds Festus, then dead, who, saith Josephus, was ὁ μάλιστα λυμαινόμενος τὴν χώραν,¶ one who exceedingly wasted the country, and laid the seeds of their future captivity. In the tenth of Nero, Gessius Florus succeeds him, who  πολλῶν ἀνέπλησε κακῶν Ἰουδαίους, brought many calamities upon the Jews, saith Josephus, which having tragically represented, he concludes thus, What shall I say more? τὸν γὰρ πρὸς Ῥωμαίους πόλεμον ὁ καταναγκάσας ἡμᾶς ἄρασθαι Φλῶρος, for it was this Florus who compelled us to the war against the Romans, which began in the twelfth of Nero.

[14] Ἕως ἐκ μέσου γένηται, Till he be taken away.] i. e. Say some, till the Roman government be taken away; as it was by the exile of Augustulus, A. D. 476. say I, till Claudius be taken away, as he was by poison, saith Suetonius; for, as tolli de medio, among the Latins, so in the Greek, ἐκ μέσου γενέσθαι, imports, one to be taken away by death, and oft-times by a violent death; so ἐξαναλῶσαι ἐκ μέσου τῆς παρεμβολῆς is to destroy them out of the middle of the camp, till they were consumed: so of Core and his company it is said, ἀπώλοντο ἐκ μέσου τῆς συναγωγῆς, they were destroyed from the midst of the congregation, Numb. xvi. 33. Thus of the righteous, saith the prophet, ἦρται ἐκ μέσου, he is taken away, he rests in his grave, Isa. lvii. 2. so Jeremiah, Ἐξῆρε ἐκ μέσου, The Lord hath taken away all my mighty men from the midst of me, Lam. i. 15. And so God saith of the false prophet, Ezek. xiv. 8, 9. Ἐξαρῶ αὐτὸν, ἀφανιῶ αὐτὸν ἐκ μέσου τοῦ λαοῦ μου, I will cut him off from the midst of my people.

[15] Ver. 8. Ὁ ἄνομος, The wicked;] Who will not be subject to the laws to which their forefathers, from the time of Pompey, have submitted.

[16] Ἀποκαλυφθήσεται, Shall be revealed;] Either by his actual apostacy from the Roman government, or by the great apostacy of the believers of that nation; of which, see note on ver. 3.

[17] Ὃν ὁ Κύριος ἀναλώσει τῷ πνεύματι τοῦ στόματος αὐτοῦ, Whom the Lord shall consume by the spirit of his mouth.] That the apostle here refers to Isaiah x. 4. appears by his using the very words of that prophet, which run thus: He shall smite the land with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked one. Now what is the land there, is well expounded by Malachi in these words, (iv. 6.) Lest he smite the earth with a curse. Where both the Hebrew and the Greek use the same words. Now in Malachi it is evident, and confessed, that by the earth, the land of Judea must be meant, as it is usually in the book of Psalms, Psal. xvi. 3. xxv. 13. xxxvii. 3. 9. 11. 22. 29. 34. seeing to them alone the prophet was then sent to prophesy: it is therefore reasonable to conceive, that the same phrase should have the same import in the prophet Isaiah; to smite this land with the breath, or spirit, of his mouth, is, to smite in his wrath and indignation. So, Job iv. 9. By the blast of God, by the breath of his nostrils, ἀπὸ πνεύματος ὀργῆς αὐτοῦ, or, of his anger, are they consumed; and to consume with his fiery indignation. Thus Tophet is ordained of old, the pile thereof is fire and much wood; the breath of the Lord, θύμος Κυρίου, the indignation of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it. So Psal. xviii. 8. A smoke ascended in his anger, and fire out of his mouth devoured. And, ver. 15. At thy rebuke, O Lord, at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils, ἀπὸ ἐμπνεύσεως πνεύματος ὀργῆς σου, by the breath of the wind of thine anger. This therefore again answers to the words of Malachi, iv. 1. Behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, and all that do wickedly, shall be as stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up: and to that of the Baptist, Matt. iii. 10. And now the axe is laid to the root of the trees; every tree therefore that bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be hewn down, and cast into the fire: which also evidently belongs to the Jewish nation, which said, We have Abraham for our father, ver. 9. and to whom alone the Baptist is there speaking: and again, ver. 12. he saith of Christ, his fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly cleanse his floor—and burn the chaff with unquenchable fire: plainly alluding to the words of Malachi, that all the wicked shall be as chaff, or stubble. This being so, the earth to be smitten with the rod of his mouth, must be the people, or inhabitants of the land; or, as the Chaldee, the sinners of the earth, the unbelievers and wicked of Judea, to be consumed by that indignation and fire of the Lord, Mal. iv. 1. So saith Procopius on the place, Doth the Lord threaten to Judea, ἐπὶ τῇ κατ' αὐτοῦ παροινίᾳ, for her contumely against him, saying, Thy house is left unto thee desolate; and ἐγκαταλειφθεῖσα πολέμῳ καὶ πυρὶ δαπανᾶται, being left desolate, is consumed by sword and fire.

That these words may have a more full completion in the destruction of the beast, or mystical Babylon, which is also to be slain by the sword proceeding from the mouth of Christ, and destroyed by the fierceness of his wrath, and, with the false prophets, to be cast alive into the lake of fire and brimstone, I deny not: but that this should be the primary intent of the words of Isaiah, and that he should be there prophesying of the destruction of the church of Rome, seems to me a rabbinical gloss, not much to be insisted on, especially since the apostle, Rom. xv. 12, applies the tenth verse of this chapter to the first calling of the gentiles.

[18] Καὶ καταργήσει τῇ ἐπιφανείᾳ τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ, And shall consume with the brightness of his coming.] The day of the Lord's coming to destroy Jerusalem, is styled by Joel, ii. 31. ἡμέρα Κυρίου ἡ μεγάλη καὶ ἐπιφανὴς, the great and bright day of the Lord: and, Mal. iv. 5. Behold, I send you Elias the prophet, (i. e. the Baptist, in the spirit and power of Elias, Luke i. 17. πρὶν ἐλθεῖν τὴν ἡμέραν τοῦ Κυρίου τὴν μεγάλην καὶ ἐπιφανῆ, before the coming of the great and bright day of the Lord. And that our Lord's coming in his day, after he had suffered, and been rejected of that age, or generation, in which he suffered, should be as lightning shining from one end of the heaven to the other, he expressly tells his disciples, Luke xvii. 24.) And when this ἐπιφάνεια καὶ παρουσία, brightness and appearance of the Son of man was to happen, he sufficiently instructs them in these words, As the lightning, φαίνεται, shineth from the east to the west, οὕτως ἔσται καὶ ἡ παρουσία τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, so shall the coming of the Son of man be, ὅπου γὰρ, for wheresoever the carcass is, there shall the eagles be gathered together, Luke xvii. 24. 37. which sensibly applies this matter to the destruction of the Jews by the Roman army, whose ensign was the eagle. This therefore is a farther confirmation of our exposition.

Lastly, Observe the connexion of these verses; there is a τὸ κατέχον νῦν, something, or person, that withholdeth now; and, ὁ κατέχων ἄρτι, he that now withholdeth, will do so, until he be taken away, καὶ τότε, and then shall the wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord shall destroy. Now would not any one here think, that if the Roman government were that which withheld, antichrist should presently be revealed, and appear to the world to be so (as all the fathers,* who were of that opinion, held), soon after the dissolution of that government, according to those words of St. Jerome,† "Qui tenebat, de medio fit, et non intelligimus antichristum appropinquare; quem Dominus Jesus Christus interficiet Spiritu oris sui?" He that withheld is taken away; and do we not understand that antichrist is at hand? And again, would not any one hence be prone to think, that the Lord should be as quick to consume him, when he was revealed, as all the fathers* thought, allowing but three years and a half for the whole reign of antichrist, and declaring, that they had this not from apocryphal writings,† but from the holy Scriptures? and were it otherwise, those Christians which saw the dissolutiono f the Roman empire, A. D. 476. might lie under the same doubts as did the Thessalonians here, touching the man of sin; for then they saw no Roman antichrist appearing, nor that mystery of iniquity yet working; for the pope and clergy of Rome were then orthodox, free from exalting themselves above all that is called God, or from wearing out the saints with persecution, till some hundred years after. And if, after his appearing thus, he were to continue twelve hundred and sixty years before our Saviour's coming to destroy him, as he must do, according to that hypothesis; might not the Christians be tempted, in that long interval, to say, Where is the promise of his coming? This therefore seems to lie as a strong bar against that, as the primary sense and meaning of these words.

[19] Ver. 9. Ἐν πάσῃ δυνάμει καὶ σημείοις, With all power and signs.] This our Lord foretold, that before his advent to destroy Jerusalem, there should appear false prophets, and false Christs, who should deceive many, Matt. xxiv. 11. who should shew signs and wonders, to deceive, if it were possible, the very elect, ver. 24. Now that these false prophets, ver. 11. 24. were the same, we learn from St. Luke, who sums both up in one, xxi. 8. and from the work of both, which was to deceive many; that they were all to appear in the same age, in which his disciples, to whom he spake these words, lived, is also evident from Christ's caution to them, in respect of both; See to it, lest any man deceive you, Matt. xxiv. 4. See to it: Behold, I have foretold you all things, Mark xiii. 23. Matt. xxiv. 26. It cannot then be doubted, but that there were such persons as are here mentioned, which then arose among the Jews. Such were the Jews of whom St. Paul speaks, comparing them to Jannes and Jambres, the celebrated magicians of Egypt, because of their resistance of the truth of the gospel, as those magicians resisted Moses, and whom he styles, πονηροὶ ἄνθρωποι καὶ γόητες, wicked men and jugglers, 2 Tim. iii. 8. 13. or those who did strange things by the invocation of devils, as the word imports, say Phavorinus and Suidas; the magicians were men of the same art and tricks. Now to these Josephus doth ascribe the beginning of the apostacy from the Roman government, and by them, he informs us, that it was carried on to the last: the affairs of the Jews, saith he, became worse daily, by reason ‡ γοήτων ἀνθρώπων οἱ τὸν ὄχλον ἠπάτων, of those impostors who deceived the people, of which he immediately gives an instance in the Egyptian, who set up for a prophet. He adds, that in the beginning of the reign of Nero,* impostors and deceivers, under a pretence of Divine impulse, endeavouring innovations and changes, made the people mad, and led them into the wilderness, promising there to them signs of liberty from God: and that † γόητες πολλοὺς εἰς ἀπόστασιν ἐνῆγον, the impostors prevailed with many to revolt. And even when their temple was in flames, he saith, there were many prophets‡ who encouraged them to expect τὴν ἀπὸ Θεοῦ βοήθειαν, help from God, and that they gave credit to them. Accordingly of the dragon it is said, that the unclean spirits which went out of his mouth, were the spirits of devils, working miracles, Rev. xvi. 13, 14. that the false prophet wrought signs before the beast, Rev. xix. 20. and that the beast wrought great signs, so as to make fire descend from heaven, Rev. xiii. 13. and that by these things they did πλανᾷν, deceive the inhabitants of the earth, Rev. xiii. 13. 19, 20. xx. 10. Of which miracles done by the members of the Roman church, to establish their idolatry and superstition, see Downham de Antichristo, lib. vi. cap. 1.

[20] Ver. 10. Τὴν ἀγάπην τῆς ἀληθείας οὐκ ἐδέξαντο, They received not the love of the truth.] From these words some conceive that antichrist, or the man of sin, must in profession be a Christian; because he is said not to receive the love of the truth only. But all the fathers,§ and many others say, not to receive the love of the truth, is, not to receive the truth which is worthy to be loved, and which would have taught them charity to those they persecuted, it being the same with not believing the truth, ver. 12. And this emphatically belonged to those unbelieving Jews to whom St. Paul speaks thus, It was necessary that the word of God should be first spoken to you: but since you thrust it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life, lo, we turn to the gentiles: (Acts xiii. 46.) and to whom he applieth that of the prophet, Behold, ye despisers, and perish; for I will work a work in your days, which ye will in no wise believe, ver. 41. (see Acts xxviii. 27. Heb. iv. 2. 12. 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8.) and all the fathers which speak of antichrist, and the man of sin, not one of them excepted, declare, that this and the two following verses belong to the unbelieving Jews,‖ that he is thus to come with signs and wonders to deceive them; and that they who would not receive Christ, confirming his doctrine with true miracles, shall be deceived by the lying miracles of antichrist. And if this be so, that these things are intended of the unbelieving Jews, they can agree in the primary import of them to them only.

that end; or, as he said, to deceive his people, (Jer. iv. 10.) because he suffered them to be deceived by false prophets. (Jer. vi. 14.) And as he deceived the false prophets, by giving them up unto a spirit of delusion, (Ezek. xiv. 9.) this must be the true interpretation of all such passages as these: for,

First, God cannot secretly inspire into us any evil, or infuse any evil principle into our hearts; for evil can never proceed immediately from him who hath an absolute and entire freedom from it; were it his offspring, it must cease to bear that name, his works being all very good, and wrought in righteousness. Nor,

Secondly, Can he incline, excite, encourage, or entice to sin: for then he must excite men to perform the abominable thing which his soul hates, to do that which is infinitely displeasing to him, and must incline them secretly to that which he openly deters all persons from; and then he cannot truly be offended with such persons, he cannot punish them for their iniquities: or else he must be angry with them because they do obey his motions, and sentence them to endless misery because they do comply with his own inclinations. Nor,

Thirdly, Can he necessitate any man to sin: for then he must by force compel them to it, and then the action done by virtue of that force cannot be theirs, but God's; nor would our consciences condemn us for sin, were we assured we could not help it.

[22] Ver. 14. Εἰς ὅ.] Here Beza notes, that many copies read εἰς ἣν, which agrees with πίστιν, ver. 13. and that many Latin copies accord with them. But it is common for this pronoun to vary in gender from the noun to which it relates; so σκεύη ἐλέους οὗς, Rom. ix. 23, 24. τεκνία μου οὕς, Gal. iv. 19. (See Phil. ii. 15. Colos. ii. 19. Philem. 10. 2 John 1.)

[23] Εἰς περιποίησιν δόξης, To the glorious life, or salvation.] That περιποιεῖν is to save alive, see note on Eph. i. 14. and περιποίησις is חיה life, 2 Chron. xiv. 13. they fell down, ὥστε μὴ εἶναι ἐν αὐτοῖς περιποίησιν, so that there was no life in them, Mal. iii. 17. the day which I make εἰς περιποίησιν, LXX.

[24] Ver. 15. Κρατεῖτε τὰς παραδόσεις, Hold the traditions which ye have been taught.] This passage proves not in the least, that, in the judgment of St. Paul, there were any traditions wholly extrascriptural; that is, such as were neither then committed, nor after to be committed to writing, by himself or any other inspired person; but only, that he himself had not writ all things to them by epistle, being absent, but had preached many things to them being present.

Now that the word which St. Paul preached orally was after written by St. Luke, his amanuensis and companion, we learn from the tradition of the church of Christ, recorded by Irenæus * and Eusebius.

Secondly, All that the apostle here exhorts the Thessalonians to do, is to retain the traditions they had immediately received from the mouth of an apostle, and which he personally had delivered to them; which traditions, when we know them to be such, there is no doubt but they ought with all reverence to be received: when therefore the church of Rome hath proved that the traditions she obtrudes upon us were immediately received from the mouth of an apostle, then, and not till then, will this text oblige us to receive them.

Thirdly, This text is so far from being an argument for receiving doctrinal traditions, no where writ in Scripture, upon the sole authority of the church of Rome, or even of the church catholic, that it is rather a demonstration, that she is no sure preserver of them, she having actually lost those very traditions touching the man of sin, which are mentioned in this chapter, and particularly referred to in this text; I told you these things when I was with you, ver. 8. and now ye know what letteth; wherefore stand fast, holding the traditions (touching his coming, which when I was with you I delivered by words, and now hint to you by epistle), and which, as it appeareth by this Epistle and his exhortation, were of great moment to be known. Now, hath this tradition been preserved by the Roman, or by the catholic church? or must she not confess with Anselm,* and their own Esthius on the place, Truly the Thessalonians knew what letted, but we know it not? So that the tradition which the church received from the apostles, touching this matter, is wholly lost; how therefore can she be relied on as a sure preserver, and a true teacher of traditions, which hath confessedly lost one of great moment, deposited with the Thessalonians, and the primitive church?

eth disorderly, and not after [4] the tradition which he hath received of (i. e. from) us.

7. For you yourselves know how you ought to follow us: for [5] we behaved not ourselves disorderly among you;

8. Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labour and travail (weariness and toil) night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you:

9. Not because we have not power (to live of the gospel, for the labourer is worthy of his hire, Luke x. 7. and so hath the Lord appointed, that they that preach the gospel should live of the gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 14.) but to make ourselves an ensample unto you to follow us, (in this our industry; for if we, who might lawfully live upon other men's labours, choose rather to work for our own living, how much more ought ye to do so?

10. And this we have formerly taught,) for even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any (being able) would not work, neither should he eat.

11. (And of this we have cause to remind you;) for [6] we hear that there are some who walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busy-bodies (meddling with that which belongs not to them).

12. Now them that are such we command and exhort by (the authority and in the name of) the Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and (so) eat their own bread.

13. (Thus I hear it is with them:) but ye, brethren, [7] be not weary of well-doing (let not their example make you neglect your industry).

14. And if any man (among you) obey not our word by this Epistle (in which we exhort and command them thus to work), [8] note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed.

15. Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother.

16. Now the [9] Lord of peace himself give you peace always by all means. The Lord be with you all.

17. The salutation of (me) Paul with mine own hand, which is [10] the token in every epistle (that it comes from me): so I write.

18. The grace of our Lord Jesus [illegible]ll. Amen.

us, but of men to obey his call. Whence Christ saith, Luke ix. 23. If any man will come after me, οὐ γὰρ ἀνάγκῃ βιάζεται, ἀλλὰ γνώμην ζητεῖ, for he compels no man.

[3] Ver. 5. Or, Εἰς ὑπομονὴν τοῦ Χριστοῦ, Into the patience of Christ.] i. e. Into an imitation of his patience, in suffering the contradiction of sinners against himself, that ye may run with patience the race which is set before you, looking unto Jesus, &c. (Heb. xii. 1, 2.)

[4] Ver. 6. Κατὰ τὴν παράδοσιν.] The tradition here mentioned, is, say Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, the tradition which he delivered διὰ τῶν ἔργων, by his works, in which he was an example to them of industry; and therefore he adds, at ver. 7.,

[5] Ver. 7. Οὐκ ἠτακτήσαμεν, We behaved not ourselves disorderly.] That is, saith Theophylact, we were not idle; for God having ordered man to labour, and fitted him with members for that end, he that will not do so, ἐκλέλοιπε τὴν τάξιν, deserts the order in which God hath placed him; and so the apostle expounds himself, ver. 11.

[6] Ver. 11. Μηδὲν ἐργαζομένους, ἀλλὰ περιεργαζομένους.] Not working at all, but being busy-bodies, or, but being employed about vain things; so περιεργάζεσθαι, πράττειν τὰ περισσὰ, Hesych. Phavorinus. So Ecclus. iii. 23. ἐν τοῖς περισσοῖς τῶν ἔργων σου μὴ περιεργάζου, "inanem vanamque operam ne suscipias," be not employed in vain things.

[7] Ver. 13.] Note, The fathers interpret these words thus, Let not their sloth hinder your charity, in giving them what is necessary to preserve life: but this exposition suits not with ver. 10.

[8] Ver. 14. Σημειοῦσθε.] Most interpreters say, that the apostle, ver. 6. and here, requires the church-governors to use the censures of the church upon these disorderly walkers: but I have shewn it to be highly probable, that when this Epistle was writ, there were no such governors settled in this church. (See note on 1 Thess. v. 12.)

Secondly, These exhortations plainly are directed to all the brethren in general; if therefore they relate to excommunication, and such-like censures, it will hence follow, that the power of the keys belongs to all the brethren in general.

Thirdly, The apostle exhorts them still to own them as Christian brethren, which they at present are not, who by excommunication are excluded from the church in the society of Christians.

[9] Ver. 16. Ὁ Κύριος, The Lord.] Both here, and ii. 16. the apostle prays to the Lord Jesus Christ for peace, which, in the Hebrew phrase, imports all happiness; and for establishment in every good word and work, which is a strong argument for his Divinity, especially considering that every good work derives from God.

[10] Ver. 17. Ὅ ἐστι σημεῖον ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ, Which is the token in every epistle.] Hence Grotius concludes, that this must be the first of his Epistles: for, had he, saith he, writ any epistle before, this admonition had been needless. I should rather think that this supposes he had writ some epistle before, because he saith not this shall be, but this is the sign in every epistle. And this is evident, almost to a demonstration, from these words, ii. 2. Be not troubled by epistle as from us, as if the day of the Lord were at hand (see the note there); and from these words, ver. 15. Hold the traditions you have (formerly) received, whether by word, or our epistle. To which words Grotius hath nothing to answer. Add to this the note of the learned Mr. Dodwell,* cited in the margin.

A DISCOURSE

BY WAY OF APPENDIX TO THE FIRST CHAPTER;

SHEWING,

That the endless miseries or torments of the wicked are well consistent both with the justice and the goodness of God.

THE apostle in this chapter seems plainly to assert, That wicked persons shall be punished with everlasting destruction, and also to resolve this punishment into the δικαιοκρισία, or just judgment of God.

Whereas it is pretended, that "it is contrary to the justice of God, to punish temporary crimes with eternal punishments, because justice always observes a proportion between offences and punishments; but between temporary sins and eternal punishments there is no proportion. And if it be hard to reconcile this with Divine justice, it will be much more so, to shew how it comports with that great goodness we suppose to be in God."

They who assert the eternity of future torments inflicted on the wicked, abiding in a state of misery, attempt by several ways to answer this objection. I shall begin with those answers, which to me seem not satisfactory, and briefly shew the reasons why I think they are not so; and then return that answer, which I think fully clears the justice and the goodness of God in this dispensation, from the strength of this objection. And,

§. I. First, Some make out the proportion thus, That "because sin is infinite in respect of the object, against which it is committed; therefore it deserves an infinite punishment: now because a finite creature cannot suffer a punishment, which is infinite as to intention; therefore he suffers that, which is infinite as to pretension or duration."

But to this it is replied, That if all sins be for this reason infinite as to demerit, then the demerit of all sins must necessarily be equal, and so there must be equal reason for the pardon of all sins; for the demerit of no sin can be more than infinite. Secondly, Hence it will follow, that God cannot render unto every man according as his works shall be; because, though they commit innumerable sins, he can only lay upon them the punishment due to one only; because he cannot lay upon them a punishment which is more than infinite.

§. II. Secondly, Others say, That "if wicked men lived for ever in this world, they would sin for ever; and therefore they deserve to be punished for ever." But,

1. Who can be certain of this, since, whilst we live in this world, we are in a state of trial, and so may be in a possibility of repenting and growing better?

2. God hath expressly declared, that men should be judged hereafter, not according to what they would have done, had they lived longer, but according to what they actually have done in this present life, according to their works done in the body: and so he hath sufficiently declared, he doth not punish them for what they would have done, had they lived longer; but for what they actually had done whilst they lived. So that this answer recoils thus; Wicked men, by God's declaration, are only to be punished for what they did whilst they lived here; now they did not live here for ever in a state of sin: therefore they are not to live for ever hereafter in a state of punishment.

§. III. Thirdly, Others say, That "God having set before the sinner life and death; and having so expressly forewarned him, this would be the certain consequence of his iniquity; he cannot charge God with injustice, in allotting to him the portion, which he chose, and would incur, after all admonitions to the contrary."

But though this may be sufficient to stop the sinner's mouth, it will do little to stop the mouth of infidels; because it seemeth not to answer the objection arising from the disproportion between the fault and the punishment: for it renders not the fault less finite, or the punishment less infinite; and so it doth not render it less inconsistent with Divine equity and goodness to threaten so to punish finite crimes, and execute that punishment upon the sinner.

§. 4. A very great and learned person hath attempted a solution to this objection from these considerations:

First, That "the measure of penalties is not to be taken from any strict proportion betwixt crimes and punishments, but from one great end and design of government, which is, to secure the observation of wholesome and necessary laws, and consequently whatever penalties are proper and necessary to this end are not unjust.

Secondly, "That whosoever considers how ineffectual the threatening, even of eternal torments, is to the greatest part of sinners, will soon be satisfied that a less penalty than that of eternal suffering would, to the far greatest part of mankind, have been, in all probability, of little or no force; and that if any thing more terrible could have been threatened to the workers of iniquity, it had not been unreasonable; because it would all have been little enough to deter men effectually from sin." But then he adds, Thirdly, "That after all, he that threateneth hath still the power of execution in his own hands: for there is this remarkable difference betwixt promises and threatenings, that he who promiseth passeth over a right to another, and thereby stands obliged to him, in justice and faithfulness, to make good his promise: but in threatenings it is quite otherwise; he that threatens keeps the right of punishing in his own hand, and is not obliged to execute what he hath threatened, any farther than the reasons and ends of government do require; and that he may, without any injury to the party threatened, remit and abate as much as he pleaseth of the punishment that he hath threatened; and because in so doing he is not worse, but better than his word, nobody can find fault or complain of any wrong or injustice thereby done him.

"Nor is this any impeachment of God's truth and faithfulness any more that it is esteemed among men a piece of falsehood, not to do what they have threatened."

But here, with submission to better judgments, I conceive are many things propounded which are not exactly true, or reach not the objection; since that relates not to God's threats of punishment, but to his execution of the threatened punishment.

And, first, when it is said, that "what proportion ought to be appointed betwixt crimes and penalties, is not so properly a consideration of justice as of prudence in the lawgiver;" and thence inferred, that "whatever the disproportion may be between temporary sins and eternal punishments, justice cannot be said to be concerned in it:"

It is owned, that by the sanctions annexed to his laws, the lawgiver designs the preservation of his laws from being violated; which is an effect of prudence, but still of prudence tempered with equity, not unregardless of it, since it cannot be prudence to threaten what I know I cannot justly execute: for this, in human laws, doth null the penalty; and could it be supposed in Divine, would even frustrate the end of all God's threats, since every body would rest assured that a just God would never execute them.

But, secondly, the execution of the threatened judgment, which is the only thing against which the objection lies, is certainly an act of distributive justice, and is so represented in the holy Scriptures, when it is said to be done according to our works, and according as our works shall be, Rom. ii. 16. 2 Cor. v. 10. Rev. xxii. 12. Matt. xvi. 27. and when it is declared to be δικαιοκρισία, the just judgment of God; and δίκαιον παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ, just with God, to render this vengeance to those who obey not the gospel, which consists in their everlasting destruction; 2 Thess. i. 6. 8, 9. So that though prudence was properly concerned in promulging the penalty, because it is prudence which directs us to choose the means most proper to the end we aim at; yet seeing the primary end of the lawgiver, i. e. the preventing the transgressing of his law, is wholly lost, and entirely defeated, before this punishment comes to be executed, justice alone can be concerned in the execution of it; and if the continuance of the sinner under misery for ever be the execution of the threatened punishment, justice alone can be concerned in the subjection of the sinner to that punishment: so far is it from being true, that if prudence be requisite for the proportioning penalties to crimes, justice cannot be concerned in the disproportion that may be between them, and much less that it cannot be concerned in executing a penalty which bears so great a disproportion to the crime.

I confess also, that in human governments prudence may fitly be called in to deliberate, not whether it be lawful, but whether it be expedient to execute the threatened penalty; as when the government is feeble, and the multitude or power of offenders may render it hazardous to do justice on them; but nothing of this nature can happen in theocracy, where there can neither be a want of wisdom in appointing, or equity in proportionating, the penalty to the offences, and much less want of power to execute what in his equity and wisdom he saw fit to threaten.

Secondly, When it is said, that "a less penalty than eternal sufferings would not have been sufficient to deter men from sin; and therefore it could not be unreasonable, but rather suitable to Divine prudence, to threaten eternal miseries:"

I am not willing to admit that God should threaten what he knows he cannot with consistence to his justice or his goodness execute; this being, in effect, to threaten in this wise, "If you will do to me what you in justice ought not to do, I will execute upon you what I in justice ought not to do to you." It is also to insinuate that an all-wise God could not so well provide for human government, or carry on his great designs, without abusing men's credulity, and scaring them with dreadful expectations of what he never did intend to execute. Lastly, this seemeth even to insinuate, that prudence in God may act without regard to equity and goodness, and even be separated from them; as it must be, in appointing, and even proportionating, those penalties to crimes which it is not consistent with his equity or goodness to inflict.

Thirdly, When it is added, that "God is not obliged to execute what he hath threatened, any farther than the reasons and the ends of government do require;" and that "he may, without any injury to the party threatened, remit and abate as much as he pleaseth of the punishment that he hath threatened, and that without any impeachment of his truth and faithfulness:"

This I allow of, in the case of temporal punishments in this world, designed not for excision, but the amendment of the sinner; because there may be a just ground for the remission of such threatened penalties, even the repentance and reformation of the sinner, by which the primary end of all God's threats, in some good measure, is obtained: and also because these threats, in what expressions soever they are made, if they be only threats, are still conditional; the meaning of them being only this,—I will inflict this judgment if you repent not of your evil ways: For at what instant I shall speak (saith God) against a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, to pull down, and to destroy it; if that nation, against which I have pronounced these things, turn from their evil ways, I will repent me of the evil which I thought to do unto them. (Jer. xviii. 7, 8.) And again, When I say unto the wicked, O wicked man, thou shalt surely die; if he do not turn from his way he shall die in his iniquity. Say therefore to them, As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, but that the wicked turn from his way and live; wherefore, turn yourselves, and live ye. (Ezek. xviii. 32. xxxiii. 8, 9. 11.) Thirdly, Because God threateneth judgments, not that he takes any pleasure in his punishments, but rather to awaken and reform the sinner: when therefore, by his comminations, he hath wrought this good effect upon him, it is not to be wondered that he doth not proceed to execute that judgment which hath already done its work by being threatened. And all this well comports, not only with Divine justice, but also with his immutability and truth, because this reformation and repentance change the subject of the threat; the change in every instance of this nature being not in God, but man. Thus, v. g. we cannot charge God with mutability, because he doth not execute the threatened judgment on repenting Nineveh; because it was impenitent, and not repenting Nineveh, he threatened: nor with injustice, because it was only her impenitence which rendered her the proper object of vindictive justice.

But then this notion seems to be stretched too far, when it is extended to God's threats of future and eternal punishments to be inflicted upon those who die in an impenitent and unreformed estate. For,

First, In all these cases, the evil threatened hath entirely lost its first and salutary end upon them, and therefore must be threatened to such persons to no end, or else to shew the justice of God in punishing these vessels of his wrath thus fitted for destruction. Thus, v. g. when Christ saith, Except ye repent, ye shall all perish; (Luke xiii. 3. 5.) that in the day of wrath, and revelation of his righteous judgment, God will give to every one according to his works; to them that obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath; (Rom. ii. 5—8.) to them that obey not the gospel, everlasting destruction; these threats are plainly made to those who die in their impenitence and disobedience, by that God who will judge every man according to his works; declaring, that in the day of the revelation of his wrath and righteous judgment they shall perish everlastingly; because, through the hardness and impenitency of their hearts, they have treasured up wrath against the day of wrath, and rendered themselves vessels of his wrath fitted for destruction. Can it be reasonably said then, because God does them no injury if he do not execute his wrath upon them, that though they do not repent, they may not perish? that indignation and wrath may not be the portion of the disobedient? and that this righteous Judge may not give to them according to their works? May we not rather say unto them, as doth this very person in another place, * "If thou continuest impenitent, however he may defer the execution of temporal evils, his truth and veracity is concerned to inflict eternal punishments upon thee?"

Secondly, God's threats of everlasting miseries have for their object the impenitent, and therefore do exclude the supposition of any change in them, which may induce God to remit or to abate the threatened judgment: if then this punishment may be remitted to them, either in part or in whole, it must be either by a change in God, or by a secret intention in him not to inflict what he thus threateneth. That there was in God no such secret intention, this learned person thus declares, by saying, † "when God did threaten, he spake what he did really purpose and intend, if something did not intervene to prevent the judgment threatened." And indeed, these threats declaring what the righteous God will do, and what they who are finally impenitent and disobedient shall suffer, such a secret will must plainly be repugnant to his revealed will, and therefore must suppose in God two contrary wills. Moreover, to say that such a secret intention may be in God, notwithstanding these declarations to the contrary, is in great measure to enervate even the primary intention of these threats, viz. the deterring the sinner, by the greatness and duration of them, from a continuance in his sin; for this intention, if it may be in God, it follows, that it may be his will not to inflict what he hath threatened to the sinner: now so much hopes as you give the impenitent sinner, that he may escape eternal punishment, so much encouragement you give him to continue still in his impenitence. Now "the belief of the threatenings of God, in their utmost extent, is of so great moment to a good life, and so great a discouragement to sin (saith this reverend person ‡), that if men were once set free from the fear and belief of this, the most powerful restraint from sin would be taken away."

That this cannot be expected, by reason of any change in God, this excellent person thus declares and evinceth:* "Let but the sinner consider what God is, and his unchangeable nature must needs terrify him; he is a holy God, who therefore hateth all the workers of iniquity; a just God, who will by no means clear the guilty, nor let the sinner go unpunished. He is also omnipotent, and able to execute the vengeance threatened against sinners. And, which gives a sad accent to all this, he that is thus holy, and just, and powerful, continues ever the same; he will never cease to hate iniquity, and to be an implacable enemy to all impenitent sinners.—Let, then, all obstinate sinners hear this, and tremble; you cannot be more obstinately bent to continue in your ways, than God is peremptorily resolved to make you miserable; if you be determined on a sinful course, God is also determined how he will deal with you; that he will not spare, but that his anger and jealousy shall smoke against you; and, that all the curses which are written in this book, shall light upon you. He hath sworn in his wrath, that unbelieving and impenitent sinners shall not enter into his rest; and for the greater assurance of the thing, and that we may not think that there is any condition implied in these threatenings, he hath confirmed them by an oath, that by this immutable sign, in which it is impossible for God to lie, sinners might have strong terrors, and not be able to fly to any hopes of refuge."

Thirdly, Either God may in justice inflict upon the wicked these punishments which he hath threatened, or else it is unjust in God to execute upon them the judgment written; i. e. the punishment which he hath threatened to them in the word of truth. If it be said, it is unjust in God to execute them on the sinner dying in his impenitence, either we cannot be obliged to believe that word in which these threats are contained; or else an obligation must lie upon us to believe that God will act unjustly. If, to avoid this, it be said, these threats do not discover certainly what God will do, but only what the sinner doth deserve to suffer, read them once more, and you will find, that they expressly say of those who shall be at the great day condemned, that they shall go away into eternal punishment, Matt. xxv. 46. that they shall be punished with eternal destruction from the presence of the Lord, 2 Thess. i. 8. and that they shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever, Rev. xiv. 10, 11. xx. 10.

Moreover, when our Saviour argues thus, to induce men to cut off their offending hands, and pluck out their offending eyes; it is better to enter into life halt and maimed, than to be cast into eternal fire, or into hell, where the worm dieth not, and where the fire is not quenched, Matt. xviii. 8, 9. doth he not sufficiently inform us, there is an absolute necessity of doing the one, or suffering the other? When he saith, He that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost, shall never be forgiven in this, or in the world to come, but shall be obnoxious to eternal judgment, Matt. xii. 32. Mark iii. 29. doth he not insinuate, that he who never is forgiven, must be for ever subject to this judgment? It is therefore certain, that our judge hath expressly taught us, not only that the impenitent sinner doth deserve, but that he shall actually suffer, the worm that never dies, the fire that shall not be quenched.

* Sermon on the Truth of God, vol. vi. p. 561.

† Sermon on the Unchangeableness of God, vol. vi. p. 110. Ibid. p. 4.

* Ibid. p. 112—115.

If God in justice may inflict upon the wicked these punishments which he hath threatened, then the objection cannot need this answer; yea, what can move him not to inflict what he, by threatening, hath engaged his truth to do? What, I say, can move him not to do it, but an act of mercy exercised to them, of whom the Scripture saith, They shall have judgment without mercy? James ii. 13. What, but remission of that sin, which, saith the Scripture, shall never be remitted? What, but mercy in the day of wrath and judgment? What, but remission exercised to the impenitent, without any interest in the blood of our redemption? To which imaginations I conceive the Scripture gives but little countenance.

Nor are we to conclude, that the nonexecution of these threats lays no impeachment on God's truth and faithfulness; because it is not esteemed, among men, a piece of falsehood, not to do what they have threatened. For men may reasonably be moved to remit their threatenings; because they oft are made in passion, or may exceed the rules of justice: but these are things not incident to an all-perfect God; or, because the person threatened repents, begs pardon, and returns unto his duty, which the damned cannot be supposed to do.

§. V. It is farther said, in answer to this objection, that "macula peccati est æterna," the stain of them who die in their impenitence will be perpetual; and he that dies thus filthy, will be filthy still: now it seems equitable, that "is qui nunquam desinit esse malus, nunquam desineret esse miser," he who never ceases to be wicked, should never cease to be miserable. Now this, rightly explained, affords a clear and satisfactory answer to the objection; as shewing, that the sinner becomes for ever miserable, not by any positive act of God inflicting everlasting stripes upon him, or loading him perpetually with fresh torments, but wholly from his own sin, which renders him incapable of the enjoyment of a holy God, and so perpetually excluded from his blissful presence; which, to a soul that is immortal, and can never die, must be the source of everlasting torment, and, from the natural workings of its faculties, will necessarily subject it to the worm that never dies.

I own, and really believe, that positive torments, such as the schools call pœna sensus, shall be inflicted on the body; but then I have insinuated my present notion of them to be this:

First, That these positive torments on the body are not to begin until the raising of the body, when Christ shall come in flaming fire, to take vengeance on them who would not obey his gospel; the world that now is, being reserved to be set on fire, for the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men. At which time, I conceive, the righteous shall be snatched up into the air, and be for ever with the Lord, (1 Thess. iv. 17.) and the wicked shall be left to the devouring flames. See for this, the note on 2 Pet. iii. 7.

Secondly, I also do conjecture, that this fire may be called eternal; not that the bodies of the wicked shall be for ever burning in it, and never be consumed by it, since this cannot be done without a constant miracle; but because it shall so entirely consume their bodies, as that they never shall subsist again, but shall perish, and be destroyed for ever by it. In which sense Sodom and Gomorrah were set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. (See the note on Jude, ver. 7.) And if so, this punishment being only temporary, the objection doth not lie against it; God being no more obliged, either in justice or in goodness, to snatch the wicked out of these flames, when they thus kindle on them, than he was to snatch the wicked of the old world out of that deluge, which overwhelmed them. These I call my conjectures, or my private sentiments. But then I add, as certain matter of my faith,

First, That the soul, even from the time of its separation from the body, in its impenitency, shall find itself in such a dismal state, as shall then fill it with perpetual horror, and dreadful expectation of the punishment which God hath threatened to the wicked. And thus it shall be like those devils which believe and tremble, (James ii. 19.) as knowing that there is reserved for them a time of torment. (Matt. viii. 29.)

Secondly, That when the final sentence shall be passed upon the wicked, and they shall be for ever separated from the presence of the Lord, their souls shall be perpetually subject to the height of misery, or to that worm which never dies; and that this misery will be the natural and the perpetual result of such separation.

To explain this, let it be considered,

1. That there is scarce any thing in which the heathen moralists so universally accord, as in this fixed rule, μὴ καθαρὸν καθαροῦ ἐπόπτεσθαι οὐ θεμιτὸν ἦ, that an impure soul can have no commerce with a pure God; and that it is not congruous to his nature to admit such souls into his presence. And this assertion is built upon a sure and incontestable foundation: for seeing God is absolute in holiness, he cannot but retain the greatest hatred to, and abhorrence of, all actions and persons that are unrighteous and impure; and since his nature is immutable, his holiness unchangeable, he must for ever hate, with a most perfect hatred, whatsoever is unholy and impure; and therefore, to suppose an interruption of his hatred of evil-doers, is to imagine he can cease to be a pure and holy God. Consider,

2. That the soul of a wicked man being immortal must abide for ever, if it be not annihilated; and that God neither is obliged to annihilate it, nor hath he any where declared that he will do so.

I say, he is not obliged to annihilate the souls of wicked men, for then it must be so on this account, because he is obliged to put them out of that misery which they have brought upon themselves by their own folly and rebellions; and if so, since this must certainly be an act, not of strict justice, but of grace and favour, God must be bound to shew an act of grace and favour towards men, purely because they have provoked and rebelled against him, i. e. because they have done that which renders them the proper objects of his hatred and his indignation; and be obliged to save men from that misery, which by their stubborn disobedience to all his calls and admonitions, his exhortations, and all the gracious methods his providence had used to preserve them from it, they wilfully have brought upon themselves. Whereas indeed the riches of his goodness being designed to lead men to repentance, or to encourage them in the ways of holiness and piety, hath only for its proper object such as are capable of being made the better by it, it cannot therefore be the goodness and mercy of a God to shew kindness to persons obstinately and incorrigibly wicked; because it cannot be the goodness and mercy of a Being infinitely just and holy. For seeing all the Divine perfections must agree together, that cannot be a Divine perfection, which contradicts any other perfection.

The original of our mistakes in matters of this nature seems to arise from our own imperfection, which naturally leads us to consider of the Divine attributes apart, and as it were in separation from each other, and by so doing, to frame such wide and large notions of the one, as to exclude the other: whereas indeed they ought to be considered as really they are in God himself, i. e. goodness and mercy joined with infinite holiness and justice; and as it is the goodness and mercy of a lawgiver, governor, and righteous judge, which never regularly can be exercised without some prospect of reclaiming, or doing good unto the object of it. And thus it is well consistent with the prayer of David, Be not thou merciful to them that offend of malicious wickedness, Psal. lix. 5.

§. 6. I add, that God hath not declared in Scripture that he will annihilate the souls of wicked men, or that this is the punishment which he designeth to inflict upon them. This is generally said to be the doctrine of the Socinians, though Crellius * expressly says, "animas impiorum Deum post judicium annihilaturum nec Scriptura asserit, nec ratio evincit;" that neither reason doth evince, nor Scripture assert, it will be so. And,

Obj. 1. It is certain that this follows not from any of those places of the Old Testament in which the dead are said to be no more, or not to be: as, v. g. Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more, Psal. civ. 35. Our fathers have sinned, and are not, Lam. v. 7. I have made Esau bare—his seed is spoiled, and he is not, Jer. xlix. 10. see x. 20. xxxv. 15.

For (1.) if any of these places speak of annihilation, they must speak of such a one as was then past already, and so is inconsistent with the future judgment of those persons; because it is not said they shall not be, but they are not; they therefore cannot refer to any future annihilation at the day of judgment.

(2.) Then must the righteous be annihilated as well as the wicked; for of righteous Enoch it is said, He walked before God, and was not, Gen. v. 24. of Joseph, One is not, Gen. xlii. 13. and David prays thus for himself, O spare me a little, that I may recover my strength, before I go hence, and be not, Psal. xxxix. 13. It is therefore evident these places only were intended to import, those persons were not in the land of the living.

Obj. 2. But it is objected, that the wicked after the resurrection shall be punished with the second death: wherefore they cannot in any proper sense be said to live, and to subsist, and to have sense of pain, this being not consistent with a state of death.

Ans. I answer, 1. That this second death cannot consist in the annihilation of the wicked, or in their exemption from all sense of punishment, because it is promised, that he who overcometh shall not be hurt by the second death, (Rev. ii. 11.) whence it is manifest, that they who die this second death, shall be hurt by it; but were it to the wicked, condemned to an eternal separation from God, and from all hopes of happiness, a conclusion of their being, and of all sense of misery, it would be no more hurtful, but highly beneficial to them, as being a conclusion of that life which they must otherwise have spent in endless misery. And therefore even Hierocles represents this as the choice of wicked men, by saying in his commentary on the verses of Pythagoras, p. 164. οὐ βούλεται γὰρ ὁ κακὸς ἀθάνατον εἶναι τὴν αὑτοῦ ψυχὴν, ἵνα μὴ ὑπομένῃ τιμωρούμενος, the wicked man would not have his soul to be immortal, that he might not abide under punishment. Moreover, those very torments which the damned suffer, are declared to be the second death; and wicked men are therefore said to die the second death, because they do endure eternal torments: for the fearful and unbelievers, &c. shall have their part in that lake of fire and brimstone, which is the second death, Rev. xxi. 8. This death then, when it is threatened as the final punishment of the wicked, cannot import a state of non-existence, or insensibility, but only an unhappy miserable state, a separation of the soul from him, who is the fountain of our life and all our comforts; an absolute exclusion from that felicity which only renders life a blessing; and a life of infelicity and misery. To make this still more evident,

Consider, 2. That this is a Jewish phrase used often by and borrowed from the ancient Hebrews, with whom it doth import the punishment of damned persons in the life to come. So, Deut. xxxiii. 6. Let Reuben live, and not die the second death, saith the Targum of Onkelos; i. e. Let him not die the death, which the wicked die in theage to come, saith the Targum of B. Uziel: Let him not die the second death, which the wicked die in the age to come, saith the Jerusalem Targum. Now that the death of the wicked, in the age to come, did really subject them to eternal torments, the Jews still thought, as is apparent not only from the plain testimony of Josephus,* who saith, the pharisees assigned to the wicked εἱργμὸν ἀΐδιον, an eternal prison, in which they were to be tormented, ἀϊδίῳ τιμωρίᾳ,† with eternal punishment; and from Philo,‡ who saith, that some conceive death to be the last of punishments, whereas it scarcely deserveth to be named the beginning of them, seeing the punishment reserved for the wicked person is, ζῆν ἀποθνήσκοντα ἀεὶ καὶ τρόπον τίνα θάνατον ὑπομένειν ἀτέλευτον, to live for ever in a dying state, and suffer such a death as hath no end; but also from the apocryphal books, which say, κλαύσονται ἐν αἰσθήσει ἕως αἰῶνος, they shall feel them, and weep for ever, Judith xvi. 17. So again, Isa. xxii. 14. This sin shall not be forgiven till the second death; that is, saith Kimchi, till the soul dieth in the world to come. And, lv. 5, 6. 15. of the same persons it is said, God will kill them with the second death; and he will deliver them up to the punishment of hell, where the fire burneth all the day.

Obj. 3. It farther is objected, That eternal life is said to be peculiar to the saints in bliss, whereas unto the wicked it is threatened that they shall not see life, John iii. 36.

Ans. To this I answer, that life, in Scripture, when it is mentioned at the end of our faith, and the reward of our obedience, is not intended only to signify our permanence in being, but to assure us of our advancement to a state of happiness, and is equivalent to everlasting life. So to the lawyer asking, What good thing shall I do that I may in- herit eternal life? our Saviour answers, Do this, and thou shalt live, Luke x. 25. 28. So Christ saith, He that eateth me shall live by me, John vi. 57. i. e. he shall live for ever, ver. 58. I came that my sheep might have life, John x. 10. I give unto them life eternal, ver. 28. And that this is the life denied to the wicked, John iii. 36. is evident from the preceding words of the same verse, He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, but he that believeth not the Son shall not see life. This is a phrase so known, and this use of it is so frequent, saith Maimonides, that hence our masters say, The just are styled living in their death, because they then are happy. And that the phrase, not to see life, cannot import the state of nonexistence, or insensibility, is evident, because it is said of them who do not see life, that the wrath of God abideth on them; they therefore must abide under a sense of it.

Obj. 4. Lastly, it is objected, that the wicked are in Scripture said to perish utterly, 2 Pet. ii. 12. and to be punished with everlasting destruction: now these expressions seem to signify a deprivation of all sense and being.

Ans. But nothing is more common, both in Greek and Latin, and in other languages, than to say, when we conceive our future life is likely to be miserable, ὄλλυμι, perii, I am undone, I perish. See the note of Taubman* upon these words of Plautus, Qui per virtutem periit, is non interit.

That only in this moral sense the damned are in Scripture said to perish, viz. by having all their hopes of future happiness destroyed, and being sentenced to those torments, which are exceedingly more heavy than the loss of being, is evident; first, from the Scripture, which informs us, that to cast the soul and body into hell-fire is to destroy them; as is apparent from these two expressions, Fear him who can destroy both soul and body in hell-fire, Matt. x. 28. who after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell, saith St. Luke, xii. 5. that is, into that place where the worm dieth not, and where the fire is not quenched. Moreover, the devils put the question to our Saviour thus, ἦλθες ἀπολέσαι ἡμᾶς, Art thou come to destroy us before the time? Luke iv. 34. and yet that to destroy is only βασανίσαι, to torment them, is evident from the same question recited by St. Matthew thus, Art thou come to torment us before the time? viii. 29. And had the devils thought, that at Christ's coming they might have been reduced into the state of nonexistence, or insensibility, they could have had no reason to dread, or deprecate so vehemently that perdition, which would so long ago have freed them from that horror which they still endure.

Moreover, this opinion is so far from being contained in the holy Scriptures, that it is plainly contrary to many things contained in it: for, (1.) the Scripture plainly intimates, some in the other world shall suffer more, some less; for it shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for Capernaum, Matt. xi. 21. 25. that some shall be beaten with fewer, some with many stripes, Luke xii. 47, 48. some shall receive greater damnation than others, Matt. xxiii. 14. But if annihilation only be the second death, the punishment and perdition threatened to sinners in the other world, they must all suffer equally; because if there be no degrees of annihilation, or not-being, then all will equally not be, or lose their being, and nothing by annihilation can lose more. (2.) It is said of the wicked, that they shall be cast into the place where their worm dieth not; of them that shall not see life, that the wrath of God abideth on them; of them that are cast into utter darkness, that there is weeping and wailing. Now that of the schools is absolutely true, that "non entis nullæ sunt affectiones," that which is not, cannot be in misery; that which abides not, cannot abide under the wrath of God; that which so dieth, as to cease to be, cannot be subject to a worm that dieth not, whatever be the import of that phrase. Consider,

§. 7. Secondly, That we have two passions of the soul, which are still conversant about good present and to come; viz. desire of the good we want, and joy in that which we at present have. When therefore we are in a state in which we cannot possibly enjoy the good we above all things want and naturally desire, we must for ever lie under the torment of dissatisfaction and despair; and when we fall into that state in which we can enjoy no comfortable or real good, we never can have any joy. Again, we have two other passions, which are employed about a present or a future evil, fear that it may befal us, and grief when it hath actually taken hold upon us. It therefore being natural to all men to desire to be freed from an afflictive evil, when they lie under it without all hopes or prospect of any end of, or deliverance from, the worst of evils, they must be swallowed up of grief; and when their guilt hath rendered them still obnoxious to the Divine displeasure, they must be subject to eternal fears. Consider,

Thirdly, That the proper action of the soul is thought, and that whilst she continues, she must be conscious to herself of her own actions; when then the soul hath nothing comfortable to employ its thoughts upon, but an eternal scene of misery, to which her wilful sin and folly have everlastingly confined her, to be the doleful subject of her continual reflections, when she hath nothing to divert her from these rueful thoughts, she must become an endless torment to herself. Now from these three considerations it will demonstrably follow, that the soul, which in this life hath not been purged from the dominion or the guilt of sin, and therefore is excluded from a state of happiness, and from enjoyment of that God in whom its happiness consists, must be for ever miserable.

For, it must be perpetually tormented with the thoughts of its eternal separation from God's blissful presence, and its exclusion from the state of happiness which saints made perfect do enjoy. Now, as a heathen, Plutarch,* puts the question, "Must it not be very sad to be deprived of the hope of everlasting blessings, and to be excluded from the completest happiness?" Were the damned obnoxious to no other punishments besides this loss, even this would beget in them such a worm of conscience, as would perpetually subject them to the worst of miseries: as will be evident, if we consider,

First, That the earnest and impetuous desire, which is in all men, to be happy, is rooted in their very nature, and therefore must continue as long as they retain that nature; and yet it is impossible that this desire should in the least be gratified, when we are once condemned to an eternal separation from the place and object of our happiness, there being no hope that they should ever see his face, who at the coming of their Judge shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord. Now the wise man tells us, that even hope deferred makes the heart sick. (Prov. xiii. 12.) Hope therefore irrecoverably disappointed must create in it an access of torment. A wicked Cain accounted it an insupportable calamity to be excluded from God's gracious presence here on earth; My punishment (saith he) is greater than I am able to bear: for from thy face shall I be hid. (Gen. iv. 13, 14.) How dreadful therefore must that sentence be, which doth eternally exclude us from his blissful presence, and force us to a continual despair of that which we most ardently desire? For as it is one great ingredient of our future happiness, that it is that which can never be lost, so must it be a signal aggravation of our future misery, and loss of happiness, to know it is irreparable.

Secondly, This loss will be enhanced from the great change the other world will make in our condition. The terrors of an awakened and guilty conscience, even in this life, are very grievous; but here we may be able to mitigate the gripings of it by the society of others, or by the pleasures of the world; we may deceive it with false opinions, and flatter it with false hopes and promises of reformation and amendment; but when we are passed hence into another world, our vain imaginations will be all confuted, our hopes of reformation will be at an end, and we shall be eternally deprived of all those enjoyments in which we once placed our happiness, and shall have nothing to divert us from our saddest thoughts: now, what condition can be more deplorable than this, viz. to be deprived of all those comforts in which we placed our former happiness, and find it utterly impossible to purchase the least glimpse of real happiness, or to divert our thoughts from a continual remorse for our irreparable loss?

For, thirdly, the sinner's memory reflecting on this punishment of loss, will create fresh and never-ceasing torments to him. It will torment him to remember what an inestimable blessing he hath lost, in losing the enjoyment of that God, who is the chiefest good, and of that happiness, which passeth understanding; for the greater still we apprehend the good to be, the greater will the trouble we endure be, when we have wholly lost the hopes of its enjoyment. Again, it will add still to the torment of the sinner, to consider that he hath exchanged this exceeding and eternal weight of glory for things of no intrinsic value and duration; that for the pleasures of a moment, which are now turned into sadness, he should forego those pleasures which run at God's right hand for ever; that for a little fading earth, which he soon left behind him, he should deprive himself of an inheritance incorruptible, reserved in the heavens for him. It will also torment him to consider in what a fair capacity he was once placed of being happy; what frequent calls and invitations he hath had to be for ever so; what importunity the God of heaven used to bring him thither; and with what stiffness he resisted all these gracious motions. These, and such-like considerations, will fill the miserable soul with constant matter of most sad reflections. "Now (saith the heathen orator*) suppose a person subject to the extremest miseries which can be incident to soul and body, without all hope of the alleviation of this misery, or expectation of any future good, what can be imagined farther to complete his misery?"

And now to answer the objection, by removing the foundation of it: hence it is easy to demonstrate, that all these evils, which the soul suffers after death, may rather be esteemed the necessary consequents, as Irenæus* hath observed, than positive and formal punishments of sin by an immediate hand of God. For being destitute of all good things, they are (saith Irenæus) in all torment, τοῦ Θεοῦ μὲν προηγητικῶς μὴ κολάζοντος; ἐπακολουθούσης δὲ ἐκείνης τῆς κολάσεως διὰ τὸ ἐστερῆσθαι πάντων τῶν ἀγαθῶν, God not internally tormenting them, but their torment following upon the deprivation of all good; and likewise because the good things proceeding from God are eternal and without end, therefore the want of them is an eternal and endless punishment.† Mercurius Trismegistus saith in like manner, that Ἀσεβὴς ψυχὴ μένει ἐπὶ τῆς ἰδίας οὐσίας ὑφ' ἑαυτῆς κολαζομένη, the soul of the wicked man continues in its proper essence, being tormented from itself. Apollodorus adds, that Ἀδίκων εἶναι τὰ κολαστήρια διὰ τοῦ λογισμοῦ, καὶ τῆς μνήμης τῶν βεβιωμένων τὰς κολάσεις ἔχοντων· The unjust are punished from their own reasonings, and their punishment results from the remembrance of what they had done in this life: and when the remembrance of these things ceaseth, καὶ ἡ κόλασις τῆς ψυχῆς πέπαυται, the punishment of the soul ceaseth. For instance, That souls departed are deprived of the love of God, are objects of his wrath, and are excluded from his presence, happeneth not merely because they are souls separated from the body; for pious souls, after their separation, are entirely exempted from these evils; but this ariseth from the natural purity and holiness of God, which renders it incongruous to him to admit such souls into his presence, and the defilement and impurity which these unhappy souls lie under, and by which they are rendered unable to converse with the God of holiness. The worm of conscience, the desperation, the direful expectations which follow from this sense of loss, and the Divine displeasure, are also the natural results of the soul's separation in an impure and unsanctified condition, and therefore being filthy still. Moreover, it being natural to all men, say the very heathens,‡ "to give good things to them they love, and in whom they delight, and to inflict evil things on those to whom they stand affected contrariwise;" how can it be, but that the soul, thus conscious of those abominable things which the Lord hates, and which most justly have incensed this righteous Judge, should live under most dreadful expectations of his wrath? Now, true is that of the tragedian, Pœnas dat qui expectat, qui autem meruit expectat; he suffers, whose conscience tells him he deserves, and therefore cannot but expect to suffer. Lastly, That he is thus to be eternally a torment to himself, ariseth from the immortality of the soul, which cannot cease to be, without an immediate dissolution from the hand of God; and whilst it doth continue, cannot cease to be desirous of that happiness from which it will for ever be excluded, or cease to be tormented with the thoughts of that stupendous folly which did subject it to this heavy doom.

And now what a poor comfort is it to the sinner, to laugh at what is said touching hell-fire, and a lake of brimstone, as unphilosophical; and say, that these are things improper to torment a spiritual soul, if undeniably it may be subject to the loss of all that is desirable to make it happy, to endless grief, to remediless remorse, and dreadful expectations of the wrath of God, and a perpetual despair of being ever freed from these tormenting evils, which, as the heathen hath observed, are πυρὸς καὶ σιδήρου βεβαιότερα, more violent and insupportable than any punishment by fire and sword: what if the fire, in which the bodies of the wicked are to be tormented, should not be kindled till our Saviour come in flaming fire to take vengeance on them? What comfort will this yield the sinner, if, from the day of its departure from the body, his soul will be obnoxious to this greater misery? What, lastly, if that fire of the damned, in which their bodies are to be tormented, should only be eternal, in that sense in which St. Jude informs us, that Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities round about them, have been set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire; if this amazing torment of the soul, which, in propriety of speech, is only capable of feeling torment, will be eternal, in the highest and most intensive import of that word?

If it be still objected, That it seems not consistent with Divine goodness, to have framed man so, as that he should be miserable from himself; this, at one blow, cuts off both heaven and hell: for it is to find fault with God, and represent him as less good, for making any beings capable of vice and virtue. For all our virtue, in a state of trial, consists in choosing well, when we had freedom, and some temptations to do otherwise; and all our vice, in choosing to do ill, when we had laws directing us to avoid the evil, and to choose the good, and had the highest motive so to do: to say then, a good God could not create a creature capable of vice and virtue, is in effect to say, it is inconsistent with Divine goodness to create such creatures as should be subject unto government; since government supposes laws, and laws must be attended with the sanctions of rewards and punishments. Here then again the mistake lies in separating the Divine goodness from his holiness and justice; whereas justice and holiness are as essential to the notion of a God as goodness: for it is impossible that justice should belong to the idea of God, if it were irreconcilable with the Divine goodness to make such creatures as may deserve well or ill; i.e. to be rewarded or punished. And seeing the holiness of God renders it necessary for him to retain the greatest hatred to, and abhorrence of, incorrigible sinners, if it be inconsistent with Divine goodness to make any creature which may deserve to be the object of his hatred, goodness and holiness cannot both belong to the idea of God.

If, lastly, it still be inquired, why Divine goodness and mercy doth not still leave condemned sinners in a capacity of that repentance and reformation, which might, after a season, fit them for the enjoyment of himself, and thereby put a happy end to all their misery?

I answer, That both the Christians and heathens do accord in this, that these eternal punishments shall only be inflicted,* ἐπὶ τοὺς καταλαμβανομένους ἐν τῇ ἀνιάτῳ κακίᾳ, on those that are incurably wicked: and they who shall hereafter be found thus confirmed in wickedness are by the heathens† given up to torments without end. Yea, Celsus ‡ dogmatically says, that they judge rightly who say, The just shall be happy; οἱ δὲ ἄδικοι πάμπαν αἰωνίοις κακοῖς συνέξονται, but the unjust shall be always subject to eternal evils. And this was the opinion of the heathens as well as of the Christians, and that no man ought ever to depart from it. Now that which haply may render their state incurable may be,

1. That their day of grace is past and turned into a day of wrath; their time of trial and probation is expired, and they are come to the time of retribution. For, as the Christians teach, that a man cannot be truly good and holy without the assistance of the Holy Spirit; so did the heathens § teach, that there was an absolute need of a Divine afflatus, or good assisting genius, to preserve them from sin, and to advance them to a virtuous life. Now, why is it unjust with God to say, his Spirit shall not always strive with them who have so long resisted all his motions, and hardened their hearts against him? whom all the riches of his goodness could not lead to repentance, or preserve from treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath? Either the day of grace must never end, or there must be a time when they that are filthy, will be filthy still.

Moreover, To assert, it is unjust with God, or inconsistent with his goodness, to appoint a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness, and render to men according to their works; as it seems plainly to border on a contradiction in the terms, so it cuts off all future judgment; it being certain, God neither will nor can do what is inconsistent with his goodness to do; and according to this hypothesis, he must never pass the final and decretory sentence upon wicked men.

2. The place and company to which the damned shall be sentenced, seems to render them incapable of growing better; for when they are once given up to the tormentor, and kept in chains of darkness, what expectation can there be they should grow better under this enemy of God and goodness? and yet that this is one ingredient of their future state, is not the sentiment of Jews and Christians only from the holy Scripture, but also of the heathens from the tradition they had received, as is evident both ‖ from their own words, and from their Adrastia, Nemesis, Alastores, their furies, hurtful demons, and their evil geniuses.

3. The alteration of their condition and their state, seems to exclude all place for reformation, and for the exercise of piety and virtue. For the sentence of condemnation and exclusion from God's blissful presence, being passed upon them, they have no hope of being happy, or of escaping the misery to which they are exposed; and so can have no motive to be better, nor can they be in a capacity to love that God from whom they can expect no good. There also seems to be no place for virtue in a future state; no room for temperance, where there is no capacity of enjoying meats or drinks, or any pleasures of the flesh; no place for justice, where there is no meum and tuum; no possibility to kill or maim, or be cruel to another, when none can be defamed to their prejudice, and hurt in their concerns: lastly, no place for charity, where there is either none that can want any thing, or none that can receive advantage by us.

A DISCOURSE

BY WAY OF INQUIRY,

Whether the apostles, in their writings, spake as conceiving the day of judgment might be in their days; and accordingly suited their phrases and exhortations.

I HAVE shewn in the note upon 1 Thess. iv. 15. and in an additional note on 2 Cor. v. 1. 9. that the apostles of our Lord neither did nor could use any expressions importing "that the day of judgment might happen in their days," or in that age in which they lived: but Mr. Whiston, in his excellent essay on the Revelation of St. John, hath very largely endeavoured to prove the contrary; I shall therefore impartially consider what he hath offered for the support of his two corollaries, and shall endeavour to shew the weakness of his arguments, and the pernicious consequences of his assertion, and then shall leave the reader to judge of this important point, and where the fatal mistake lies. Now his first assertion is, that "Our Saviour himself, as man, whilst he was on earth at least, did not know the duration of the days of the Messiah, nor the time of the rise and the duration of antichrist, which was included in it." Now in this proposition I have no concern, and so shall not be long either in answering what he alleges for, or in the confutation of it. I therefore grant that our Saviour, whilst he acted as a prophet, or a revealer of his Father's will, whilst he was here on earth, did not by the revelation of the Spirit know the day or hour of the day of judgment; but I deny that hence it follows, that he did not know the age in which it was to happen, or what great occurrences or previous mutations were to happen before that day. 2. I grant, that he that was the "Lamb slain, was therefore worthy to open the sealed book;" but I deny that hence it follows, that he was not able to know the contents of it before. 3. I grant that to the question of his disciples, Wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom unto Israel? our Saviour answers, It is not for you to know the times and the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power; (Acts i. 6, 7.) but I deny that hence it follows, that he in whom were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, (Colos. ii. 3.) did not know them. When Mr. Whiston proves all or any of these consequences, he will have something to support his corollary; but till this be done, it must pass for an assertion which hath no foundation in the holy Scripture. Let us now see what just ground he had to own, "that this is a strange assertion." And surely it must be exceeding strange to any considering person, that he in whom dwelt the fulness of the Godhead, and in whom were hid all the treasures of wisdom, should be thought ignorant, whether his own kingdom, to which he was advanced, should continue only for a few or for some thousand years; that he should be ignorant of the reign of his own saints a thousand years, and of the time when all the prophecies of the Old Testament, concerning the glorious conversion of the Jews, should happen; that Daniel should so plainly say, that in the time of the fourth monarchy, the God of heaven should set up a kingdom which should never be destroyed, but should consume all other kingdoms, and should last for ever, (ii. 44.) an everlasting kingdom that should not pass away; and yet our great Prophet, who was the wisdom of the Father, and the very king who was to rule over this kingdom for ever, should be so ignorant of the import of these prophecies relating to his own kingdom, as not to know it was to last one quarter of the duration of some of the other kingdoms, but might be, for any thing he knew to the contrary, res unius ætatis, only the business of one age. Lastly, Is it not very strange, that these masters of revelations should be able so punctually to declare to us the very year of the fall of the Roman empire; the time of the rise of the little horn, and the period of his duration; and the true import of the words of that prophet, a time, and times, and half a time; and yet our blessed Lord should be so much an ignoramus as to the true import and extent of that whole prophecy, as to imagine, that it might be fulfilled in the very first century; and that what they knew imports one thousand two hundred and sixty years, he should imagine might only signify three years and a half? And so much for the first corollary.

Secondly, He positively asserts,* Christ's apostles seem to have really imagined, "that the great day of judgment might not be very long deferred beyond the destruction of Jerusalem, which was to be in that age, (A. D. 70.) and accordingly to have suited their phrases and exhortations."

Now against this corollary I argue as before, that either these inspired apostles knew and understood the import and meaning of the prophecy of Daniel, concerning the kingdom to be given to the saints, the fall of the Roman empire, the rise of antichrist; or, the little horn, the time, times, and half a time, of his duration, and the millenium that was to follow; and also of the prophecies of the Old Testament, concerning the blindness of the Jews, and the time of their general conversion; or they did not, but were ignorant of all these things. If they did know these things, it is certain that either they must think that these things were to happen after the day of judgment; or that they could not think that the day of judgment might happen in that age, or while they lived. If they knew not these things, which were spoken for their instruction, by their own prophets, how came these men to be so positive and certain of all these things, of which inspired apostles, led by the Spirit into all truth, should know little or nothing? That the apostles should be ignorant of that exact time of the day of judgment, which Divine wisdom still conceals from all men, and never made the matter either of revelation or prediction, I very heartily believe; but that they should be so ignorant of all the famous epochas, foretold by their own prophets, concerning the state of Christ's church, and their own nation; that they should not know whether the Roman empire was to fall in their own days, or in the fifth century; whether antichrist was to come in their days, or only was to arise after that fall; whether being come he was to continue only three years and a half, or to last one thousand two hundred and sixty years; or whether Daniel's time, times, and half a time, did signify the one or the other period; whether the mystery of the glorious conversion of the Jews, when deliverance should come to them out of Sion, and so all Israel shall be saved; and the new heaven and new earth they expected, according to God's promise, was to be expected in their days, or about one thousand seven hundred years after their decease; whether the kingdom, which was to be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, and the millenium promised, was to begin and end in their days, or to commence and end so long after, according to the time assigned for these epochas by these more knowing men; these, I confess, are things I cannot easily believe.

In particular, who can imagine, that St. Paul should say to the first persons to whom he wrote any epistle,* That the day of judgment should not come till that which letted, i. e. the Roman empire, was taken away, and that then the man of sin was to be revealed, and was only to be consumed by the coming of our Lord to judgment; that he should endeavour to remove their scruple, touching the nearness of his coming, by remembering them, that when he was with them, he told them these things; and yet should tell them the very next year, that this day might happen whilst he was alive? for if indeed he told them truly when these things were to happen, it was impossible that he should tell them the day of judgment might happen in his days or age; but if he told them, that they might expect, that all these things should happen in his days or age; that being, as experience shews, manifestly false, why doth he, by the direction of the Holy Ghost, conclude that discourse thus? Wherefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have received, whether by our word or our epistle, ver. 15. Again, who can think that the same apostle should tell the Christians of this time, that the Spirit had said expressly, that in the latter times some should depart from the faith, giving heed to deceivers, and to doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, 1 Tim. iv. &c. i. e. that he should, as Mr. Mead saith, use these words (the latter times) as a mark to inform them, to whom he wrote, when these things should come to pass; and, as he adds, that the Holy Ghost had marked out these times in Daniel, by the time of the fall of the Roman empire, and the rise and duration of the little horn; and yet that St. Paul himself, in express contradiction to this declaration of the Holy Ghost, should teach that the day of judgment might happen in his time. Could St. Peter arm the believing Jews against the scoffers at the promise, or prediction of the day of judgment, by bidding them remember the words of the holy prophets, Esaias and Daniel (says Mr. Mead†), who prophesied of things not yet come to pass, and yet tell the same persons, that God was then ready to judge the quick and the dead?‡ Could he say dogmatically, in Mr. Whiston's sense, *the end of all things is at hand; and yet soon after tell the same persons, as Mr. Whiston† saith he did, that the day of judgment might, through the long-suffering of God, be prolonged for a thousand years, without any impeachment of his veracity?

And whereas he absolutely denies, "that the apostles, who thus conceived of the day of judgment, and accordingly suited their phrases and exhortations, were herein properly deceived, or that they ever preached or declared, as from God, that the day of judgment was to be in that age; or that they were deceived in any part of their doctrine, or that they preached false doctrine;" I, on the contrary, undertake to prove, that if the places, produced by Mr. Whiston, bear the sense which he hath put upon them, all these things must follow with the clearest evidence. And,

First, I say, That on this supposition they must have preached false doctrine; for if, when St. Paul saith to the believing Jews, Christ hath appeared in the consummation of ages, Heb. ix. 26. this signifies his positive assertion, that he appeared but a little time before the day of judgment, as Mr. Whiston doth interpret his words; if, again, when he says dogmatically, Yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry,‡ he said this of the day of judgment, must he not preach false doctrine, in saying so dogmatically, he would come in a little time, and would not tarry, when in truth he was to tarry nigh two thousand years, and St. Paul knew nothing to the contrary, but he might do so?

Moreover, St. James, Peter, and John, according to this hypothesis, must have taught false doctrine. For doth not James say dogmatically, The coming of the Lord draweth nigh, and the Judge standeth at the door;§ and if he said these things of the day of judgment, must he not speak what experience shews to be notoriously false? When he adds, ver. 5. that God was ready to judge the quick and the dead; if he meant, as Mr. Whiston saith he did, "that he was then ready to begin the fatal judgment," must he not speak the plainest falsehood? When St. John saith as dogmatically, Little children, this is the last hour, and that, by the coming of the many antichrists, who are now upon the stage, you may know this is the last hour,‖ he meant this is the time of the last judgment, did he not manifestly teach false doctrine?

Secondly, They must delude their hearers, and all those Christians to whom they wrote, and all those Christians who were obliged to believe their writings, with false hopes, false motives, and encouragements to the performance of their duty. For instance; when St. Paul exhorts the Romans to awake out of sleep, εἰδότες τὸν καιρὸν, knowing the season, that now is their salvation nearer than when they believed;¶ when he advises them to put off the works of darkness, and to put on the armour of light, because the night was far spent and the day was at hand; here are not only two assertions notoriously false, if, according to Mr. Whiston, these passages relate to the nearness of the day of judgment, but also two motives to Christian duties, both grounded on these false assertions. When he exhorts his Philippians to moderation *because the Lord is at hand, if he meant this of the day of judgment, there is another motive to a Christian duty grounded upon a false assertion. When he exhorts the believing Jews to patient suffering, because after a little while Christ will come, and would not tarry, he again, according to this supposition, endeavours to support them under their afflictions by false hopes. When St. James, v. 8, 9. saith to the same Jews, Be patient: stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. Speak not evil one of another, brethren, that ye be not condemned; behold, the Judge standeth at the door: and when St. Peter saith, The end of all things is at hand, be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer: if all these passages spake of the day of judgment as near at hand, and even at the door, must not all these motives to patience, to forbear evil speaking, to sobriety, to vigilance in prayer, be built upon false grounds? When St. John exhorts them *not to love the world, because the world passeth away, and they knew it was the last hour; if these words relate to the day of judgment, he must build his exhortation upon a manifest falsehood, it being impossible that either he or they should know what was not true.

* 2 Thess. ii. † 2 Pet. iii. 2. ‡ 1 Pet. iv. 5.

* 1 Pet. iv. 7. † P. 134. ‡ Heb. x. 37. § James v. 8, 9.
‖ 1 John ii. 18. iv. 3. ¶ Rom. iii. 11, 12.  Phil. iv. 5.

Moreover, they speak of these things as both known to themselves, and visible to those to whom they write, by certain tokens, as when St. John saith, Now there are many antichrists, by which we know this is the last hour; when St. Paul saith to the Romans, that now is the hour to awake out of sleep, and to the Jews, exhort one another, and this so much the more, ὅσῳ βλέπετε ἐγγίζουσαν τὴν ἡμέραν, as you see the day approaching, Heb. x. 25. Since it is certain they could not know that to be true which by experience we know to be false, or see that day was then near, or approaching, which is not yet come, how impossible is it that these things should relate to their knowledge of the day of judgment?

Lastly, The apostle Paul, discoursing of the desire that the Christians had to be clothed upon with their celestial bodies, saith expressly, 2 Cor. v. 5. He that hath wrought in us this very thing is God, who hath also given us the earnest of his Holy Spirit; and 1 Thess. iv. 15. he speaks thus, This I say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we who are alive shall not prevent them that are asleep. Now if these things relate, as Mr. Whiston thinks they do, to the coming of the day of judgment whilst the apostles were alive, must not the apostle deliver that as a truth taught by the word of Christ, and a desire erected in them by God himself, which experience shews to have been a great mistake, and manifestly false? and sure these things must be sufficient to impair the credit of these apostles in other matters. I therefore heartily wish, that learned, good, and ingenious men would be more careful to avoid those things which do so plainly shock the very foundations of Christianity, and strengthen the hands of those who question the authority of these sacred books.

And having thus vindicated my notes upon these two places, I have done also that which shews my arguments, to prove that the pope and church of Rome could not be the primary subject of St. Paul's discourse in 2 Thess. ii. were not grounded, as Mr. Whiston thinks, on a mistake, but on those solid grounds, which I believe he never will be able to evert, and therefore wisely waved.

* 1 John ii. 16. 18.

But though he was not pleased to consider my arguments, I can assure him, that in the very place I had considered and even answered his, before he produced them; for indeed the excellently good man is so intent upon what he conceiveth to be right, that, as it plainly appears from this, and the discourse on Matt. xxiv. he is not at leisure to consider what is said against him.

He begins with a bare citation of the apostle's words, and then adds,* "This description is so lively and clear, that I look upon it so far from needing any large paraphrase itself, that it serves well for a paraphrase to all the other prophecies hereto relating, viz. the little horn, and the second beast;" where he manifestly begs the question, supposing that it manifestly relates to those other prophecies, one of which was not then in being, and neither of them rightly understood, saith Mr. Whiston, by the apostle; he thinking that the day of judgment might happen in his time, that the fall of the empire might be then, and that the time, times, and half a time, might only signify three years and a half; whereas I verily believe that St. Paul's discourse had no relation at all to them, unless it be by way of accommodation; and desire him to be so merciful to such blind creatures as I am, as to let us see by any good proof that there is any affinity betwixt them, save in this one thing, that the man of sin is to be destroyed with the Spirit, and the beast with the sword of Christ's mouth, but with this difference, that the man of sin, saith Mr. Whiston, is only to be destroyed by his coming at the day of judgment, and the beast above a thousand years before; the millenium of the saints, the conversion of the Jews, the fulness of the gentiles, and the war with the saints, being all to precede the day of judgment.

I know that our revelation-men call the apocalyptical beast, antichrist, but that the Scripture doth, or ever intended so to do, I find no reason to believe, but rather reason to believe the contrary; for,

First, An antichrist, or a false Christ, in the Scripture sense, is one who sets up himself for a true Christ, saying to others, Lo, here is Christ; he is another, who shall come in his own name, and be received by the Jews: (John v. 43.) the antichrists of St. John were such as denied that Jesus was the Christ, 1 John ii. 22. or that Christ was come in the flesh, 1 John iv. 3. 2 John ver. 7.: and that the church of Rome either was St. John's antichrist, or concerned in St. John's description of him, no ancient commentator ever said.

Secondly, The false Christs and antichrists belonged only to the first age of Christianity; the false Christs mentioned by our Lord, Matt. xxiv. 24. and who should come in his name, saying, ἐγώ εἰμι, I am Christ, Mark xiii. 6. Luke xxi. 8. were to come before the destruction of Jerusalem; and, as St. John saith, they had heard that he was to come in the last hour, so, saith he, from his being now in the world, you may know that it is the last hour, 1 John ii. 18. iv. 3. Let then that be granted which no authority affirms, and, therefore none of us can know, that this Epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem: why may not the words of St. John refer to the then present age, and the false Christs among the Jews and Samaritans, since he doth not say that the last hour is near, or is yet to come, but that it was already come, and represents this as a thing known to them by the antichrists that were then in the world? That he cannot be interpreted of the day of judgment, hath been fully manifested; and of any antichrists that were yet to come, of which these come already were the forerunners, he saith not one word; and so there is no reason to imagine that any such thing was intended by him.

Thirdly, The church-history assures us, that Simon Magus, Dositheus, Barchochebas, and others among the Jews, were such as answered these descriptions; but of any antichrist that was to be amongst the Christians of the church of Rome, neither the Scripture nor antiquity for many ages give us any intimation.

He adds, that* "I allow the agreement of this description to the great antichrist mentioned in the Revelation;" whereas indeed I do not allow that any antichrist at all is mentioned in the Revelation, but only say, that in a secondary sense this may be attributed, i. e. accommodated, to him who is commonly called the papal antichrist, and may be signally fulfilled in him, in the destruction of him by the Spirit of Christ's mouth; and this I say, not from any conviction of the thing, but only that I may not wholly differ from my brethren in this matter; giving in my annotations first what I think is the true sense and intendment of the apostle's words, and then the sense which protestants put upon the words, and introducing it thus, Others, who refer this to the church of Rome. I proceed to shew that the arguments brought against my exposition were answered in the exposition.

Arg. 1. "What need of all this solicitude of St. Paul to free himself from the scandal of having affirmed, that the destruction of Jerusalem was at hand, when the greatest part within which our Saviour expressly had asserted that destruction was to come, was already past?

Ans. "St. Paul expressly says, his solicitude was to prevent the trouble of the Thessalonians on the imagination that the day of the Lord ἐνέστηκε, was, or had been instant, for which solicitude he had good reason; for, saith the note there, to conceive that signal day of the destruction of their enemies the Jews, and the deliverance of the Christians, mentioned Joel ii. 31, 32. Mal. iv. 1, 2. come, and find themselves deceived in that conception, might cause great troubles to them, and even shake the steadfastness of their faith." To which add,

Secondly, That the Judaizing Christians, who could hardly think of wrath coming to the uppermost on this once beloved people, might persuade the Thessalonians that the slaughter threatened to them was already executed, by the great desolation made of them in Egypt by Flaccus, in the time of Caius, of which Philo† speaks, and the great slaughter made of them at the same time in Mesopotamia, Babylon, Syria, and Selencia, which, saith Josephus,‡ was φόνος πολλὸς καὶ ὑπόσος οὐκ ἱστορούμενος πρότερον, a greater destruction than ever was before recorded of them.

Arg. 2. "How absurd is it to interpret the παρουσία, or solemn coming of Christ, in the former Epistle, nay in this Epistle, and in the first verse of this very chapter, of his coming to judgment at the last day, and yet in the eighth verse to interpret it of his coming to destroy the Jews only, especially when no example can be shewed, that ever St. Paul uses that word in that acceptation?"

Ans. To this imputation of absurdity the answer is returned (note on ver. 1.) in these words: "The coming of Christ is by the reverend Dr. Hammond referred to Christ's coming to destroy the unbelieving Jews; this is the παρουσία, coming of the Son of man, so often mentioned in our Lord's prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem and of the temple, Matt. xxiv. 3. 27. Luke xvii. 24." This is most certainly the import of this phrase in St. James twice, when he exhorts the brethren to be patient, ἕως τῆς παρουσίας τοῦ Κυρίου, till the coming of the Lord, adding, that this παρουσία, coming, was at hand, v. 7, 8. And to his saying, that "I interpret the first verse of the coming of our Lord to judgment," and therefore do absurdly interpret the eighth verse of his coming to destroy the wicked Jews, I have answered in the note on the eighth, by shewing that the words there are taken from Isaiah xi. 4. and that they necessarily refer to the smiting of the land of Judea, and therefore cannot be referred to Christ's coming to judge all men at the last day; to which I do not find that any good interpreter refers these words.

Arg. 3. "How comes the apostle to inform the Thessalonians, who were almost all gentiles, of the destruction of Jerusalem in Judea at a thousand miles' distance, which was of little more consequence to them than the destruction of any other church or city in a remote country?"

Ans. To the ignorance and mistake on which this argument is wholly founded, he hath had one answer in the note on ver. 1. in which words let it be noted, "That the church of the Thessalonians were partly converts of the Jews and proselytes; for the converts made by St. Paul preaching to them were of the Jews and the devout Greeks, (Acts xvii. 4.) who, in expectation of our Lord's prediction, and their redemption by it drawing nigh, (Luke ii. 28.) might long for the execution of it."

Secondly, Had he mentioned the destruction of the wicked Jews, by the spirit of Christ's mouth, as the apostle doth, there would have been no appearance of any strength in that argument, to which a farther answer is given (note on ver. 5.) in these words: "Of the Jews, and their opposing themselves to the doctrine of Christianity, and the professors of it, the apostle had told them in his First Epistle, ii. 15, 16. and when he was with them, the persecutions that both he and they suffered from them, (Acts xvii. 15, 16.) gave him a just occasion to speak both of their opposition to the gospel, and of the deliverance they shortly might expect from such enraged persecutors, who not only fell severely on the converted Jews throughout all their dispersions, but, as Justin Martyr* assures us, stirred up the heathen governors in all places where Christians were to do the like, and sent chosen men from Jerusalem for that very end." Nor was the slaughter of them in those days of vengeance confined to Judea, but, as I have fully proved from Josephus,† they suffered the like calamities in the remotest places from it. Though therefore the Thessalonians might be less concerned for the destruction of the city or temple of Jerusalem, they might be very much concerned that these men should be disabled from executing any more their rage upon them, or against the church of Christ.

P. 251. † Contr Flac. ‡ Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 12.

* Dial. cum Tryph. p. 234, 235. † Pref. to the Ep. of St. James, §. 5.

Arg. 4. "Lastly, How comes the church of the Thessalonians to be in such a consternation and disturbance, σροεῖσθαι; at the supposal that Jerusalem should be destroyed, since therein none but the unbelieving Jews and the enemies of Christ were to perish?"

Ans. How came you to fall into this imagination? Their trouble, saith the text, being only this, that they conceived the apostle had spoken of the destruction of the wicked and persecuting Jews as instant, whereas by sad experience they found that they lay still as much as ever under such rage and cruel persecution of these men, (1 Thess. ii. 15.) that the apostle was afraid lest these temptations should have rendered his labour vain among them, (iii. 5.)

Secondly, The opinion having obtained among the Jews that the destruction of their temple, and the destruction of the old world, should be contemporary, this might be among the believing Jews a farther reason of their trouble. And this should be more considerable to him who earnestly contends that the apostles spake, in all their Epistles, as men who believed the day of judgment might happen soon after the destruction of Jerusalem.

In the following words he attempts to answer an objection thus: "If it be still wondered at that St. Paul should here say, that the mystery of iniquity doth already work: I say it is not strange, that he that knew that the great man of sin was to corrupt and spoil the purity of the Christian religion, and turn the mystery of godliness into a mystery of iniquity, and who found already the beginnings of such mischiefs creeping into the church, and that in some of the same points which antichrist was to corrupt, looks upon such beginning of antichristianism as preludes and forerunners of that grand corruption to come afterward."

But this evasion is fully confuted, in the note on ver. 7. by this argument: It is highly reasonable to conceive, that "the mystery of iniquity already working should be that very mystery which after was to be completed by the more full appearance of the man of sin, as will be evident from the connexion of the words, Remember ye not, that when I was with you, I told you these things? (viz. who was the man of sin to be revealed, what were the characters of him, and what it was that did at present hinder him from a full revelation of himself, ver. 3, 4.) for the mystery of iniquity is already working, i. e. he is doing that covertly, which, when he is revealed, he will do more openly; only he that hinders (his full appearance) will do so till he be taken away, and then shall this wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord shall destroy with the spirit of his mouth; whence it seems clear, that the man of sin, then covertly working his mystery, and only hindered from appearing openly by something that then letted, must be that man of sin, who after was to be revealed, and then destroyed by the spirit of Christ's mouth. All those interpretations therefore must be false which make the mystery of iniquity to be one person, or one kind of persons, and the man of sin, or antichrist, another, as they must do who make the mystery of iniquity to belong to Simon Magus, the false prophets, or heretics, in being when this Epistle was indited, and the man of sin to be the pope and his clergy." In a word, dolosus versatur in generalibus; till Mr. Whiston can name some false prophets, or false apostles, or corrupters of the gospel, by turning it into a mystery of iniquity, in being when this Epistle was indited, who were not of Jewish extract, or appeared not then amongst them; and in what particulars of that pernicious influence they conspired with the present church of Rome (which neither yet hath been, nor I think can be done to satisfaction), it is evident he hath said nothing which hath the least appearance of an answer to the objection he himself hath started.

A PARALLEL

BETWIXT

The Jewish and the Papal Antichrist, in their apostacy from, and corruption of, the doctrine delivered to them.

HAVING given my conjecture, that the Jewish church, with their rulers, were the antichrist mentioned by St. Paul, I proceed to shew, how their apostacy, when they were thus deserted by God, resembled and ran parallel to the apostacy of the Roman church, when she began in like manner to apostatize from and to corrupt the Christian faith.

And here it cannot be expected, that I should draw the parallel betwixt them, in those doctrines which never were nor could be owned by the unbelieving Jews, viz. in the doctrines of transubstantiation, the adoration of the host, the sacrifice of the mass, communion in one kind, and the number of the Christian sacraments; but yet in most of their other doctrines, it is very easy to discern it.

First, In the doctrine of infallibility, the mother of incorrigible errors.

For, first, As Roman catholics assert the infallibility of councils, which they are pleased to call general councils, and plead for a living and infallible judge of controversies; so the Jews looked upon the judgment of their great Sanhedrin, and the concurring suffrage of their rulers and pharisees, as free from error, and not to be gainsaid by any of the people. Their way of arguing, John vii. 38. seems plainly to insinuate, that they thought themselves the only fit and proper judges of the true sense and meaning of the law; that the people were wholly to be guided by them; and that they who would not submit to their judgment were deceived, and would be accursed for their obstinacy in things in which they neither had, nor could have, any certain knowledge without their guidance and assistance; for thus they speak to those officers whom they had sent to apprehend our Saviour: Are ye also deceived? Have any of the rulers, or of the pharisees, believed on him? But this people which knoweth not the law (and yet will take upon them to dissent from their judgment) are accursed; which is the very language of the church of Rome in her anathemas. They were the supreme judges, and the keepers of oral traditions; and the fear that, when the Sanhedrin was dissolved, these traditions might be lost, produced the Misna, or the second law, commonly called by them, thorah schebal pe, the oral law, or the law given to Moses by word of mouth, as they gather from Exod. xxxiv. 27. They also took upon them to be authentic interpreters of the written law; and that by virtue of these traditions, given, say some of them, to this end. Now this, as the excellent

Mr. Chillingworth* observes, is indeed to make men "apostates from God, and to dethrone him from his dominion over men's consciences, and to set up themselves;" and why else doth our Saviour charge these men with making void the commandments of God, not in one only, but in many cases, by their traditions;† and in opposition to these teachers of traditions, as received from their forefathers, require them to call no man Father upon earth, because one only was their Father in that sense, in which the Jewish doctors claimed that title, even their Father which was in heaven: and that he had great reason to speak thus, we learn from the Jewish canon cited by Dr. Pocock,‡ vota cadere in res mandati, "that vows reach even to things commanded, or take place as well in things commanded by the law, as in things indifferent; and that a man may be so bound by them, as that he cannot, without great sin, do what God had by his law required to be done; so that if he made a vow which laid him upon a necessity to violate God's law, that he might observe it, the vow must stand, and the law be abrogated."

Secondly, The like infallibility they ascribe to the words of their rabbins, wise men, and scribes. Thus R. Isaac Abuhaf§ saith, "that to all things which their rabbins have taught in their homilies, the same faith is to be given as to the law of Moses." In the Talmud‖ they say, that "all their words are the word of the living God;" and that¶ "the righteous nation that keepeth the truth, (mentioned Isa. xxvi. 2.) are they who receive all their wise men have said for undoubted truth, and say Amen to it:" and that when two of them differ in their opinions, neither of them is to be condemned, "ki ellou veellou dibre Elohim chajim," for the words of them both are the words of the living God. That they are†† "to attend more to the words of the scribes than to the words of the law; and that they are more amiable than the words of the prophets; the prophets being obliged to work a miracle, that they might be credited; whereas they were to be believed without a miracle, it being said, Deut. xvii. 10. Thou shalt observe to do according to all that they shall teach thee." (See of this more in Buxtorf's Recensio Operis Talmudici, from p. 221. to 228.) Maimonides‡‡ saith, "If a thousand prophets, who were equal to Elias and Elisha, bring one interpretation; and a thousand and one wise men bring a contrary to it, they must incline to the most; and be obliged rather to act according to the sentence of their wise men, than that of the thousand prophets." In his explication of the thirteenth treatise of the Sanhedrin, he distributes men who interpreted the sayings of their wise men into three ranks: first, those who thought their sayings were figurative and tropological. Secondly, Those who said their words were to be interpreted according to the letter, as thinking, "sapientes in omnibus indubitatæ veritatis in dictis suis,"§§ the wise men were of undoubted truth in all their sayings. Thirdly, those who allude the words of the wise men, judging themselves more wise, and saying, that‖‖ "they were deceived;" these he pronounces fools, and accursed, for saying these things of those great men of whose wisdom they were well assured. Josephus¶¶ says, "that they who were of the sect of the pharisees, ἕπονται τῇ ἡγεμονίᾳ, followed their guidance, and thought it necessary to observe and contend for every thing their guide commanded. The sadducees, saith he, held it a virtue to contend πρὸς τοὺς διδασκάλους σοφίας, against the teachers of wisdom, but they yielded such honour, τοῖς ἡλικίας προήκουσι, to their ancestors, that they durst not be so bold as to gainsay any thing that they had introduced as fit to be observed." Here we have, in express words, the teachers, guides, and fathers mentioned by our Lord, Matt. xxiii. 8, 9. and all of them represented as persons whose doctrines none ought to doubt of, and whose sayings none should gainsay. This then was the authority the Jews of those times lodged in their fathers, teachers, rabbies, their scribes and pharisees, who sat in Moses's chair, and gloried in the name of rabbi, rabbi, Matt. xxiii. 7. And this usurped authority is the very thing our Saviour forbids, as prejudicial to his office, in these words, Matt. xxviii. 8. Be not ye called rabbi, for one is, ὑμῶν ὁ διδάσκαλος, your teacher, even Christ; and ver. 10. Be not ye called καθηγηταί, guides, for one is your guide, even Christ. And therefore it is observable, that though the apostles had an express commission from Christ to teach all nations all that he had commanded, and a promise, that in the execution of this office the Holy Spirit should bring these things to their remembrance, and so were infallible revealers of the mind and the commandments of Christ, which the church of Rome neither doth, nor can pretend to, without falling under St. Paul's anathema for preaching another gospel; yet none of them pretended or ever attempted to be interpreters of the words of Christ, or infallible judges of the true sense of what he had already taught or commanded; which is the thing the Romanists now challenge to themselves, and which the Jewish doctors did pretend to be, with respect to the mind of God, revealed in the Scriptures of the Old Testament. And indeed this claim of the church of Rome to be the infallible judges, interpreters of the laws, doctrines, and commands of Christ, must give them power without control to alter any of the laws of Christ, and under pretence of interpreting to overthrow them, and so to dethrone Christ from his dominion over men's consciences, and instead of Christ, set up themselves: for he that requires that all the interpretations of the laws of Christ should be obeyed as the true mind of Christ, seem they to the understandings of many myriads never so dissonant or discordant from it, requires indeed that his interpretations should be received as Christ's laws, and that all men should obey rather what they think he, than Christ hath taught them; and whosoever is firmly prepared in his mind to believe and obey all such interpretations without judging them, though to his own judgment they seem most unreasonable, whatsoever he may pretend, he makes both the law and the law-maker stales, and obeys only the interpreter; for seeing the true sense of the law is indeed the law, he must be to me the only giver of the law, who alone gives me the true sense of it. Thus, if any person should pretend he would submit to the laws of the king of England, but should resolve to obey them only in that sense, whatsoever it were, which the French king should put upon them, I presume every understanding man would say, that he obeyed only the French king, not the king of England.

session, determines that "besides the written word contained in the canon of the New Testament, there were also oral traditions, concerning both faith and manners, received by the apostles from the mouth of Christ, or dictated to them by the Holy Spirit, and preserved in the church catholic by a continual succession, which therefore they received pari pietatis affectu, with the same pious affection as the holy Scriptures of the New Testament:" in all this they plainly copied from the apostatizing Jewish church. For,

1. As the Romanists plead, that their traditions are of a Divine original, as being derived partly from the mouth of Christ, partly from his inspired apostles; so do the Jews expressly teach, that their "oral law came from the mouth of God,"* and that "God delivered it to Moses on Mount Sinai with the written law, and that he received it by Divine revelation."†

2. As the Romanists say, that their unwritten traditions were preserved, and handed down to this present age, by the "catholic church in a continual succession;" so the Jews say their traditions were "deposited with the whole congregation, the great Sanhedrin, and the high-priest;" and give us the very names of the eminent persons through whose hands their traditions came down to their days. (Voisin Proem. Pug. Fid. a p. 10. ad p. 16.)

3. As the Romanists affirm,‡ that the Scriptures are imperfect and obscure without their traditions, and consequently make their traditions necessary to the expounding of the Scriptures; so also do the Jews say, that the§ "oral law is the foundation of the written law," and that "they cannot come to the knowledge of the Scriptures, unless they insist al dibre, הגל, on the words of their wise men of blessed memory, that the written law cannot be expounded without the oral, that they cannot be established upon the written law without the oral, which is the explication of it, that it is rather the oral than the written law, which is the foundation of all their religion, there being no demonstration to be taken from the written law, שהמושנה, because tradition explains the secret of it." (Cod. Jur. chagiga, t. x. 1.)

4. As the Trent council declares concerning the unwritten traditions, "that they are to be received and reverenced with the same pious affection as the Holy Scriptures;" so must the Jews do in consequence of that opinion, which makes them both to proceed immediately from the same Divine authority, and both derived to them by the same means; for, say they, "as we have received the written word, so have we received the oral law, min haaboth, from the fathers: hence, like good Roman catholics, they are more exceedingly zealous for the traditions of their fathers, than for the law itself, Gal. i. 14. They accuse all that walk not according to the customs of their fathers, as persons who forsook the law of Moses, Acts xxi. 21. and it was esteemed a great crime to do any thing against the custom of their fathers, or the traditions of the elders, Matt. xv. 2. Acts xxviii. 17.

5. As the Jews call them "karaim," scripturists, and "minim," heretics, who reject their oral traditions; so do the Romanists style us heretics and scriptuarii, for rejecting their supposed apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions. (Prateolus Elencho, lib. xvii. cap. 16.) And as the karaim were, saith Manasseh ben Israel,* "exclusi communione Israelitarum," excluded from the communion of Israel; so do the Romanists exclude us from their communion upon the same account.

§. III. Thirdly, As the church of Rome† hath received many apocryphal books as canonical Scripture, pronouncing an anathema on all who deny them so to be; so did her apostatizing sister also receive many such books, as of equal strength and authority with the Scriptures. As,

1. The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan; for their Talmudical doctors declare, that Jonathan received his Targum, or exposition of the prophets, from the mouth of Haggai, Zachary, and Malachi, three prophets, and keepers of the oral traditions belonging to the consistory of Ezra; and so they make them equal to the writings of these three prophets. Moreover, they say, that "if any other person, interpreting any verse of Scripture in the Chaldaic tongue, add any thing to it, he blasphemes; because he may do this contrary to the mind of the author:" but then they add, that Onkelos and Jonathan "did not offend in any of their additions, because they did this always according to the mind of the author." (So Buxtorf, in voce Targum.) Hence Raymundus‡ saith, that this translation of Onkelos, "tantam inter Judæos autoritatem obtinet," is of so great authority among the Jews, that none of them dares presume to contradict it.

And Paulus Burgensis§ saith, that the Chaldaic translation among them "tantæ autoritatis est sicut textus," is of equal authority with the text. (See N. Lyranus, in Isa. cap. viii.) Such,

2. Is their Misna, or fardle of traditions, collected by R. Jehudah Hakkadoh the holy, or R. J. Hannisi the prince, anno Christi 150. which, saith Buxtorf,‖ is publicly received by all the Jews, both in the Holy Land and in Babylon, as an authentic body of their law: hence, as we have shewed before, they call it a "secondary law received from the mouth of God," and prefer it much before the written law, comparing the text only to water,¶ but these traditions to wine: and the school of Elias used to say, "that whosoever learned the traditions of the Misna might be assured he should have eternal life."

3. The Talmud, which contains the explications of their doctors upon the Misna, is of such veneration among them, that they place the Talmud, or Gemara, which by way of eminence they call the Talmud, "among the books given by tradition from the mouth of God;" (see Cartwright's Mellif. lib. iv. cap. 5. p. 30. 70.) saying, that "nothing is superior to the most holy Talmud; and that by reading in the Scriptures they can get little profit, more by reading in the Misna, but by reading in the Talmud most of all:" with many other things of a like nature, collected by Buxtorf, Synag. Jud. cap. 3. Recensio Operis Talmudici, p. 225, 226. et Lex. Talmud. in voce Talmud. p. 2475.

§. IV. Fourthly, As the church of Rome pretends to be the catholic church, out of whose communion there is no salvation, requiring all men to own her faith, and to receive her mark, Rev. xiii. 16. so also did the apostatizing church of the Jews: for when the gospel was first preached, they thought that the salvation promised by it belonged to them alone, and therefore forbade the apostles to preach to the gentiles that they might be saved. (1 Thess. ii. 16.) They also earnestly contended, that unless they who believed in Jesus would be circumcised and keep the law, and so receive the mark of, and become proselytes to, their religion, they could not be saved. (Acts xv. 1. 24.) Even those Christians who were dispersed into other parts by the persecution of their fellow Jews, preached the word only to the Jews of their own language, (Acts xi. 19.) and to the Hellenistic Jews, (ver. 20.) and the rest of them thought it a great sin in Peter to go in to the uncircumcised and converse with them, though this was only done to convert them to the Christian faith, (Acts xi. 3.) and it was matter of great admiration to them, that God should grant repentance to salvation to the gentiles, (ver. 18.) So deeply was this Jewish principle then rooted even in the first converts of that nation to the Christian faith.

§. V. Fifthly, As the church of Rome hath introduced the religious worship of saints and angels; so also did the apostatizing church of the Jews: for they had imbibed the philosophy of the Platonists, who taught,* "that demons were of a middle nature betwixt gods and mortals; that they brought our prayers and offerings to the gods, and their commands to us, and that it was very fit, εὐχαῖς τιμᾷν, to honour them with our prayers upon these accounts:" and that "God had no immediate commerce with men, but all his converse with them was by the mediation of those demons." And suitably to his philosophy we find the angel saying, Tobit xii. 12. 15. that he was one of the seven angels, οἱ προσφέρουσι τὰς προσευχὰς τῶν ἁγίων, who offered up the prayers of the saints, and that when Tobit and Sarah prayed, he brought the memorial of their prayers before the Holy One. And Philo in several places declares, that as the philosophers said of their demons and heroes, so Moses "introduces the angels as messengers of good things from God to his subjects, and carrying back their needs, not that God needs their ministry, but that it is very needful and beneficial for us frail men to have such mediators." (See the full proof of this in the note on Colos. ii. 18.) Accordingly Theodoret on that place saith, "they who were zealous for the law persuaded men, τοὺς ἀγγέλους σέβειν, to worship angels, because the law, say they, was given by them. And this they persuaded men to do out of humility, saying, that the God of all things was invisible, and inaccessible, and incomprehensible, and that it was fit we should procure the Divine favour by the means of the angels." Hence Clemens Alexandrinus † brings in Peter forbidding Christians "to worship God as the Jews did, because, pretending that they only knew God, they indeed did not know him, as worshipping angels and archangels."

In their office for the dead, saith Voisin,‡ "they pray thus, Ye fathers of the world, who sleep in Hebron, open to him the gates of the garden of Eden, and say, Let him come in peace." And again, "Ye angels of peace, come forth to meet him, and unlock for him the gates of the garden of Eden, and say, Let him come in peace." (Theolog. Judaic. lib. i. cap. 1. p. 80, 81.)

§. VI. Sixthly, As the church of Rome gives an inferior kind of veneration to images, and by some nice distinctions eludes the prohibition of the second commandment; so do the apostate Jews, by the same arts, declaring "that he who worships an idol, taking it for God, is guilty, but if not, he is free;" and the gloss there adds, "that if he adore God in it, it is no crime, for his heart is towards God." And again, "if a Jew see a statue, such as useth to be set up for a king, if he adore it not under the notion of an idol, but in honour to the king, it is nothing." And this corrupt nation prevailed upon the Corinthians to eat freely in the idol's temple of their sacrifices, as thinking they did not offend, because they did not own the idol to be God. (See for this Dr. Lightfoot on 1 Cor. viii. 10.)

§. VII. Seventhly, The apostatizing Jews do so plainly symbolize with the Romanists in the doctrine of purgatory and prayers for the dead, that Bellarmine confirms those doctrines from the practice of the Jews recorded in the book of Maccabees, lib. ii. cap. xii. 39. 46. from Tobit iv. 18. and from their other writings, Bellarm. de Purgatorio, lib. ii. cap. 3. §. Hinc etiam, §. Secundus, et cap. 11. §. Tertia ratio.

And indeed the parallel is very clear, for as the papists pray for the souls of the dead, that they may be delivered from the pains of purgatory, and go thence to heaven; so do the Jews in their liturgy pray "for the souls of their friends, and kindred, grandfathers, and grandmothers, that they may be admitted to the rest of the righteous in the garden of Eden." (See Dr. Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 1017, 1018.) As the papists say, those souls they pray for go to purgatory, "in order to their purgation from some defilements they have contracted in this world, and afterward to heaven;" so the Jews say, that "Anima gehennæ igne purgatur, ut pura evadat et candida," the soul is purged with hell-fire, that it might be made pure and white, and then put into the hands of the angel Michael, who offers up the souls of the just. (Voisin Theolog. Jud. lib. i. cap. 1. p. 78.) As the papists give so much money to have so many masses said for the deliverance of souls out of purgatory; so the Jews vow "to give alms, that they may be conveyed into the garden of Eden;" and the priest pronounces a blessing upon him "who hath vowed so many alms for the souls of the dead." (See these prayers and benedictions in Lightf. ibid.) And in relation to this opinion, the son of Sirach seems to say, vii. 33. A gift hath grace in the sight of every man living, and for the dead detain it not.

§. VIII. Eighthly, As the papists hope to be helped, both living and dead, by the merits of the saints, and especially of the martyrs; so the Jews pray, that God would shew kindness to them, "for the sake of all those who are slain and massacred for his sake," and went through fire and water, for the hallowing of his name. (Lightf. ibid.) They thought in the time of the Maccabees, that the death of their good men, or martyrs, might be an expiation for their sin. This being among them a received rule, that σπουδαῖος τοῦ φαύλου λύτρον, *the good man is the redemption of the wicked; and hence Josephus † brings in Eleazer praying thus to God, Be thou gracious to thy nation, being satisfied with the punishment I suffer for them, make my blood an expiation for them, καὶ ἀντὶ ψυχῶν αὐτῶν λάβε τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχὴν, accept my life instead of theirs. Hence have we frequent mention of "merita patrum," the merits of the fathers, in their books, and of the merits of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; from which they did expect great things, even deliverance from hell, saying, that "hell-fire hath no power over the sinners of Israel; because Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, descend thither to fetch them thence." THE

FIRST EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

THAT this Epistle was written after St. Paul's departure from Ephesus to Macedonia, some gather from these words, When I went into Macedonia, I besought thee to abide at Ephesus, i. 3. And that it was written when he was in expectation of returning shortly thither, they conclude from these words; I write to thee, hoping to come unto thee quickly, iii. 14. It therefore, say they, must be writ before he came to Melitus, Acts xx. 17. For then he, sending for the bishops of Ephesus thither, speaks thus to them: And now I know, that all you, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more, ver. 25. For then he must have laid aside all thoughts of returning any more to Ephesus. It therefore must, say they, be written while he was in Macedonia, or thereabouts; and so, A. D. 55. and the first of Nero. So Dr. Lightfoot.

Bishop Pearson grants, that it was written after St. Paul was gone into Macedonia; but then he adds, that it was writ after his enlargement from his bonds at Rome, A. D. 65. That it could not be writ at any time of St. Paul's going to Macedonia, before his journey to Jerusalem, he proves, because before that time St. Paul could not have exhorted him to abide at Ephesus; for the first time he went to Macedonia, by the direction of the Holy Ghost, Acts xvi. 9, 10. he had not seen Ephesus, for he came not thither till a long time after, Acts xix. 1. The second time he came to Macedonia was after the tumult which forced him to leave Ephesus, Acts xx. 1. when he could not exhort him to abide at Ephesus, for he had sent him thence to Macedonia at that very time when that tumult began, Acts xix. 22, 23. This argument, I confess, is not very strong; it being plain, from his First Epistle writ to Corinth, while he was at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xvi. 8. 10, 11. that he expected then his return to him: but then it appears, that Timothy was with him when he went first from Macedonia to Achaia, and at Corinth writ his Epistle to the Romans, xvi. 21. and also when he returned from Achaia to Macedonia, for then he accompanied him from Achaia to Macedonia, and so to Asia, and so he abode not then at Ephesus, Acts xx. 4. Now from thence St. Paul goes to Jerusalem, and from thence bound to Rome, and so he could not after go to Macedonia till he was set at liberty. This therefore, saith he, was done afterward, in the tenth year of Nero, A. D. 65. and soon after he writ this Epistle to him.

And whereas against this it is objected, that in this Epistle he speaks twice of his coming to Ephesus, saying, I write unto thee, hoping to come to thee shortly, iii. 14. and till I come, give thy diligence to reading, iv. 13. whereas before his going up to Jerusalem he had expressly said to them of Ephesus, I know that all you shall see my face no more; whence it is gathered, that this Epistle must be writ before that time.

To this I answer, that St. Paul saith plainly in this Epistle, that he proposed to come to him; but he saith not, that he purposed to come to him to Ephesus. If you reply, that in this Epistle he commands him to stay at Ephesus, and so must be supposed to speak of coming thither to him, i. 3.: this, I confess, is true, according to our version, which adds unto the words, so do: but if you read the words thus, As I exhorted thee to abide (some time) at Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia, (so I did it) that thou mightest admonish some to teach no other doctrine; it will be left uncertain, whether he were at Ephesus at the inditing this Epistle; for then having done the work for which he was bid to stay at Ephesus, he might go on to other places, doing the work of an evangelist, and settling ordinary church-governors, bishops, presbyters, and deacons, where they were wanting, and doing all the other things mentioned in this Epistle, as things to be performed in the church of God. For,

First, It is certain, that when the Second Epistle was writ to Timothy, he was not at Ephesus, as I have there proved, note on iv. 12. He therefore might have been gone thence also at the writing of this Epistle, to settle the affairs of other churches.

Secondly, It is certain, that this First Epistle was writ to him, that in St. Paul's absence he might know how to deport himself in the church of God, especially in reference to the prescriptions here laid down, iii. 15. Now there was little need that he should stay there, to do the great work prescribed in this Epistle, touching bishops and deacons, they being settled among them by St. Paul himself before he left Ephesus; and they being after, in his journey to Jerusalem, summoned to Miletus, and taught how to demean themselves in the respective provinces committed to their trust; it is therefore highly probable, that these directions were given him, in reference to other churches to which this evangelist was to travel, and in some of which he might then be. If this conjecture may take place, the difficulty is fully answered; if not, I must confess myself unable to return any satisfactory answer to it, and so leave the reader to his choice, whether he will follow the opinion of Dr. Lightfoot or Bishop Pearson, in this matter.

But though there be a great difference as to the time of writing this Epistle, the ancient commentators all agree in this, "That St. Timothy* was left at Ephesus, to preserve that church from the endeavours of the Judaizing Christians to introduce circumcision, and the observance of the law, and to amuse them with their Talmudical fables, and with their genealogies from Abraham and the patriarchs." A reverend person saith, "It is evident, the gnostics were now scattered in Asia, and so characterized by the apostle, chap. iv. and vi. and there distinctly specified, under the title of ψευδώνυμος γνῶσις, science falsely so called, ver. 20. they being the men who assumed to themselves the names of gnostics, or knowing men." And it must be confessed, that Theodoret† accords with him in this matter, saying, "That the apostle styles the pretended knowledge of the gnostics, science falsely so called." And St. Chrysostom‡ saith, "Perhaps this was spoken by reason of some who were then called gnostics." And Theophylact§ says, "I think the apostle speaks this concerning some then called gnostics." But yet there lies this strong objection against this exposition of this phrase, or the ascribing of it to the gnostics, that, according to all the accounts we receive from the ancients, these gnostics were not then in being, at least under that name; for whether, with Irenæus, we derive their original from Valentinus,‖ or Carpocrates; or, with Clemens Alexandrinus, from Epiphanes the author of the sect of the Carpocratians; or, as St. Jerome saith, from Basilides;¶ it is evident, and confessed by all these authors, that all these, and even Menander, whom Irenæus sometimes makes the father of the gnostics, were long after the writing of this Epistle. Whereas the Judaizing Christians were, saith Theodoret, μέγα φρονοῦντες ἐπὶ τῇ γνώσει, great boasters of their knowledge of the law; and yet, that their pretended knowledge was false knowledge, we learn from those words of the apostle, that these teachers of the law knew not what they said, or whereof they affirmed; 1 Tim. i. 7. Hence is their doctrine styled ματαιολογία, vain-talking, ver. 6. and here κενοφωνία, empty babbling; as also, 2 Tim. ii. 16. ἄνοια, foolishness, 2 Tim. iii. 9. and they are said to be ματαιολογοὶ, vain talkers, Tit. i. 10. Men puffed up, and knowing nothing, but doating about questions, and strife of words, 1 Tim. vi. 4. (See the note on vi. 20.) So that I can see no objection against that opinion which refers this phrase to those Judaizers whom the apostle elsewhere styleth false apostles and deceitful workers.

See the preface to the Epistle to Titus.

CHAP. I.

1. PAUL, an [1] apostle of Jesus Christ by the [2] commandment (κατ' ἐπιταγὴν, according to the appointment) of God our Saviour, (who called me to this office by his grace, Gal. i. 15.) and (by the appointment of the) Lord Jesus Christ, who is our hope (of glory, Colos. i. 27.)

2. Unto Timothy, [3] my own son in the faith, (do I wish) grace, mercy, and peace, from God our Father and (from) Jesus Christ our Lord.

3. (Declaring, that) as I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia (so I did it to this end), that thou mightest charge some (Judaizers there) that they teach no other doctrine, (than that which is according to godliness, vi. 2.)

4. Neither give heed (or incline) to (Jewish) fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions (or disquisitions into pedigrees), [4] rather than godly edifying, which is in faith: so do.

5. Now (for) the [5] end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned:

6. From which (commandment) some having swerved have turned aside unto vain jangling (vain discourses of Talmudical fables and endless genealogies);

7. [6] Desiring to be teachers of the law; (and yet) understanding neither what they say (of it), nor whereof they affirm (i. e. neither the sense, scope, or true meaning of that law of which they speak, nor having any certainty of the traditions of which they talk so confidently).

8. But (though they are thus ignorant) we know that the law (in itself) is good, [7] if a man use it lawfully; (not as a means of justification, but as a restraint from sin, Gal. iii. 19. and as a schoolmaster to bring him to Christ, the end of the law, Gal. iii. 24. Rom. x. 4.)

9. Knowing this, that [8] the law is not made for a righteous man (to condemn, or work wrath to him, Rom. iv. 15. as failing in the strict observance of it), but for (restraining and condemning) [9] the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers,

10. For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for menstealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine;

11. (That is the doctrine which is) according to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust.

12. And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me, (by the assistance of the Spirit and power of wisdom, who of myself was insufficient for this work, 2 Cor. iii. 5, 6.) [10] for that he accounted me (one that would be) faithful (in the discharge of it), putting me (therefore) into the ministry;

13. (Me, I say,) who was before (this gracious call) a blasphemer (of Christ, Acts xxvi. 11.) and a persecutor (of his servants, Acts viii. 3.) and injurious (to them): but I obtained mercy (from him), because [11] I did it (not against knowledge, for I verily thought I ought to do many things against the name of Jesus, Acts xxvi. 9. but) ignorantly in unbelief.

14. And the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant (in its power to enable me to promote the faith, Rom. xv. 19.) with (through that) [12] faith and love which is in Christ Jesus.

15. This (therefore) is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world [12] to save sinners; of whom [13] I am (the) chief (and so a great example of the truth).

16. Howbeit for this cause (even) I (the chief of sinners) obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might shew forth all long-suffering, for a pattern (of it) to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting.

17. Now to the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

18. This charge (of remaining some time at Ephesus, for the benefit of the churches there, ver. 3.) I commit unto thee, son Timothy, [14] according to the prophecies that went before of thee, that thou (encouraged and excited) by them [15] mightest war a good warfare; (even that of faith, vi. 12. fighting and suffering as a good soldier of Jesus Christ, 2 Tim. ii. 3.)

19. Holding faith, and a good conscience; which (last) some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck:

20. Of whom is Hymeneus (2 Tim. ii. 17.) and Alexander; (2 Tim. iv. 14.) [16] whom I have delivered unto Satan, (for the destruction of the flesh, 1 Cor. v. 5.) that they (by what they suffer) may learn not to blaspheme (or speak evil of the faith).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. ΑΠΟΣΤΟΛΟΣ, An apostle, &c.] Thus he writes to Timothy and Titus, not to assert his apostolical authority to them who doubted not of it, but for their sakes over whom they were to preside, that they might not despise what they did and enjoined by so great authority.

[2] Κατ' ἐπιταγὴν Θεοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν καὶ Κυρίου, &c.] Some construe these words thus, According to the commandment of Jesus Christ, who is God our Saviour; but the words τῆς ἐλπίδος ἡμῶν, our hope, must be construed with the words Jesus Christ: and this sufficiently confutes that version, which, as none of the ancients followed, so it is not supported by the word Saviour added to God, that epithet being twice applied to God the Father in this Epistle, viz. ii. 3. iv. 10. and twice in the Epistle to Titus, viz. i. 3. ii. 10. Moreover, some ancient copies read τοῦ Πατρὸς, of God our Father.

[3] Ver. 2. Γνησίῳ τέκνῳ ἐν πίστει, My own son in the faith.] This phrase compared with 1 Cor. iv. 14, 15. seems plainly to import, that Timothy was converted to the Christian faith by St. Paul; as also he seems to intimate when he saith, he served with him in the gospel, as a son with the father, Phil. ii. 22. and again calls him his beloved Son, 2 Tim. i. 2. Nor find I any thing in Scripture to the contrary; for though it is said that he had learned the Scriptures of the Old Testament from his youth, 2 Tim. iii. 15. yet is that true also of St. Paul, when yet he was no convert to the Christian faith, but a zealous persecutor of it. And though he was a disciple when Paul circumcised him, and took him with him from Lystra, (Acts xvi. 1.) that hinders not but that he might be made so by St. Paul himself.

[4] Ver. 4. Μᾶλλον ἢ οἰκονομίαν Θεοῦ τὴν ἐν πίστει, Rather than godly edifying, which is in faith.] Here first the grammarians note, that comparative particles, and especially this of μᾶλλον, rather, are often in sense negative, as Luke xviii. 14. He went to his house justified, ἢ ἐκεῖνος, rather than the other; i. e. the publican, and not the pharisee; 1 Pet. iii. 17. It is better to suffer for well-doing, than for evil-doing; John iii. 19. Men loved μᾶλλον τὸ σκότος ἢ φῶς, darkness rather than light; 2 Tim. iii. 4. φιλήδονοι μᾶλλον ἢ φιλόθεοι, i. e. lovers of pleasure, and not of God. (See John xii. 43. Heb. xi. 25.) The edification in the faith here mentioned, is styled the edification of God, because it hath God for its object and its end, as tending to the true knowledge and right worship of God; it is efficiently from him (on which account justification by faith is styled the righteousness of God), and tendeth highly to his glory.

[5] Ver. 5. Τὸ τέλος τῆς παραγγελίας, The scope of the commandment.] This some refer to the law, which (saith the apostle) is fulfilled by love, Rom. xiii. 10. but ἀγγελία, 1 John iii. 11. παραγγελία, 1 Thess. iv. 2. and ver. 18. of this chapter, and ἐπαγγελία, being in the Epistles always used of the gospel, and the latter word spoken of it in opposition to the law, which saith the apostle was not ἐξ ἐπαγγελίας, of promise, (Rom. iv. 13. Gal. iii. 18.) I rather think it here refers unto the gospel, or to that dispensation, in which nothing availeth but faith working by love, (Gal. v. 6.) and which requires fervent and unfeigned love out of a pure heart, from all that do obey the truth. (1 Pet. i. 22.)

[6] Ver. 7. Θέλοντες εἶναι νομοδιδάσκαλοι, Desiring to be teachers of the law.] That those persons were not gnostics, but ἐξ Ἰουδαίων, the Jews, is manifest, say the Greek commentators, from these words: for the gnostics were the greatest adversaries of the law and the prophets; and even rejecters of that God who gave the one and inspired the other. Simon Magus taught, that the prophets* received their prophecies only from angels, and that therefore they that believed in him, and his Selene, should not regard them. Saturninus, That Christ came to destroy the God of the Jews;† which God Simon himself denied, saith the Pseud. Ignatius.‡ They taught men not to use the law and the prophets,§ nor to fear their threats. Now they who held and taught these things must be the greatest adversaries to, and not the teachers of, the law.

§ Νόμῳ καὶ προφήταις μὴ χρᾶσθαι. Constit. Apost. lib. vi. cap. 20. Μηδὲφρίττειν τῶν νόμων τὰς ἀπειλάς. Theodoret. Hær. Fab. lib. i. cap. 1.

Hence it follows, first, that the fables and the genealogies, mentioned ver. 4. and the vain janglings, ver. 6. cannot relate to the æones of the gnostics, which seem not then to be hatched; but that the apostle rather here respects, as Theodoret observes, τὴν Ἰουδαϊκὴν ἑρμηνείαν τὴν ὑπ' αὐτῶν καλουμένην δευτέρωσιν, the vain traditions, or Talmudical fables, of the Jews, as the apostle explains himself, when he instructs Titus to teach the Cretians, μὴ προσέχειν Ἰουδαϊκοῖς μύθοις, not to give heed to the Jewish fables of men, who turn from the truth, (i. 14.) especially those traditions and fables they had received of a Messiah ben Joseph that was to suffer, and a Messiah ben David that was to triumph gloriously and abide for ever, (John xii. 34.) if that distinction was so ancient; and of the golden days they were to have at the coming of this Messiah, of which Trypho in his dialogue with Justin speaks, p. 249. B. saying, that their prophets taught them, ἔνδοξον καὶ μέγαν ἀναμένειν—παραλαμβάνοντα τὴν αἰώνιον βασιλείαν, to expect a great and glorious Messiah, who should have an endless kingdom; and, p. 306, 307. of the halcyon days they should enjoy in Jerusalem, rebuilt at his coming. The endless genealogies are, say the fathers, Γενεαλογίας τὰς ἐξ Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Δαβὶδ, their genealogies from Abraham and David, which they were concerned for, that they might know they came from the promised seed; or their title to the privileges belonging to the children of Abraham; or that they might have the preference: for those of the tribe of Judah and of the family of David were held more honourable than those of other tribes. (See Campeg. Vitringa, de Syn. Vit. lib. iii. cap. 71. p. 871.) They were, saith Dr. Lightfoot, the long and intricate pedigrees they stood upon to prove themselves priests and Levites; for, as Josephus* notes, they thought themselves obliged to be very exact in that affair, and therefore had genealogies of them preserved two thousand years. To these we may add the genealogy and pedigree of their traditions, which they derived from Joshua in a long line of succession to their times. That they were genealogies belonging to the Jews, we learn from Tit. iii. 9. where they are joined with strifes about the law.

[7] Ver. 8. Ἐάν τις αὐτῷ νομίμως χρῆται, If a man use it lawfully.] That is, saith Theodoret, ἐάν τις ἀκολουθῇ αὐτοῦ τῷ σκόπῳ, if he complieth with the scope of it, which is to bring him to Christ.

[8] Ver. 9. Δικαίῳ νόμος οὐ κεῖται.] i. e. The law was not made to condemn the just man; for against such there is no law condemning them, (Gal. v. 23.) ἀντίκειται δὲ, but it lies against the lawless, to condemn them.

[9] Ἀνόμοις, &c.] From this enumeration of offenders against the law, we learn that the apostle is here speaking of the moral law contained in the ten commandments; for the sins here mentioned respect them; the ungodly being sinners against the first commandment; the ἁμαρτωλοὶ, sinners (as that word signifies the idolatrous gentiles, Gal. ii. 15.) the transgressors of the second, the perjured persons of the third, the unholy and profane of the fourth, the murderer of fathers and mothers of the fifth, the manslayers of the sixth, the fornicators and defilers of themselves with mankind of the seventh, menstealers of the eighth, liars of the ninth; as also from the following words, If there be any other thing contrary to the sound doctrine of the gospel. Note,

Thirdly, That fornication is here reckoned among sins committed against the law of nature, or the moral law; as it is also Rom. i. 29. and among the manifest works of the flesh, (Gal. v. 19.) yea, among the things for which the wrath of God comes upon the children of disobedience, or unbelief, that is, the heathens, (Eph. v. 5, 6.) for which men are to be excluded from the kingdom of God, (1 Cor. vi. 10. Rev. xxii. 15.) and to be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone; (Rev. xxi. 8.) whence it is to be wondered that this sin should be so generally committed by some, and pleaded for by others, who are called Christians.

[10] Ver. 12. Ὅτι πιστόν με ἡγήσατο, He accounted me faithful.] St. Paul was a vessel of election to bear Christ's name before the gentiles; (Acts ix. 15.) in order thereunto he was by him to be filled with the Holy Ghost, (ver. 17.) and so enabled to perform this work with the power of signs and wonders, and of the Spirit of God. (Rom. xv. 19.) Christ also appeared to him for this very end, προχειρίζεσθαι, to constitute him first, and set him apart, as it were, by laying hands upon him, to make him a minister and witness of what he had seen and heard, (Acts xxvi. 16. xxii. 14, 15.) and accordingly he sent him to the gentiles, (Acts xxvi. 17.) and thus he put him into the ministry. Christ did this because he accounted him one that would be faithful in the discharge of his duty; (1 Cor. iv. 2. vii. 25.) i. e. such a one who, by the consideration of so great a mercy and abundant grace, vouchsafed to one so unworthy, would patiently suffer for, (Acts ix. 16.) and labour more abundantly in propagation of the gospel, when thus assisted by the grace and Spirit of Christ. (1 Cor. xv. 10.) Whence it is observed by the fathers here, that* there was not only something of God, but also something of himself, for which he was chosen to this ministry; and that he so magnifies the grace of God, as not to invalidate man's free-will.

[11] Ver. 13. Ὅτι ἀγνοῶν ἐποίησα ἐν ἀπιστίᾳ, I did it ignorantly;] Being an unbeliever, as he might be by reason of those many prejudices the learned Jews and zealous assertors of their traditions laboured under. For to this St. Peter doth ascribe their crucifixion of our Lord, saying, I know you did it, κατ' ἄγνοιαν, through ignorance, (Acts iii. 17.) and St. Paul saying they did it, τοῦτον ἀγνοήσαντες, not knowing him, (Acts xiii. 27. 1 Cor. ii. 8.) and Christ himself when he prays thus, Father, forgive them, they know not what they do, (Luke xxiii. 34.) giving the same reason of his prayer for their forgiveness, as St. Paul here doth of his own actual forgiveness; so that it is needless to endeavour, as some do, to wrest these words to another sense.

[12] Ver. 14. Μετὰ πίστεως καὶ ἀγάπης, Through faith and love.] Love constraining him to labour more abundantly, (2 Cor. v. 14.) and his strong faith enabling him to do it in the power of signs and wonders, and of the Holy Ghost. (Rom. xv. 19.)

* Τὴν περὶ τὰς ἀναγραφὰς ἐπιμέλειαν. Lib. i. contra App. p. 1036. A. Τεκμήριον δὲ μέγιστον τῆς ἀκριβείας, οἱ γὰρ ἀρχιερεῖς οἱ παρ' ἡμῖν ἀπὸ δισχιλίων ἐτῶν ὑφ' ἁπάντων παῖδες ἐκ πατρὸς εἰσιν ἐν ἀναγραφαῖς. Ibid. D.

* Δείκνυσιν ὅτι δεῖ καὶ παρ' ἡμῶν εἰσενεχθῆναί τινα, οὐ γὰρ ἀκρίτως Θεὸς ἐπιλέγεται τινάς. Œcum. Ὅρα πῶς καὶ τὸ αὐτοῦ πίδησι, καὶ τὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, τὸ πλέον νέμων τῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ προνοίᾳ. τὸ δὲ αὐτοῦ συστέλλων, πλὴν ὅσον μὴ λυμῆνασθαι τῷ αὐτεξουσίῳ—χάριν ἔχω, &c. Τοῦτο τοῦ Θεοῦ, εἶτα πάλιν τὸ αὐτοῦ, ὅτι πιστόν με ἡγήσατο. Chrysostom.

[12] Μετὰ πίστεως, With faith.] Or, " per fidem," through faith, or by faith: so Paul and Barnabas declared what things God had done, μετ' αὐτῶν, by them, Acts xiv. 27. xv. 4. which is, ver. 12. δι' αὐτῶν.

[13] Ver. 15. Ἁμαρτωλοὺς σῶσαι, To save sinners.] Hence divines have well observed, that if man had not sinned Christ had not come into the world.

[14] Εἰμι ἐγώ, I am.] He saith not, I was, but I am; because even when sin is pardoned, we ought to have the prospect of it still before our eyes, to keep us humble and sensible of the grace of God to us.

Ver. 17. Μόνῳ σοφῷ Θεῷ.] Dr. Mills seems very averse from the word σοφῷ, admitting it neither here nor Jude 25. but see it defended in both places, Examen Millii in locum.

[15] Ver. 18. Κατὰ τὰς προαγούσας ἐπὶ σὲ προφητείας, According to the foregoing prophecies concerning thee.] So iv. 14. Neglect not, τὸ χάρισμα, the gift of the Holy Ghost which was given thee, διὰ προφητείας, according to the prophecy. I have shewed (note on 1 Cor. xii. 10.) that among the gifts of prophecy and discerning of spirits, this was one, to foretell and choose out persons meet to do God service in the ministry. Hence St. Paul charges the bishops of Ephesus to feed the flock, over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers, or bishops, Acts xx. 28. And Clemens Romanus saith, the apostles chose bishops and deacons, with full assurance of the Holy Ghost, πρόγνωσιν εἰληφότες τελείαν· (Ep. ad Cor. §. 42. 44.) having a perfect knowledge of them, and making trial of them by the Spirit. So was it in the case of Timothy, say all the Greek scholiasts on the place. St. Chrysostom* saith, he was chosen by prophecy, that is, by the Spirit of God; Theodoret,† that he received imposition of hands, not by man's calling, but by Divine revelation; Œcumenius,‡ that by the revelation of the Spirit, he was both chosen by St. Paul to be a disciple, and was circumcised, and ordained a bishop; and Theophylact affirms the same. Being thus designed and notified by the spirit of prophecy, they were, by prayer and imposition of hands, consecrated to their office. Thus, when the Spirit in the prophets had said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work of the ministry to which I have called them, (Acts xiii. 2—4.) they prayed, and laid their hands upon them, and sent them away; and they are said to be sent forth by the Holy Ghost. And with this imposition of hands they, who had them not before, received χαρίσματα, gifts answerable to their calling. Thus St. Paul charges Timothy to stir up χάρισμα Θεοῦ, the gift of God that was in him, by the laying on of his hands, 2 Tim. i. 6. And Irenæus saith, lib. iv. cap. 33. that the bishops who succeeded the apostles, with their succession into their bishopricks, received a certain χάρισμα of truth, according to the good pleasure of the Father. (See note on 1 Cor. ii. 16. xii. 10.) Vain therefore are they who, pretending to an internal call of the Spirit, which they cannot prove to others, think imposition of hands, and consecration to the work of the ministry, unnecessary to the performance of the ministerial office.

[16] Ἵνα στρατεύῃ τὴν καλὴν στρατείαν, That thou mayest war a good warfare.] i. e. Perform the office of an evangelist well, (2 Tim. iv. 5.) so as to be a good minister of Jesus Christ. (1 Tim. iv. 6.) Thus in the Old Testament, the Levite that entered upon the service of the tabernacle of the congregation, is, in the Hebrew, one that enters into the host, Numb. iv. 3. 23. 30. 35. 39. 43. viii. 24. and goes לצבא צבא, to war the warfare, i. e. to serve the service, saith the Chaldee; and so the following words explain it: and to be superannuated, and so to cease from the work, is, to return from the warfare, viii. 25. Thus also in the New Testament, the Christian minister is a soldier of Jesus Christ, 2 Tim. ii. 3. στρατευόμενος, a warrior, ver. 4. He hath the weapons of his warfare, 2 Cor. x. 4. and ought to have his wages, because no man goeth to warfare at his own charge, 1 Cor. ix. 7.

[17] Ver. 20. Οὓς παρέδωκα τῷ Σατανᾷ, Whom I have delivered to Satan.] I have shewed, (note on 1 Cor. v. 5.) that the ancients say, this phrase signified that some disease was to be inflicted on them by Satan. Thus Theodoret, Chrysostom, and Œcumenius, here say of these men,* that, being separated from the church, they were cruelly chastised by the adversary, falling into diseases and grievous afflictions, and other damages and calamities; and this, in the forementioned place, is argued, from the ends of this delivery to Satan, viz. for the destruction of the flesh; that they might learn not to blaspheme that doctrine which could so severely punish them that did so. Note also, that Hymenæus and Alexander made shipwreck of the faith; not by renouncing Christianity, for what have I to do (saith the apostle) to judge them that are without? (1 Cor. v. 12.) but by maintaining such doctrines as overthrew the faith, i. e. by denying the resurrection of the body, as Hymenæus did. (2 Tim. ii. 18.)

CHAP. II.

1. I EXHORT therefore, (in pursuance of the design of Christ's coming to save sinners, i. 15. and here, ver. 3, 4.) that, first of all (Gr. first, that) [1] supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men;

2. (Particularly) [2] for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we (under their government) may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty.

6. Who gave himself (up to death, as) [4] a ransom [5] for all (men), to be testified in due time, (Gr. for a testimony in due time of God's love to all, Tit. iii. 4.)

7. Whereunto (i. e. for the accomplishment of which will of God) I am ordained (appointed of Christ) a preacher, and an apostle, [6] (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not,) a teacher of the gentiles in faith and verity.

8. I will therefore that men pray every where, lifting up [7] holy hands, [8] without wrath and [9] doubting.

9. In like manner also, (I will) that (Christian) women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with [10] shamefacedness and sobriety; not (setting out themselves) with broidered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array;

12. But (for) [11] I suffer not a woman to teach (publicly), or to usurp the authority over the man, (to whom she was subjected by God's precept, Gen. iii. 16.) but (I command her rather) to be in silence.

13. For Adam was first formed, (and) then Eve, (after him, and out of him, to denote subjection to him; and for him, to shew she was to serve him, 1 Cor. xi. 8.)

14. [12] And Adam was not (immediately) deceived (by the serpent as Eve was), but the woman being deceived was (first) in the transgression.

15. Notwithstanding she (i. e. the female sex) shall be saved in [13] child-bearing (διὰ τεκνογονίας, through childbearing; i. e. they shall go through the sorrow threatened to her sex for that sin with safety), if they continue in faith (i. e. trusting in God) and charity (to others, especially in the like condition,) and holiness (Gr. in sanctification, i. e. in chastity of manners, and freedom from uncleanness), with sobriety (ἐν σωφροσύνῃ, in temperance, or freedom from excess).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. ΔΕΗΣΕΙΣ, προσευχὰς, ἐντεύξεις, Prayers, supplications, intercessions.] Δεήσεις are deprecations for the pardon of sin, and the averting Divine judgments: Προσευχὰς, prayers for the obtaining of all spiritual and temporal blessings; and in this we have the suffrage of the Greek scholiasts and lexicographers: but as for the word ἐντεύξεις, they almost unanimously say, it is a complaint or accusation made to God, against those who deal injuriously with them, and a desire that he would avenge their injuries; to which I cannot think the apostle would so passionately exhort them. Nor is the word capable of this sense, when the apostle saith, iv. 5. The creature is sanctified to us, διὰ ἐντεύξεως, by prayer.

I therefore prefer the other import of the word mentioned in Phavorinus, that it is παράκλησις ὑπό τινος προσαγομένη Θεῷ περὶ σωτηρίας ἑτέρων, an address presented to God for the salvation of others. And by this rule were the devotions of the church continually directed: for, saith the author of the book De Vocatione Gentium,* the devotion of all the priests, and all the faithful, doth so unanimously observe this rule of prayer, that there is no part of the world in which the Christian people do not put up such prayers as these, praying not only for the saints, but for infidels, idolaters, the enemies of the cross, and the persecutors of Christ's members, for Jews, heretics, and schismatics. But then, as these addresses had a particular respect to men in these circumstances, so the other must have respect to men in general; all these addresses being to be made, not only for ourselves, but for all men.

[2] Ver. 2. Ὑπὲρ βασιλέων, &c. For kings, and all that are in authority.] So the Jews prayed, and offered sacrifices for the Persian kings,* and the welfare of their government, Ezra vi. 10. Thus Jeremiah sends to them in their captivity, to pray for the peace of the city, whither God had caused them to be carried captive, xxix. 7. And the Jews in Babylon send to those in Judea, to pray for the life of Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, and for the life of Balthazar his son, that their days may be upon the earth as the days of heaven, Baruch i. 11. When they came under the government of the kings of Egypt, Eleazer, their high-priest, writes to Ptolemy thus:† We continually offer sacrifice for thee, thy sister, thy children, and friends; and the people pray for thy happy success in all things, and for the peaceable state of thy kingdom. And so when they were under the Seleucidæ. And, lastly, when they came under the Roman government,‡ this was their constant practice, till they begun that rebellion, under which their city, country, religion, and nation, were destroyed. This being, saith Josephus, the cause of the war, that the seditious did θυσίαν τοῦ Καίσαρος ἀπορρίπτειν, reject the sacrifice offered for Cæsar, though the priests and nobles earnestly entreated them μὴ παραλείπειν τὸ ὑπὲρ τῶν ἡγεμόνων ἔθος, not to desert the custom concerning their rulers, which always had obtained among them.

And that the Christians, following their examples, thus prayed continually, from the beginning, for their kings,§ we learn from Polycarp,‖ Justin Martyr,¶ Tertullian, St. Cyprian,†† Origen,‡‡ Lactantius,§§ and from all the ancient liturgies. And this it became them to do, that the heathen emperors, finding them thus solicitous for the welfare and prosperity of their government, might permit them quietly and peaceably to enjoy their religion.

[3] Ver. 5. Μεσίτης, Mediator.] That is, saith Suidas, εἰρηνοποιὸς, a peace-maker. This, say the Socinians, is not necessary, that a mediator should appease or reconcile parties at variance; but only, that he should deliver the mind of one to the other, and strike a covenant or league betwixt them, as in the case of Moses, Gal. iii. 9. To this I answer;

First, That though this be not necessarily contained in the signification of the word, yet it is evidently implied in that which is annexed to our Mediator, wherever he is mentioned in the New Testament, viz. here, and in the Epistle to the Hebrews; for he is such a mediator as gave himself a ransom to God for us, ver. 6. and there, he is a mediator of the new covenant of his blood, the covenant made by intervention of his death, εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν, for redemption of the transgressions of the former covenant, ix. 15. viii. 6. xii. 24.

Secondly, This seemeth to have been the Jewish notion, both of a mediator in the general, and of our Mediator, or the Divine Logos, in particular. Thus Philo saith,* That "the Father of all things hath granted to his most ancient Word an excellent gift, viz. that, standing in the confines of both, he should put a difference betwixt the maker and the thing made, as being an intercessor for mortal man to the immortal God, and an ambassador from the king to his subjects; in which gift he rejoiceth, saying, Κἀγὼ εἱστήκειν ἀνὰ μέσον Κυρίου καὶ ὑμῶν, And I stood betwixt God and you, being neither unbegotten as God, οὔτε γενητὸς ὡς ἡμεῖς, nor made as we are, but a middle of the extremes, and a pledge to both; to the Creator, engaging that all mankind shall not corrupt itself, and apostatize, choosing disorder before order; to the creature, that he may have good hope, that the merciful God will not wholly overlook his own work; for I denounce τὰ εἰρηνεῖα, peaceable things to the creature from the God of peace." And speaking of their high-priest, who was a type of Christ, he saith, † "The law will have him raised above human nature, and coming near to the Divine; and, if I may say the truth, a middle betwixt both, that men may atone to God by a mediator, and God may reach forth and distribute his favours to men by a certain minister." And again,‡ "It was necessary, that he, who performs the office of a priest to the Father of a world, should have for his advocate his Son most perfect in virtue, to obtain the pardon of sins, and the participation of the greatest blessings." So that here it is made the office of a mediator, to procure peace to the creature from God, to make atonement to God, and to be an advocate to obtain the pardon of sins; and if Christ our mediator and advocate with the Father was, by virtue of his office, to do this, surely it must be part of his office to appease and reconcile God to us.

[4] Ver. 6. Ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων, A ransom for all;] And, Matt. xx. 28. λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, a ransom in the stead of many. Hence then it is evident beyond contradiction, that our Lord Jesus suffered in our stead. For when the Scripture saith, Οὐ λήψεσθε λύτρα περὶ ψυχῆς παρὰ τοῦ φονεύσαντος, Ye shall admit no satisfaction for the life of a murderer who is worthy of death, Numb. xxxv. 31, 32. but he shall surely be put to death; for, οὐ ἐξιλασθήσεται ἡ γῆ ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵματος, the land cannot be cleansed or expiated from the blood that is shed therein, but by the blood of him that shed it: is not this the plain import of these words,—that no price shall be admitted instead of his life? Again, when Ahab passed this judgment on the disguised prophet, Ἔσται ἡ ψυχή σου ἀντὶ τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ, Thy life shall go for his life whom thou hast let go, 1 Kings xx. 39, 40. and when the prophet thus returns upon him, Thus saith the Lord, Because thou hast let go out of thy hand a man whom I have appointed to utter destruction, καὶ ἔσται ψυχή σου ἀντὶ τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ, therefore thy life shall go for his life: and when Jehu saith to the men appointed to slay the priests of Baal, If any of them escape, he that letteth him go, ἡ ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ ἀντὶ τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ, his life shall be for his life that escapeth of them, 2 Kings x. 24.: do not all these expressions plainly signify, Thou shalt die instead of him? When therefore Christ elsewhere declares, that he would give his flesh for the life of the world; that he gave his life a ransom for many, a ransom for all; must he not signify by these expressions, that he would give up his life to the death, instead of them who had deserved death? which sure he could not do, but he must suffer in their stead. Moreover, by the Jewish law, the first-born of every beast was to die; or, to rescue him from it, the owner was to pay, λύτρον ἀντὶ ψυχῆς, a price to redeem his life, Numb. xviii. 15. and the pushing ox, provided the owner did not pay, τὸ λύτρον τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ, a price or ransom for his life, Exod. xxi. 31. Every Israelite was also to bring in yearly his half-shekel, λύτρον τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ ἐξιλάσασθαι περὶ τῶν ψυχῶν ὑμῶν, to be the ransom of his life, that he die not: (Exod. xxx. 12. 15, 16.) and this money was appointed to buy the daily sacrifice, which was to expiate or make atonement for their lives. Moreover, among the Jews it was a received opinion, that σπουδαῖος τοῦ φαύλου λύτρον, the good man was the redemption of the wicked: (Philo de Sacrif. Cain, p. 118. D.) and hence Josephus* brings in Eleazer praying thus to God, Be thou gracious to thy nation, being satisfied with the punishment I suffer for them: make my blood an expiation for them, καὶ αντὶ ψυχῶν αὐτῶν λάβε τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχὴν, and take my life instead of theirs. (See the note on Matt. xx. 28.) When therefore, in allusion to these things, it is said, Christ gave himself, ἀντίλυτρον, or λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, a ransom for many, can we put any other sense upon these words than this,—that he gave his life instead of ours, to expiate and atone for those lives which we, by sin, had forfeited?

[5] Ὑπὲρ πάντων, For all.] These verses contain several convincing arguments, that God wills the salvation of all men in particular, and that Christ thus died for all. For,

First, The apostle here enjoins us to pray for all men, because God will have all men to be saved. Now it is unquestionably the Christian's duty, and was the constant practice of the church, to pray for all men in particular; and therefore the reason here assigned of this duty must reach to all men in particular.

Secondly, The apostle reasons thus; God will have all men to be saved, because he is the God of all, the common Father, Creator, Governor, and Preserver of all men: now thus he is the God of all men in particular; and so this argument must shew, he would have all men in particular be saved. For, as the apostle argues for God's readiness to justify the gentiles by faith, as freely as the Jews, by asking, Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the gentiles? Rom. iii. 29. and answering, that there is no difference betwixt them, the same God being rich unto all that call upon him, Rom. x. 12.; so may we argue in this case by a like inquiry, Is he the God of a small remnant of the Jews and gentiles only? Is he not the God and Saviour of them all? (iv. 10.)

Thirdly, He would have all men to be saved (saith the apostle); for there is one mediator betwixt God and man, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all. Now if the argument from one God, was, as we have proved, designed to shew he was the God of all men in particular; the argument from this one Mediator must also prove Christ the mediator of all men in particular. Hence he is here emphatically styled the man Christ Jesus; to intimate unto us, that having taken upon him the nature common to us all, to fit him for this office, he must design it for the good of all who were partakers of that nature; for, as he was a man, he surely was endued with the best of human affections, universal charity, which would excite him to promote the welfare of all: as he was a man he was subject to the common law of humanity, which obliges us to endeavour the common benefit of men. (See the note on iv. 10.)

[6] Ver. 7. Ἀλήθειαν λέγω, I speak the truth in Christ.] This oath or vehement affirmation could not be necessary to confirm Timothy in the belief of this matter. But this Epistle being sent to Ephesus, or some other place where there were many Jews, who either denied that salvation was to be preached to the gentiles, or only on the terms of being also circumcised, which this apostle did so stoutly oppose, it might be necessary for their sakes.

[7] Ver. 8. Ὁσίους χεῖρας, Holy hands.] It is certain, that it was the custom of the heathens to wash sometimes their heads, sometimes their whole bodies, but generally their hands, before they came to their temples, to pay their homage to their gods. And to this purpose they had their χερνίβια, or χειρόνιπτρα, basins, or lavers, placed before the temples, which they were to use before they sacrificed; it being thought so great a crime to come to the gods with hands unwashed, illotis manibus libare, that it is * proverbial with them, to signify, by that phrase, those who come irreverently and unprepared to their service, say Diogenianus and St. Gregory; and to come reverently to the gods is, † περιῤῥαινάμενον, ἀπορῥυψάμενον, ἀπονιψάμενον, ὡσιωμένον προσιέναι, to come cleansed and washed; and therefore holy. As for the Jews, the learned Dr. Pocock saith, that this is a law among them, that every one must wash his hands when he arises from his bed, that he may be pure when he offers up his prayers to God, not thinking any man טהור (ὅσιος, Prov. xxii. 11.) pure, till he hath washed his hands. This they were to do, say their rabbins, lest God, seeing his creature defiled, should be angry; and because prayer succeeded to those sacrifices, which were not to be touched by the priest till he had washed his hands. (Exod. xxx. 27, 28.) This they looked upon as a part of sanctification, and therefore pray thus, Blessed be thou, O Lord God, קדשנו אשר, who hast sanctified us by thy precepts, and commandest us to wash our hands. This washing was to signify three things:

First, That the hands should be innocent and pure from all blood and cruelty, injustice and bribery, all filthiness and impurity, before we come to this sacred Majesty, as David saith, I will wash my hands in innocency, and so will I compass thine altar, Psal. xxvi. 6. and Philo, of the Essenes, * that they lifted up pure hands to heaven; that is, hands, καθαραὶ λημμάτων, καὶ ὑπ' οὐδεμίας προφάσεως τῶν εἰς πορισμὸν μιαινόμεναι, pure from gifts, and stained with no unjust gain; and so, saith he, must the person who lays his hand upon his offering be able to say, † Αἱ χεῖρες αὗται οὔτε δῶρον ἐπ' ἀδίκοις ἔλαβον, These hands have received no gift to do injustice, are not polluted with innocent blood; they have maimed, wounded, done violence to no man; they have been employed in no culpable action, but have ministered to all good and profitable things.

Secondly, That our hearts should much more be purified from all lusts and filthiness of spirit, pride, hatred, malice, covetousness, &c. so clean hands and a pure heart, in the Psalmist, go together, Psal. xxiv. 4. He that offers sacrifices (saith Philo ‡) must be καθαρὸς σώματι καὶ ψυχῇ, pure in body from whatsoever defileth that; and in soul from all evil passions and vices: for it is folly to think we may not come to the temple till we have washed the body, and yet may pray and offer sacrifice with a spotted and defiled mind.

Thirdly, That we be purified from all worldly and distracting thoughts, that the mind may be at leisure to attend purely to heavenly things, that we may bring to God, saith Philo, § τὴν ψυχὴν τοῦ τῶν αἰσθήσεων καὶ αἰσθητῶν ὄγκου παντελῶς ἐπικουφισθεῖσαν, a soul eased of all the weight of the senses and sensible objects. These are the things which the apostle here enjoins, when he commands us to lift up holy hands; not that we should wash them with water, which Tertullian ‖ reckons among things vacuæ observationis, of vain observation, superstitious, and rather curious and affected than reasonable devotion, when introduced by some Christians, from the heathen or the Jewish practice, as a preface to prayer.

[8] Χωρὶς ὀργῆς, Without wrath.] As being contrary to that charity and forgiveness, and that sedateness of spirit, we ought to have when we address to God in prayer, and being the forerunner of that cruelty which defiles the hand.

[9] Καὶ διαλογισμοῦ, And doubting.] I find not that the Greek ever bears the sense of doubting, but always imports, in the New Testament, either inward reasonings, or tumultuating thoughts; διαλογισμοὶ πονηροὶ, evil thoughts in the heart, Matt. xv. 19. Mark vii. 21. James ii. 4. διαλογισμοὶ καρδιῶν, the thoughts of men's hearts, Luke ii. 35. ix. 46. διαλογισμοὶ αὐτῶν, their thoughts, Luke v. 22. vi. 8. or their imaginations, Rom. i. 21. Luke xxiv. 38. or contention and disceptation among them, Luke ix. 46. or inward murmurings, Phil. ii. 14. all which are plainly opposite to that peace, concord, and sedateness of spirit we should bring to our devotions, and apt to distract us in them, especially evil imaginations.

The Scripture itself seems to direct us to the prime sense of this word; for what is διαλογισμοὶ, Luke ix. 47. is ἐνθυμήσεις, inward thoughts and reasonings, Matt. ix. 4. and this sense the word will bear in all places where we render it either doubting or disputing. So Phil. ii. 14. Do all things without murmuring, καὶ διαλογισμῶν, and inward reasonings, whether you should continue in the faith or not; or why such commands should be laid upon you; and here, without inward thoughts, or resentments of the injuries done to you. Theodoret here interprets it agreeably to the matter in hand, ἀμφιβολίας χωρὶς, without hesitation, firmly believing thou shalt receive what thou askest: and of this, saith Theophylact, thou mayest be assured, if thou still askest according to his will; if thou askest, μηδὲν ἀνάξιον τοῦ Βασιλέως, nothing unworthy of God, but all things spiritual, and asketh these things without wrath and hesitation, or a mind wavering betwixt hope and fear.

* Vide Erasm. Adag. Chil. 1. Cent. ix. p. 246. † Pol. lib. i. c. sect. 24.

‖ De Orat. cap. 12.

[10] Ver. 9. Μετὰ αἰδοῦς καὶ σωφροσύνης, With shamefacedness, and sobriety, or chastity.] It seems impossible to fix a certain rule for the attire of women of all states and conditions, at all times and in all places; but from what the apostle saith here, and 1 Pet. iii. 3. (see the note there), it seems evident, first, that περιπλοκαὶ τῶν τριχῶν ἑταιρικαὶ, all attire which suspected women used, either to provoke lust in others, or to shew any inclination to it in themselves; and all attire which hath any tendency to any thing of this nature, or to raise a suspicion of it, must be here forbidden, as being contrary to the modesty and chaste behaviour of a godly matron: and, secondly, all attire which, by the richness and costliness of it, shews any pride, or vanity of spirit, or an ambition to excel others: and, thirdly, all great concernment, care, and study to appear in such attire, as if it were indeed our truest ornament, and that which made us truly to excel, and be more honourable than others: this vanity and pride, this esteem of and concern for these things, being not well consistent with sobriety, and much less with the profession of true godliness. And here it is worthy to be noted by the women, first, that this precept ought not to be slighted by them, as of little moment, seeing it is so carefully inculcated by the two chief apostles of the Jew and gentile, St. Peter and St. Paul; and the contrary is represented as a practice opposite to godliness. Secondly, Let them especially mark the character here given of a Christian woman, viz. that she is one who doth not only profess and declare, that she serves and worships God, but also doth ἐπαγγέλλειν, shew forth godliness in her life and conversion. And, thirdly, let the men note hence that of Esthius, That if it be so unbecoming a Christian woman, to be thus concerned in adorning and tricking up her body, it must be much more unbecoming a Christian man to put on such attire, which makes him truly to deserve the name of fop.

[11] Ver. 12. Οὐκ ἐπιτρέπω, &c. I suffer not a woman to teach.] i. e. Publicly, 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35. (See the note there.) They may privately instruct, as Priscilla did Apollos, Acts xviii. 26. and as a believing wife may instruct her unbelieving husband, when he requires a reason of her faith; but then she must not challenge any authority to do this, this being to usurp an authority not due unto her.

[12] Ver. 14. Οὐκ ἠπατήθη, He was not deceived.] i. e. By the serpent, who never attempted him, but was only seduced by the woman: she therefore was both guilty of her own and of her husband's sins.

[13] Ver. 15. Διὰ τῆς τεκνογονίας, In child-bearing.] That is, some say, by bearing the Messiah, the promised seed; but there is no instance that can be produced, where this phrase is used in this sense. Say others, by education of her children; but neither is there any instance of this signification of the word; nor is it fit that her salvation should depend on the faith, and charity, and holiness, of her children, these being things not in her power to produce in them. And, 3. what then shall become of barren women, and those that live and die virgins? To establish therefore the sense given in the text, let it be noted,

First, That this enallage numeri, or change of the number, in words that comprehend all of the same kind, is very common both in the Old and New Testament, and in profane authors: so Gen. xxxiii. 13. Morientur totus grex. Gen. xli. 57. Universa terra venerunt; the whole land came into Egypt: Psal. cxl. Grant not the desires of the wicked, further not his wicked devices, lest they exalt themselves: Prov. ii. 12, 13. The evil man—who leave the paths of uprightness: (see Numb. x. 3. 1 Kings i. 40. 1 Chron. x. 6. Ezra x. 12. Psal. lxviii. 11. Esd. xxv. 3. xxxiv. 10. Mark iii. 7, 8.) and here, v. 4. χῆρα—μανθανέτωσαν, if any widow—let them learn. Note,

Secondly, That the preposition διὰ doth not always signify a means or a condition, but sometimes a term to be passed through; as when it is said, διὰ πολλῶν θλίψεων, Through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God, Acts xiv. 22. He shall be saved διὰ πυρὸς, as one passing through the fire, 1 Cor. iii. 15. Let us behave ourselves as the ministers of God, passing inoffensively, διὰ δόξης καὶ ἀτιμίας, διὰ δυσφημίας καὶ εὐφημίας, through honour and dishonour, through good and evil report, 2 Cor. vi. 8. in which sense we are said ambulare per viam, per plateam. But against the interpretation given in the paraphrase, it is objected, that the following words, If they continue in the faith, &c. cannot be mentioned here as a condition of their safe deliverance in child-bed, since that deliverance is common to the believer and the pagan, the charitable and temperate, and the uncharitable and intemperate, the chaste and the unchaste women.

Ans. Now to this I answer, That this objection seems to be of no force against the sense here given: for though health, riches, a good name, and other temporal blessings, be common to the pagan and believer, to the good and bad, that hinders not but godliness may have the promise of this life; as health, riches, a good name, and other outward blessings, are promised to those that fear God; it being sufficient to make good this promise, that God is pleased sometimes to vouchsafe this safe deliverance from the dangers of child-birth to women, by virtue of their trust in God, their charity to others, especially in the like condition, their temperance, sobriety, and chastity, as to the observation of the matrimonial vow; and that others may sometimes miscarry through the want or neglect of these duties. In a word, seeing it cannot be denied that these things are likely to engage God's providence to be with them in that needful hour, and the neglect of them may provoke him to abandon others, they must be deemed fit matter of a temporal promise.

CHAP. III.

1. [1] THIS is a true saying, If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work (i. e. a work that is honourable in itself, and so requires such dispositions and qualifications in the person who desireth it, as may render him worthy of that honour).

2. A bishop then must be [2] blameless (i. e. free from just ground of blame), the [3] husband of one wife (i. e. not guilty of polygamy, or of divorcing one woman and marrying another, as many of the Jews and Greeks then were), vigilant (in his functions), sober (governing his passions), of good behaviour (in words, in habit, or in aspect), [4] given to hospitality (or the entertainment of strangers), apt to teach (not so much for his eloquence, as for his skill in Divine things, and knowledge of what is fitting to be taught. So Theodoret.)

3. Not given to (much) wine, (ver. 8.) no striker, nor greedy of filthy lucre, but [5] patient; not a brawler (or contentious person), not [6] covetous;

4. One that ruleth well (in) his own house, having his children in (due) subjection, (and behaving himself in it) with all gravity;

5. (For if a man know not how to rule (well in) his own house, how shall he (be able to) take care of the church of God?) (which is a larger family, and so requires greater skill in government;)

6. [7] Not a novice (in religion), lest, being lifted up with pride (ἐκ τῆς προεδρίας, by reason of his high advancement) he fall [8] into the condemnation of the devil.

7. Moreover, he must have a good report of them that are without (i. e. the unbelieving Jew or gentile, with whom he formerly conversed); lest he fall into reproach (from them) and (into) the [9] snare of the devil.

8. Likewise must the deacons be grave, not double-tongued, (not fraudulent and deceitful, Chrysostom: not saying one thing to one, another to another, Theodoret:) not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre (i. e. of lucre gained by sordid and filthy arts);

9. Holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience, (i. e. in a life so pure that conscience may not smite him; for when a good conscience is once put away, the loss of faith will follow, i. 19.)

10. [10] And let these also first be proved (by the examination of the soundness of their faith, and the purity of their former lives); and then let them (be admitted to) use the office of a deacon, being (thus) found blameless.

11. Even so must their [11] wives be (γυναῖκας ὡσαύτως, the women in like manner must be) grave, not slanderers, sober, faithful in all things.

12. Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, (see ver. 2.) ruling their children and their own houses well.

13. For they that have used the office of a deacon well (i. e. according to these rules, do by so doing) purchase to themselves [12] a good degree (or higher office in the church), and great [13] boldness in (preaching) the faith (which is) in Christ Jesus.

14. These things write I (now) unto thee, hoping to come to thee shortly, (and furnish thee with other instructions, iv. 13.)

15. [14] But if I tarry long (they will be the more needful), that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, [15] the pillar and ground of the truth.

16. And without controversy (or, confessedly) great is the mystery of godliness: (consisting in these articles,) [16] God was manifest in the flesh, justified in (or by) the Spirit, seen of angels, preached to the gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1.] NOTE, concerning the import of the word bishop here, I find three different opinions among the ancients; viz. that of Theodoret, that the apostle here calls the presbyter bishop,* which he thus proves; because after the rules prescribed concerning bishops, he descends to those concerning deacons, omitting presbyters; Because (saith he) anciently the same persons were styled presbyters and bishops, the name apostles being then given to them who are now called bishops; but in process of time, they left the name of apostles to them who were apostles indeed, and gave this name of bishop peculiarly to them who anciently were styled apostles. And though (saith he) these rules are given to the presbyters by name, it is clear that they more eminently belonged to bishops, ἅτε δὴ καὶ μείζονος μεταλαχόντας τιμῆς, as being of a higher dignity. And this opinion, if true, is a full confutation of the presbyterian hypothesis; for it declares, that there were three distinct orders from the beginning of the church, apostles or bishops, presbyters, and deacons; and that the bishops were of a higher dignity than the presbyters.

Secondly, The second opinion is that of Epiphanius, that† the apostles could not order all things at one time, there being then a necessity of presbyters and deacons, by both which ecclesiastical matters were to be administered; they placed no bishops there, where they found no persons worthy of that office; in other places, where they found persons worthy of it, but by reason of the paucity of converts found scarce any fit to be presbyters, they constituted only bishops and deacons. And this account (saith he) is taken, βαθυτάταις ἱστορίαις, from the most ancient histories of the church; I suppose from the known passage of Clemens Romanus to this effect. And this also yields a full confutation of the presbyterian hypothesis; for it declares, that it was the design of the apostles to institute three several orders in the church, viz. bishops, presbyters, and deacons; and where this was not done, it was only through want of persons fit to complete these orders, and only during that defect; and this being writ in answer to Aerius's heresy, that a bishop differed not from a presbyter, they being both one order, dignity, and honour,‡ shews that opinion was then counted not only false and novel, but heretical.

Thirdly, The third opinion is that of Chrysostom,§ Œcumenius,‖ and Hilary the deacon, on the place,¶ that the apostle includes presbyters under the name of bishops, because there is no great difference between them, they being appointed, as well as bishops, to teach, and to preside over the church; and being only inferior to the bishops, as to the power of ordination, which belongs alone to bishops, and not to presbyters. Now even according to this opinion, the bishop is above the presbyter, and all ordinations which are not performed by the bishop are irregular, and performed by them who have no power to ordain.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἀνεπίληπτος, Blameless.] For the life of a bishop (saith Chrysostom) should shine so bright, and be so free from spot, that others may not only behold it, but live by his example.

[3] Μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἄνδρα, The husband of one wife.] For the Jews and Greeks (saith Theodoret*) were wont to be married to two or three wives together. The apostle, therefore, doth not say this to depreciate second marriages, which he elsewhere allows, (1 Cor. vii. 8. 39.) and from which it may not be in a man's power to abstain: If then a man, τὴν προτέραν ἐκβαλὼν, ἑτέρᾳ συνεζύγη, rejecting his former wife, be joined to another, he deserveth blame; but if death have disjoined him from his former, and nature, urging, doth necessitate him to take another, it is otherwise. Considering these and other things, I approve of this interpretation of some of the ancients, which is also mentioned by St. Jerome,† and by Chrysostom, declaring, that the apostle doth not here oblige the bishop to be married, but only corrects the immoderateness of some; because, among the Jews, it was lawful both to marry twice, καὶ δύο ἔχειν κατὰ ταυτὸν γυναῖκας, and to have two wives together; and it was more common with them to divorce one, and take another. And whereas against this interpretation it is objected, that the apostle requires also, that the widow should be the wife of one husband; whereas it never was permitted, among any but barbarians, for women to have more than one husband at once; this objection hath some strength against the interpreting that passage of polygamy, but none against that interpretation which relates to marriage after dismission of the former husband; the law allowing this in Greece, and the practice having made it common among the Romans, and not unusual among the Jews. (See note on v. 9.) Origen‡ seems plainly to insinuate, that this law, in the strict sense, seems harsh and unreasonable, since he that hath a wife might lose her in his youth, and so have need of a second; and this law allowed the bishop to enjoy his first wife even to old age, ἐσθ' ὅτε μηδὲ γυμναζόμενον εἰς ἁγνείαν, καὶ σωφρασύνην, though he never exercised himself to chastity and continence: and therefore he thinks fit to interpret these words by analogy to the bill of divorce, plainly declaring against the church of Rome, that neither bishop, priest, nor deacon, of whom there he speaks, were either by Scripture, or the laws of the church, restrained from cohabiting with their wives, after their promotion to those orders. See the confirmation of our exposition in Suicerus, vocibus διγαμία and δίγαμος.

[4] Φιλόξενον, Given to hospitality.] Not in our common sense, of keeping a good table, or an open house, for all comers; but, τοὺς ὑποδημοῦντας ὑποδεχόμενον, an entertainer of strangers, as the fathers say, and the word φιλόξενος signifies.

Ver. 3. Μὴ αἰσχροκερδῆ.] These words, saith Dr. Mills, crept into the text from Tit. i. 7. whereas they are found in Chrysostom, and Œcumenius, Cod. Alex. and St. Basil, tom. ii. p. 416, 417. and are fully confirmed from the words following, διακόνους ὡσαύτως μὴ αἰσχροκερδεῖς; and from Tit. i. 7. where St. Paul treats of the same subject.

[5] Ἐπιεικῆ, Patient, or gentle;] i. e. Saith Theodoret, in reference to offences committed against himself; for it is no part of meekness or patience, when others are injured, to overlook the injury.

[6] Ἀφιλάργυρον, Nor covetous, or a lover of money.] Theodoret here notes, that the apostle doth not say he must be ἀκτήμονα, one who possesseth none; for a man may possess these things, and yet distribute them as he ought, so as not to be a slave to them, but a lord over them.

[7] Ver. 6. Μὴ νεόφυτον, Not a novice.] This, say Chrysostom and Theodoret, is not spoken with respect to age; for Timothy himself, to whom he writes, was a youth, (iv. 12.) but in respect to his knowledge of the faith.

[8] Εἰς κρῖμα τοῦ διαβόλου.] That the devil fell by pride, Theodoret here notes: but yet both he and Chrysostom say, that by condemnation here the apostle means not his sin, but his punishment for it.

[9] Ver. 7. Καὶ παγίδα διαβόλου, And the snare of the devil.] i. e. Saith Theodoret, lest, being tempted by Satan, he relapse into his former sins; or, lest, being reproached by those he is set over, for his former life, Satan tempt him to apostacy, v. 15.

[10] Ver. 10. Καὶ οὗτοι δοκιμαζέσθωσαν πρῶτον, And let these be first proved.] These words καὶ οὗτοι shew, that this trial belonged also to the higher orders; and so it seems to have been from the beginning, where the Holy Ghost did not immediately interpose in designation of the person. The emperor Severus takes notice of it,* as of a practice observed both by the Jews and Christians, in order to the ordination of their priests, and fit to be imitated in choosing a rector, or procurator of the provinces subject to the Roman government. The epistles of St. Cyprian† make frequent mention of this practice observed in the church, in imitation of the Jews. This (saith he) was observed in the acts of the apostles; in the ordination both of bishops, priests, and deacons: and therefore this (saith he) is derived from a Divine and apostolical tradition, observed almost throughout all pro- vinces, that the bishops of that province where the bishop is to be placed, should come thither and choose the bishop, the people being present who were acquainted with his life and conversation.

[12] Ver. 13. Βαθμὸν καλὸν, A good degree.] It being the custom to choose presbyters out of the deacons, and bishops out of the best presbyters; and therefore, at his ordination, they prayed, that he, using the office of a deacon unblameably, might * μείζονος ἀξιωθῆναι βαθμοῦ, be held worthy of a higher degree.

[13] Παῤῥησίαν, Boldness, or freedom.] The deacons sometimes preached and converted men to the faith, as St. Stephen and Philip; and this they could more freely and more successfully perform, when they lived suitably to the qualifications of their function, and to the rules of the gospel they professed and taught.

[14] Ver. 15. Ἐὰν δὲ βραδύνω, But if I tarry long.] Here Theodoret well notes, that neither the holy prophets, nor apostles, knew all things, the grace of the Spirit dictating to them only the things which were expedient; as appears from these expressions, hoping to come shortly, and, but if I tarry.

[15] Στύλος καὶ ἑδραίωμα τῆς ἀληθείας, The pillar and the ground of truth.] Here, say the Romanists, the church is styled the pillar and the ground of truth, surely from her teachers being so; they being elsewhere styled pillars, Gal. ii. 9. and foundations, Eph. ii. 20. Now, say they, may not all securely rely in their faith on the pillar of truth? May they not securely ground their faith upon the ground of truth? The church therefore being the pillar and the ground of truth, we may, without fear of ever erring, rely upon her.

Ans. 1. Whereas the objection represents it as certain, that the church is here styled the pillar and the ground of truth, in respect of its teachers, the text seems clearly to intimate the contrary: for whether we supply the sense of the words thus, πῶς δεῖ (σε), how thou oughtest; or, with Theophylact, πῶς δεῖ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον, how a bishop ought to behave himself in the house of God, which is the church, it is evident, that the church,† here mentioned, is put in opposition to the bishop of it, and is, according to Theodoret on the place, σύλλογος τῶν πιστευόντων, the collection of believers; and therefore not the church representative, which is only σύλλογος τῶν ἐπισκόπων, an assembly of bishops, according to the doctrine of the church of Rome; and therefore the infallibility of the church representative can never be concluded from these words, which so expressly do relate to the whole system of believers, in distinction from their bishops.

Ans. 2. The church here is the church of the living God; not as it comprehends the major part of her visible members, but only as it comprehends the true and living members of Christ's body, they being only the church of the living God; so that we must first know who they are, before we can be guided by them. Now, because this is impossible to be known with any assurance, it is impossible that we should be obliged to rely on their judgment in deciding what is truth.

Ans. 3. There is nothing more common, in the language of the writers of the church, than to style any eminent father of the church or assertor of her faith, the pillar and the ground of faith. This title is by St. Basil* given to Musonius bishop of Cæsarea, to Athanasius, and to the orthodox bishops banished for the truth; by Nazianzen,† to Basil, to Athanasius, and to Eusebius bishop of Samosata; by Lanfranc and Rupertus Tuitiensis, it is given to St. Austin; and yet sure they were far from thinking, that any of these single fathers were infallible. Whence it must follow, that, according to the judgment of the church, this phrase did not import infallibility.

Ans. 4. The church cannot here be styled the pillar and the ground of truth, as being the foundation on which truth is built, and which giveth it authority; truth being, saith St. Chrysostom,‡ τῆς ἐκκλησίας καὶ στύλος καὶ ἑδραίωμα, the pillar and the ground of the church, which is, saith the apostle, built on the foundation of the apostles and the prophets, Eph. ii. 19, 20. She therefore is the church of Christ, because she holds the truth; as is demonstrative from this, that purely ceasing to do so, her members cease to be the members of the church: she therefore cannot, by me, be known to be the church, until I know she holds the truth, and doth not cease to make profession of it: and when I first know this, what need have I of her infallible direction to find out the truth? She therefore may be rather said to be the pillar and the ground of truth, because it is essential to her being, to maintain and teach all necessary truths; and because her living members do and will maintain them, when concealed, denied, or misrepresented by hypocritical professors; and because she doth preserve and own those oracles in which the saving truth of Christ is fully and perspicuously maintained; and doth baptize her children into that symbol, which was always held to be a perfect summary of Christian faith.

Lastly, The church of that age might well be said to be the pillar and the ground of truth, because then the apostles presided in it, who were the pillars and foundations of the Christian faith, according to the Scriptures and the ancient fathers: thus Theodoret§ styles St. Peter and St. John, τοὺς στύλους τῆς ἀληθείας, the pillars of truth; and Œcumenius,‖ στύλους τῆς πίστεως, i. e. the pillars of the faith. Then also did the apostles and evangelists deliver, and the church receive, those Scriptures, which were to be the standard of the Christian faith, and which were written, saith Irenæus,¶ by the will of God, to be hereafter "columna et fundamentum fidei nostræ," the pillar and foundation of our faith: and which are, saith Athanasius, τῆς πίστεως ἡμῶν ἀγκυραὶ καὶ ἐρείσματα, the anchors and stabiliments of our faith. Then did her members confirm the Christian faith by miracles, which, by St. Hilary†† upon this place, are styled, The confirmation of this truth; and by their sufferings for it: on which account the martyrs are peculiarly styled by the fathers the steady pillars and the grounds of Christians. Now seeing none of these reasons can be applied to the present church, it will not follow, that she can, in like manner, claim this title.

[16] Ver. 16. Θεὸς ἐφανερώθη, God was manifested in the flesh.] Here Grotius saith, "Suspectam nobis hanc lectionem faciunt interpretes veteres, Latinus, Syrus, Arabs, et Ambrosius, qui omnes legunt ὃ ἐφανερώθη," i.e. The Latin, Syriac, Arabic, versions, and St. Ambrose, all read, the mystery which was revealed in the flesh; which gives us reason to suspect the other reading, viz. God manifested in the flesh. But, 1. this a great mistake as to the Arabic version, for that reads thus, Quod Deus, that God was manifested in the flesh; and so doth the Syriac, according to the version of Tremellius: in the Polyglot it runs thus, Magnum est arcanum justitiæ quod justificatus est carne; which cannot refer to mystery, but must refer to God or Christ: and though the Vulgar Latin, and the commentator under the name of Ambrose, read, Quod manifestum est in carne; yet he adds, agreeably to the opinion of the Latins, that this mystery is "Christus in carne," Christ manifested in the flesh, but concealed in the Spirit, or, as to his Godhead. (See Dr. Pearson's Vindication of this place against Grotius, Creed, p. 128.) In a word, the reading which our translation follows is owned by all the Greek scholiasts, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, and is found in all the manuscripts, excepting that of Clermont and Lincoln college, and the phrases here used do make it necessary to expound the words, not of the gospel, but of Christ, the subject of it. For,

1. That exposition, which refers these words unto the gospel, puts such a strained sense on some of these expressions, of which we meet with no example in the whole New Testament: for where doth manifestation in the flesh signify the manifestation of a thing by weak and mortal men? and where is the gospel said to be manifested in the flesh? where doth ἀνελήφθη signify the exaltation of the gospel? or where is it said, that the gospel was received into glory?

2. It turns many of those expressions into a metaphorical sense, which are literally true of Christ; for, according to this exposition, flesh signifies weak men; to be justified, to be owned and approved; to be seen, is to be known or revealed; to be taken up, is to be exalted in the minds of men.

3. This strained exposition reduces three of these articles into one; it being, in effect, the same, to be believed on in the world, by reason of those glorious miracles by which it was confirmed; and, to be owned and approved, by reason of the operations of the Holy Spirit, which did assist the preachers of it; and, by that approbation, gloriously exalted in the minds of men.

These are the inconveniences which attend that exposition; whereas the other interpretation, which refers this mystery to Christ, affords a very plain and literal exposition of the words, confirmed by parallel expressions frequent in the holy Scripture. For,

1. The Word (saith St. John) was made flesh, and dwelt among us, John i. 14. and we have seen his glory. Ἐφανερώθη, He was manifested, 1 John iii. 5. 8. iv. 2. and came in the flesh, who was the Son of God. He who was in the form of God, and thought it no robbery to be equal with God, was found in the likeness of a man, Phil. ii. 6, 7. He that was God blessed for evermore, was also of the seed of David, according to the flesh, Rom. ix. 5.

2. He was justified by the Spirit, as doing those miracles on earth, by which he justified his mission against all the accusations of the Jews, by the Spirit of God, Matt. xii. 28. being declared to be the Son of God with power, by the Spirit of holiness, Rom. i. 3, 4. by sending that Spirit after his ascension into heaven, Acts ii. 32. which he had promised to his disciples upon earth, and by which the world was convinced, περὶ δικαιοσύνης, of his righteousness, John xvi. 10.

3. He was seen of angels, who at his entrance into the world did worship him, Heb. i. 6. who celebrated his birth, and gave notice of it to the world, Luke ii. 9. 13. who ministered to him in the desert, Matt. iv. 11. and in his agonies, Luke xxii. 43. xxiv. 4. who were present at his resurrection, and attended him at his ascension into heaven, Acts i. 10.

4. The whole history of the gospel shews, that he was preached to the gentiles, and believed on in the world.

5. And, lastly, He was received up into heaven, ἀνεφέρετο, ἀνήρθη, ἀνελήφθη, he was taken, he was carried up into heaven, and sat at the right hand of Majesty in glory, Matt. xvi. 19. Luke xxiv. 51. Acts i. 2. 11. And sure so plain, so full, and literal an exposition of these articles, deserves to be preferred before the strained and metaphorical interpretations of Grotius, Erasmus, and the Socinians.

CHAP. IV.

1. NOW (but though the mystery of godliness be so fully confirmed), [1] the Spirit (in the Scripture) speaketh expressly, that [2] [a] in the latter times [3] [b] some shall depart from the faith (once embraced by them), [4] [c] giving heed to seducing spirits, and [d] doctrines of devils;

2. Speaking lies in [5] [e] hypocrisy (Gr. ἐν ὑποκρίσει ψευδολόγων, through the hypocrisy of liars, and of men), having their consciences seared with a hot iron, (i. e. of corrupt and profligated consciences;

3. Of men) [6] [f] forbidding (those whom they have seduced) to marry, and (commanding them) to [g] abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them that believe and know the truth, (i. e. who are instructed aright in their Christian liberty; for though nothing be unclean of itself, yet to him who through weakness esteemeth any thing unclean, to him it is unclean, Rom. xiv. 14.)

4. For every creature of God is good (for food), and nothing (is) to be refused (as polluted), if it be (Gr. being) received with thanksgiving.

5. For it is [h] sanctified by the word of God, (giving us commission to eat of all things, Gen. ix. 2, 3. or by the gospel, taking off the difference betwixt things clean and unclean, Rom. xiv. 14.) and (by) prayer (for a blessing on it, and thanksgiving for it).

6. If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things (to preserve them from these impostors), thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ, nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine, whereunto thou hast attained (or, which thou hast followed hitherto).

7. But refuse (avoid) profane and old wives' fables, (such as the Jewish doctors tell, i. 4. 6. Tit. i. 14. iii. 9.) and exercise thyself rather (in those things which tend, not as they do, to endless questions, and law-strifes, and the perversion of the faith, but) unto ungodliness.

8. For [i] bodily exercise profiteth little: but godliness is profitable to all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

9. This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation (a truth most worthy to be relied on, viz. that godliness hath the promise of that life which is to come).

10. For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, [k] who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe.

11. These things command (Gr. exhort) and teach (men to believe).

12. Let no man (have occasion to) despise [l] thy youth, (or thy function, by reason of it;) but be thou an example of (and to) believers, in word (of doctrine), in (gravity of) conversation, in charity (to all), in (fervency of) spirit, in faith, in purity (of life).

13. [m] Till I come (to thee), give attendance to reading (the holy Scriptures, whence thou mayest learn to teach others), to exhortation (to what they ought to do, and to avoid), to doctrine (teaching them what to believe).

14. Neglect not (to stir up) the gift that is in thee, (see note on 2 Tim. i. 6.) which was given thee by prophecy (according to the foregoing prophecies concerning thee, see note on 1 Tim. i. 18.) [n] with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.

15. Meditate on these things (which thou readest in the holy Scriptures, and in which thou instructest others, ver. 15.) give thyself wholly to them (to exhortation and doctrine, ver. 13.) that (so thou mayest perform them with such readiness and exactness, that) thy profiting may appear unto all.

16. [o] Take heed to thyself (that thou livest exemplarily, ver. 12.) and to thy doctrine (that it be sound and edifying, ver. 6.) continue in them (in the exercises mentioned ver. 12, 13.) for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself (by doing faithfully thy duty), and them that hear thee (by engaging them to perform theirs).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[i] Ver. 1. Τὸ Πνεῦμα ῥητῶς λέγει, The Spirit saith expressly.] Hence Mr. Mede concludes, That the apostle must refer to some prophecy of these things recorded in the Scriptures; for though the Spirit in the apostles advertised them of many things, viz. The Spirit said to Peter, Behold three men seek thee, Acts x. 19. The Spirit said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul, for the work of the ministry, Acts xiii. 2. (see Acts xvi. 6. xxi. 11.) yet he did this only, ἐν ὁράματι, in a vision, Acts x. 19. or by secret inspirations (and so not ῥητῶς, expressly). But to this the fathers answer, That the word ῥητῶς here signifies only φανερῶς, σαφῶς, clearly, and perspicuously; to which it may be added, that in those times of prophecy, when the prophets had the government of the churches, and spake still in the public assemblies, it might reasonably be said, The Spirit speaketh expressly, what they taught expressly in the church. And whereas hence he infers, that this prophecy must be found somewhere in the Old Testament, the reverend Dr. Hammond thinks that unnecessary, this apostacy being foretold by our Prophet, who had the Spirit without measure, saying, Matt. xxiv. 11, 12. Then many shall be scandalized, and many false prophets shall arise, καὶ πλανήσουσι, and shall deceive many; and because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. I confess, Mr. Mede seems to have found this prophecy, Daniel xi. 36—39. But to omit all other objections against his interpretation of the words, I can by no means think, that Daniel, so well acquainted with the import of strange gods, both in the law and the prophets, should give that infamous name, Heloah Nechar, a strange God, to our blessed Saviour; or that he should at the same time prophesy, that antichrist should acknowledge and increase Christ with honour, and yet divest Christ of his glory and honour, by setting up Mahuzzims in opposition to his offices. But considering that this Epistle, according to Bishop Pearson, was writ in the eleventh of Nero, A. D. 64. why may we not refer this prediction, either to the apostacy, ῥητῶς, expressly mentioned 2 Thess. ii. 3. 9. or to the predictions of the apostles mentioned by St. Jude, ver. 17—19.?

[k] Ἐν ὑστέροις καιροῖς, In the latter times.] The Jewish doctors lay this down as a rule, that wherever we find this phrase, באחרית הימים, in the latter days, we are to understand it of the age and times of the Messiah: so, Gen. xlix. 1. Gather yourselves together (saith Jacob to his sons), that I may tell you what will befal you, ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν, in the last times, i. e. the days when the Sceptre shall depart from Judah, and Shiloh the Messiah shall come; Numb. xxiv. 14. Come (saith Balaam), and I will tell thee what shall befal thy people ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν ἡμερῶν, in the latter days, i. e. when the Star comes out of Jacob, and the Sceptre ariseth out of Israel; i. e. when the Messiah comes, saith the Targum of Onkelos, on ver. 17. Isa. ii. 2. In the last days the mountain of the Lord shall be established on the top of the mountains, and all nations shall flow into it: in the times of the Messiah, say R. Salomon, and other Jews. Jer. xxiii. 20. In the latter days ye shall understand this; in the days of the Messiah, Targum on ver. 5. Dan. ii. 28. There is a God of heaven who maketh known to the king what shall come to pass, ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν, from his times, till the kingdom of the Messiah be set up, ver. 44. see also x. 14. Hosea iii. 5. Afterward they shall return, and shall seek the Lord, and David their King; Targ. Messiah their King, the Son of David, in the latter days. Micah iv. 1. In the last days shall the mountain of the Lord be established upon the top of the mountains: where Dr. Pocock saith, "That by the last days are meant, the days or times of the Messiah or Christ, is agreed on by some Jews and most Christians." And wherever we meet with this phrase in the New Testament, it manifestly refers to the beginnings of Christianity, and signifies the last times of the Jewish state or economy, concurring with the times of the Messiah, and the erecting of his kingdom, by calling the gentiles, and settling a Christian church, to succeed that of the Jews. Thus, when the Holy Ghost fell down on the apostles and disciples, This is that (saith St. Peter) which was spoken of by the prophet Joel, saying, In the last days I will pour my Spirit upon all flesh, Acts ii. 17. So, Heb. i. 1. God, who of old spake to our fathers by the prophets, ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν χρόνων, in these last days hath spoken to us by his Son, i. e. by him who, saith St. Peter, was foreordained from the beginning of the world, but was manifested, ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν χρόνων, in the last times; where the times of Christ's manifestation to the world, and of his preaching to the Jews, are manifestly styled the last times. So, James v. 3. You have treasured up your gold and silver, as fire, which shall eat your flesh, ἐν ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις, in the last days: 2 Pet. iii. 3. This know ye, ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν ἡμερῶν, in the last times there shall come mockers, &c. and that they were then come, we learn from ver. 5. This they are ignorant of; and Jude, ver. 17, 18. Remember the words spoken before by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ, that they said unto you, that, ἐν ἐσχάτῳ χρόνῳ, in the last time there should be mockers, walking after their own lusts: and that they were then come, is evident from the following words, These are they who separate themselves, &c. ver. 19. And, 1 John ii. 18. Little children, ἐσχάτη ὥρα ἐστὶ, it is now the last hour, and, as you have heard, that antichrist shall (then) come, so now are there many antichrists, whereby you may know, that this is the last hour: so 2 Tim. iii. 1, 2. This know, that in the last days, ἐν ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις, there shall be perilous times, for men shall be lovers of themselves; and that those times, or days, and persons, were then come, is evident from his exhortation to turn away from them, ver. 5. and his character of them, ver. 6. ἐκ τούτων, of these are they that creep into houses, &c. And that the last times here mentioned were already come, we learn from his admonition to Timothy, to put the brethren in mind of these things, ver. 4. Here, then, is another defect in Mr. Mede's ingenious interpretation of these words, that he hath not made it out, that the last times are to be extended beyond the first century, or the age of the apostles. Mr. Mede saith, "These words are not a narration of things present, but a prediction of what shall betide the Christian faith in aftertimes." I answer, They are indeed a narrative of what the Spirit had foretold should happen in the latter times, by an apostacy from the faith; but the determination of the time, when what was thus foretold should be accomplished, depends on the fixed import of the latter times: for these last times, saith Mr. Mede, being mentioned as the indication when this apostacy should take place, must therefore be sufficient to determine the time of this apostacy: and so they plainly do, according to my interpretation. But if, with others, you refer these last times to the whole times of antichrist, they began not till above four hundred years after the writing of this Epistle; and why then is the apostle so concerned, that Timothy then should put the brethren in remembrance of these things? ver. 6. and they contain twelve hundred and sixty years; and so cannot inform us in what period, or precise portion of that time, this apostacy should have its rise. (See this note continued on p. 292.)

[3] Ἀποστήσονταί τινες τῆς πίστεως, Some shall depart from the faith.] Here seems another defect of Mr. Mede's hypothesis, that he makes these words to signify only a partial declining from the faith, and that again only virtual and consequential, by setting up doctrines opposite to or inconsistent with it, though not owned to be so by them that embrace them; whereas apostacy from the faith seems plainly to import a falling off from it wholly, or at least an actual and professed renouncing of some essential part of it. (See this note continued on p. 293.)

[4] Προσέχοντες πνεύμασι πλάνοις, καὶ διδασκαλίαις δαιμονίων, Giving heed to seducing spirits, and to doctrines of devils.] These words, by all the ancient commentators, seem to be taken actively for those doctrines which are introduced by men, led by the suggestions of Satan and of evil spirits; these doctrines being, saith Theodoret, ἐκείνων κυήματα, the productions of those evil spirits; and they who vent them are, saith Chrysostom, οἱ ὑπ' ἐκείνων ἐνεργούμενοι, men acted by them. The false prophets and false apostles, saith the author of the interpolated Epistle to the Philadelphians, had λαοπλάνον πνεῦμα, (§. 5.) a spirit that deceived the people; they preached ἀπάτην καὶ πλάνην, deceit and error, and had dwelling in them, τὸν δράνοκτα τὸν ἀποστάτην, the apostate dragon. These false prophets had, saith St. John, πνεῦμα τῆς πλάνης, a spirit of error; as the apostles had πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, the spirit of truth, 1 John iv. 1. 6. So far it is from being true, that the word spirit signifies doctrines, and not those deluding spirits which taught them; yet because the prince of devils, Matt. ix. 34. the spirit of the devil, Luke iv. 33. Rev. xvi. 14. the sacrifice, the table, the cup of devils, 1 Cor. x. 20, 21. the habitation of devils, Rev. xviii. 2. are phrases where δαιμόνια, devils, are still taken objectively, I admit that sense also here: and then the apostacy, procured by the spirits of deceit, is that of the Judaizers, relapsing from the profession of the Christian faith, through those false Christs and false prophets, of which our Saviour foretold they should deceive many, Matt. xxiv. 11. 24. whereas they, who apostatized by falling back to heathenism, are they who give heed to the doctrines of demons: for "dii gentium demonia," the gods of the heathens are demons. (See this note continued on p. 293.)

[5] Ver. 2. Ἐν ὑποκρίσει ψευδολόγων, Through the hypocrisy of false speakers.] Ἐν pro διὰ, through, is very common; so ἐν πάσῃ ἀπάτῃ ἀδικίας, through all deceivableness of unrighteousness, 2 Thess. ii. 9, 10. (see Mark ix. 29. Luke i. 17. Acts xvii. 31. Rom. xii. 21. Tit. i. 9. 2 Pet. iii. 1.) Κεκαυτηριασμένων τὴν συνείδησιν, of seared consciences, i. e. of consciences, which have lost the sense of good or evil, and no longer do their office: for this expression, saith Theodoret, signifies, τὴν ἐσχάτην αὐτῶν ἀναλγησίαν, the extreme stupor of their consciences; for the member seared, νεκρωθὲς τὴν προτέραν αἴσθησιν ἀποβάλλει, being mortified, hath lost its former sensation. (See this note continued on p. 293.)

[6] Ver. 3. Κωλυόντων γαμεῖν, ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων, Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats.] It is here to be noted from Theophylact, that in construing these words, οὐκ ὀφείλεις ἀπὸ κοινοῦ λαβεῖν τὸ κωλυόντων, ἀλλ' ἔξωθεν προσθεῖναι τὸ συμβουλεύοντων ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων, we must not repeat the word forbidding, but add, in lieu of it, counselling to abstain from meats: so all the ancients have interpreted these words of Clemens Alexandrinus,* when he saith, οὐ κωλυτέον γαμεῖν, οὐδὲ μὲν κρεωφαγεῖν, we must not forbid to marry, nor yet to eat flesh. The apostle, saith Tertullian,† notes them who wholly forbade marriage, and interdicted meats. And Epiphanius saith,‡ This of the apostle is fulfilled in the Cataphrygæ and other heretics, for most of them, τοῦ γαμεῖν κωλύουσιν, ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων παραγγέλλουσιν, forbid marriage, and command to abstain from meats. This, in effect, is the interpretation of all the ancient commentators on the place, who give us the same sense of the words as do the fathers cited; and of all the translations, which, though they do not add the word commanding, yet they add a copulative, and change the infinitive into a participle, thus, Prohibentes nubere, et abstinentes a cibis, Syriac. Prohibentes matrimonium, et amoventes cibos, Arabic. And Bochart gives us instances of the like nature from the Old Testament, viz. Gen. xxxi. 40. By the heat of the day was I burnt, and by the frost of the night (obrigescebam) I waxed stiff with cold; Psal. cxxi. 6. The sun shall not burn thee by day, nor the moon (refrigerate thee) by night: so Luke xiii. 9. If it bring forth fruit (it shall stand), if not, thou shalt cut it down. (See this note continued on p. 293.)

* Strom. lib. iii. p. 462.

That all these things happened in the apostle's times, and many of them were to happen before the destruction of Jerusalem, is evident; that there was to be a great apostacy before that time, carried on by prophets and false Christs, our Lord expressly had foretold; and that in great measure it had obtained, especially among the Jews, we learn from the Epistle to the Hebrews, writ purposely to put a stop to it; that the great promoters of it were deceitful workers, false apostles, and that they carried on that work in hypocrisy, esteeming gain godliness, this apostle doth often inform us; (see 2 Cor. ii. 17. xi. 13—15.) that they were men whose minds and consciences were defiled, see Tit. i. 15. that their doctrine was this, It is good for a man not to touch a woman, 1 Cor. vii. 1. their vain philosophy this, taste not (forbidden meats), handle not (an unclean thing), see Colos. ii. 21. It remains only to consider, who they should be: that they could not be the gnostics, the followers of Simon Magus, I have proved against Dr. Hammond, note on Colos. ii. 21. Moreover, according to his exposition, they were to appear before the destruction of Jerusalem; for he interprets these words, the Spirit speaketh expressly of our Lord's prediction, Matt. xxiv. Now there were no such heretics among the gnostics until the second century. Saturninus, saith Theodoret,* was the first who named matrimony the doctrine of devils, and taught men to abstain from living creatures. Now this Saturninus was before Basilides,† who, by St. Jerome,‡ is often called the father of the gnostics; whereas that these men were in the apostles' times, we learn, saith Tertullian,§ from the apostles themselves. I have noted on 1 Cor. vii. 1. and on Colos. ii. 21. conjectured, that they were the Essenes among the Jews; and that with them agreed the magicians and idolaters among the heathens, we learn from Clemens of Alexandria, who speaking of those heretics, who said the resurrection had passed on them already, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο ἀθετοῦσι τὸν γάμον, and therefore rejected matrimony, he saith this was not peculiar to these Menandrians,‖ but they who worshipped idols did also abstain from meats and venery; and the magicians, who worshipped angels and demons, did also carefully abstain from wine, from living creatures, and from venery.

And if Saturninus, who succeeded Menander, who flourished in the time of Domitian and Trajan, did in this, as in most other things, τὰ αὐτὰ τῷ Μενάνδρῳ ψευδολογῆσαι, agree in sentiments with Menander, as Eusebius* saith he did, the apostle may reasonably be conceived to include him: for Epiphanius saith of him, in the very words of Irenæus,† that‡ he affirmed, that to marry, and beget children, was from Satan, and that hence many of them abstained from living creatures; and by this feigned continence seduced many to their heresy. And this is the more likely, because it is noted of this Menander, that he proceeded εἰς ἄκρον τῆς μαγίας, to the height of that magic, which was attended with that abstinence, Iren. lib. i. cap. 21. Euseb. H. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 26. It is no objection against this interpretation, that the Essenes mentioned by Philo and Josephus were not Christians, and so could not depart from the faith: for who can prove that none of them embraced the faith of Christ, or that they could not do it, and yet retain their old sentiments concerning meats and marriage? It may be also true, that the Menandrians were not yet formed into a sect when this Epistle was indited; but that affects not my interpretation, since it is certain from 1 Cor. viii. 1. Colos. ii. 16. (see the notes there), that their doctrines obtained before; and that the persons here intended must be Judaizers, is fairly gathered from ver. 7. and from these words, Commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them that believe and know the truth; for those last words shew, that these persons were such as had no faith, or knowledge of that Christian truth, that every creature of God was good (for food), and nothing was to be refused, as polluted or unclean, ver. 4. Add to this, that Dr. Lightfoot, note on Acts xv. 20. quotes this passage from Bava Bathra, fol. 602. viz. That when the temple was destroyed the second time, the pharisees (i. e. separatists) were greatly multiplied in Israel, who taught that it was not lawful to eat flesh, or to drink wine; and a little after say, it is but just that we should ordain among ourselves not to marry wives, nor beget children: and if these pharisees then espoused these tenets, they may be the persons here noted by the apostle. Thus I have given my own opinion concerning the true and primary import of these words. Others, I know, conceive that they refer to the apostacy of the church of Rome, and therefore descant on them thus:

Ver. 1. But (in opposition to this mystery of godliness, mentioned iii. 15, 16. there is another mystery of iniquity, of which) the spirit speaketh expressly (Dan. xi. 36—39. saying), that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to erroneous spirits and doctrines of devils.

[b] Ἀποστήσονται τῆς πίστεως, Some shall depart from the faith.] Idolatry being represented in the Old Testament as apostacy from the law of Moses, and the God of Israel, the like idolatry in the church of Rome may well be counted an apostacy from the Christian faith.

[c] Προσέχοντες πνεύμασι πλάνοις, Giving heed to seducing spirits.] i. e. Men acted by seducing spirits: for πνεύματα doth often signify the impulses or afflatuses of good or evil spirits; of good, so 1 Cor. xiv. 12. You are zealous, πνευμάτων, of spiritual gifts, or afflatuses, and so throughout the chapter; of evil spirits, as 1 John iv. 1. Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits. Accordingly, the coming of the man of sin is to be κατ' ἐνέργειαν τοῦ Σατανᾶ, according to the energy of Satan, with all lying wonders: (2 Thess. ii. 9.) so was the idolatrous worship of the gentiles promoted, say Tertullian,* Eusebius,† and St. Chrysostom:‡ so also was the worship of saints promoted in the church of Rome. (See Mr. Mede, lib. iii. cap. 3, 4.)

[d] Καὶ διδασκαλίαις δαιμονίων, And to doctrines of devils;] i. e. To the heathen theology concerning demons, or giving heed to the doctrine concerning the worship of dead men, or departed saints, brought in by their pretended apparitions and wonders wrought at their tombs after death, which were indeed, if at all done, wrought by the illusions of devils.

Ver. 2. Ἐν ὑποκρίσει, Which apostacy shall be promoted] By the hypocrisy of liars, which have their conscience seared.

[e] Through the hypocrisy, &c.] Hence it is argued, that they, who thus promote and carry on this apostacy, must not be open deserters, but hypocritical professors of that faith, from which they by their actions virtually depart.

[f] Ver. 3. Κωλυόντων γαμεῖν, Forbidding to marry.] (And the men I speak of may be discerned by these marks, that they are) of those who forbid to marry, and command to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth: as is done in the Roman church to monks and nuns, (see Mr. Mede, lib. iii. cap. 7.) and to the clergy; and that, saith pope Siricius, "quoniam qui in carne sunt, Deo placere non possunt," because they, that are in the flesh, cannot please God.

[g] Ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων, To abstain from meats.] That this is done in the Roman church, by a law obliging some orders of monks to abstain from all flesh, see Mr. Mede, ibid.: and this may well be reckoned as a character of apostacy from the Christian faith, because it seems to be a reducing of them back from their Christian liberty, to a conformity to the legal rites.

[h] Ver. 5. Ἁγιάζεται, It is sanctified.] So the Jews from these words, Psal. cxxxiv. 2. Lift up your hands (Kodesh ad sanctitatem), and bless the Lord, gather, That the benediction is the sanctification of the meat, and that it is not lawful to eat of it till it be thus sanctified. (Buxt. Syn. Jud. cap. 12. p. 241.)

[i] Ver. 8. Σωματικὴ γυμνασία, Bodily exercise.] The apostle in the former verse exhorted Timothy, γυμνάζειν, to exercise himself unto godliness, as the athletics did, in the Olympic games, exercise themselves for their combats; adding here, that their exercises, though they were very hard and difficult, tended little to profit, they striving for mastery, only that they might obtain a corruptible crown, 1 Cor. ix. 25. whereas that piety, in which he did advise him to exercise himself, was profitable for all things; or, because Philo makes mention τῶν συνεχῶν πόνων, *of the continual labours of the Essenes, and Josephus,† of their ἐργασίαι, or exercises morning and evening, he perhaps may oppose unto them this exercise of piety.

[k] Ver. 10. Ὅς ἐστι Σωτὴρ πάντων ἀνθρώπων, Who is the Saviour of all men.] The author of the book De Vocatione Gentium expounds this very well, telling us, That by saying, (lib. ii. cap. 31.) He is the Saviour of all men, he confirms the general goodness of God towards all men; and by adding, especially of them that believe, he shews, there is one part of mankind, which, through the benefit of divinely inspired faith, is, by special benefits, advanced to the highest and eternal felicity. He is the Saviour of all men, 1. Leaving none of them without some testimonies of his goodness, (Acts xiv. 17.) sufficient to engage and direct them so to seek the Lord, that they may find him, (Acts xvii. 27.) lib. ii. 5. Nulli nationi hominum bonitatis suæ dona subtraxit, saith the same author. 2. Shewing to them so much of himself, i. e. of his eternal power and godhead, as might render them inexcusable, in that they did not glorify him as God, neither were they thankful; (Rom. i. 20, 21.) and writing in their hearts the law of nature, which enabled them by nature to do the things of the law, and made their consciences accuse them, when they neglected so to do; (Rom. ii. 14, 15.) they knowing so far the righteousness of God, that they who did those things which were contrary to the law of nature, were worthy of death: (Rom. i. 32.) for adhibita est semper universis hominibus quædam supernæ mensura doctrinæ, quæ etsi occultioris, parciorisque gratiæ fuit, suffecit tamen quibusdam ad remedium, omnibus ad testimonium. 3. Accepting every where him that worked righteousness, of what nation soever he might be, (Acts x. 35.) and accounting him as circumcised who kept the righteousness of the law: (Rom. ii. 26.) and, lastly, rewarding the good deeds of all that diligently sought him. (Heb. xi. 6.) Mr. Clerc understands this salvation, of deliverance from temporal dangers, in which sense it is also true; but that cannot be the entire sense of the apostle, who had said before, ver. 8. that godliness had the promise of this life, and that which is to come, i. e. both of temporal and eternal salvation; and adds, ver. 9. This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation; i. e. that not temporal only but eternal blessings are to be expected from him, and that therefore they, the apostles, laboured and suffered reproach, because they trusted in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men; whereas, doubtless, they did this, not only with respect to temporal, but especially to eternal salvation. (2 Cor. iv. 17.)

[l] Ver. 12. Τὴν νεότητα, Thy youth.] The presbyters were generally in those times aged, as their name imports; but Timothy, because the gift of prophecy had pointed him out for that work, (ver. 14.) and because the gifts of the Spirit had rendered him fit, was made an evangelist in his younger age, and therefore the apostle doth exhort him to make up in the excellency of his doctrine, and the gravity of his conversation, what was wanting in his age.

[m] Ver. 13.] Here, first, it is well noted by the fathers, and by Esthius, that if St. Timothy, who had spiritual gifts, was yet, by St. Paul, commanded to be thus diligent in reading the Scriptures, that in his exhortations he might profit others, then much more should other bishops and ministers be so, quos omnes Paulus in Timotheo instruit; then also should they not depend upon extemporary effusions, without attendance unto reading.

Secondly, That the illumination or gifts of the Holy Spirit, should not hinder our diligence in reading and studying what we are to exhort others to, and instruct them in: for, saith Theodoret, it becomes us to bring our labour, καὶ οὕτω λαμβάνειν τὴν χάριν τοῦ πνεύματος, and so to receive the grace of the Spirit.

[n] Ver. 14. Μετὰ ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν πρεσβυτερίου, With the imposition of the hands of the presbytery.] The χάρισμα, or spiritual gift here mentioned, is expressly said to be given, διὰ τῆς ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν μου, by the laying on of the hands of St. Paul, 2 Tim. i. 6. the giving of the spiritual gifts, seeming to be peculiar to this or some other act of an apostle, Acts viii. 17. xix. 6. But other seniors, or presbyters, as Irenæus, lib. iv. cap. 43. calls them, "Qui cum episcopatus successione charisma veritatis certum acceperunt," Who with their succession received the certain charisma of truth, might and did lay on their hands together with him. This ceremony of imposition of hands in ordination is confirmed from the practice of the apostles and apostolical men, thus ordaining deacons, Acts vi. 6. pastors, or teachers of the word, Acts xiii. 3. elders, whether bishops or presbyters, in every city, Acts xiv. 23. and evangelists, here. And this practice they certainly derived from the Jews, who created governors of criminal causes, or ruling elders, and masters, doctors, and rabbins, to be teachers of the law; i. e. to labour in the word and doctrine, by that imposition of hands which they called סמיכה, as Moses did to Joshua, Numb. xxvii. 18. Deut. xxxiv. 9. and as Maimonides* saith he did, when he assumed the Seventy to assist him; and as the first-born † laid their hands upon the Levites, Numb. viii. 10. who were chosen to serve in their stead, and so consecrated them to God in their name. And this way of consecration, by imposition of hands, say they, came down from Joshua,‡ by a perpetual succession to their rabbins. Though therefore I scarce find any footsteps of it in the first century, or second, yet Cyprian, in the third, speaks of it as that which, "de traditione Divina et apostolica observatione servandum est et tenendum," was to be observed and held from Divine tradition, and apostolical observation, in the collation of the episcopal office, and as that which they § practised in the ordination of Sabinus to that office. Eusebius saith,‖ Origen also was thus advanced to the presbytery by the bishops of Cæsarea: and the Apostolical Constitutions give us this as an ordinance of St. John the apostle,* who, doubtless, when he returned from Patmos to Ephesus, regulating the churches, and constituting bishops, did it according to the rites of the Jews, and practice of the other apostles; whence I conclude, this is no accidental but a necessary rite of the due ordination of bishops, presbyters, and deacons.

3. [4] Honour widows that are [5] widows indeed.

4. But if any widow have children or nephews, [6] let them (i. e. those children or grand-children) learn first (or chiefly) to shew piety at home (i. e. to their own family or household), and to requite their parents (who have bred them up; ver. 10.) for that is good and acceptable before God (and then, if they be able, extend their charity to others).

5. Now she that is a widow indeed, and [7] desolate (being left quite alone, without any children to relieve her), [8] trusteth in God, and continueth in supplications and prayers night and day.

6. But [9] she that liveth in pleasure (licentiously) is dead (to God), whilst she (thus) liveth (and so is not to be respected as a vital member of the church, or nourished by her).

7. And these things give in charge, that they (i. e. the widows) may be blameless.

8. But if any (having ability) provide not for his own (kindred), and especially for those of his own house, he hath (in works) denied the faith, and is [10] worse than an infidel.

9. [11] Let not a widow be taken into the number (of widows to be maintained by the church), under [12] threescore years old, having been the wife [13] of one man (not one that hath divorced herself from one husband, and married again,

11. But the younger widows refuse: for when they have begun to [15] wax wanton against (or, grow weary of) Christ, they will marry;

14. I will therefore that the younger women (rather) marry, bear children, guide the house, (and so) give none occasion to the adversary (of Christianity) to speak reproachfully (of it.

15. The necessity of which precept is too great,) for some (of these young widows) are already [16] turned aside after Satan.

16. 25. [25] Likewise also the good works of some are manifest beforehand (and so less examination is needful concerning them); and they that (i. e. whose works) are otherwise cannot be (long) hid (their vices will, by information of others they converse with, or by temptation, and their own evil inclinations, be at last discovered).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1. ΜΗ᾽ ἐπιπλήξῃς, Rebuke not.] The word signifies to chastise, or rebuke with severity, and sometimes with stripes.

[2] Πρεσβυτέρῳ, An elder.] In the judgment of Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, the elder here signifies, οὐ τὸν ἱερέα, ἀλλὰ τὸν γεγηρακότα, not a priest, but a grave ancient man, such being, in all ages and nations, styled fathers; and this sense the distinction here, of ages and of sexes, seems to plead for.

[3] Ver. 2. Πρεσβυτέρας, The elder women.] The widows of the church, saith Dr. Hammond, very improbably; they being mentioned particularly in the sequel of the chapter.

[4] Ver. 3. Τίμα, Honour.] i. e. Yield them reverence and alimony; for that provision for them is included in this honour, is evident from ver. 4. and the 8th. Thus, not to give parents what is needful for them, is to transgress the precept which commands us to honour our father and our mother, Mark vii. 10—12. So Acts xxviii. 10. Πολλαῖς τιμαῖς ἐτίμησαν ἡμᾶς, They honoured us with many honours, giving us, τὰ πρὸς τὴν χρείαν, such things as were necessary. Hence, in the Jerusalem Targum, * "Honorare, est viaticum providere;" To honour, is to make provision for any person: so here, honour widows; that is, saith Theophylact, τὰ ἀναγκαῖα χορήγει, provide them necessaries. (See note on Mark vii. 10.)

[5] Τὰς ὄντως χήρας, That are widows indeed.] Answering that name, by being χηρεύσαι, desolate, and destitute of any other to relieve them, and being also exemplarily pious, (ver. 5.) Widows, saith Cotelerius, hath divers significations; it signifies, 1. Any woman that survives her husband. 2. Poor women, who, after the death of their husbands, need the alms of the church (as here). 3. Such as consecrated themselves to God, professing perpetual widowhood, (ver. 5.) 4. Such as were chose into the ecclesiastical ministry, or made deaconesses, (ver. 9.) That there should be any ἀειπαρθένοι, or persons that were always virgins, called, τὰς παρθένους, τὰς λεγομένας χήρας, widows; though the passage of Ignatius, according to Vossius's reading, seems to make for it; yet, according to the reading of Bishop Usher (ἀειπαρθένους καὶ χήρας) it makes against it; and "virgo vidua," a virgin widow, that is admitted to the degree of a deaconess, is, in Tertullian's language,† a miracle or monster in the church. It is certain, such a one could be none of the apostle's widows here; for he supposeth his widows may have children, ver. 4. and expressly forbids any to be chosen into the number of widows, that hath not nourished or brought up children, ver. 9, 10. and it is not reasonable to conceive the church of Smyrna should so soon transgress against this rule of the apostle, or that this famous martyr should approve such a violation of the apostle's precept.

Note also, That the reading of Bishop Usher is confirmed from the like words, ἡ παρθένος, καὶ ἡ χῆρα, found in the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. iii. cap. 6.

[6] Ver. 4. Μανθανέτωσαν πρῶτον τὸν ἴδιον οἶκον εὐσεβεῖν; Let them learn first to shew piety at home.] The apostle here speaks of the care the children should take to nourish their parents, which are widows, πρῶτον, before they suffer them to be burdensome to the church, as it is evident from ver. 16. which saith, If any man or woman have widows (belonging to their families), let them relieve them, and let not the church be charged with them; and also from the following words here, and to requite their parents, which only can belong unto the children, and was always reckoned an act of piety towards them, ‡ as, after God, the authors of our being; whence anciently they were so reverenced, saith Simplicius,* as to be called gods.

[7] Ver. 5. Μεμονωμένη, Solitary.] So Philo saith, the widow of the priest, which has no children, must return to her father's house, as ἀνδρὸς καὶ παίδων ἔρημος, οὐδεμίαν ἔχουσα καταφυγὴν, having no other refuge, when destitute of husband and children, but her father: but if she have sons, or daughters, it is necessary that the mother should be placed with her children, υἱοὶ καὶ θυγατέρες τῆς τοῦ γεννήσαντος οἰκίας ὄντες,† for sons and daughters, being of the house of their parents, draw the mother to it: whence also we learn, what it is to shew pity to their own house, ver. 4. viz. to do it to their parents.

[8] Ἤλπικεν ἐπὶ τὸν Θεὸν, Trusteth in God.] i. e. Having no other helper, she reposeth herself on Him alone, committing herself to him, by constant prayer, for his help. This is Cotelerius's third kind of widows, compared, by the author of the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. iii. cap. 1. to the widow of Sarepta, and to Anna the daughter of Phanuel, mentioned Luke ii. 36. who does not oblige herself, by vow or promise, so to do, but only remains single, δῶρον ἔχουσα χηρείας, as having the gift of widowhood. So St. Jerome describes these widows, in these words, Honora viduas, quæ vere viduæ sunt, hoc est, quæ omni suorum auxilio destitutæ sunt, quæ manibus suis laborare non possunt, quas paupertas debilitat, ætasque conficit, quibus Deus spes est, et omne opus oratio. (Ep. ad Gerontiam.)

[9] Ver. 6. Ἡ δὲ σπαταλῶσα, She that liveth in pleasure.] This word properly signifies to feed deliciously, and drink choice liquors; τῇ γαστρὶ ζῆν μόνῃ, to live only for the belly, saith St. Chrysostom. So Ezek. xvi. 49. This was the sin of thy sister Sodom, in pride, in fulness of bread, καὶ ἐν εὐθηνίᾳ ἐσπατάλων, and in abundance, she and her daughters rioted: Amos vi. 4. They lie upon beds of ivory, καὶ κατασπαταλῶντες, and, abounding with superfluities, they eat lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall; and because such eating and drinking provoke to carnal pleasures, it is joined with them; as when the apostle saith, Ye have lived in pleasure and been wanton, Gr. ἐσπαταλήσατε, James v. 5. Such a woman is dead while she liveth, according to that of the Jews,‡ The just in their death are styled living; the wicked, whilst they live, are styled dead. (Maimonides.)

[10] Ver. 8. Ἔστιν ἀπίστου χείρων, He is worse than an infidel.] For they put this among the first and most indissoluble principles of nature, requiring us, πρῶτα Θεοὺς τιμᾷν, μετέπειτα τοκῆας,§ first to honour the gods and then our parents; placing among the things in which they are to be honoured, χρημάτων χορηγίαν καὶ σώματος ὑπηρεσίαν, the making provision for them, and serving them with our bodies. So Aristotle‖ saith, We must rather make provision for them than for ourselves, and yield them, τιμὴν καθάπερ Θεοῖς, honour, as they do unto the gods. Plutarch¶ saith, That all men, though some may think otherwise, say, that nature, and the law of nature, require, that parents should have the highest honour next the gods: that men can do nothing more acceptable to the gods, than by readily heaping favours upon their parents, and that nothing is a greater evidence of atheism or impiety, than to despise them. Some here are guilty of a great mistake, scraping together great fortunes, and hoarding them up for their children, with a scandalous neglect of that charity to their Christian brethren, which alone can sanctify those enjoyments to them, and enable them to lay up a good foundation against the time to come; pleading these words to justify, or to excuse, their sordid parsimony, and want of charity, that he that provideth not for his own household, hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel; whereas these words plainly respect the provision which children should make for their parents, and not that which parents should make for their children.

See the defence of the text, ver. 16. and 19. Examen Millii, ibid.

[11] Ver. 9. Χήρα καταλεγέσθω μὴ, Let not a widow be taken into the number.] The apostle now comes to speak of such widows as were not only to be maintained by the church (for they were doubtless to receive her alms, if really they were poor, without these qualifications), but of such as were to be admitted into the number of deaconesses, whose office it was to instruct the younger women, to attend the women when sick and in labour, and to assist at the baptism of the female sex.

[12] Μὴ ἔλαττον ἑξήκοντα, Not less than sixty years old.] It is the mistake of Zonaras, Balsamon, and Blastares, to think to reconcile this with the fifteenth canon of the council of Chalcedon, and the fourteenth of Trullo, by saying, That widows might only be admitted deaconesses at sixty, but virgins at forty. This last was done in after-ages, and after that Apostolical Constitution, which, agreeably to St. Paul, saith, lib. iii. cap. 1. Χήρας δὲ καθιστᾶτε μὴ ἔλαττον ἐτῶν ἑξήκοντα, Let not the widows be constituted under sixty years; and they who first began to alter the time, did at last take away the office.

[13] Γεγοννῖα ἑνὸς ἀνδρὸς γυνὴ, Being the wife of one husband.] i. e. One who had not divorced herself from one, and married another husband; for otherwise, the younger widows, whom St. Paul bids to marry, could never be admitted deaconesses, though they had all the other qualifications. That such divorces were then common on the wives' side both among Jews and gentiles, we learn, concerning the Romans, from the complaint of Seneca,* That none in his time blushed at it, their noble women marrying that they might divorce themselves, and there being scarce any marriages without divorces. Cicero† complains of many things of this kind, which happened in his time. Plutarch‡ mentions it as a thing common, and customarily done by any women that were jealous; and the law among the Athenians* allowed it: instances we have of it in Justin Martyr† and Tertullian.‡ And that this also was frequent in the practice of the Jews, and allowed by their rabbins, see note on 1 Cor. vii. 11. I confess that univira, the wife of one husband, in Livy, lib. x. cap. 23. is one, quæ uni viro nupta fuisset, ad quem virgo deducta sit, who from her virginity had been married only to one man; and that univira sacerdos bears the same sense in Trebellius Pollio, c. de Tito, p. 795. and that this monogamy was counted honourable, even among the heathens; and they who were content with it, wore pudicitiæ coronam, the crown of chastity; (Val. Max. lib. ii. cap. 1.) whereas they who proceeded to a second marriage, sacerdotio arcebantur, were thought unworthy of the priesthood, as Servius notes upon those words of Virgil, (Æn. iv. 19.) Huic uni forsan potui succumbere culpæ: and the Flamines, among the Romans, were to be the husbands of one wife, and the Flaminicæ, the wives of one husband. (Rhodig. Lect. Antiq. lib. xxviii. cap. 22.) That therefore the sacred ministers in the church of Christ might be nothing inferior to those of heathens, the apostle may require that, in this sense, the bishop should be the husband of one wife, and the deaconess the wife of one husband.

[14] Ver. 10. Εἰ ἐτεκνοτρόφησεν, If she hath brought up children.] That εἰ signifies that, as well as if, see note on Acts xxvi. 23. Εἰ παθητὸς ὁ Χριστὸς, εἰ πρῶτος, &c. That Christ hath suffered, and that he was the first that rose from the dead; and that so it should be rendered here, the word μαρτυρουμένη, testified, seems to require: for a testimony of the good works of others, is, that they have done such and such laudable actions.

[15] Ver. 11. Ὅταν καταστρηνιάσωσι τοῦ Χριστοῦ, When they have waxed wanton against Christ.] That is, say Chrysostom and Œcumenius, ὅταν ἀκκισθῶσιν, when they have cast off, or fastidiously refused and rejected Christ; ὅταν καταβλακευσθῶσιν, when they have contemned, and made light of him; when they do βαρέως φέρειν, καὶ ἀποσπᾶν τὰς ἡνίας, bear Christ's yoke grievously, and cast off his reins: so Hesychius and Phavorinus. So that this phrase signifies to cast off Christ and Christianity: and, as the apostle afterward explains it, ἐκτρέπεσθαι, to turn from him after Satan, or to fall off from him to heathenism or Judaism; and then, πρώτην πίστιν ἀθετεῖν, to violate their first faith, cannot be to violate the promise made, when chosen into the order of widows not to marry, but their faith given unto Christ at baptism; the other, if any such promise were then made, being not their first, but second faith. So Chrysostom and Œcumenius expound it, from those words of the apostle to the Corinthians; I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin unto Christ.

[16] Ver. 15. Ἐξετράπησαν ὀπίσω τοῦ Σατανᾶ, Have turned aside after Satan.] The converting men to the Christian faith, being the turning men from the power of Satan unto God; (Acts xxvi. 18.) the rescuing men from the snare of the devil, who were taken captive by him at his will, (2 Tim. ii. 26.) and who walked according to the prince of the power of the air; (Eph. ii. 2.) the casting off the faith may well be styled, the turning aside after Satan.

[17] Ver. 17. Διπλῆς τιμῆς, Double honour.] That is, τῆς ἐλευθερίου τροφῆς, of a liberal maintenance out of the public stock; it signifies, saith Chrysostom, τὴν τῶν ἀναγκαίων χορηγίαν, provision of things necessary, as is evident from the reason following, ver. 18. The labourer is worthy of his hire.

[18] Μάλιστα οἱ κοπιῶντες ἐν λόγῳ καὶ διδασκαλίᾳ, Especially those who labour in the word and doctrine.] Οἱ πρεσβύτεροι, the elders among the Jews were of two sorts: first, such as governed in the synagogue; and, secondly, such as ministered in reading and expounding their scriptures and traditions, and from them pronouncing what did bind or loose, or what was forbidden, and what was lawful to be done:* for when, partly by their captivity, and partly through increase and traffic, they were dispersed in considerable bodies through divers regions of the world, it was necessary they should have governors or magistrates to keep them in their duty, and judge of criminal causes; and also rabbins to teach them the law, and the traditions of their fathers: the first were ordained, "ad judicandum, sed non ad docendum de licitis et vetitis," to judge and govern, but not to teach; the second, "ad docendum, sed non ad judicandum," to teach, but not to judge or govern: and these the apostle here declares to be the most honourable, and worthy of the chiefest reward: accordingly the apostle, reckoning up the offices God had appointed in the church, places teachers before governments, 1 Cor. xii. 28.

[19] Ver. 18. Λέγει γὰρ ἡ γραφὴ, For the Scripture saith.] The former words, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn, being expressly found in Deut. xxv. 4. and the latter, expressly in the Gospel of St. Luke, x. 7. and with a little variation, Matt. x. 10. and in no other place in Scripture (for in Lev. xix. 13. and Deut. xxiv. 14. there is nothing to this purpose), it follows, that St. Paul must here reckon the Gospel of St. Luke among the Holy Scriptures; from which such doctrines, as he is now teaching, may be infallibly confirmed. Note,

Secondly, That the apostle, both here and 1 Cor. ix. 9. proves this from what was written in the law of Moses, applying in both places that which primarily must belong to the Jewish priesthood, to the preachers of the gospel; and hence allowing us to argue for the maintenance of the latter, by analogy to what was appointed for the former; as the apostle himself doth in this very case, in these words, Do you not know, that they who minister about (legally) holy things, eat of the things of the temple; and that they which wait at the altar, are partakers with the altar? i. e. are fed and liberally maintained, by the portions God allowed them of what was offered at his altar; even so hath the Lord Christ appointed, that they who preach the gospel, should live of the gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 14. Whence note,

Thirdly, That this is a standing ordinance of Christ, to continue as long as the preaching of the gospel doth, built upon reasons of equal obligations at all times; the labourer being always worthy of his hire; the shepherd to eat of the milk of the flock, and he that soweth spirituals, to reap carnals, 1 Cor. ii. 7. 10, 11. Note,

* Εἰθίτο τῇ ἀπολείψει γράμματα παρὰ τῷ ἄρχοντι θίσθαι, μὴ δι' ἑτέραν, ἀλλ' αὐτὴν παροῦσαν, ὡς οὖν παρὴν τοῦτο πράξουσα κατὰ τὸν νόμον, laquens de uxore Alcibiadis. Plut. de Alcib. p. 195.

* Morin. de Ordin. par. iii. exer. 7. cap. 4. Buxt. in voce, סמיכה.

Fourthly, From whom this reward is to be received; from them amongst whom these pastors labour, to whom they sow spiritual things, and who are taught by them: for, Let him (saith the apostle) who is taught in the word communicate to him that teacheth in all good things, Gal. vi. 6. So that he is to have a supply of all things needful for the discharge of his function here, double honour, i. e. a liberal maintenance. Note, Fifthly, That as the command of being charitable to the poor, gives just occasion to those laws which are made in all communities to oblige men, according to their abilities, to distribute to the necessities of the poor; because, otherwise, the general rules of Scripture would not be obeyed, nor the poor provided for: so the standing ordinance of Christ and his apostles, concerning the double honour due to them who labour in the word and doctrine, and the communicating to them in all good things, justifies these laws which ascertain what shall be communicated to them; since otherwise, it is much to be feared, the general rules of Scripture concerning this matter would not be obeyed, nor the clergy sufficiently provided for.

[20] Ver. 19. Κατὰ πρεσβυτέρου.] The elder here seems to relate not to one who was such by age, but by office, because the apostle was before speaking, ver. 17. of elders which rule well, or laboured in the word and doctrine: and whereas the law had taken care that no man should be condemned, but by the mouth of two or three witnesses, the apostle, knowing how much the church would suffer by the rash accusations of her governors, bishops, and presbyters, seems to rise higher, not suffering an accusation to be admitted against them, without the like number of witnesses.

[21] Ver. 20. Τοὺς ἁμαρτάνοντας, i. e. Them that sin] Grievously and scandalously, and are convinced of their offences before two or three witnesses, were to be rebuked, saith Theodoret, πάντων παρόντων, in the presence of all; such public censures being, according to the custom of the church, done by the presidents or rulers of the church, ὑπὸ πλειόνων, before and with the consent of all, as Tertullian* saith. (See note on 2 Cor. ii. 6.)

[22] Ver. 21. And our Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels.] He joins the angels with Jesus Christ, saith Theodoret, οὐχ ὡς ὁμοτίμους, ἀλλ' ὡς δούλους, not as equal in honour, but as servants to him, and those who are to attend him at the great day of judgment.

[23] Ver. 22. Χεῖρας ταχέως μηδενὶ ἐπιτίθει, Lay hands suddenly on no man.] This, saith the reverend Dr. Hammond, belongs to the laying on of the bishop's hand in absolving penitents: saith the reverend Bishop of Worcester, to the laying of hands on bishops, priests, and deacons; 1. Because St. Paul had not mentioned laying on of hands in relation to penitents in this Epistle, but he had done it with respect to ordination, and that in Timothy's own case, iv. 14. 2. Because the apostle, in this Epistle, gives no rules concerning the qualifications of penitents, saying nothing what penitents were to be reconciled, and after what time, and under what conditions they were to have hands laid on them, in token of reconciliation; nor is there a concurrent evidence of such a practice so early in the church; but he had given rules touching bishops and deacons, and their qualification; and therefore we have more cause to apply it according to the chief intention and design of this Epistle. 3. Because the great use of laying on of hands, in the New Testament, is for the setting persons apart for the discharge of a sacred office; so it was in the first institution of deacons, Acts vi. 6. and of Paul and Barnabas to a particular charge, Acts xiii. 2, 3. This was an ancient ceremony among the Jews, in the solemn designation of persons to sacred offices, Numb. xxvii. 18. 23. Deut. xxxiv. 9. either to be rulers or teachers in their synagogues; and from thence it was brought into the church, in the solemn designation of persons to the ministry. And, 4. if these words do not relate to ordination, St. Paul would have given Timothy no particular direction about that which was one main part of his office; wherefore, as he left Titus at Crete, to ordain elders in every city; so, doubtless, Timothy had the same commission, which yet is no where intimated but in these words. And, according to this sense, the following words are capable of a very good meaning, thus: Be not partaker of the sins of them, who rashly, and without due qualifications, rush upon sacred offices; for by want of due examination, and trial of them, thou wilt become partaker of their guilt.

[24] Ver. 23.] So Justin Martyr * saith, that wine is to be used for the help of the body, and the cure of inward distempers. And Plato † saith it was given for the health and strength of the body. The Essenes abstained wholly from wine, (see note on Colos. ii. 21.) but the gnostics ‡ freely used it, when they went to the heathen feasts, and otherwise.

[25] Ver. 25.] I find three expositions of these words: the first is that of St. Basil and St. Austin, which refers them to the judgment of God, thus: The good and evil works of some men are so manifest, that they may be discerned of all men before the day of judgment, and so, in discerning them, thou canst not err; but if they be latent here, and so escape thy examination and censure, they will be manifested at the great day of their accounts.

2. Others, referring this to the censures of the church, the ἐπιτιμία, mentioned ver. 20. make the sense run thus: Some men's sins are so open and notorious, as to bring them under the censures of the church, by way of precedent merit; others appear more criminal after the censures passed upon them, and so less fit to be absolved; and some men's reformation, or good works, are so manifest after censure, as to evidence they deserve absolution; and if they continue evil, or do but few good works, that also will be in time discernible: so that thou mayest know who are fit to be absolved, who not. But against this exposition there lies this objection, That no man should incur the censures of the church, but by way of precedent merit; and so no man's evil works, for which he is to be censured, should follow after that act of discipline: and, secondly, the last clause of the last verse seems, by the antithesis, to refer not to evil, but to good works, though done as the works of charity ought to be, so as not to be observed by men.

3. The ancient Greek expositors, with Grotius, refer these words to ordination, thus: When I said, Lay hands suddenly on no man, I spake not of men whose good or bad works are manifest beforehand; for they, without farther discussion or examination, may be admitted, or are to be rejected; but of those whose vices or good works are latent; for they, after examination and inquiry, cannot be long hid: and so, if thou be not hasty in laying on of hands, thou timely mayest discover them; or if by this means thou canst not do it, thou wilt not be partaker with the sinner, as having done as much as was in thy power to discover them.

CHAP. VI.

1. LET as many servants as are under the yoke (of bondage to the heathens) count their own masters worthy of all (due) honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed, (or evil spoken of, as tending to dissolve those civil obligations, but rather honoured in all estates of men, as tending to make them better in their several relations, Tit. ii. 10. and more subject even to hard and froward masters, 1 Pet. ii. 18.)

2. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are (advanced to be) brethren (and so equal to them in Christ); but rather (let them) do them service, because they are faithful (of the household of faith), and beloved (of God), [1] partakers of the benefit. These things teach and exhort.

3. If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, [2] even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, (Matt. xx. 27. He that would be first among you, let him be your servant; or, servant of all, Mark x. 44.) and to the doctrine which is according to godliness;

4. He is proud (Gr. puffed up), knowing nothing, but doating (sick) about questions and strife of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmises,

5. Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness: [3] from such withdraw thyself.

6. But (whatsoever they esteem so, we know that) godliness, with (that) [4] contentment (which attends it), is great gain.

7. (I say, with contentment, which it becometh us to have;) for we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out (of it).

8. And having (ἔχοντες δὲ, having therefore) food and raiment, let us be therewith content.

9. But (for) they [5] that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition.

10. For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

11. But thou (thou therefore), O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, [6] godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness.

12. [7] Fight the good fight of faith, (and so) lay hold of eternal life, whereunto thou art (both) called, and (according to that calling) hast professed a good profession (by enduring persecutions for it) before many witnesses.

13. I give thee charge in the sight of (that) God, who quickeneth all things (and therefore is able to raise them that suffer for him from the dead), and before Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession, (confirming truth to the death, John xviii. 37.)

14. That thou keep this commandment (given to thee, ver. 11, 12.) without spot, unrebukable, [8] until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ:

15. Which (appearance) in his times (or, in the proper season) he shall shew (forth), who is the blessed and only (absolute) Potentate, the [9] King of kings, and Lord of lords (who therefore is more to be feared than all earthly potentates, and will more assuredly punish those who submit not to his laws and government);

16. Who only hath (of himself) immortality (and so only can confer it upon others, and only lives for ever, to reward and punish), dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto (and live, and so, whom no man fully can enjoy in this life); whom no man hath seen, nor can see: to whom (be ascribed) honour and power everlasting.

17. Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, (the two diseases of rich men; for the rich man's wealth is his strong city, and as a high wall in his own conceit, Prov. x. 15. xviii. 11. and riches and strength lift up the heart, Ecclus. xl. 26.) but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy (and in whom therefore we may safely trust);

18. [10] That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate (to others of their wealth);

19. Laying up in store for themselves [11] a good foundation against the time to come, that (when these things fail) they may lay hold on eternal life.

20. O Timothy, keep that (truth) which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called:

21. Which some professing [12] have erred concerning the faith. Grace be with thee. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

[1] Ver. 2. Οἱ τῆς εὐεργεσίας ἀντιλαμβανόμενοι.] These words, being not connected to the preceding by καὶ, and the article οἱ shewing that they relate not to the predicate, but to the subject, will be best rendered thus; Because they who partake of the benefit of the service are faithful and beloved; and therefore more worthy of their service, the more they are honoured of God, and of the number of them whom we stand bound to serve in love.

That the gnostics taught any such doctrine, that Christian servants were not obliged to obey their heathen or their Christian masters, there is not the least hint in any of the commentators on this place, or in any of the fathers, who have given us the largest account of their doctrines: I find, in the epistle of Ignatius to Polycarp, these words, * Despise not men and maid-servants, nor let them be puffed up; but let them serve the more for the glory of God, that they may obtain a better liberty; let them not covet to be free from their masters: but neither doth the martyr, nor any of his commentators, intimate that this relates to any doctrine of the gnostics; and considering how much he endeavoured to imitate St. Paul, we may more probably conjecture it hath relation to this very place: moreover, though I have given you the words as Dr. Hammond translates them, yet I think the true meaning of these words, Μὴ ἐρώτωσαν ἀπὸ τοῦ κοινοῦ ἐλευθεροῦσθαι, is this, Let them not be importunate to be delivered, and made free by the church, or by her common stock; for τὸ κοινὸν signifies the community; and so, τὸ κοινὸν τῆς ἐκκλησίας, in Eusebius,* is the community, or body of the church; and also in Lucian,† where he speaks of the Christians; and τὰ κοινὰ in Aristophanes, Demosthenes, and Lucian, signifies the common stock: now it is evident from Justin Martyr and Tertullian, that the common stock of Christians was employed to buy their brethren out of bonds and servitude. (See note on 1 Cor. vii. 23. and Lucian, de Pereg. ed. Gr. p. 594, 595.)

* Δούλους καὶ δούλας μὴ ὑπερηφάνει, ἀλλὰ μηδὲ αὐτοὶ φυσιούσθωσαν, ἀλλὰ εἰς δόξαν Θεοῦ πλέον δουλευέτωσαν, ἵνα κρείττονος ἐλευθερίας ἀπὸ Θεοῦ τύχωσιν· μὴ ἐράτωσαν ἀπὸ τοῦ κοινοῦ ἐλευθεροῦσθαι. §. 4. See Coteler. in locum.

But that many of the Jews were of this opinion, and might be apt to introduce it into Christianity, we find just reason to believe; for they thought themselves privileged, by their relation to God, from being the servants of men: some of them, saith Josephus, thought it a wicked thing, μετὰ τὸν Θεὸν φέρειν θνητοὺς δεσπότας, to own, besides God, any mortal lords or masters. Their rabbins thought it unbecoming any Jew to be a bond-slave to a heathen or idolater; for that was, say they, to be "servi servorum," servants of servants, which the servants of the Lord must not be. (See Dr. Lightfoot on 1 Cor. vii. 23.)

[2] Ver. 3. Λόγοις τοῖς τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν, The words of our Lord Jesus.] This phrase being often used of the very words which Christ spake, as Matt. xxvi. 75. Acts x. 16. 20. 35. I thought fit to refer it to those words which might most likely be aimed at by the apostle; though seeing they also may refer to the doctrine of Christ, preached by the apostle, this phrase being so used, Acts xix. 10. and the doctrine of the Lord very often, 1 Thess. i. 8. 2 Thess. iii. 1. in this sense it affords this useful observation, That the words written by St. Paul in these Epistles are the words of the Lord Jesus.

[3] Ver. 5. Ἀφίστασο ἀπὸ τῶν τοιούτων, From such withdraw thyself.] From these words it is plain that the apostle speaketh here of persons then in being: that they were Jews, seems evident from the foregoing note, shewing, that they were in this matter, ἑτεροδιδάσκαλοι, men that taught otherwise; that these νομοδιδάσκαλοι, were men knowing nothing, or not knowing what they said, or whereof they affirmed, see 1 Tim. i. 9. that they did ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖν, teach otherwise than the doctrine which is after godliness, ver. 3. that they had their fables which ministered ζητήσεις, questions, ver. 4. that they had their ματαιολογίας, vain wranglings about words, ver. 6. that they had their foolish questions, which begat strifes and contentions about the law, see Tit. iii. 9. that they of the circumcision were vain talkers, teaching things which they ought not for filthy lucre's sake, see Tit. i. 10, 11. and so accounted gain for godliness; that their minds and consciences were defiled and perverted, see Tit. i. 14. that they turned aside from the faith to vain janglings, see 1 Tim. i. 6. how they were puffed up, see note on 2 Tim. iii. 4. See the defence of these words, Examen Millii in locum.

[4] Ver. 6. Αὐτάρκεια, Contentment.] This the apostle well explains by being satisfied ἐν οἷς εἰμι, in the condition we are in, Phil. iv. 4. and τοῖς παροῦσιν, with the things we have at present, with food and raiment, ver. 8. i. e. with those things which are needful for this present life, Matt. vi. 31, 32. in opposition to anxiety, distrust, or murmuring; and it is never separable from true piety, but is the natural result of that love to, and that value the good man hath for God, and the things of God; that trust he hath in God, and the entire resignation of his will, in all affairs, to the conduct of his providence.

[5] Ver. 9. Οἱ βουλόμενοι πλουτεῖν, They that will be rich,] i. e. On whom the love of money so prevails, that they are resolved they will be rich, if by any means they can compass wealth, are in the ready way to yield to any lust which will gratify their greedy humours; μηδενὸς χρηματισμὸν συντελοῦντος αἰσχροῦ μηδ' ἀνιαροῦ φειδόμενοι, abstaining (saith Plutarch*) from nothing that is base or impious that tends to enrich them: whence the ancients, agreeably to the apostle here, "avaritiam omnia vitia habere putabant," thought covetousness to comprehend all vices: as A. Gellius, lib. xi. cap. 2. from Cato, and Cicero, N. 45. in his oration, Pro Roscio Amerino, have observed: it also causeth us to make shipwreck of faith, and a good conscience, and whatsoever else is sacred, when they cannot be held without the loss of that wealth we so love and admire: whence Cicero notes,† "Nullum esse officium tam sanctum atque solenne, quod non avaritia comminuere, atque violare soleat;" That there is no duty so holy or solemn which covetousness is not wont to impair and violate.

[6] Ver. 11. Εὐσέβειαν, πίστιν, &c.] That godliness, which gives contentment, with food and raiment, and what at present we enjoy; that faith, which assures us of a better and a more enduring substance, reserved in the heavens for us; (Heb. x. 34.) that justice, which requires us to injure no man, but to let every man enjoy his own; that love, or charity, which makes us ready to distribute, and willing to communicate of these things to others; (ver. 11.) that patience, which makes us, with tranquillity and equanimity, submit to a low fortune and adversity; that meekness, which suppresses our wrath and indignation against them who are injurious to us in temporals, and take away that which is ours: all these are proper preservatives against, or indications of a mind free from, covetousness.

[7] Ver. 12. Ἀγωνίζου τὸν καλὸν ἀγῶνα, Fight the good fight.] These words are plainly agonistical, relating to the Olympic games, and particularly to that of racing, to which the apostle doth so oft allude, where the crown being hung up at the end of the goal, he that came first did ἐπιλαμβάνειν, lay hold of it, and take it to himself: and because these games were performed in the presence of many spectators, the apostle continues the allusion, saying, That Timothy had, in the presence of many witnesses, shewed his readiness to suffer for the faith.

[8] Ver. 14. Μέχρι τῆς ἐπιφανείας τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν, Till the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ.] Here, saith Grotius, it appears, that Paul speaks to Timothy, as one who might live to the last judgment: but this vain conceit hath been sufficiently confuted, note on 1 Thess. iv. 15. Nor doth this exhortation prove it; it being used, rather than that, until death, saith Theophylact, to mind us of that glorious appearance: and because, saith St. Austin,* the day of our death is, to us, as that day: Tunc enim unicuique veniet dies ille, cum venerit ei dies, ut talis hinc exeat, qualis judicandus est illo die: in quo enim quemque invenerit suus novissimus dies, in hoc eum comprehendet mundi novissimus dies.

[9] Ver. 15. Ὁ Βασιλεὺς, &c. King of kings, and Lord of lords.] This title the great empires took to themselves: the king of Babylon is so styled by Daniel, ii. 37.: by Jeremiah, xxvii. 6.: of Persia, Ezra vii. 12. (See Brisson. de Regno Pers. lib. i. p. 3, 4.) And therefore the apostle saith here, That it truly belongs to God only, and to our Lord Jesus Christ, Rev. xvii. 14. xix. 16.

[10] Ver. 18. That they do good.] See note on Tit. iii. 8.

[11] Ver. 19. Θεμέλιον καλὸν, A good foundation.] Τῶν μελλόντων ἀγαθῶν ἀπόλαυσιν θεμέλιον κέκληκεν ἀκίνητον, The enjoyment of good things to come, he calls an immoveable foundation, say the Greek commentators. So the doctrine of the resurrection is styled the foundation of God, 2 Tim. ii. 19. and the heavenly Jerusalem, a city that hath foundations, Heb. xi. 10.; and the good foundation, here, being, in the words following, eternal life, confirms their interpretation. They who think the word θεμέλιος signifies here a treasure, or an obligation on the part of God to give them life eternal, mean the same thing, though they give us no just evidence that the word hath any such signification.

[12] Ver. 21. Περὶ τὴν πίστιν ἠστόχησαν, Have erred from the faith.] These, in all reason, must be the same with the τῆς πίστεως ἀστοχήσαντες, those who erred from the faith: (i. 5, 6.) and that they were the νομοδιδάσκαλοι, the assertors and teachers of the law, and so the opposites to the gnostics, who were, saith Irenæus, "legis adversarii," adversaries of the law, the seventh verse demonstrates; as Theodoret† well observes upon the place: of them it is also certain, that they pretended, above all men, to be γινώσκοντες τὸ θέλημα, skilled in the knowledge of the will of God, and ἔχοντες τὴν μόρφωσιν τῆς γνώσεως, men that had the scheme or form of knowledge. (Rom. ii. 18—20.) They were the great assertors and promoters of the cabala, or cabalistical doctrine, which was, in their account, "scientia arcana divinitus accepta,"* a secret mystical knowledge of Divine things received from God, and equal, in their opinion, to the Scriptures, according to their rule, verba cabalæ æquiparantur verbis legis. And they, doubtless, opposed this their knowledge of the law, and of these cabalistical traditions, to the gospel taught by St. Paul, which opposed and slighted them; and their stiff adherence to them caused them, ἀστοχεῖν, to shoot off from the faith of the Messiah, which was the mark they aimed at: that therefore the ψευδώνομος γνῶσις, the falsely-named knowledge, mentioned here,† may agree to them as well as to the gnostics, is manifest from these things, that it cannot agree to the gnostics, if these persons were teachers of the law, as it is very probable they were; (see note on i. 7.) and that it cannot be attributed to Simon Magus, the father of the gnostics, of whom alone the apostle can be supposed here to speak, appears from this—that he cannot properly be said to err concerning the faith, who was so far from being then of it, that he himself set up for the Christ, and opposed the profession of the gospel with all his might. As for the gnostics, it is agreed among the learned, that though they conspired with former heretics, yet were they not known by that name, nor had they taken it upon them, till the time of Anicetus bishop of Rome, and the reign of M. Aurelius Antoninus and L. Verus, that is, not till the year 129. Hence Dr. Cave makes them a heresy of the second century. Eusebius says,‡ that Carpocrates, who flourished in the time of Hadrian, gave rise to the sect of the gnostics: but Clemens Alexandrinus seems to affirm, that one Epiphanes,§ the author of the sect of the Carpocratians, gave birth to this name and sect: and if it were so, it is improbable that the knowledge falsely so called, here mentioned, should have relation to the gnostics.

SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

THE ancients‡ from these words of this Epistle, I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand, iv. 6. do generally conclude this was the last of St. Paul's Epistles, he being, πρὸς τῷ τέλει, near the end of his life, when he writ it. And truly the words of the apostle are not well capable of any other sense; for he says expressly, ἤδη σπένδομαι, I am now offered, and the time of my dissolution, ἐφέστηκε, is instant, ver. 6. I have finished my course, ver. 7, 8. λοιπὸν, from henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of glory. Whereas he not only expected to be delivered from his first bonds, but saith expressly, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all, for your furtherance and joy of faith, that your rejoicing may be more abundant in Christ Jesus, for my coming to you again, Phil. i. 25, 26. (see ii. 24. Philem. 22.) yea, he was actually delivered, and ready to go to Judea, when he writ the Epistle to the Hebrews, xiii. 23. Secondly, This Epistle, saith Bishop Pearson, was writ from Rome, i. 17. by St. Paul in bonds, i. 8. ii. 9. Now these bonds could not be his first bonds; for then he was in "libera custodia," in his own hired house, receiving all that came to him, none forbidding it, Acts xxviii. 30, 31. yea, his bonds were known throughout Cæsar's palace, and to all others, Phil. i. 13. Here he is in "arcta custodia;" so that Onesiphorus was forced to inquire more diligently after him, that he might find him out, i. 17. Again, in his first bonds, saith he, many of the brethren of the Lord, being encouraged by my bonds, were bold to speak the word more abundantly without fear, Phil. i. 14. Here, all men forsake him, iv. 16. see a third argument for this opinion, iv. 13. a fourth, ver. 16. a fifth and sixth, ver. 20. so that I conclude, with the postscript, that this Epistle, ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Ῥώμης, ὅτε ἐκ δευτέρου παρέστη Παῦλος τῷ Καίσαρι Νέρωνι, was writ from Rome, when St. Paul stood the second time before Nero.

That this Epistle was writ to stir up Timothy to caution, diligence, and discharge of his office, on occasion of the creeping heresy of the gnostics, (ii. 17.) stolen in among them, which had much debauched the Asiatics, (i. 15.) and made use of magic, to oppose the truth of the gospel, (iii. 8.) is said by a reverend and learned person: but there is nothing in any of the ancient commentators of this nature, which speak here only of the *heresies arising from the Jewish doctors, as that which gave occasion to the writing this Epistle. And, secondly, the places cited by this reverend person, do not prove that the apostle speaketh of the gnostics: for, i. 15. he only says, all those that were in Asia had forsaken him; which they might do by cleaving to the Cerinthians and Ebionites, rather than to the gnostics. (See the note there.) That they who taught the resurrection was past already, were not gnostics, is proved, note on ii. 17. and that the words, iii. 8, 9. agree not to the gnostic heretics, but to the Jewish false teachers, who were also great magicians, is there shewed. (See note on 2 Thess. ii. 10.)

CHAP. I.

1. PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, [1] according to the promise (for declaration of the promise) of (eternal) [2] life which is (made to us) in Christ Jesus,

2. (Writeth) to Timothy, my dearly beloved son: (wishing to him) grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord (by whom all mercies are derived to us from the Father through the Spirit).

3. I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers [3] with a pure conscience, that [4] without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day;

4. Greatly desiring to see thee, being mindful of thy tears (shed when thou departedst from me), that (as then I was filled with sorrow, so, by seeing thee again) I may be filled with joy;

5. (I thank God, I say,) when I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith which is in thee which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and (in) thy mother Eunice (converted to the faith before thee; Acts xvi. 1.) and I am persuaded that (it dwells) in thee also.

6. Wherefore I put thee in remembrance, that thou [5] stir up the gift of God, which is in thee [6] by the putting on of my hands.

7. For God hath not given us the spirit of fear (as under the Mosaical dispensation; Rom. viii. 15.) [7] but (the spirit) of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.

8. Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, (i. e. of giving testimony to the death and resurrection of Christ, 1 Cor. vi. which were the great things they chiefly were to testify, Acts i. 8. 22. iv. 33. v. 32.) nor of me (though I am now) his prisoner (for that testimony): but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel (Gr. συγκακοπάθησον, suffer thou evil with the preachers of it) according to the power of God, (given thee for this end, ver. 7.

9. Even that God) who hath saved us, (i. e. designed us for salvation, 1 Thess. v. 9. see note on Eph. ii. 7, 8.) and (in pursuance of that design, hath) called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, (see note on Tit. iii. 5, 6.) which was given (i. e. determined to be given) us in Christ Jesus [8] before the world began;

10. But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ (the Lord and giver of life), who (by his death) hath abolished death, and hath brought (this) [9] life and immortality to light through the gospel:

11. Whereunto (εἰς ὃ, for which thing) I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the gentiles.

12. For the which cause also I suffer these things: nevertheless, (though I suffer thus) I am not ashamed (of my hope): for I know (in) whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that he is able to keep [10] that which I have committed to him (i. e. my soul and life, 1 Pet. iv. 19.) against (or to) that day (of recompence).

13. Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus, (i. e. with a firm faith, and true Christian love: see note on ii. 2.)

14. That good thing which was committed to thee (i. e. the doctrine of the gospel, 1 Tim. vi. 20.) keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us, (and confirms it to us, 1 John ii. 20. 27.)

15. This thou knowest (by messengers from Rome, or those who travel from thence to Rome), that all they [11] which are in Asia be turned away from (Gr. have forsaken) me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes.

16. The Lord give (i. e. shew) mercy to the [12] house of Onesiphorus, (the Ephesian, iv. 19.) for he oft refreshed me (with his presence and relief) and was not ashamed of my chain (as the rest of the Asiatics were):

17. But when he was (Gr. being) in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me.

* Αἱρέσεις ἦσαν ἐξ Ἰουδαϊκῶν διδασκάλων ἀρχόμεναι, ἅπερ ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ ἐπιστολῇ ἐπέστειλε. Chrysost. Præfat.

18. [13] The Lord (therefore) grant unto him (who shewed such mercy to me) that he may find mercy with the Lord in that day (of recompence we Christians expect): and in how many things he ministered to me at Ephesus, thou knowest very well.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. ΚΑΤ' ἐπαγγελίαν.] Ὥστέ με τὴν ἐπαγγελθεῖσαν αἰωνίην ζωὴν τοῖς ἀνθρώποις κηρύξαι, That I might declare that eternal life which is promised to men: so Theodoret. So, Tit. i. 1. Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, κατὰ πίστιν, for the promotion or declaration of the faith of God's elect; so κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν, for every cause, Matt. xix. 3. Phil. iv. 11. I speak not καθ' ὑστέρησιν, for want of any thing.

[2] Ζωῆς ἐν Χριστῷ, Life which is in Christ Jesus.] Adam brought the sentence of death upon us all, and the promise of deliverance from that death is only made to us in and through Christ Jesus, by virtue of that death he suffered in our stead.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἐν καθαρᾷ συνειδήσει, With a pure conscience.] So, Acts xxiii. 1. I have lived in all good conscience to this day before God; i. e. a conscience free from insincerity, or wilful disobedience to the dictates of his mind, or the rule by which he thought himself obliged to walk: for, as touching the righteousness which was required by the law, he was blameless; and as for his blasphemies against Christ, and his persecutions of his church, that he did ignorantly in unbelief, 1 Tim. i. 13. thinking he ought to do many things against the name of Jesus, Acts xxvi. 9. But yet he was not free from sin; for he confesses, that upon this account he was the chief of sinners, 1 Tim. i. 15.

[4] Ἀδιάλειπτον, Without ceasing, day and night.] To pray morning and evening, is to pray continually, or without ceasing: thus Zadok, and his brethren, offered burnt-offerings before the Lord continually, διαπαντὸς, morning and evening. (1 Chron. xvi. 42, 43. see note on 1 Thess. v. 17, 18.)

[5] Ver. 6. Ἀναζωπυρεῖν.] Philo * saith, that where there is any spark of true probity, being ventilated, it will shine and break forth into a flame. And this is also true, as well of spiritual gifts as graces; even the gifts of miracles, of healing, and casting out of devils, were strengthened and increased by prayer, (Matt. xvii. 21.) and by faith, (ver. 20.) and the internal gifts of wisdom and knowledge, by reading and meditating on the word; the illumination of the Holy Spirit coming then upon gifted persons when they were so employed. (1 Cor. xiv. 23—26. 1 Tim. iv. 13—15.) How they may be extinguished, see Eph. iv. 30. 1 Thess. v. 19. Thus Pythagoras, saith Jamblichus,† purged the souls of the scholars from ignorance and sensual passions, and then, ἀνεζωπύρει τὸ θεῖον ἐν ἑαυτῷ, cap. 16.

[6] Διὰ τῆς ἐπιθέσεως, &c. By the laying on of my hands.] The presbytery also laid their hands upon him, 1 Tim. iv. 14. but the χάρισμα, or gift here mentioned, being the gift of the Holy Ghost, was usually conferred by laying on of the hands of an apostle, Acts viii. 17. xix. 6. Vain therefore is the inference of Esthius from these places, that ordination is a sacrament, seeing the grace here mentioned is no ordinary grace, but an extraordinary gift, conferred only in those times by the hands of an apostle, and now wholly ceased.

[7] Ver. 7. Πνεῦμα δυνάμεως, The spirit of power,] Used Luke xxiv. 19. Acts i. 8. partly to assist us in the preaching of the gospel, ἐν δυνάμει, in the power of miracles, and in the power of the Spirit of God, (Rom. xv. 19.) and to render it effectual to the hearers, it being the power of God through faith to their salvation, (Rom. i. 16.) and preached by the apostles with great power; (Acts iv. 33. 1 Thess. i. 5. Colos. ii. 9.) and partly to enable us to endure afflictions, for the sake of Christ, τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς δυνάμεως, the Spirit of power resting upon us for that end; (1 Pet. iv. 14. and here, ver. 8.) and the spirit of love to Christ, which constrains us to our duty, (2 Cor. v. 14.) and casteth out the fear of any thing we may suffer for the performance of it; (1 John iv. 18.) and of a sound mind, Gr. σωφρονισμοῦ, of wisdom to discharge that duty, so as either to avoid dangers, (Eph. v. 15, 16. Colos. iv. 5.) by giving no offence to the heathens, or else to speak the word with convincing power, (Luke xxi. 15.) and to walk so exactly, that they may be ashamed to speak evil of us, or do evil to us, who behold our good conversation in Christ: (1 Pet. iii. 16.) all these were spiritual gifts, not now conferred in ordination, as Esthius vainly conceives.

[8] Ver. 9. Πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, Before any age hath passed.] The promise that the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head, being made at the beginning of the world, the promise of that life to which we were to be restored by this seed, and had lost by the subtilty and malice of the serpent, is said to be given πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, Tit. i. 3. (see the note there.)

Note also, that these words may be connected thus, According to his purpose before all ages, and the grace given us in Christ Jesus. And this import of the words may be confirmed from the like passages of the apostle, saying, God hath elected us in him before the foundations of the world, (Eph. i. 4.) and promised us eternal life before the world began. (Tit. i. 2.)

[9] Ver. 10. Φωτίσαντος ζωὴν, &c. Hath brought life and immortality to light.] It is to be acknowledged, that the heathens had by tradition, and the light of nature, conceived some hope of some future good things to be received after this life was ended; that being absolutely necessary, saith the apostle, that they might come to God, or do him any acceptable service: for, he that cometh to God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. (Heb. xi. 6.) But yet this hope was very weak and feeble in them, and scarce credited by their philosophers. It is styled by Cicero, Tusc. Q. 1. "Futurorum quoddam augurium sæculorum," A surmise of future ages. It is, saith Seneca,* That which our wise men do promise, but they do not prove. Socrates,† even at his death, speaks thus: I hope to go hence to good men, but of that I am not very confident; nor doth it become any wise man to be positive that so it will be. I (saith he) must now die, and yet shall live; but which of us is in the better state, the living or the dead, God only knows. Both he and Cebes* do ingenuously confess, that these things relating to the soul were disbelieved by the greatest part of mankind.

Aristotle† held, that death was therefore φοβερώτατον, the most terrible, as putting an end to all things: neither good nor evil happening to any man after his death. Yea, he says, It is absurd to say that any man can be happy after death, since happiness consists in operation. Hence Atticus‡ reckons him among those who held that souls could not remain after their bodies. And Origen§ saith, that he did τοῦ περὶ τῆς ἀθανασίας τῆς ψυχῆς λόγου κατηγορηκέναι, condemn the doctrine of the soul's immortality. The poets Sophocles, Euripides, Astydamas, agree in this, that ἄλγος δ' οὐδὲν ἅπτεται νεκροῖς, the dead are sensible of no grief or evil. (Vide Stob. Serm. 119. p. 602.)

Lipsius‖ confesseth, that amongst the stoics this was a controverted point, and was not received by them with any full consent; and whosoever reads, will find them still at their ifs and ands,¶ not knowing whether there were any thing after death, εἰ δὴ μηδέν ἐστι τελευτήσαντι, or nothing, as Socrates in Phædo speaks; whether their souls should be extinguished, or only change their place; whether they were in a state of sense, or ἐν ἀναισθησίᾳ, without sense; whether soul and body were extinguished together, or not, as Cicero, Seneca, and others; or else were still at their disjunctives, ἤτοι σβέσις, ἢ μετάστασις, fluctuating still betwixt extinction or translation, a profound sleep, a long peregrination, or an utter dissolution. (See Hyperides, apud Stob. Serm. 124. p. 618.)

Cæsar†† declares, that death removes all our evils and our torments, as leaving no farther place for joy or fear. And Pliny,‡‡ that neither soul nor body hath any more sense after death, than before it was born.

Cicero§§ begins his discourse upon this subject with a profession, that he intended to deliver nothing as fixed and certain, but only as probable, and having some likelihood of truth. And having reckoned up the different sentiments of the philosophers about it, he concludes thus,‖‖ Which of these opinions is true, some god must tell us; which is most like to truth, is a great question. And when he had confirmed, as much as he was able, the doctrine of the soul's immortality, he ingenuously confesses, "Catervæ veniunt contradicentium," *That his opinion was contradicted, not only by whole troops of the sect of Epicurus, but also by the most learned of the other sects.

Plutarch† saith, that if men will be restrained from their evil courses by fear, they must be kept under the superstition of the dread of hades; but to them who have cast off those fears must be propounded, ἡ περὶ τὸ μυθῶδες τῆς ἀϊδιότητος ἐλπὶς, the fabulous hope of immortality. And this, saith he, is one great benefit of philosophy, that it hath taught us to look upon that death which others fear, ὡς μηδὲν πρὸς ἡμᾶς, as nothing to us. Now the philosophers themselves saw the evil effects that this denial or doubting of these things would have upon the lives of men; viz.

1. That it would yield a great encouragement to men to go on in their evil ways: for if death, saith Socrates, in Phæd. p. 80. A. be the extinction of the whole, or a freedom from all evils, ἑρμαῖον ἂν αὖ τοῖς κακοῖς ἀποθανοῦσι, this will be good news to the wicked, that they have nothing to suffer.

2. That it tended to discourage men from leading virtuous and pious lives, as cramping all their hopes of happiness: for, as Dionysius Halicarnásseus‡ well observes, If the soul, when separated from the body, perisheth, it is not easy to discern how good men can be happy, who receive no fruit of their virtue here, but often perish by it.

3. That it very much staggers our patience and perseverance in virtue, and our concern for fidelity and equity, when we must suffer for them in this world: for it is truly said, by Cicero,§ that it is not possible for any one to have that esteem for faith and equity, as to endure the most dreadful punishments to preserve them, unless he be assured, that the things he hath assented to cannot be false. (See note on Heb. xi. 6.) And yet, after all this uncertainty, it is worthy of our deists to reflect on Plato's inference from his discourse upon this subject; viz. that though no wise man could be positive in these things, yet it became him to do his utmost to obtain virtue and wisdom, καλὸν γὰρ τὸ ἆθλον, καὶ ἡ ἐλπὶς μεγάλη, because great was the hope, and the prize excellent, and that it was worthy of them, κινδυνῆσαι, to make a trial, though with hazard, as if we did believe them; καλὸς γὰρ ὁ κίνδυνος, for it is (saith he) a noble trial, and it behoves us to have these things impressed upon our souls.

As for that immortality the body shall obtain at the resurrection, the heathens knew and believed nothing of it; they laughed at it, and looked upon it as a thing impossible, and unworthy of God to do, and without any example to convince them that it might be done. Hence then we see the necessity that this life and immortality should be brought to light by the gospel; and what continual thanks we owe to the blessed Jesus, who hath, by his death, not only removed the fear and sting, but even the being of death, and hath procured a blessed immortality, not only for the soul, but for the body also.

[10] Ver. 12. Τὴν παρακαταθήκην μου, My soul;] Which persons dying used to commit into the hands of God. So Josephus, de Bello Jud. lib. iii. p. 852. "The immortal soul, which hath its original from God, dwells in the body: now if any one embezzles, or evilly entreats that which is committed to him by man, he is accounted a wicked and perfidious man, εἰ δέ τις τοῦ σφετέρου σώματος ἐκβάλλει τὴν παρακαταθήκην τοῦ Θεοῦ, λελῆθέναι δοκεῖ τὸν ἀδικούμενον; if therefore any one casts the depositum of God out of his body by self-murder, can he hope to conceal himself from him that is injured?" And Philo* in like manner saith, that God hath given to man a soul, speech, and sense, which he must endeavour so to keep, that he who committed them to him may find no cause to blame him for his custody. And again,† This is the praise of the wise man, that he keeps the sacred depositum of the soul, sense, speech, the Divine wisdom, and human understanding, purely, and without deceit, not to himself, but only to him who committed them to him. And again, lib. de Abr. p. 302. No wise man (saith he) is offended that any one calls for τὴν παρακαταθήκην, his depositum: why therefore should he be offended, that God, or nature, calls for that which they have intrusted with us? And Hermes saith, lib. ii. Mandat. 2. They that lie defraud the Lord, not rendering to him τὴν παρακαταθήκην ἣν ἔλαβον, the depositum they received from him; for they received a spirit free from falsehood; and therefore by lying, ἐμίηναν τὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ παρακαταθήκην, they have defiled God's depositum. The Jews‡ make mention of two depositums of God: the lamp which is in us, or the soul; and the lamp without us, which is the law; or, according to Philo,§ θεῖον παρακαταθήκη ὀργίων, the depositum of the Divine mysteries: and they introduce God speaking thus; My light or lamp is in thy hand, and thy lamp, which is thy soul, is in mine: if thou shalt diligently keep my lamp, I will keep thine; if thou extinguishest mine, I will put out thine. This depositum they, dying, did commit into the hands of God; as you may see Sepher Tephiloth Lusitanorum.‖ The apostle seems to have respect to both these depositums in his Epistles to Timothy; to the light of the gospel, when he saith, τὴν παρακαταθήκην φύλαξον, Keep that which is committed to thee, 1 Tim. vi. 20. and here, ver. 14. to the lamp within us, ver. 13.

[11] Ver. 15. Ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ, Which are in Asia.] This Œcumenius and Theophylact expound thus, οἱ ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ, τουτέστιν, ἐκ τῆς Ἀσίας, those of Asia, that either went with him to Rome, or came to him there, or were found there at his coming, in the time of his distress, forsook all converse with him for fear of Nero. But this exposition seems not consistent with the words. For, (1.) he saith, οἶδας τοῦτο, This thou knowest: now Timothy, being not at Rome, could not well know what was done there; and therefore the apostle gives him an account how all men had deserted him in his first defence, iv. 16. But being then in Asia, or Achaia, he might know what happened there. (2.) The words ἀπεστράφησάν με, have been averse from me, seem to import a departure from St. Paul and his doctrine; and may be rendered they have turned me off. He having therefore told them long before, that after his departure grievous wolves should enter in, not sparing the flock; and that from themselves should arise men speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them; (Acts xx. 29, 30.) and charging Timothy to stay some time at Ephesus, to oppose himself to the false teachers of the Jewish nation, and to exhort the Ephesians not to give heed to these teachers of the law; (1 Tim. i. 7.) it seems most proper to refer these words to the rejecting St. Paul as an adversary to the law, by the persuasions of the Cerinthians and Ebionites, who laid this charge against him.

[12] Ver. 16. Ὀνησιφόρου οἴκῳ, The household of Onesiphorus.] Onesiphorus seemed to be dead when Paul writ this, saith Grotius on the place: and if so, saith Esthius, here is a strong confirmation of the practice of praying for the saints deceased. I answer, 1. That it follows not that Onesiphorus was dead, because St. Paul here mentions, and in the close of this Epistle salutes his family, without mention of him: the reason of that being this, because Onesiphorus was not yet returned from Rome to Ephesus, where his family was; but, as Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, say, on 2 Tim. iv. 19. was then ἐν Ῥώμῃ, at Rome, serving St. Paul. 2. The apostle here only prays that he might find mercy at the great day of recompence, as doth our liturgy, and all the ancient liturgies, for deliverance in the hour of death, and at the day of judgment; which is perfectly exclusive of prayers supposed to be made for souls in purgatory, which, if they do them any good, must be supposed to do it before that day.

[13] Ver. 18. Δῴη αὐτῷ ὁ Κύριος εὑρεῖν ἔλεος παρὰ Κυρίου. The Lord grant he may find mercy from the Lord.] Here is a plain example of the known rule of the grammarians, that the noun is frequently repeated for the pronoun: so, Gen. xix. 24. Jehovah rained fire and brimstone, meet Jehovah, Κύριος παρὰ Κυρίου, from Jehovah. So Exod. xxiv. 1—3. He, i. e. Jehovah, ver. 3. said to Moses, Ascend el Jehovah, i. e. to me. And, 1 Sam. iii. 21. Jehovah appeared to Samuel in Shiloh, bidevar Jehovah, by the word of the Lord. So Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, say here, τουτέστι, παρ' ἑαυτοῦ; and that it is the custom of the Scriptures so to speak, they prove from Gen. xix. 24. not fearing the anathema, which the great council of Sirmium, through ignorance of the Hebrew tongue, pronounced against them who did so interpret it.

1. THOU therefore, my son, (follow not the example of those that turn from me, but) be (thou) strong in (and through) the grace that is (given thee) in Christ Jesus. (See i. 6—8.)

2. And [1] the things which thou hast heard of (from) me, (established) by many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also.

3. Thou therefore (assisted by his grace) endure hardship, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

4. (Not loving this present world, or entangling thyself with the affairs of it,) for no man that warreth [2] entangleth himself with (any other of) the affairs of this life; (but quits all these concerns,) that he may (be more at leisure to) please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier.

5. And (it is in this militia, as in the wrestling at the Olympic games, where) if a man also strive (with another) for mastery, yet is he not crowned, unless he strives lawfully, (according to the rules of wrestling, i. e. unless he wrestle naked, and have put off all the clothes which might hinder him in wrestling, or give another advantage to take hold of him.

6. Nor let it discourage thee, that thou dost not receive thy wages presently, as other soldiers do; for) the husbandman that laboureth first (Gr. first labouring), must be (afterward) partaker of the fruits (of his labour).

7. Consider what I say; and the [3] Lord give thee understanding in all things (belonging to thy duty).

8. (And, to fortify thee under thy sufferings,) [4] remember that Jesus Christ, [5] of the seed of David, (after all his sufferings) was raised from the dead, according to (the testimony of) my gospel:

9. [6] Wherein (for which gospel) I suffer trouble (from the Jews, Acts xxv. 19. 26. and vi. 7. and others), as an evildoer, even unto bonds; but (though I am bound) the word of God (which I preach) is not bound, (but hath its free course.

10. And) therefore (for this cause) I endure all (these) things (cheerfully), [7] for the elect's sakes, (Col. i. 24.) that they (being confirmed by my example in suffering, 2 Cor. i. 6. xiv. 15.) may also obtain the salvation which is (tendered) in (and through) Christ Jesus, with eternal glory.

11. It is a faithful saying (that by Christ Jesus we shall obtain this salvation): for if we be dead (Gr. have died) with him (in baptism, by dying unto sin,) we shall also live with him, (in conformity to his resurrection, Rom. vi. 8.)

12. If we suffer (as he did), we shall also reign with him; (but) if (through persecutions) we deny him, he also will deny us: (Matt. x. 33.)

13. If we believe not (these promises of salvation to his faithful sufferers), yet he abideth faithfully: he cannot deny (what he) himself (hath promised).

14. Of these things put them in remembrance (in the churches of Christ), charging them before the Lord that they [8] strive not about words (which tend) to no profit, (but rather) to the subverting of the hearers.

15. Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, [9] rightly dividing the word of truth.

16. But shun profane and vain babblings: for they will increase to more ungodliness (rendering men more and more profane).

17. And their word will eat as doth a canker (or, gangrene, infecting the whole body): of whom (i. e. of the number of which profane talkers) are [10] Hymeneus and Philetus;

18. Who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already; and (by that doctrine) overthrow the faith of some.

19. Nevertheless [11] the foundation of God (the hope and promise of the resurrection) standeth sure, [12] having this (as the) seal (of it), [13] The Lord knoweth them that are his. And (therefore), Let every one [14] that nameth the name of Christ depart [15] from iniquity.

20. (And be not disturbed, that such heretics as these arise out of the members of the church;) but (δὲ, for) in a great house (such as the church is) there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some (viz. those vessels of gold and of silver, representing the orthodox Christian, 1 Cor. iii. 12. are, εἰς τιμὴν,) to honour, and some (viz. those of wood and earth, representing the heterodox,) to (uses of) dishonour.

21. If a man therefore purge himself from those (false doctrines, and the teachers of them), he shall be a vessel unto honour, [16] sanctified, and meet for the master's use (serviceable to Christ, the master of the family), and prepared unto every good work.

22. (Avoid these, therefore, and) [17] flee also youthful lusts: but follow righteousness, faith, charity, peace, with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart.

23. But (the) foolish and unlearned questions (of the Jews, see note on 1 Tim. iv. 7. Tit. iii. 9.) avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes.

24. And (for) the servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle to all men, apt to teach, patient,

25. In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves (to the gospel); if God [18] peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledgment of the truth (they contend now against);

26. And that they may recover themselves (or awake) out of the snare of the devil, [19] who are (now) taken captive by him at his will, (Gr. εἰς τὸ ἐκείνου θέλημα, to the performance of the will of God; penitents being turned from the power of Satan unto God, Acts xxvi. 18. Colos. i. 13.)

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 2. Ἃ ἤκουσας παρ' ἐμοῦ, The things which thou hast heard from me.] "That depositum, cap. i. 14. which I committed to thee, in the public assembly, at thine ordination, do thou also, in like manner, deposit with other faithful men, that the truth may be continued in an uninterrupted succession of such persons:" so Mr. Obadiah Walker. "The things agreed on, and consented to by all the other apostles, do thou commit to able men, and appoint them as bishops of the several churches under thee:" so Dr. Hammond. I think there is no foundation for all this in the text; no intimation that these things were taught him at his ordination, or that they were things agreed on, and consented to by all the apostles, as if they had met and consulted about a system of articles of faith and good life, to be held by all that taught the Christian faith; or that God chose this way to continue down the faith, in an uninterrupted succession, from age to age, of such persons; or, that this was a commission to St. Timothy to appoint bishops under him in the several churches of Asia: for he doth not appoint him as he did Titus, to ordain elders in every city, (i. 5.) the bishops of Ephesus, and the adjacent cities, being before not only appointed but convened by himself: (Acts xx. 27, 28.) the things which Timothy had heard confirmed by many witnesses, seem to refer to Christ's death, his resurrection, and ascension, which were matters of testimony, and contained the prime doctrines which St. Paul delivered to the churches, 1 Cor. xv. 3, 4. and which were confirmed by the testimony of St. Paul, the twelve apostles, and five hundred brethren, ibid. ver. 5—8. Luke xxiv. 50—52.; or to the mystery of godliness, mentioned 1 Tim. iii. 16. and testified in every part of it by men and angels. I grant also that the apostle seems to refer to some form of doctrine delivered to them who received the Christian faith, when he speaks of the mystery of faith, and the mystery of godliness, 1 Tim. iii. 9. 15, 16. of the first principles of the oracles of God, Heb. v. 12. and of the principles of the doctrine of Christ, vi. 1—4. enumerating them in the Epistle to the Hebrews; there being a faith once, and at once delivered to the saints, Jude 3. in which they were to stand fast, and for which they were to contend: (Phil. i. 27.) and that there was also a παρακαταθήκη, or depositum of Christian doctrine delivered to them who were to preach and instruct others in the faith; and which he commands Timothy to keep, 1 Tim. vi. 20, 21. as being intrusted with it, in opposition to those who had erred from the faith, which he calls the form of sound words, which he had been taught, and which he was to keep, in faith and love of the truth, 2 Tim. i. 13. and that good thing committed to him, ver. 14. which he was to keep by the Holy Ghost, the Spirit which leadeth into all truth, the unction which taught them all things belonging to their office, (1 John ii. 20. 27.) the things in which he was to continue, knowing of whom he had learned them. (2 Tim. iii. 14.) I lastly grant, that all the fathers, from Irenæus downwards, speak of such a symbol of faith delivered to the church by the apostles and their disciples, which the church received from them, and distributed to her sons, being the one and the same faith which the church retained throughout the world, than which they believed neither less nor more, and which, for substance, was the same with the Apostles' Creed. This I have * elsewhere largely proved, and thence demonstrated the falsehood of the whole doctrine of the church of Rome, and of her new creed, delivered as necessary to be believed unto salvation: and if Obadiah Walker means no more, I shall not contend with him.

[2] Ver. 4. Ἐμπλέκεται ταῖς τοῦ βίου πραγματείαις, Entangleth himself with the affairs of this world.] The apostle here, by two plain similitudes, requires Timothy, as a good soldier and bishop of the church of Christ, and an evangelist, not to engage himself in any temporal affairs or secular negotiations; of which the first is taken from the comparison of a soldier, who was, by the Roman laws,† "armis, non privatis negotiis occupari:" to be employed wholly at his arms, and not in any private business. The second is taken from the similitude of wrestlers,‡ who did not strive according to the laws, unless they wrestled naked, and put off all their garments, and therefore could not win the crown of laurel. Hence is that inquiry of St. Basil, Τίς στεφανοῖ ποτε τὸν μηδὲ ἀποδύοντα πρὸς τὸν ἀντίπαλον; Who crowns him who comes not naked to his adversary? And those words of St. Chrysostom,§ If thou art a wrestler, thou must come naked to the combat; thou must put off the affairs of this life, and be made a wrestler; divest thyself of worldly cares, for it is the time of conflict. Hence the Apostolical Canons declare, Can. iv. those bishops, priests, or deacons, ought to be deposed, who do κοσμικὰς φροντίδας ἀναλαμβάνειν, immerse themselves in worldly affairs. Cyprian* represents it as a thing worthy of the Divine judgments, that bishops, contemning the office, become proctors for secular affairs. And this practice was condemned by the general council of Chalcedon,† Can. ii. 12. and by a council of Carthage, as repugnant to these words of the apostle; and by the council of Sardica, Can. viii. And even before St. Cyprian was bishop, this was established in ‡ Africa by council, from this very text, No man that warreth, entangleth himself with the affairs of this life.

[3] Ver. 7. Δῴη.] Other manuscripts read, δώσει γὰρ, For the Lord will give thee understanding, &c. And δῴη is oft put for δώσει. So Gen. xxvii. 28. Δῴη σοι ὁ Θεὸς, The Lord shall give thee of the dew of heaven.

[4] Ver. 8. Μνημόνευε, Remember] To maintain this, against the unbelieving Jews, that Jesus Christ, the promised Messiah, of the seed of David, not of Joseph, was raised from the dead, according to the gospel that I preach, 1 Cor. xv.

[5] Of the seed of David.] It is certain, that the Jews, before our Saviour's time, thought the Messiah, the Son of David, was not to die; and therefore, when Christ had told them, he was to be lifted up, they answer, We have heard, out of the law, that the Messiah abideth for ever; and how sayest thou, That he must be lifted up? (John xii. 34.) And when first he tells his disciples of it, Peter began to rebuke him, with an absit, This shall not be unto thee. (Matt. xvi. 22.) When he tells them again of it, They understood not the word, saith St. Mark, ix. 32. It was hid from them that they perceived it not, saith St. Luke, ix. 45. And again, They understood none of these things, and this saying was hid from them; neither knew they the things which were spoken, (xviii. 34.) Surely Christ's words were plain, They shall put him to death; but they knew not how to reconcile them with their received doctrine, that he was to abide for ever; (John xii. 34.) and therefore, because Isaiah speaks so plainly of a Messiah, who was to suffer death, they invented, afterward,§ a distinction betwixt Messiah of the tribe of Ephraim, the son of Joseph, who was to die, and Messiah of the tribe of Judah, the Son of David, who was to reign, and conquer, and never die. This distinction is to be found in their Talmud, in the Targum upon the Canticles, iv. 5. vii. 3. in Bereschith Rabba, in Gen. xlix. 14. in R. Solomon, and Kimchi on Zech. xii. 10. Now if this invention obtained in the times of St. Paul, he might here have respect unto it; if not, because in the dialogue of Justin with Trypho we read nothing of it, their notion, that the Messiah of the seed of David could not die, must be confuted by his resurrection from the dead.

Remember that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead.] Theodoret here observes, that Simon Magus ‖ began to broach his heresies about this time; and he and all his followers denied that Christ had taken flesh upon him, saying, that his incarnation, or anthropism, was only in appearance, or ἐν φαντασίᾳ; and, in opposition to this heresy, he is here styled Jesus Christ of the seed of David; and because from that heresy it must follow, that he could not truly die or suffer in the flesh, and so could not be truly raised from the dead; therefore the apostle bids Timothy remember, that he was raised from the dead, who was of the seed of Abraham, according to the promise.

[7] Ver. 10. Διὰ τοὺς ἐκλεκτούς, For the elect's sake;] i. e. For the sake of Christians, who are all γένος ἐκλεκτὸν, a chosen generation, (see the note on 1 Pet. ii. 9.) and who may be confirmed in the faith, by the example of my patient sufferings, and continuing in it may obtain that salvation to which they are called. Vain therefore are these following notes of Esthius; first, that there is a certain election of God, which hath infallibly chosen us to salvation: unless he means this of a conditional election, God having infallibly determined to save them who make their calling and election sure, by perseverance in good works. (2 Pet. i. 10.) Secondly, That as Paul suffered those things only for the elect, so Christ died only for them: for, He tasted death for every man, Heb. i. 9. He died for all, 1 Tim. ii. 6. Not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world, 1 John ii. 2. For them that perish, Rom. xiv. 15. Thirdly, That neither Christ did nor ought we to do any thing that the reprobates may obtain salvation: which is horribly false; Christ's preaching to the unbelieving Jews being intended for their salvation, John iii. 17. xii. 47. and v. 34. 40. For the blinded Jews the apostle prays and labours that they might be saved, Rom. ix. 1. 11. 14.

[8] Ver. 14. Μὴ λογομαχεῖν, That they strive not about words.] Here we learn, first, What are the things which ought not to be matters of contention among Christians: 1. Such things in which we differ from each other rather in words than sense; mean the same thing, but differ only in the expressing of our sentiments: which rule observed, would put an end to many of our controversies. 2. Such things as tend to little or no profit, either as to edification in the faith, or edifying of the body in love, (Eph. iv. 16. see note on 1 Tim. i. 4. vi. 3. Tit. iii. 9.) or, by knowing which, we may be the more learned, but not the better Christians. Again, hence we learn why we should not contend about such things, viz. because they tend to beget strife and contentions, (ver. 23. 1 Tim. i. 4.) which divide Christians into parties, and dissolve or obstruct Christian charity. 2. Because they tend to the disturbance of the hearers, they not knowing to which party to adhere; and also to their subversion, causing them to doubt of the truth of that faith about which the contending parties cannot agree.

[9] Ver. 15. Ὀρθοτομοῦντα τὸν λόγον, Rightly dividing, or handling, the word of truth.] This word ὀρθοτομεῖν is a sacrificial word, relating to the right dividing of the sacrifice which was to be laid upon the altar, by cutting off and laying aside those parts which were not to be offered, and severing them from those that were: and to this sense St. Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, refer the word here, saying, that he requires Timothy to separate from the preaching of the word all noxious and idle questions, πάντα τὰ περιττὰ, all superfluous things, and give his hearers only the sincere milk of the word: and this sense agrees well with the preceding and the following words. Others think it refers to the cutting out a straight path to walk in; and so it is an admonition, saith Theodoret, to keep close to the truth of the gospel, in all his exhortations, τῷ κανόνι τῶν θείων λόγων ἑπόμενος, following the canon of the Holy Scriptures.

[10] Ver. 17. Ὑμέναιος, &c. Hymeneus and Philetus.] That these two were gnostic teachers, none of the ancients do insinuate; nor did the gnostics teach, that the resurrection was past already, but that the flesh was not fit to rise, and that it was incapable of salvation and of incorruption. So Irenæus * often doth inform us, by saying, they deny the salvation of the flesh, denying it to be capable of incorruption; and with him agree Pseud. Ignatius,† the Apostolical Constitutions, and others. Valentinus,‡ who flourished only A. D. 145. and so could not be touched at in these words, was of the same opinion, say all the ancients. So that Tertullian must either be mistaken, when, speaking of them, who held the resurrection was past already, he adds, Id de se Valentiniani adseverant, or means this not of Valentinus himself, whom he there numbers with those, "qui resurrectionem carnis infringunt," who deny the resurrection of the flesh, but of some of his followers. But then Irenæus§ informs us, that this was part of the heresy of Menander, who taught "resurrectionem per id quod est in eum baptisma accipere ejus discipulos;" that his disciples obtained the resurrection by his baptism, and so could die no more, but were to persevere immortal. Justin Martyr‖ also saith, he persuaded his disciples, ὡς μὴ ἀποθνήσκοιεν, that they should not die. He taught, saith Timothy,¶ priest of Constantinople, that they who received his baptism should be immortal, ὡς μήκετι ἀποθνήσκειν, and should never die. Now he was contemporary to Simon Magus, and so might be also with St. Paul. (See note on 1 Cor. xv. 12. 44. and Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 26. Tertul. de Anima, cap. 50.)

[11] Ver. 19. Θεμέλιος τοῦ Θεοῦ, The foundation of God.] The fundamental doctrine of the resurrection to life eternal is so styled, in these words, Let us not lay again, τὸν θεμέλιον, the foundation of the resurrection of the dead, Heb. vi. 1, 2. This is the faithful saying, mentioned ver. 11.

which he exhorts Timothy to bring to their remembrance, ver. 14. and by denying which, saith he, the Christian faith is overturned, ver. 18. But notwithstanding all the vain babblings of Hymeneus and Philetus, this foundation (saith the apostle) standeth sure.

[12] Τὴν σφραγῖδα ταύτην, Having this seal.] Sealing seems always mentioned in the New Testament for confirmation and assurance; as when the apostle saith, The seal of my apostleship are you in the Lord, 1 Cor. ix. 2. i. e. the effects I have wrought upon you, and the gifts of the Spirit imparted to you, prove the truth of my apostleship: and when he tells his converts, that by the Spirit they were sealed up to the day of redemption, 2 Cor. i. 22. v. 5. Eph. i. 13. iv. 30. and were established in the truth of the gospel: the gifts of the Spirit they had already received, according to Christ's promise, being a confirmation of that glorious redemption he had farther promised.

[13] Ἔγνω Κύριος τοὺς ὄντας αὐτοῦ, The Lord knoweth who are his.] i. e. He owns and approves those he hath commissioned to reveal his mind to others: for this expression is taken from Numb. xvi. 5. where Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, rise up against Moses and Aaron, declaring they took too much upon them, in pretending the one to be their prophet, and the mouth of God to them; the other, to be the high-priest, whom God had consecrated to his peculiar service above all others of the tribe of Levi. Now to this imputation Moses replies, according to the Septuagint, ἔγνω ὁ Θεὸς τοὺς ὄντας αὐτοῦ, God knoweth who are his, and by him separated to his service, and will maintain their cause and calling against all opposers; as in that instance he did in a wonderful manner, causing the earth to open, and swallow them up: so also will God own us his apostles against Hymeneus and Philetus, and all that set up against us and our doctrine. As therefore Moses said then to the Israelites, Depart you from the tents of those men, καὶ ἀπέστησαν, and they departed; so say I now to all Christians, Let them depart from this impiety, i. e. from these pernicious doctrines, which increase to ungodliness, and cause men to make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience.

[14] That nameth the name of Christ.] i. e. That professeth to own him, or to be his disciples: so Isa. xxvi. 33. τὸ ὄνομά σου ὀνομάζομεν, We have no other God but thee, we name thy name. (See Isa. xliii. 7. lxiii. 19. Psal. lxxx. 19. Gen. iv. 26. 2 Chron. xii. 13.)

[15] Ἀπὸ ἀδικίας.] "Justum pro vero, et injustum pro falso, frequentes tam nos quam Attici ponimus," saith Priscian; both Greeks and Latins frequently use the word injustice to denote falsehood: (see note on 1 Cor. xiii. 6.) so that these words may thus be rendered, Let every one that names the name of Christ depart from falsehood; i. e. let him preserve himself from the pernicious errors of these apostates from the truth.

[16] Ver. 21. Ἡγιασμένον, Sanctified.] The vessels of the sanctuary were consecrated to the service of God, and were also, saith the apostle, purified by the sprinkling of the blood upon them. (Heb. ix. 21.) And so are Christians sprinkled by the blood of Jesus from their sins, and consecrated by baptism to his service, and so made meet for the service of God. (See the reading of the text justified, Examen Millii, in locum.)

[17] Ver. 22.] Note, that hence it follows, that we must maintain peace with, and therefore must not separate from our communion, any person who serves Christ with a pure heart.

[18] Ver. 25. Μήποτε, If peradventure.] This word in the Septuagint answers to the Hebrew particle אוּלַי, si forte, or fortasse. So, Gen. iii. 22. xxiv. 5. 39. Μήποτε οὐ πορεύσεται ἡ γυνὴ, Perhaps the woman will not come with me; xxvii. 12. Μήποτε ψηλαφήσῃ, Perhaps my father will handle me; Μήποτε ἀγνόημά ἐστιν, Perhaps it is an error, Gen. xliii. 12. 1 Kings xviii. 27. Μήποτε χρηματίζει, ἢ μήποτε καθεύδει, If perhaps he be busy, or perhaps sleepeth. (See also Job i. 5. Luke iii. 15.) So Philo,* ἀλλὰ μήποτε ὃ λέγει τοιοῦτόν ἐστιν, Perhaps that which he saith is to this effect; and again, μήποτε οὖν τὴν τοῦ παντὸς οὐρανοῦ περιφορὰν, δι' ὑπόνοιαν εἰσάγει —μήποτε δὲ καθ' ἑτέραν ἐκδοχὴν,† Perhaps he signifies the circumference of the whole heaven—or perhaps, by another interpretation, either hemisphere: and, p. 88. F. μήποτε εἰκότως, Perhaps fitly; p. 110. D. μήποτε διὰ τὴν αὐτὴν αἰτίαν, Perhaps for this cause; and De Abrahamo, p. 285. E.

[19] Ver. 26. Ἐζωγρημένοι ὑπ' αὐτοῦ εἰς τὸ ἐκείνου θέλημα, Who are taken captive by him at his will.] Some refer this to the devil, as being the nearest substantive to the relative ἐκεῖνος. But (1.) this seems not agreeable to the use of the two relatives, which, when they come together, seldom relate to the same person. (2.) Satan is the nearest substantive rather in place than in sense, the words being capable of this construction; If peradventure God will give them repentance to do his will, that they who are taken captive by the devil, may awake out of his snare. This is the sense which best accordeth with the work of conversion and repentance, which is a recovering men from the service of Satan to the service of God; (Acts xxvi. 18.) a freeing them from sin, that they may be servants of God; (Rom. vi. 17.) a delivering men from the power of darkness, and translating them into the kingdom of his Son. (Colos. i. 13.)

CHAP. III.

1. THIS know also, that in the last days (of the Jewish economy, and the erecting of Christ's kingdom, see note on 1 Tim. iv. 1.) perilous times shall come.

2. [1] For men shall be lovers of their ownselves (i. e. their own temporal pleasures and profits), covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers (evil speakers), disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy (or profane),

3. Without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce (or cruel), despisers of those that are good,

4. Traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God;

5. Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away.

6. For of this sort are they which [2] creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sin, led away with divers lusts,

7. Ever learning (of new teachers), and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

8. Now as [3] Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses (when working his miracles in Egypt before Pharaoh); so do these also resist the truth: (being) men of corrupt minds, [4] reprobate concerning the faith. (Tit. i. 14—16.)

* Alleg. lib. ii. p. 52. B. † Cherub. p. 85. G. 86. E.

9. But [5] they shall proceed no farther (Gr. not much farther); for their folly shall be manifest to all men, as theirs also was (i. e. the folly of Jannes and Jambres).

10. But (be not troubled at such times or persons, having in me good experience of the power and readiness of God to deliver them who suffer for his sake, for) [6] thou hast fully known my doctrine, (my) manner of life, (my) purpose (to adhere to Christ, seeking his glory, not my own, and to promote his gospel to the utmost, my) faith, long-suffering, (2 Cor. vi. 6.) charity, (1 Cor. viii. 13. ix. 22. 2 Cor. xi. 29. my) patience,

11. (The) persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, (Acts xiii. 50.) at Iconium, (xiv. 2.) at Lystra, (where I was stoned, ver. 19.) what persecutions I endured (from the Jews); but out of them all the Lord delivered me.

12. Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution (especially in such perilous times; and at all times, either openly or secretly, from the hatred and malice of wicked men, or from their taunts and calumnies, which are styled persecutions, Gal. iv. 29. nor is it to be expected that it should be otherwise).

13. But (δὲ, for) evil men and [7] seducers (impostors) will (till the wrath of God takes hold upon them) wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived.

14. But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned (from me), and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them;

15. And that [8] from a child thou hast known the holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise to salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

16. [9] All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is (Gr. being inspired by God, is also) profitable for doctrine (to teach us what we are to believe), for reproof (or conviction of error), for correction (and reformation of vice, and) for instruction in (the way of) righteousness:

17. That the man of God (or teacher of it) may be perfect, (both as to his own practice and his teaching others, and so) thoroughly furnished (not to this or that only, but) to all good works (belonging to his office).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 2. ΕΣΟΝΤΑΙ γὰρ οἱ ἄνθρωποι.] That the apostle here speaks of such persons as were in being when this Epistle was indited, is evident from his command to Timothy, to turn away from them, and from the description of them.

That they were not the gnostics, or the followers of Simon Magus, seems apparent; first, because Simon Magus could not make the times perilous by any opposition he could make to Christianity, he being a despicable and beggarly magician, of whose power or endeavour to persecute the Christians, I remember not one word in church-history applicable to the times of this Epistle; but that the Jews were zealous persecutors of them, not only in Judea, but through all parts of the world where they were dispersed, both Scripture and Justin Martyr fully testify; and the supposed combination betwixt the Jews and gnostics is not only groundless, but incredible: for what accord could there be betwixt him who set up for a god, yea, for a father over all, and them who were zealous for the true God, and hated idolatry with a perfect hatred? or between them who had the highest veneration for the law and the prophets, and him who taught they were not at all to be regarded? Secondly, Because the Jews had a form of knowledge, (Rom. ii. 20.) and a zeal for God, (Rom. ix. 1.) and a settled form of worshipping the true God; they were great zealots for the observation of the sabbath, and all the sacrifices and institutions required by the law of Moses; and served God frequently day and night, (Acts xxvi. 7.) and so they had a form of godliness, though not worshipping God in the spirit; (Phil. iii. 3.) but only with these carnal ordinances they denied the power thereof: but what form of godliness do we find in Simon Magus and his followers in the times of the apostles? what profession of Christianity could he make, who set himself to oppose the apostles, and the doctrines which they taught? See a third argument against this exposition, ver. 9.

But that these characters agree to the Jews, and particularly to the Judaizing Christians and false teachers, is evident from Scripture and church-history, and from the writings of Josephus: for, Rom. i. 29—31. we have mention of gentiles that were covetous, proud, boasters, disobedient to parents, without natural affection, truce-breakers, cruel, unclean, unthankful; and, ii. 21. the Jew is condemned as doing the same things; and, ver. 22. 24. as guilty of adultery and blasphemy. They were blasphemers and false accusers of the apostles, as if they walked after the flesh, (2 Cor. x. 2.) contradicting and blaspheming Christianity; (Acts xiii. 45.) they represented it to all the world, when it was first preached, as an atheistical sect,* and were the authors of all the vile stories which the heathens objected against it: and in despising of the apostles and Christians, they were despisers of those that were good. They were great lovers and admirers of themselves, proud, boasters, and high-minded, boasting of God as their Father, and of their knowledge of the law, (Rom. ii. 17. 23.) magnifying themselves above others, (see note on 2 Cor. xi. 12. 20.) glorying in their circumcision, (ver. 18.) and in their being of the seed of Abraham, (ver. 22. Phil. iii. 5.) and exalting themselves upon these accounts above the gentiles, whom they styled dogs, and sons of the earth, and uncircumcised; whilst they were the noble, the sons of God, and his beloved people. They were διάβολοι, contentious, and obeyed not the truth; (Rom. ii. 8. Phil. i. 15, 16.) they were covetous, perverting others for filthy lucre's sake, (Tit. i. 11.) counting gain godliness, (1 Tim. vi. 5.) minding earthly things: (Phil. iii. 10.) they were fierce, heady, cruel in their persecutions of the Christians; (1 Thess. ii. 15, 16.) they were traitors and truce-breakers in their revoltings from the Roman government: they were disobedient to their parents in their corban, (Matt. xv. 5.) and without natural affection, not in that only, but in their persecution of Christians of their own family and blood: (Luke xxi. 16.) they were unholy and incontinent, defiled and abominable (Tit. i. 14, 15.) in their adulteries, and continual divorces; lovers of pleasure, making their belly their god; (Phil. iii. 19.) feasting luxuriously on their sabbaths, and given to drunkenness in their feasts of Purim. (See the reading, ver. 3. justified, Examen Millii, ibid.)

* "Ανδρας ἐκλεκτοὺς ἀπὸ Ἰερουσαλὴμ ἐκλεξάμενοι τότε ἐξαπέμψατε εἰς πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν, λέγοντες αἵρεσιν ἄθεον Χριστιανῶν ἀναφύναι, καταλέγοντες ταῦτα ἅπερ καθ' ἡμῶν οἱ ἀγνοοῦντες ἡμᾶς πάντες λέγουσιν. Justin Martyr. Dial. cum Tryph. p. 234. E. 235. A.

[2] Ver. 6.] That these perverters of men from the truth and creepers into houses, were of the circumcision, and addicted to Jewish fables, see Tit. i. 10, 11. 14.

[3] Ver. 8. Jannes and Jambres.] Though we have no mention of the names of these magicians in the Old Testament, yet were their names celebrated both among the heathens, as Pliny* and Numenius† inform us, who represent them as Egyptians skilled in the art of magic; and in the Jewish writings,‡ who do not only say that they were "principes præstigiatorum," the chief of the magicians; but also that they were the two sons of Balaam. Origen § informs us, that there was a book writ by them, bearing this title, Jannes et Mambres liber.

[4] Ἀδόκιμοι περὶ τὴν πίστιν, Reprobate concerning the faith.] So they are styled in Scripture, who, through their resistance of, and contentions against, the truth, are unworthy to have the faith made known to them, or indisposed to receive it. Thus the heathens, who, when they knew God, did not glorify him as God, neither were thankful, (Rom. i. 22. 25.) are therefore delivered up εἰς νοῦν ἀδόκιμον, to a reprobate mind: and they here who resist the truth, being men of corrupt mind, are therefore reprobate concerning the faith. (See note on 2 Cor. xiii. 5.)

[5] Ver. 9. Οὐ προκόψουσιν, They shall proceed no farther.] This agrees well with the Jewish false doctors, who were soon disabled from carrying on their false doctrines, by the destruction of Jerusalem; but not so well with the gnostic heretics, who spread themselves wide in the second century. The fancy of a reverend person, that St. Paul here prophesies, that as Jannes and Jambres perished in the Red Sea, so should Simon Magus at Rome, falling down headlong, when he was flying in the air, perish at the prayers of St. Peter and St. Paul, is in every part of it uncertain. For,

First, Though the Jews tell us Jannes and Jambres were with Pharaoh at the Red Sea, they say not that they perished there, but say they rode with Balaam to meet Balak, and lived to the making of the golden calf, and then perished. (Targ. Jon. in Numb. xxii. 22.)

Secondly, I have shewn in the preface to the Epistle to the Thessalonians, §. 6. that the story of Simon Magus's flying in the air in a fiery chariot, and being thrown down by the prayers of those two apostles, in the sight of the people at Rome, is of no credit among learned men.

[6] Ver. 10. Παρηκολούθηκας, Thou hast fully known.] Παρακολουθεῖν, relatum ad animum est, συνιέναι, saith Constantine. So the Greek commentators thought it here signified, rendering it οἶδας, μεμάθηκας ἀκριβῶς, Thou hast known, thou hast learnt exactly, as the word imports, Luke i. 4. The primary sense of it, Thou hast followed, or resembled me, in my persecutions, may also be applied to Timothy, who was in bonds at Rome also, Heb. xiii. 23. (See the note on 1 Tim. vi. 12.)

[7] Ver. 13. Καὶ γόητες, Impostors.] That the impostors among the Jews continued till the very time of the destruction of Jerusalem, more and more deceiving the people, and that the whole nation of the unbelieving Jews grew then to the highest pitch of wickedness, Josephus fully testifies. (See notes on Rom. ii. 2. 2 Thess. ii. 10.)

[8] Ver. 15. From a child thou hast learned the Scriptures.] Note here, the care of the Jews to teach their children the Scriptures even from their childhood: from five years old, say the Talmudists, we put our children to read the Bible. Josephus* informs us, that their children learning their laws, ἀπὸ τῆς πρώτης ἐνδὺς αἰσθήσεως, from the first dawnings of sense and reason in them, had them engraven in their souls: which, as it condemns the practice of the church of Rome, in withholding those sacred oracles from old and young, so also it does reprehend the generality of Christians, who are more concerned to teach their children things unnecessary, or, at the best, things only needful for this present life, than to instruct them in that word of God, which is able to make them wise to salvation.

[9] Ver. 16. Πᾶσα γραφὴ, All scripture.] Here note,

First, That the Scriptures of the Old Testament, not of the New, must be the Scriptures here intended, they only being the Scriptures which Timothy had known from a youth; that is, before the Scriptures of the New Testament were written; and so he could not speak of the Scriptures, as interpreted by them who were then guides of the church, viz. the Jewish Sanhedrin, or the scribes and pharisees; seeing they so interpreted them, as to make void the commandments of God, and to deny our Saviour to be the promised Messiah.

Secondly, Observe, that the apostle doth not say, that these Scriptures were of themselves sufficient to make Timothy wise to salvation; but only, that with faith in Christ Jesus they were sufficient for that end. Now faith in Christ Jesus doth only signify a firm belief that Jesus was the Christ, the true Messiah, the Son of God, the Saviour of the world; as is evident from these words, This is the victory over the world, even our faith, 1 John v. 4. i. e. our belief that Jesus is the Son of God, ver. 5. (See the preface to the Epistle to the Galatians, §. 2.) Hence then I argue for the perfection of the Scriptures thus: If the Scriptures of the Old Testament were sufficient to make a man wise unto salvation, provided only that he believed that Jesus was the Christ; the Scriptures of the Old and the New Testament must much more be so, because the Scriptures of the New Testament must needs more plainly and fully contain the faith and duty of all Christians, than the Scriptures of the Old only can be supposed to do.

Obj. But, saith Esthius, "If the Scriptures of the Old Testament were sufficient to make men wise unto salvation, then there is no need of the Gospels, or of the Epistles, of the New Testament."

Ans. I answer, Yes: there was need of them, both to beget in men, and to confirm this faith in Christ, they being written that we might believe, and believing might have life through his name; (John xx. 31.) and also to give the Christians of succeeding ages a more full, plain, and perspicuous knowledge of those things, which were not so fully and plainly, to the capacity of the meanest, to be learnt in the Old Testament. Thus, though the five books of Moses sufficiently contained the whole Jewish law, it follows not that the historical and prophetical books, or the hagiographa, were superfluous.

* Contra Appion. lib. ii. p. 1072. E.

Thirdly, Observe, that the apostle saith, these Scriptures were therefore able to make Timothy a Christian bishop, wise to salvation, because they were profitable for doctrine, to teach the Christian all that he was to believe, πρὸς ἔλεγχον, for the correction of every error in the faith, for the conviction of every vice they were obliged to eschew, and for their instruction in every way of righteousness; even so profitable for these ends, as to make the man of God perfect; i. e. wanting in nothing he ought to practise or believe himself or teach others, for the edification of a Christian into a perfect man in Christ Jesus, and to make him thoroughly furnished to every good work. So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, upon the place.

False therefore here is the note of Esthius, That the Scriptures are here said to be profitable, but not sufficient to these ends; vain is his subterfuge, that the apostle, by every good work, understands only "singula generum," every kind of good works, but not every good work of that kind, i. e. every work of faith and instruction in righteousness: for if these good works be requisite to make the man of God perfect, and thoroughly furnished for his office, they must be here included; if they be not, they must be needless in order to the discharge of it.

CHAP. IV.

1. I CHARGE thee therefore before God (the Father), and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead [1] at his appearing and his kingdom;

2. [2] Preach the word; be instant (in that work) in season (and) out of season (publicly and privately, by day and night, in times of peace and of danger); reprove (ἔλεγξον, repel false teachers), rebuke (evil livers), exhort with all long-suffering (though they long seem not to regard thy exhortations) and doctrine (i. e. all manner of instructions.

3. Thus it becomes thee to be instant now,) for the time will (shortly) come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears;

4. And they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto [3] fables.

5. But watch thou in all things (which respect thy office), endure affliction (patiently), do the work of an evangelist, (see the note on Eph. iv. 11.) make full proof of (Gr. fulfil) thy ministry.

6. For I am now ready to be offered (Gr. I am already poured out), and the time of my departure (or dissolution) is at hand. (See the Preface.)

7. (But be it so, this is my comfort, that) I have fought a good fight (suffering hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ), I have finished (or ran) my course, I have kept the faith:

8. (So that) henceforth (I may be confident) there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord (Jesus), the righteous judge, shall give me [4] at that day: and not to me only, but to all them also that love (Gr. hath loved) his appearing (and shewed that love by patient suffering for his sake).

9. Do thy diligence to come to me shortly:

10. For Demas hath forsaken me, [5] having loved this present world (i. e. the safety of his life), and is departed unto Thessalonica; Crescens to Galatia, Titus to Dalmatia (these two not deserting St. Paul, as Demas did, but going thither for the promotion of the gospel).

11. Only [6] Luke is with me. Take Mark, and bring him with thee: for [7] he is profitable for the ministry (Mark therefore was not then in Egypt).

12. (I say, only Luke is with me,) and (Gr. for) Tychicus have I sent to [8] Ephesus.

13. [9] The cloak that [10] I left at Troas with Carpus, [11] when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments.

14. Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil: the Lord (shall) [12] reward him according to his works:

15. Of whom be thou aware also; for he hath greatly withstood our words.

16. [13] At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men (of my acquaintance at Rome) forsook me: I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge.

17. Notwithstanding the Lord (Jesus) [14] stood with me, and strengthened me; that by me (thus standing up in defence of the gospel) the preaching (of it) might be fully known (Gr. fulfilled), and that all the gentiles might hear (my defence of it): and I was (then) delivered out of the [15] mouth of the lion.

18. And the Lord [16] shall (will) deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me to his heavenly kingdom: to whom (therefore) be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

19. Salute Prisca and Aquila, and the household of Onesiphorus. (See note on Acts xviii. 18.)

20. [17] Erastus abode at Corinth: but Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick.

21. Do thy diligence to come before winter. Eubulus greeteth thee, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren.

22. The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit. Grace be with you. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. ΚΑΤΑ' τὴν ἐπιφάνειαν αὐτοῦ, καὶ τὴν βασιλείαν αὐτοῦ, At his appearance, and his kingdom.] "This appearance (saith Mr. Mede) is the appearance of Christ, the word ἐπιφάνεια, always importing Christ's advent, who, after the resurrection, and the judgment of the quick and dead, must give up his mediatory kingdom to the Father; it therefore must signify some other kingdom, proper to Christ's second coming; and what can that be, but the kingdom of the millenium?" But,

First, This appearance of Christ is his glorious appearance, when we shall receive the blessed hope, i. e. the eternal happiness we hope for, Tit. ii. 13. when we shall appear with him in glory, Colos. iii. 4. when we shall be made like unto him, and see him as he is, 1 John iii. 2. which cannot be expected till after this supposed millenium. It is the same with the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ from heaven, 2 Thess. i. 7. his glorious revelation, 1 Pet. iv. 13. and with his παρουσία, second coming, which is, a coming with all his saints, 2 Thess. iii. 13. a coming of our Lord from heaven, 1 Thess. iv. 15, 16. Now Mr. Mede himself confesses, That he dares not so much as imagine, that the presence of Christ in the millenary kingdom would be visible upon earth: for the kingdom of Christ, saith he, p. 603. ever hath, and shall be "regnum cœlorum," a kingdom, whose throne and kingly residence is in heaven. And, thirdly, at this appearance, and his kingdom, saith the apostle, he shall judge the quick and the dead; not the dead only, but the quick and dead; not some of them only, but all of them without exception. Now the judgment of the dead, is to be after the conclusion of the supposed millenium, Rev. xx. 12.

Secondly, Though Christ will, after the judgment of the quick and dead is completed, give up his mediatory kingdom; yet, since that very judgment consists in retribution of his final punishments upon his enemies, and crowning of his loyal subjects with eternal glory, which are the two chief acts of kingly government, and the very end for which all power was committed to him, (John xvii. 2.) it very properly is styled his kingdom: and though he shall then deliver up this kingdom, as it is a kingdom, which respects the rewarding of his servants, and the punishment of his enemies, when the first shall be crowned with eternal glory, and the last doomed to endless punishments; yet shall he still continue to be King of saints, highly exalted above them in honour and dignity, and honoured still by them with religious respect and veneration.

[2] Ver. 2. Κήρυξον, Preach, &c.] In Timotheo omnes pastores officii sui commonitos esse voluit Spiritus Sanctus, Esthius.

Εὐκαίρως, καὶ ἀκαίρως, In season, and out of season.] That is, saith Chrysostom, not only when thou art in the church, but also in thine house; not only in times of peace and safety, but also when thou art in prison; not only in time of health, but even when thou art about to die.

[3] Ver. 4. Ἐπὶ τοὺς μύθους, To fables.] To the fabulous divinity of the gnostics, made up of gentilism and Judaism, say some; but it doth not appear that the fabulous divinity of the gnostics, mentioned by Irenæus, was then hatched: it is far more probable, that he here speaks of the Jewish doctors, and their fabulous traditions; for in his First Epistle he saith, he left Timothy at Ephesus, that he might charge some among them not to teach other doctrines, nor to give heed to fables and endless genealogies, 1 Tim. i. 3, 4. which, as it relates to the genealogies of the Jews, touching their tribes, their relation to the house of David, and their traditionary men (see the note there); so, ver. 7. the apostle plainly tells us, they were teachers of the law; which Simon and his followers said was not to be regarded. And in his Epistle to Titus, he sends a like exhortation to him, to preserve the Cretians from giving heed to Jewish fables, (Tit. i. 14.) and doctrines of men that turn from the truth; which the gnostics, who never sincerely embraced the truth, could not do; and to avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, καὶ μάχας νομικὰς, and quarrels about the law, as being unprofitable and vain, (iii. 9.)

[4] Ver. 8. Ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, At that day.] The council of Florence hath defined, That pure and cleansed souls, when they quit the body, are presently received into heaven, and there have a clear vision of the holy Trinity. And the Trent council, sess. 25. hath laid this as the foundation of the invocation of saints departed, that they do now, "cum Christo regnare, et æterna fœlicitate in cœlo frui;" reign with Christ, and enjoy eternal felicity in heaven. But in this they seem to deviate from Scripture and the primitive antiquity: I say, from Scripture; for,

First, Charity is represented by St. Paul as the most excellent of Christian virtues, and therefore that which will obtain the highest recompence; and yet the motive by which our Lord excites us to perform it, runneth thus, Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. (Luke xiv. 14.)

Secondly, To those who suffer death and persecution, for the name of Christ, our Lord hath promised a great reward in heaven, (Matt. v. 12.) but this reward will only be conferred upon them, at the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ from heaven with his mighty angels. (2 Thess. i. 7.) The trial of their faith shall be found to praise, glory, and honour, ἐν ἀποκαλύψει, at the revelation of Jesus Christ. (1 Pet. i. 17.) Then they, who communicate with him in sufferings, shall rejoice with him, ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει, at the revelation of his glory; (1 Pet. iv. 13.) till then, the souls of them who were slain for the word of God are represented as under the altar, Rev. vi. 9.

Thirdly, To those who feed the flock of Christ, a great reward is promised, even a never-fading crown of glory; but it is to be received then only, when the great Shepherd doth appear. (1 Pet. v. 4.) A reward is to be rendered to the servants of God, the saints, and prophets; but it is to be rendered, when the time comes that the dead shall be judged. (Rev. xi. 18.) The apostles are to have their mansions in heaven with Christ, but not till he comes again from heaven: for then, saith he, I will receive you to myself; that where I am, you may be also. (John xiv. 2, 3.)

Fourthly, The retribution to every man according to his works, is also to be made at the same time; for the Son of man will come in the glory of his Father, with his holy angels; and then will he render to every man according to his works: (Matt. xvi. 27.) At the end of the world shall the righteous shine as the sun, in the kingdom of their Father: (Matt. xiii. 40. 43.) this shall be done, in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men's hearts, (Rom. ii. 15.) and when we shall appear before the judgment-seat of Christ. (2 Cor. v. 12. Rev. xxii. 10.)

Fifthly, Hence, in the Scripture, the time of recompence and the time of judgment are represented as the same; as in these words, The time is come that the dead shall be judged, and that thou shouldest give rewards to thy servants the prophets, and to the saints. (Rev. xi. 18.) The time of glory, and of the apparition of our Lord; as in these words, When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall you appear with him in glory. (Colos. iii. 4.) The time of Christ's appearance, and of our salvation; for, He shall appear a second time without sin unto salvation. (Heb. ix. 28.) The time of his appearing, and of our beatific vision; for, when he doth appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. (1 John iii. 2.)

Sixthly, Hence Christians are so often said to expect the adoption of the sons of God, viz. the redemption of the body from corruption; (Rom. viii. 23.) to expect the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ; (1 Cor. i. 7.) to expect the Son of God from heaven; (1 Thess. i. 10.) to expect the blessed hope and glorious appearance of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ; (Tit. ii. 14.) to hope for the grace that shall be given them at the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ. (1 Pet. i. 13.)

Now let it be observed, That the body, compared to the soul, is the vilest and least considerable part of man; and therefore, the hope, the glory, the reward, inheritance, adoption, bliss, and happiness, reserved to the time of the resurrection, cannot respect the body only. Moreover, the apostle saith of the incestuous person, that his body was delivered up to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh, that his soul might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus, (1 Cor. v. 5.) which shews, that the complete salvation of the soul is then to be expected.

As for the judgment of primitive antiquity in this matter, it may be learned from these considerations:

First, That they ascribe this opinion of the soul's immediate ascent to heaven, and its enjoyment of God's immediate presence after death, to the heretics of those times; representing it as proper to the followers of Valentinus, Basilides, and Marcion; and, after them, as a part of the heresy of the Manichees. Thus Justin Martyr, speaking of those who were called Christians, but blasphemed the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, saith, in his dialogue with Trypho, p. 307. 354. They denied the resurrection, and held, ἅμα τῷ ἀποθνήσκειν τὰς ψυχὰς αὐτῶν ἀναλαμβάνεσθαι εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν, that as soon as they died, their souls were received into heaven: Irenæus saith in like manner,* That the heretics despised the formation of God, i. e. the body formed by him, and not receiving (the doctrine of) the salvation of the flesh, "simul atque mortui fuerint, dicunt se supergredi cœlos et demiurgum, et ire ad matrem vel ad eum, qui ipsis affingitur, patrem," say, That as soon as they are dead, they ascend above the heavens, and go to him whom they call their Father. And having said, that our Lord's soul went not to heaven, but continued in the place of the dead till the resurrection; he saith, This is sufficient to confound those men, "qui dicunt interiorem hominem ipsorum derelinquentem hoc corpus in super-cœlestem ascendere locum," who say, that their inward man, leaving the body here, ascends to the super-celestial mansions. And then he gives the orthodox opinion thus; † It is manifest, that the souls of the disciples of our Lord shall go into the invisible place appointed for them by God, expecting the resurrection; and then receiving their bodies, and rising with them, as our Lord did, shall come into the presence of God. Tertullian, having produced the same instance of the death of Christ, and the continuance of his soul apud inferos, till the resurrection of the body, positively concludes, that, ‡ "Nulli patet cœlum, terra adhuc salva, cum transactione enim mundi reserabuntur regna cœlorum;" Heaven is opened to none whilst the earth remains; the kingdom of heaven being only to be opened at the dissolution of the world. And in his fourth book against Marcion, he saith, § The bosom of Abraham, which is higher than the inferi, but not so high as heaven, is that which gives refreshment to the souls of the just, till the consummation of all things produces the resurrection of all, with a full reward.

The Manichees, who also denied the resurrection of the body, contended, that good souls had their whole reward immediately after death; because Christ promised to the thief, that he should be that day with him in paradise. To which objection, St. Chrysostom answers, by concession, that the thief was indeed admitted to paradise; but then he adds, that paradise was not the same with heaven, μὴ γὰρ ταῦτά ἐστι τὰ ἀγαθὰ, ἅπερ ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῖν ἐπαγγέλλεται, for it contains not the good things which God hath promised to us; and then concludes, that if God promised the kingdom of heaven, and only brought the thief into paradise, οὐδέπω ἀπέδωκεν αὐτῷ τὰ ἀγαθὰ, he hath not yet given to him the good things promised.

2. That they expressly teach, that the souls of good men remain till the day of judgment in a certain place, extra cœlum beatorum, out of heaven, expecting the day of judgment and retribution. Thus Justin Martyr* saith, that no souls die; but, τὰς μὲν τῶν εὐσεβῶν ἐν κρείττονί τινι χώρῳ μένειν, τὰς δ' ἀδίκους καὶ πονηρὰς ἐν χείρονι, τὸν τῆς κρίσεως ἐκδεχομένας χρόνον, that the souls of good men remain in a better place, the souls of bad men in a worse, expecting the day of judgment. Irenæus † gives us the tradition of the church touching this matter, thus; The presbyters, who were the disciples of the apostles, say, Those that were translated, were carried into paradise; for that place is prepared for just men, and such as have the Spirit, and there they remain till the consummation, expecting, or beginning immortality; and that there shall be new heavens and new earth; and then, Οἱ μὲν καταξιωθέντες τῆς ἐν οὐρανῷ διατριβῆς ἐκεῖσε χωρήσουσιν, They that are worthy of the celestial mansions shall go thither. Tertullian, ‡ having cited those words of the apostle, And the God of peace sanctify you throughout, in body, soul, and spirit, and keep you unblamable to the coming of the Lord, (1 Thess. v. 23.) saith thus, "Habes omnem substantiam hominis saluti destinatam, nec alio tempore quam in adventu Domini, qui clavis est resurrectionis;" Here you see the whole substance of man designed for salvation, nor at any other time but the appearance of our Lord, who is the key of the resurrection. There is a place, saith Novatian,§ "Quo piorum animæ, impiorumque ducuntur, futuri judicii præjudicia sentientes;" whither the souls of good and wicked men are carried, having some foretastes of their future judgment. And Caius, ‖ a presbyter of the church of Rome, saith, that just souls being celebrated by the angels placed over them, ἄγονται εἰς χωρίον φωτεινὸν ἐν ᾧ οἱ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς δίκαιοι πολιτεύονται, are led by them into a place of light, called the bosom of Abraham, where the just from the beginning have been; where they are delighted with the vision of the just fathers, expecting, τὴν μετὰ τοῦτο χωρίον ἀνάπαυσιν, καὶ αἰωνίην ἀναβίωσιν ἐν οὐρανῷ, after this place, their rest and everlasting habitation in heaven. Let no man think, saith Lactantius,¶ "animas post mortem protinus judicari," that souls are forthwith judged after death; they are all held in one common custody, till

[5] Ver. 10. Ἀγαπήσας τὸν νῦν αἰῶνα, Having loved this present world.] He doth not say, that Demas had forsaken the Christian religion, or that he betook himself to his own secular affairs, forsaking his attendance on the service of God in the church, or preferred the things of this life before those of a future; but, as the ancients do expound the words, he left the apostle in this time of danger, consulting the safety of his own life; for ὁ νῦν αἰὼν, in the Scripture phrase, still signifies this present life: so, οἱ πλούσιοι ἐν τῷ νῦν αἰῶνι, are those that are rich in this life. (1 Tim. vi. 17.) To live soberly, righteously, and godly, ἐν τῷ νῦν αἰῶνι, is to do it in this present life. (See Mark x. 30. 1 Tim. iv. 8.) He seems therefore only to say of him here, what he says of others, ver. 16. In my first apology no man stood by me, but all left me.

[6] Ver. 11. Luke.] Hence it appears, that Luke must be alive at the twelfth or thirteenth of Nero, when this Epistle was indited.

[7] Εὔχρηστος εἰς διακονίαν, He is profitable for the ministry.] i. e. For the work of an evangelist, (ver. 5.) As St. Peter, being shortly to put off his tabernacle, was the more diligent in giving instruction to the churches of the Jews, (2 Pet. i. 13, 14.) so was St. Paul, now in bonds, in sending his messengers to the churches of the gentiles, (ver. 10. 12.)

[8] Ver. 12. To Ephesus.] Hence it is evident, that Timothy, at the writing of this Epistle, was not at Ephesus; for if so, why should the apostle advertise him, that he had sent Tychicus thither?

[9] Ver. 13. Τὸν φελόνην, The cloak.] Or rather, the roll: for, φελόνη, saith Phavorinus, is εἱλητάριον μέμβρανον, a parchment rolled up; φελόνη εἵλητον τομάριον μέμβρανον, a folded vellum, or parchment: and Hesychius saith the same.

[10] Ὃν ἀπέλιπον ἐν Τρωάδι, Which I left at Troas.] Not when he went from Troas to Assos, in his journey to Jerusalem; for then, saith Bishop Pearson, he could have no cause to leave any thing of moment with him, having so many that accompanied him in that journey, (Acts xx. 4. 6.) and a ship still attending on them; (ver. 13.) but in his travels, after he was set at liberty, and had left Rome.

[11] Ἐρχόμενος, Coming,] Probably from thence; for he does not bid him send thither for them, or go thither to fetch them: whence it follows, that St. Timothy was then at Troas, when this Epistle was directed to him.

[12] Ver. 14. Ἀποδῴη.] The king's manuscript reads, ἀποδώσει, will or shall reward him. And all the ancients note, that this is not an imprecation, but πρόῤῥησις πρέπουσα ἀνδρὶ ἀποστόλῳ, a prediction becoming an apostle. So Pseudo Justin, Qu. et Resp. 125. So Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius, Theophylact, on the place. Who this Alexander was, or where he lived, is uncertain; as also whether he were a Christian, but zealous for the Jewish rites, as he must be, if he were the Alexander delivered up to Satan, (1 Tim. i. 20.) or a heathen, zealous, as Demetrius was, for his trade, and on that account opposing the apostle.

[13] Ver. 16. Ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ μου ἀπολογίᾳ, In my first apology.] If the date of this Epistle, contended for in the preface, stand good, this could not be his first defence of the gospel, of which he speaks, Phil. i. 17. For after that, he was set at liberty; whereas after this, he is still a prisoner, (i. 8. ii. 9.) Moreover, Timothy was then with him at Rome, as appears from the salutations then sent to the churches of Philippi (i. 1.) and Colosse, (i. 1.) from St. Paul and Timothy; yea, he was a prisoner there, even after that St. Paul was set at liberty, and so needed not to be taught how things went with the apostle then. He therefore calls this his first apology, or defence, because, after he had made it, he was still kept in bonds, (i. 8. ii. 9.) and so reserved for another hearing. He escaped then, say Chrysostom* and Œcumenius: but when he instructed Nero's butler or cupbearer in the faith, he was cut off.

[14] Ver. 17. Παρέστη, Stood by me.] In a vision, to comfort and support me; as, Acts xviii. 9. so ἐπιστὰς is used Acts xxiii. 11. and παρέστη, Acts xxvii. 23. or, to give me mouth and wisdom, according to his promise, Luke xii. 12. xxi. 14, 15.

[15] Ἐκ στόματος λέοντος, From the mouth of the lion;] i. e. Of Nero, or of Helius Cæsareanus. So when Tiberius † died, Marsyas said to Agrippa, τέθνηκεν ὁ λέων, The lion is dead. And so speaks Esther, touching Artaxerxes, Put a word into my mouth, ἐνώπιον τοῦ λέοντος, before the lion. (Esth. xiv. 13.)

[16] Ver. 18. Καὶ ῥύσεταί με, And will deliver me.] If he will deliver him, saith Chrysostom, why saith he, I am now offered? Mark therefore his words, he saith not, he will again deliver me out of the mouth of the lion; but only, that he will preserve me from every evil work, and to his heavenly kingdom.

[17] Ver. 20.] That St. Paul was in bonds when he writ this Epistle, and at Rome, he himself saith, i. 8. 17. Now this verse affords two arguments, to prove he could not be then in his first bonds: first, from these words, Erastus abode at Corinth: when was it, when St. Paul went from Corinth to go to Jerusalem? then Timothy accompanied him, at least as far as Asia, and so needed not to be told that, from Rome, so long after: it therefore must refer to the time when, saith the reverend Bishop Pearson, St. Paul went from Nicopolis to Corinth, A. D. 65. and the twelfth of Nero. Secondly, From these words, Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick: now this cannot relate to the time when St. Paul went to Miletus, near Ephesus; (Acts xx. 17.) for, as Timothy was then with him, (Acts xx, 4. 15.) so was not Trophimus then left at Miletum, but carried up thence with St. Paul to Jerusalem; (Acts xxi. 29.) nor did St. Paul ever return thither: (Acts xx. 25.) he must be therefore left at Miletus in Crete, where St. Paul was, saith Bishop Pearson, after his first bonds, A. D. 64. Ner. 10.

EPISTLE TO TITUS.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

§. 1. THAT St. Paul was at Crete, we learn from these words of this Epistle to Titus, I left thee in Crete: when he went thither is uncertain. Dr. Lightfoot conjectures that he touched there when he went from Macedonia to Greece, Acts xx. 2. "For (saith he) if we consider that after their parting at Ephesus, when Titus was sent to Corinth with his First Epistle to them, they never met till Titus cometh up to him, when he was come from Ephesus to Macedonia, 2 Cor. vii. 5, 6. we may thence learn, that in that first journey to Macedonia, he left him not at Crete, because Titus and he were not yet met again after their parting at Ephesus; and yet, at his second return thither, he had not only left him there, but writes to him to come thence to Nicopolis, bordering on Macedonia, iii. 12. so that this Epistle (saith he) must be writ in his return, or at his coming thither, A. D. 55. and not from Nicopolis, as the postscript dates it; for he saith not, I have determined to winter, ἐνταῦθα, here, but ἐκεῖ, there; which shews he was not yet come thither."

§. 2. But that it could not be written at that time, the learned Bishop Pearson proves, not only from the silence of St. Luke in that very chapter, where he so particularly enumerates all St. Paul's journeys, after he came from Ephesus, till his arrival at Jerusalem, without the least mention of his being at Crete; but saith expressly, that διελθὼν, passing through those parts (viz. of Macedonia), and exhorting them with many words, he came to Achaia, representing him still in transitu, and as passing immediately from Macedonia to Greece, not going from Macedonia farther beyond it than was to it, and then returning back to Greece, as he must have done had he gone from Macedonia to Crete, and so to Achaia. Secondly, This opinion he more demonstratively confutes from these words, iii. 12. When I send to thee Artemas, or Tychicus, make haste to come unto me to Nicopolis, for I have determined there to winter: for, besides that Artemas, before his going to Jerusalem, seems not to have joined St. Paul, and Tychicus then was part of his retinue, there is not any mention of St. Paul's going to Nicopolis, in the whole history of his journey to Jerusalem; nor is it possible he should then determine to winter at Nicopolis, who being at Philippi in the days of unleavened bread, made all the haste he could to be at Jerusalem before Pentecost, Acts xx. 6. 16. (See more to this purpose, Dissert. 1. De Success. prim. Romæ Episc. cap. 9. §. 7.) He therefore places St. Paul's journey to Crete after his freedom from his bonds at Rome, A. D. 63. and the tenth of Nero, and saith, that this Epistle was written the year following: that it was writ after his freedom from the bonds in which he was, from his going to Jerusalem, till his freedom at Rome, he gathers from this note of Chrysostom* and Theophylact, that the apostle seemeth to have been then at ease, as making no mention in it of his bonds, or his temptations, as he doth in his Epistle to the Ephesians, iii. 1. iv. 1. to the Philippians, i. 7. 13, 14. to the Colossians, iv. 18. to Philemon, ver. 1. 9. and in his Second Epistle to Timothy, i. 8. ii. 9. That after his freedom he determined to go to Philippi in Macedonia, he himself intimates, Phil. i. 26. ii. 24. "And this (saith Bishop Pearson) he did in the twelfth of Nero, in which year he wrote this Epistle." And that he writ it a little after he had been at Crete, may be gathered from those words, 2 Tim. iv. 20. Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick; which cannot be understood of Miletus near Ephesus, mentioned Acts xx. 17. for from thence he carried him to Jerusalem, Acts xxi. 29. never returning thither, Acts xx. 25. He must be therefore left sick at Miletus in Crete, mentioned by Homer,† and by Strabo.‡

§. 3. It is the opinion of all the ancient commentators upon this Epistle, that Titus was left in Crete, not only to ordain bishops in every city, and deacons to minister to them, but also to rebuke sharply, and with authority, unruly walkers; and this Epistle was writ to him, say the ancients,§ "to make him watchful over, and to oppose himself against the Jews and Judaizers in that island," as many passages in this Epistle do sufficiently demonstrate.

§. 4. But the great controversy concerning this, and the Epistle to Timothy, is, whether Timothy and Titus were indeed made bishops, the one of Ephesus and the Proconsular Asia, the other of Crete, having authority to make, καὶ τοσούτων ἐπισκόπων κρίσιν,‖ and jurisdiction over so many bishops as were in those precincts. Now of this matter, I confess I can find nothing in any writer of the first three centuries, nor any intimation that they bore that name: but this defect is abundantly supplied by the concurrent suffrage of the fourth and fifth centuries. For,

First, As for St. Timothy, he is styled bishop of Ephesus by Eusebius,* and that with respect to former histories; and the same he saith of Titus. And the council of Chalcedon† reckons from Timothy to their time twenty-seven bishops. The anonymous author of his life,‡ in Photius, makes him bishop of the metropolis of Ephesus, with seven assistants; and either he, or Photius, say, that he was constituted bishop by St. Paul; and the Apostolical Constitutions say the same,§ as do also St. Jerome,‖ and all the ancient commentators on his Epistles.

Secondly, That Titus had τὴν νῆσον ὁλόκληρον, the whole island of Crete committed to his care, is testified not only by Eusebius, but also by St. Jerome in his Catalogue, by St. Ambrose, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Œcumenius in the preface to this Epistle, to omit many others cited by Dr. Cave in the Life of Titus, p. 58, 59. Now to pass my judgment in this case:

First, I assert, that if by saying Timothy and Titus were bishops, the one of Ephesus, the other of Crete, we understand that they took upon them those churches or diocesses, as their fixed and peculiar charge, in which they were to preside for term of life; I believe that Timothy and Titus were not thus bishops: for,

First, Both Timothy and Titus were evangelists, and therefore were to do the work of an evangelist: now the work of an evangelist, saith Eusebius,¶ was this, "to lay the foundations of the faith in barbarous nations, to constitute them pastors, and having committed to them the cultivating of those new plantations, they passed on to other countries and nations."

Secondly, As for Titus, he was only left at Crete to ordain elders in every city, and to set in order the things that were wanting; having therefore done that work, he had done all that was assigned him in that station: and therefore St. Paul sends for him the very next year to Nicopolis, Tit. iii. 12. And so, according to Bishop Pearson's chronology, he was left at Crete only A. D. 64, and sent for thence A. D. 65, and returned thither, as the ancients conjecture, after the death of St. Paul: for they say he died in the ninety-fourth year of his age, and was buried in Crete.

As for Timothy, St. Paul saith, he exhorted him to abide at Ephesus when he went into Macedonia: now, as he writes to the church of Philippi in Macedonia, A. D. 62. and the ninth of Nero, that he hoped to be shortly with them, Phil. i. 25, 26. ii. 24. so, saith Bishop Pearson, he went thither A. D. 64. and the eleventh of Nero, and writ his First Epistle to him, A. D. 65. Two years after this, he sends for him to Rome, 2 Tim. iv. 9. 21. and there he continued, as the ancients conjecture, till the martyrdom of St. Paul; after which time he must, as they suppose, return to Ephesus: for they tell us, that in the reign of Domitian he was martyred in that city, and lay buried there. But since we read not any thing in Scripture of their return to either of these places afterward, and the authorities on which this return dependeth are not very ancient, we cannot much rely upon them.

Prop. 2. But if by bishops we only understand persons who had authority to ordain, and to govern the clergy of their province, and to exercise acts of discipline and censure, over more than one single congregation, I believe both Timothy and Titus had this episcopal jurisdiction, and so might properly be styled bishops. For,

First, That the jurisdiction of Titus extended to all the Christians in the whole island of Crete, is apparent from these words, For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou mightest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, Tit. i. 5. Hence is he said to have received the episcopal care, τῶν ἐπὶ Κρήτης ἐκκλησιῶν, of the churches in Crete, and to have the whole island committed to him.

And if the church at Ephesus, committed to the care of Timothy, did not exceed the compass of one particular congregation, St. Paul had very little success in the great pains he took for three whole years to teach them publicly, and from house to house, exhorting every one of them night and day, Acts xx. 30, 31. Whereas St. Paul himself informs us, that at Ephesus, a great door, and effectual, was opened to him, 1 Cor. xvi. 8, 9. St. Luke, that all that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and gentiles; that the word of God prevailed and grew mightily, and that fear fell upon them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified, Acts xix. 10. 17. 20. But that which puts this matter beyond doubt, is the observation of the learned Bishop Stillingfleet, that the elders St. Paul sends for to Miletus were all of Ephesus, and to them he commits not only the church of Ephesus, but all the flock over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers, i. e. all that had been converted in Asia, through his means, during his abode there three years. Irenæus indeed saith, he summoned them from the neighbouring cities as well as Ephesus: but (saith he) St. Paul was in so great haste, that he would not so much as go to Ephesus, nor send any whither but to that city; and yet those to whom he committed the whole flock, then in Asia, came from Ephesus to Miletus: which makes it probable, that there St. Paul had raised a nursery for the churches thereabout; as, Clemens observes, the apostles were wont to do in fruitful soils, with a prospect of such churches as were to be formed, τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν, of those that should after believe: and the same St. Clement observing that they did this, δοκιμάσαντες τῷ πνεύματι, making trial of them by their spiritual gifts, he very probably conjectures, that the twelve persons, who, when he laid his hands upon them, received the Holy Ghost, and spake with tongues, and prophesied, Acts xix. 6, 7. being thus qualified, in an extraordinary manner, to be teachers of others, might be in the number of those elders whom St. Paul charges to take heed to themselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers, ver. 28.

As to the jurisdiction belonging to them in their several districts, it is also manifest concerning Timothy, that he was set over the house of God, 1 Tim. iii. 14, 15. that in that house he was to ordain, and to lay hands on the elders to be chosen to that office, v. 22. to choose such to the episcopal office, or to the office of elders, who were duly qualified for that work, iii. 2. 7. to admit and consecrate others to the office of deacons, ver. 8. to take widows into the number of deaconesses, under such qualifications, and to refuse others, v. 9. 11. to receive accusations against the elders, v. 19. and to rebuke them, ver. 20. Which plainly shews there was a right of judging and censuring offenders in Timothy, by virtue of his office. He had power also to order the maintenance of the elders, ver. 17. to take care that the public offices of Divine worship were performed regularly, ii. 1. 8. to charge others not to teach any other doctrine than what they had received, i. 3. to command and teach with authority, iv. 11. and not to suffer others to despise his authority, ver. 12. And all these things seem plainly to belong to the trust committed to him, vi. 20.

And as for Titus, it is certain he was left in Crete by St. Paul, to set in order the things which were wanting, i. 5. and, in order to this end, to inspect the qualifications of them who were to be admitted to the episcopal office, ver. 17. and so to ordain elders in every city. And he was also to admonish and reject heretics, iii. 10.

Now I confess, that these two instances, absolutely taken, afford us no convincing arguments for a settled diocesan episcopacy, because there is nothing which proves they did or were to exercise these acts of government rather as bishops than evangelists; for it is certain that the order of evangelists was superior to that of governments, and so included an authority to do those acts of government which belonged to bishops. Accordingly, in those places where these evangelists preached, they did ποιμένας καθιστάναι,* constitute pastors, and then went on to preach in other places. Yet these things evidently follow hence:

1. That such superiority over other pastors cannot be contrary to the gospel rule; or that the nature of church-government doth not imply an equality among the governors of it: and that the apostles, if they pleased, might have fixed persons in any other churches, to exercise these acts of ecclesiastical authority and jurisdiction, as well as St. Paul placed these two persons, the one at Ephesus, the other at Crete, for these ends.

2. That it is not repugnant to the constitutions of churches in the apostolical times, for men to have jurisdiction over more than one particular congregation; for such a power Titus had over all Crete, and Timothy over many elders: which, had it been contrary to the nature of church-government, would not have been permitted, and much less ordained, by St. Paul, in any of the churches planted by him.

3. Hence also it appears, that the apostolical power of governing churches, and ordaining elders in them, was not so limited to the persons of the apostles, but that it might be communicated to others, whom the apostles would intrust with it; and therefore might be continued in the church after their decease: and if it be granted, that such an apostolical power of governing churches might be committed to others, and was actually so, by the apostles; it remains only to inquire, whether, upon their remove, or departure, they did intrust any persons in such a manner, as it is certain, from Scripture, St. Paul did Timothy, as to the churches of Asia: of which we shall discourse hereafter.

4. From these words, The things which thou hast heard from me, confirmed by many witnesses, commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also; it may be fairly argued, that the apostle here appoints St. Timothy* to constitute a succession of men vested with ecclesiastical authority, to teach them, and command others to observe them. And from those words to Titus, I left thee in Crete, to ordain elders, κατὰ πόλιν ὡς ἐγώ σοι διεταξάμην, in every city, as I ordered thee, Tit. i. 5. For a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God, ver. 7. it is also fairly gathered that a succession of bishops was to be constituted in every city, as persons that were to take care of the church of God there, 1 Tim. iii. 5. And my conjecture is, that St. Paul, after his liberty from his first bonds, having travelled into Spain and Judea, and from thence to Macedonia, began to settle this church-government in all the churches where they before were wanting; that so, after his death, they might be all provided with them: that, upon this account, Titus was sent by him to Crete, i. 5. and afterward to Dalmatia, 2 Tim. iv. 11. and that the First Epistle to Timothy was not writ to him to require him to stay at Ephesus, where bishops had been settled long before; but to instruct him how to behave himself in the church of God in general, iii. 15. doing the office of an evangelist, by ordaining church-governors where he found them wanting, and ordering other matters, as he saw them needful, in any of those places to which he resorted. But then, if we take in the suffrage of antiquity, and consult them who were nearest to the fountain of church-government, we shall find still greater reason to believe that it was διάταξις ἀποστολική, an apostolical ordinance, to appoint bishops with the chief jurisdiction over cities: for we find plainly, by the forementioned instances, that the apostles had this power in themselves, and did convey it to some others; but whether they did this universally, and with a design to continue this order, being an inquiry about matter of fact, must be proved by the best means we can use in a matter of fact of so great antiquity. Now there can be no stronger proof of such a matter of fact, than the general sense and concurrent practice of the Christian church in the ages next succeeding the apostles. And this general sense of the Christian church may be demonstrated,

1. From undoubted testimonies affording a clear evidence of this succession in the most conspicuous churches. And as for the undoubted testimonies of this succession in the most conspicuous churches, "I shall first appeal (saith the learned Bishop of Worcester) to Irenæus and Tertullian, as least liable to exception." The former not only mentions a succession of persons to the apostles; but he saith,† "the apostles committed the care of the churches to them, and left them to succeed in their places:" which implies, that as the apostles had themselves the care of ministering to the church, and the power of governing and presiding over it; so they committed it to the bishops whom they chose to succeed them. Tertullian not only mentions them in general who succeeded the apostles,* but particularly instances in Polycarp, placed by St. John at Smyrna; and Clemens, by St. Peter at Rome; and then adds, that "the other churches had bishops placed in them like to these:" so that what authority St. Clemens had at Rome, and Polycarp at Smyrna, that, Tertullian affirms, the bishops had in other churches. Now Irenæus saith, that Linus and Clemens had the episcopal power of governing the church: and as for Polycarp, he, even by the Jews† and gentiles, was styled, ὁ τῆς Ἀσίας διδάσκαλος, the master, or teacher, of Asia; by St. Jerome,‡ πάσης τῆς Ἀσίας ἀρχηγὸς, the governor of all Asia; and by Ignatius,§ κυβερνήτης, the governor of the church of Smyrna.

Add to this, these words of Mr. Dodwell, to those, who denied the presidency of bishops over the church in those ages: "What can they say to the angels in the Revelation? What, to the testimony of Irenæus, concerning St. Polycarp? What, to the testimony of Clemens Alexandrinus,‖ who mentions bishops among other officers of the church, settled by St. John? What, to the testimony of Hegesippus,¶ who makes the kinsmen of our Saviour, ἡγήσασθαι τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, to have been governors of the churches, from Domitian's time to that of Trajan? What, to those who mention St. James as made bishop of Jerusalem by the apostles themselves? What, of the seven Polycrates mentions as bishops in his own see before himself? Nay, what, to all those catalogues of bishops succeeding in the four patriarchal sees, particularly the fifteen in Jerusalem, from St. James, to the destruction of the Jews under Hadrian? Nay, what, to the succession of all the apostolical sees, to which the fathers of the second century do so solemnly appeal, to prove their own doctrine apostolical, in opposition to the contrary pretences of the heretics? Can they think them all to have been either wilful forgeries, or general mistakes, in a matter of fact, so near their own time, without so much as any likely ground in history? How will they then assure us, that they were not mistaken, in delivering to us the books of the apostles, which were not more notorious to them than their government."

2. This general sense of the church may be demonstrated, from the unreasonableness of the supposition, that the form of government, left to the churches by the apostles, should be so quickly changed, as they suppose, who do conceive that the apostles left no governors superior to presbyters, or pastors of one congregation, in the church: for it is clearly proved, by the learned bishop of Chester, that the writers of the second century distinctly mentioned these veral orders of bishops, and their inferior presbyters, in the same church; and thereby give us reason to conclude, that disparity was settled in that age, and therefore it is very improbable it should be otherwise in the preceding age of the apostles: for that, in the frame and substance of the established government of the church, a thing always in use and practice, there should be so sudden a change, so universal a corruption, in so short a time; and that all Christians, all the degraded clergy, without the least degree of opposition that we meet with, or we read of, should conspire in, or consent to, this innovation and corruption, is a thing morally impossible: for, as Tertullian* argues in a like case, "What all Christian churches did so early agree in practising uniformly, came not by error, but by tradition." The improbability of this sudden and general innovation will be farther evident, if we consider,

1. The subjects of this constitution, viz. the persons appointed by the apostles, or apostolical men, to govern and preside in every church; they being constant objects of every person's common sense, seen in every assembly, employed in every ecclesiastical affair public or private, in which Christians, sick or well, living or dying, were concerned. Now in a matter of this kind, which was the daily object of the senses of all Christians, we cannot easily conceive how they could possibly mistake, and not perceive that such a change was made, if really it was done.

Again, We shall be more convinced, that this was not performed by conspiracy, or by a joint consent of Christians, to make this alteration in that form of government which the apostles had established, if we consider,

1. The general agreement of all churches in this matter; since not one single church can be produced, in which this government did not obtain. For how can we imagine, that, in a time when no general council could meet to appoint it, and when there were no Christian princes to set it forward on a political account; and when, by reason of the heat of persecution, and the distance of Christian churches, there was so little commerce and intercourse between them, from the churches of Armenia and Persia in the east, to those of Spain in the west; from the African churches in the south, to our British churches in the north; this constitution should universally be received, and submitted to, if it had not been established by the apostles, or the first founders of those churches?

2. If we consider how much it did concern all churches, that such an innovation should not obtain amongst them, and tamely be submitted to; for all the people were obliged to know their governors, to which they were by Scripture obliged to submit, and so they could not yield to this innovation, without the greatest danger to their souls: the presbyters, if they had by the apostles been advanced to the highest power, would not so weakly have submitted to an authority usurped over them; but, either out of a just zeal to assert their freedom, or out of indignation at the insolence of the usurping bishops, or out of that unwillingness to submit and obey, which is natural to all men, would have asserted their equality.

3. This will be farther evident, if we consider, that even

* "Evolvant ordinem episcoporum suorum (hæretici), ita per successiones ab initio decurrentem, ut primus ille episcopus aliquem ex apostolis, vel apostolicis viris, qui tamen cum apostolis perseveraverit, habuerit auctorem, et antecessorem; hoc enim modo ecclesiæ apostolicæ census suos deferunt, sicut Smyrnæorum ecclesia Polycarpum ab Joanne conlocatum refert, sicut Romanorum Clementem à Petro ordinatum itidem: perinde utique et cæteræ exhibent, quos ab apostolis in episcopatum constitutos apostolici seminis traduces habeant." the persons then exalted could have no motive or temptation to accept of this advancement: for men do not easily desire a change, but upon prospect of some ease or temporal advantage; much less when they perceive the change is like to add to their trouble, and increase their danger. Now this was really the case of the first Christian bishops, they being still exposed to the sharpest fury of their persecutors, and commonly begun with first, when any storm was raised against the church: their labours also were very great; for the care of the flock lay on them, and they were unwearied in the discharge of the pastoral care. Can we then reasonably think, that they could be so fond of so much toil and peril, as to violate the institution of the blessed Jesus or his apostles to obtain it?

CHAP. I.

1. PAUL, [1] a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, [2] according to (κατὰ, for the promotion of) the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledging of [3] the truth which is after godliness;

2. [4] In (ἐπ', with that) hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, (hath) promised before the world began (i. e. from the beginning of ages);

3. But hath in due time manifested (ἐφανέρωσε δὲ καιροῖς ἰδίοις, and hath, in its proper season, manifested this) his word (of promise) through preaching (of it to the gentiles), which (office) is committed to me according to the command of God our Saviour;

4. (I, Paul, write this) to (thee, O) Titus, mine own son after the common faith: (wishing to thee) grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and (from) the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour.

5. (Advertising thee, that) for this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that (as yet) are wanting, and ordain [5] elders in every city, as I had appointed thee:

6. If any be blameless, [6] the husband of one wife, (neither guilty of polygamy, nor married again after divorce from his former wife; see note on 1 Tim. iii. 2.) having faithful children, not accused of riot, or unruly.

7. [7] For a bishop must be blameless, as (being) the steward of God; not self-willed, not soon angry, not given to wine, no striker, not given to filthy lucre;

8. [8] But a lover of hospitality, a lover of good men (or things), sober (or prudent), just, holy, temperate;

9. Holding fast the faithful word as he hath been taught (κατὰ τὴν διδαχὴν, according to the doctrine of Christ and his apostles), that he may be able by sound doctrine [9] both to exhort (both to admonish, or instruct in sound doctrine,) and to convince the gain-sayer.

10. For there are many unruly [10] and vain talkers (in Crete) and deceivers (of men's minds), [11] especially those of the circumcision:

11. Whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not (to teach), for filthy lucre's sake.

12. One of themselves (even Epimenides), [12] a prophet of their own, said, The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, [13] slow bellies (i. e. gluttons).

13. This witness is true (of them who inhabit Crete, whether natives or Jews). Wherefore [14] rebuke them sharply (ἔλεγχε αὐτοὺς ἀποτόμως, convince them powerfully), that they be sound in the faith;

14. Not giving heed [15] to Jewish fables, and commandments of men, who turn from the faith.

15. (For, whatsoever they may say or think, concerning unclean meats, persons, or things,) to [16] the pure (the gentile, whose heart is purified by faith,) all things are pure (in their use): but unto them that (though they count themselves the only pure persons) are defiled and unbelieving is nothing (truly) pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled (and by that their actions).

16. [17] They profess that they know God (above others, Rom. ii. 17.) but in works they (practically) deny him, being abominable (now, to him, of whom they were once beloved), and disobedient, and to every good work reprobate.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. ΔΟΥΛΟΣ Θεοῦ, A servant of God.] He writes not this to confirm his authority to Titus, who doubted not at all of it; but to confirm it to others with whom he did converse, or to whom this Epistle might come; it being of use not only to direct Titus then, but all bishops and rulers of the church for ever.

[2] Κατὰ πίστιν, For the promotion of the faith of God's elect.] i. e. The faith of Christians in the general, they being all γένος ἐκλεκτὸν, an elect generation, 1 Pet. ii. 9. and St. Paul being an apostle in reference to them all, to them to whom he was a saviour of death, as well as to them to whom he was a saviour of life, 2 Cor. ii. 16.

[3] Τῆς κατ' εὐσέβειαν ἀληθείας, The truth which is after godliness.] The mystery of godliness, 1 Tim. iii. 16. The doctrine which is after godliness, 1 Tim. vi. 3. This is therefore only necessary to be believed, so far as that belief is necessary to a holy life. To confirm this inference, let these following arguments be considered:

First, That which hath the promise of this life, and that which is to come, must be sufficient to secure us of the enjoyment of the life to come; but godliness, saith the apostle, hath the promise of this life, and that which is to come, 1 Tim. iv. 18. Ergo, again, that which hath contentment is great gain, and must sure avail us to salvation, seeing, without salvation, we can gain nothing which is truly good; but godliness with contentment is great gain, 1 Tim. vi. 6. Ergo,

Secondly, If this be the great end, for which ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡ σωτήριος, the saving grace of God hath appeared to us, viz. To teach us that, denying all ungodliness, and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godlily, in this present world; and if, by doing so, we may expect the blessed hope and glorious appearance of our Lord with comfort, then must this holiness administer to us an assurance of our future happiness. Now, all this is the express saying of St. Paul, Tit. ii. 11, 12. 14. Ergo,

Thirdly, By what we do entirely attain the end for which our Saviour died, or suffered on the cross, by that we must attain assurance of the benefits of his death and passion, viz. remission of sins, justification, and salvation; but this we do, by dying to sin and living unto righteousness; that is, by being holy in our lives and conversations: for Christ bore our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sin, might live to righteousness, 1 Pet. ii. 24. And to as many as are thus conformed to his death, by dying unto sin, he hath promised that they shall be conformed to him in likeness of his resurrection, Rom. viii. 11. Faith therefore can be no farther necessary, than it is requisite to engage us to die unto sin, and to live to righteousness.

Fourthly, This will be farther evident even from the nature of true holiness; for seeing that consisteth in a participation of the Divine nature, 2 Pet. i. 4. in putting on the new man, which is created after God, in righteousness and true holiness, Eph. iv. 24. in being holy in all manner of conversation, as he that has called us is holy, 1 Pet. vi. 11. it plainly follows, either that they who live to God, who are like him in holiness, who have the image of God instamped upon them, and who are made partakers of the Divine nature, may, notwithstanding, perish everlastingly, or that true holiness may render us secure of happiness.

Fifthly, It seems evident, that a good and a wise God cannot reveal things only to stuff our heads with notions, when they have no influence upon our hearts to make us better: since, then, to disbelieve them would be pernicious, and yet the believing them would do us no good, and a wise God must require this faith to no end, his design in requiring us to believe in Jesus Christ being this, that believing we may have life through his name, John xx. 31. and the very end of our faith is the salvation of our souls, 1 Pet. i. 9. he therefore can require us to believe nothing but what hath a real tendency to the obtainment of that life, and that salvation, which is the end of our whole faith.

[4] Ver. 2, 3.] Note, By comparing these two verses with those words in Timothy, He hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus, πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, before the world began; but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel; whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the gentiles, 2 Tim. i. 9—11. I say, from these words compared together, it may be inferred,

First, That the promise of eternal life, mentioned in both places, is the promise of calling those gentiles, to whom St. Paul was an apostle, to that faith which had the promise of eternal life annexed to it: for this promise God is said to have performed, by St. Paul's preaching this word of life to the gentiles.

Secondly, That this hope of eternal life was not made manifest till the appearing of our Saviour, and the preaching of his gospel to the world; he having brought life and immortality to light by the gospel, 2 Tim. i. 10. and manifested the hope of it by the preaching of the word of faith.

Thirdly, Seeing no such promise could be made to men, no such grace given to them, before there were any men in the world, these words, πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, cannot properly be rendered, before the world began; but, as Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Œcumenius, render them, ἄνωθεν ἐξ ἀρχῆς, of old time, or from the beginning: so, the revelation of the calling of the gentiles is styled, The revelation of the mystery, χρόνοις αἰωνίοις σεσιγημένου, kept secret from men since the world began, Rom. xvi. 25. but now manifested by the Scriptures of the prophets. This promise therefore was contained in the writings of the prophets, and either must relate to the promise made to Adam immediately after the fall, That the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head, which was a promise made from the beginning, and πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, before any of the three ages of the world were passed; or, to the promise made to Abraham, That in his seed should all the families of the earth be blessed, which was a promise made a long time ago, and before the first age of the world expired. So Zacharias speaks of the promise of the Messias, made διὰ τῶν ἀπ' αἰῶνος προφητῶν, by the holy prophets from the beginning, Luke i. 70. And Jerusalem is mentioned as an apostatizing city, ἀφ' ἡμέρων αἰῶνος, from the days of old, Ezra iv. 15. 19. and, ἀπ' αἰῶνος, of old, Esd. ii. 23. 26. If it refer to the promise or declaration made to Adam, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, that must be a declaration that the Messiah should exempt us from that mortality the serpent had brought upon the seed of Adam, and consequently a promise that he should procure for us a happy resurrection to eternal life: if we refer it to the promise made to Abraham, In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed, we, by that blessing, being made the adopted sons of God, and heirs according to the promise, Gal. iii. 29. must have a title by it to the redemption of our bodies, and must become sons of the resurrection to eternal life, and by it receiving the promise of that Spirit, which is the earnest of that inheritance, Gal. iii. 14. must thereby be assured of it.

[5] Ver. 5. Πρεσβυτέρους.] Hence it appears, that at the first conversion of the Cretians to the faith, they had no bishops or presbyters set over them, but had all their church-offices performed by men assisted by that Holy Spirit, which God shed on them abundantly, through faith in Christ, (iii. 6.) though out of these, bishops and deacons usually were chosen: but then it is observable, that things were then wanting; or, that this was a deficiency in that church.

[6] Ver. 6. Μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἀνὴρ, The husband of one wife.] Here Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, have well observed, against the heretics and papists, that marriage is so honourable, that any clergyman may ascend to the episcopal throne with it, ὥστε μετ' αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν ἅγιον θρόνον δύνασθαι ἀναβαίνειν, Chrysost. Theoph.: yea, that he may do the office of a bishop, and retain the nuptial bed, ὡς δυναμένου καὶ μετὰ γάμου ἐπισκοπῆς προνοεῖν τινος. Œcumenius.

To shew the antiquity of that interpretation of those words, The husband of one wife, which I incline to, St. Jerome saith, that, "Quidam de hoc loco ita sentiunt, Judaicæ, inquiunt, consuetudinis fuit vel binas uxores habere, vel plures, quod etiam in veteri lege de Abraham, et Jacob, legimus; et hoc nunc volunt esse præceptum, ne is qui episcopus est eligendus, uno tempore duas pariter habeat uxores." He also seems to shew his dislike of the other opinion, in these words, "Multi superstitiosius magis quam verius, etiam eos, qui cum gentiles fuerint, et unam uxorem habuerint,—qua amissa, post baptismum Christi alteram duxerint, putant in sacerdotio non eligendos."

[7] Ver. 7. Ἀνέγκλητον εἶναι, (I left thee in Crete to ordain elders; if any be blameless;) for a bishop must be blameless.] Hence, say the Greek and Latin commentators, it is manifest that the same person is called a presbyter in the fifth, and a bishop in the seventh verse, Καὶ ἐντεῦθεν δῆλον ὡς τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους ἐπισκόπους ὠνόμαζον, εἰρηκὼς γὰρ ἵνα καταστήσῃς κατὰ πόλιν πρεσβυτέρους, ἐπήγαγε, Δεῖ γὰρ ἐπίσκοπον ἀνέγκλητον εἶναι· ἐν ἑκάστῃ δὲ πόλει οὐκ ἐπισκόπους, ἀλλὰ πρεσβυτέρους ἔθος εἶναι πόλλους, Theodoret. *When he had said, I left thee in Crete, that thou mightest ordain presbyters in every city, "postea intulit; oportet enim episcopum sine crimine esse, tanquam Dei dispensatorem; idem est ergo presbyter qui episcopus:" he after makes this inference, For a bishop must be blameless: the bishop therefore and presbyter are here the same. The reverend and learned Bishop Pearson proves, from St. Clemens of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen, that in their judgment, the apostle speaks of presbyters properly so called; as doth also Theodoret, from this argument, That the apostle requires presbyters in the plural to be ordained in every city, whereas there was to be only one single bishop in a city. But I find no answer to the argument, that the same person is a presbyter in the fifth, who is a bishop in the seventh verse; and therefore I still incline to the opinion of Chrysostom, Theodoret, St. Jerome, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, that the names were then common.

A bishop must be blameless.] St. Jerome, understanding this of presbyters, speaks to the bishops thus; "Audiant episcopi, qui habent constituendi presbyteros per urbes singulas potestatem, sub quali lege ecclesiasticæ constitutionis ordo teneatur:" and then proceeds thus; "At nunc cernimus plurimos hanc rem beneficium facere, ut non quærant eos qui possunt ecclesiæ plus prodesse et in ecclesia erigere columnas; sed quos vel ipsi amant, vel quorum obsequiis sunt deliniti, vel pro quibus majorum quisquam rogaverit, et ut deteriora taceam, qui ut clerici fierent, muneribus impetrarunt."

[8] Ver. 8. Φιλόξενον, A lover of hospitality.] Not in the modern sense of keeping hospitality, that is, a great table for persons of quality to come to; but, say St. Chrysostom and Theophylact, τὰ αὐτοῦ τοῖς ξένοις προϊέμενος καὶ τοῖς δεομένοις, one so far from filthy lucre, that he spends what he has upon the stranger and the poor. Σώφρονα οὐ τὸν νηστευτὴν εἶπεν ἐνταῦθα, ἀλλὰ τὸν πάθους κρατοῦντα, He saith sober, i. e. not one that is much in fasting, but an exact governor of his passions, his tongue, hands, and eyes.

[9] Ver. 9. Παρακαλεῖν.] i. e. Νουθετεῖν, Theoph. See Rom. xii. 8. Τὸ δὲ μάλιστα χαρακτηρίζον τὸν ἐπίσκοπον, τὸ διδάσκειν ἐστὶν, The chief character of a bishop is τὸ διδασκαλικὸν, his ability to teach, say Chrysostom and Theophylact.

[10] Ver. 10. Ματαιολόγοι, Vain talkers.] That the Jews were ματαιολόγοι, vain talkers, and ἑτεροδιδασκαλοῦντες, teachers of things which they ought not, we learn, 1 Tim. i. 3, 4. 6. and that they were desirous of filthy lucre, robbing and devouring those they taught, see 2 Cor. xi. 20. Of the covetousness of the pharisees, the great sticklers for the necessity of circumcision, and of the observation of the law of Moses, by all Christians, (Acts xv. 5.) our Saviour gives us a large account, Matt. xxiii. 14. 25. Luke xvi. 14. Their mouths must be stopped, not with force, but with conviction, (ver. 2.) by such strength of conviction, say the fathers, as will not suffer them to speak any thing by way of answer, or gainsaying the truth.

[11] Μάλιστα δὲ οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, Especially they of the circumcision.] He doth not say, Especially those gentiles or Samaritans, who are advocates for the observation of the Jewish law, but οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, they of the circumcision, which, throughout the New Testament, signifies the Jews, men of that nation and religion: so Acts x. 45. And οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, The Jews which came with Peter were amazed, when they saw the gift of the Holy Ghost poured out upon the gentiles; Acts xi. 2. οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, The Jews contended with Peter, saying, Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them. (See Rom. iv. 12. xv. 8. Gal. ii. 7—9. Eph. ii. 11. Colos. iv. 11.) Moreover, the gnostics and Simonians were so far from being advocates for the observation of the Jewish law, that it was one part of their doctrine, * νόμῳ καὶ προφήταις μὴ χρᾶσθαι, that no man should observe the law or the prophets: (see note on 1 Tim. i. 7.) they therefore cannot be the men here intended.

[12] Ver. 12. Προφήτης, A prophet of their own.] Theodoret expressly says, this poet was Callimachus; Œcumenius and Theophylact cite the words of Callimachus, and so doth Chrysostom, though he confesses the poet was Epimenides. Callimachus it could not be, for he was no Cretian, but a Cyrenian, nor hath he this whole verse, but only the beginning of it, Κρῆτες ἀεὶ ψεῦσται, which, saith St. Jerome, he borrowed from Epimenides; who by Plato† is styled ἀνὴρ θεῖος· by Diodorus Siculus,‡ ὁ θεόλογος, the divine; by Diogenes Laertius,§ θεοφιλέστατος, and γνωστικώτατος, one skilled in divination; by Cicero,‖ "futura præsentiens, et vaticinans per furorem," one that foretold things future by ecstasy; by Plutarch,¶ σοφὸς περὶ τὰ θεῖα, a wise man concerning Divine things; by Apuleius, Fatidicus, a soothsayer; by Maximus Tyrius,†† δεινὸς τὰ θεῖα, one skilled in divine things; by Dion Prusiensis, and the apostle here, one of their prophets.

[13] Γαστριμαργός.] Ἄπληστος, Suidas. Γαστριμαργοὶ, ἀκρατεῖς, ἄπληστοι, πολυφάγοι, Hesych. Γαστριμαργία ἀκρασία περὶ τὴν τροφὴν, Clem. Al. Pæd. lib. ii. cap. 1. p. 146. C. Vide Jul. Polluc. lib. ii. cap. 4. p. 109. 37. cap. 111. 26.

[14] Ver. 13. Ἔλεγχε αὐτοὺς ἀποτόμως, Rebuke them sharply.] If these words relate to the Cretians deceived by the Jews, as the verse following seems to hint, they are fitly translated, Rebuke them sharply. To be sound in faith, is, say Œcumenius and Theophylact, to retain it so as it was delivered by the apostles, without adding any thing to it from Judaism or gentilism, and especially without adding to it the necessity of observing the Jewish law or rites by the gentiles.

[15] Ver. 14. Ἰουδαϊκοῖς μύθοις.] By Jewish fables, some here understand the gnostics' cabalistical interpretations of the Old Testament: but (1.) if we look into Irenæus, we shall find their senseless interpretations chiefly related to the New Testament. Their thirty æones they gathered from the thirty years our Saviour spent in silence, before he preached, and from the parable of those who wrought in the vineyard, and from St. Paul; from whom he shews, lib. i. cap. 1. p. 16. 18. they gathered most of their wild fancies, and so they must, in time, be after the writing of his Epistles. (2.) It does not appear, that the cabalistical Jews had any such interpretations as favoured the mad doctrines of the gnostics. The fathers therefore generally interpret these words of the vain traditions of the Jews, especially concerning meats, and other things, to be abstained from, as unclean, which our Lord also styles the doctrines of men, Matt. xv. 9. and of the teachers of them, St. Paul, in his Epistle to Timothy, saith, that they were turned from the faith, 1 Tim. i. 5, 6. And this, saith Œcumenius, is evident from the ensuing words.

[16] Ver. 15. To the clean all things are clean.] Here, saith Jerome, "Considerandum ne ista tractantes, occasionem illi hæresi demus, quæ juxta apocalypsin, et ipsum quoque apostolum Paulum scribentem ad Corinthios, putant de idolothytis esse vescendum, quia omnia munda sunt mundis."

[17] Ver. 16.] It is the opinion of all the ancient commentators upon the place, that the apostle speaks this "adversus Judæos," against the Jews, nor is there any thing said in these two verses which may not be applied to them. For,

First, We have observed already how the Scripture gives those very names to the unbelieving Jews, which they were wont to give unto the gentiles, styling them dogs, Phil. iii. 2. as they styled the gentiles; and vessels of wrath, Rom. ix. 22. 1 Thess. ii. 16. who thought themselves the only vessels of mercy; and here (ver. 15.) defiled, who counted themselves the only pure servants of God, Neh. ii. 20.

Secondly, Of their profession to know God, when in works they denied him, the apostle gives a large account, Rom. ii. from ver. 17. to ver. 25. and again, chap. iii. from ver. 10. to ver. 19. That they were abominable in the sight of God, our Lord not only saith of the pharisees, Luke xvi. 15. but St. Paul of the Jews in general, declaring, that they pleased not God; yea, they were so displeasing to him, that wrath was come upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. Of their disobedience to the law, we read in the forecited places of the Romans, and of their evil works, Phil. iii. 2. 2 Cor. xi. 13. 15. And, lastly, that a defiled mind and conscience polluted all their actions, even those that were done according to the will and the command of God, see Isa. i. 11. 16. lxvi. 3. Jer. vi. 20. Amos v. 21, 22.

CHAP. II.

1. BUT (howsoever they live and teach) speak thou the things which become sound doctrine:

2. (To wit,) that [1] the aged men be sober, grave, temperate, sound in faith, (sincere) in charity, and (constant in) patience.

3. The [2] aged women likewise, that they be in behaviour (in habit and gesture) as becometh holiness, not false accusers, not given to much wine, teachers of good things (of piety, charity, chastity, to those with whom they do converse);

4. [3] That they may teach the young women to be sober, to love their husbands, to love their children,

5. To be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands, [4] that the word of God be not blasphemed (by reason of their crimes).

6. Young men likewise exhort to be sober-minded (Gr. σωφρονεῖν, to govern not only their concupiscible, but their irascible passions).

7. In all things shewing thyself a pattern of good works: in doctrine shewing uncorruptedness, gravity, [5] sincerity,

8. [6] Sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part (whether Jew or gentile) may be ashamed (of his opposition to you), having no evil thing to say of you.

9. Exhort servants to be obedient to their own masters, and to please them well in all (lawful) things; [7] not answering again;

10. Not purloining (or filching from their masters), but shewing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things (belonging to their station).

11. For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men (as well servants as masters, yea, to men of all nations),

12. [8] Teaching us that, denying (all) ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world;

13. Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearance of [9] the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ;

14. Who gave himself for us, that he might [10] redeem us from all iniquity, and (so might) purify to himself [11] a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

15. These things speak, and exhort, and rebuke (the opposers of this doctrine) with all authority. Let no man despise thee (but use the censures of the church, and deliver up to Satan those Jews who gainsay this doctrine).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 2. ΠΡΕΣΒΥΤΑΣ, The aged.] See the note on Philem. 9. So the word signifies in all the other places of the New Testament where it is found; so ἐγὼ γάρ εἰμι πρεσβύτης, I am aged, saith Zacharias, Luke i. 18. and Παῦλος πρεσβύτης is Paul the aged, Philem. 9. And in this sense the true St. Jerome, and all the Greek commentators on the place, expound it. The reverend Dr. Hammond thinks it here signifies church-officers, and in particular the deacons, mentioned in Timothy, after the bishops, 1 Tim. iii. But of five qualifications there required of the deacons, (ver. 8.) the apostle here mentions only one, that of gravity; nor is it necessary that these πρεσβύται should be church-officers, because the apostle here enumerates their qualifications: for, as St. Jerome on the place observes, he reckons up the qualifications of the younger women, ver. 4, 5. and of the younger men, ver. 6. and of the servants, ver. 9, 10. But hence it will not follow that they were church-officers: nor, secondly, because Titus was sent to ordain such; for we find not that he was sent to ordain any but presbyters or bishops, ii. 5. 7. though doubtless he did ordain deacons to attend them.

[2] Ver. 3. Πρεσβυτίδας.] That the aged women here import the deaconesses of the church, some of the commentators say was the opinion of some ancients; and indeed they were so necessary, 1. for the baptism of women, when that was performed by dipping, as in the apostles' days it was; and, 2. for the converting some young women to, and the instructing others in, the faith they had already owned (which aged women, though not permitted to speak in the church, might do in private houses, without scandal; but the apostles, and a young Timothy, could scarcely do without suspicion); that for these reasons I doubt not but this office obtained in the first preaching of the gospel.

[3] Ver. 4. Ἵνα σωφρονίζωσι τὰς νέας, That they may teach or admonish the young women.] Stephanus renders the words thus, That they may teach them by chastisement; but women, who had husbands and children, as these in the next verse are supposed to have, were not to be chastised by others. Observe then, that young men and women become wise by hearkening to the admonitions and instructions of persons aged and experienced in the practice of it, and they who were set over the youth and the young women for this end were called by the Greeks σωφρονιστῆρες, that is, directors of their manners, because they admonished them how to behave themselves in their stations: hence σωφρονιστὴς is by Hesychius rendered νουθετὴς, an admonisher, and in Julius Pollux, σωφρονίζειν is νουθετεῖν, to admonish, and σωφρονισμὸς is the same with νουθεσία, admonition, lib. iii. cap. 17. p. 153. lib. xli. &c.

[4] Ver. 5. That the word of God be not blasphemed.] For, say Theodoret and Theophylact, when wives leave their husbands, or servants their masters, προφάσει τῆς εὐσεβείας, from a pretence of religion, they cause men to speak evil of the gospel.

[5] Ver. 7. Ἀφθαρσίαν, Sincerity.] This word is not to be found in Chrysostom, Theophylact, nor in many copies; but it is in Theodoret, Œcumenius, Cod. Alex. Arab.

[6] Ver. 8.] The doctrine to be preached must be pure, and free from all corrupt mixtures; it must be entire, so as to want nothing necessary to be known; it must be such as is ὑγιὴς, wholesome and beneficial to the hearer; it must be delivered with gravity and with care, that there be nothing spoken which may be subject to reprehension. And he that teacheth it must in his conversation practise suitable to what he teacheth, lest his own heart should inwardly condemn him, and he should be condemned both by God and man from his own mouth.

[7] Ver. 9. Μὴ ἀντιλέγοντες, Not answering again.] Not murmuring against their commanders, nor contradicting them, but only with submission pleading their own cause; for that even nature doth allow.

[8] Ver. 12.] The first thing Christianity requires of them, who would enjoy this saving grace, is to deny all practical ungodliness, by carefully abstaining from all idolatry, superstition, and false worship, and to discard all those principles which tend to cherish in us a profane and irreligious conversation, viz. all principles of atheism and infidelity, all denial of providence, and of a future recompence; for as all our false worship will render our whole service vain, and our pretended piety a provocation, so these pernicious principles will render our religion none at all: for how can he be seriously employed in religious actions who questions the very object of religion, denies the motives to it, and reckons it a vain thing to serve the Lord?

Secondly, To deny all worldly lusts; i. e. all inordinate affections to the enjoyments of this present world, as knowing, that the friendship of this world is enmity to God; all the pollutions which are in the world through lust; (2 Pet. ii. 20.) walking not in riot and drunkenness, in banquetings and revelling, in lasciviousness and uncleanness, in strife and envy; but putting on the Lord Jesus Christ, and making no provisions for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof. (Rom. xiii. 13, 14. 1 Pet. iv. 2, 3.)

Thirdly, To live soberly, in the due moderation of all our appetites, the exact government of all our passions, and in the regular exercise of our affections and desires; i. e. we must so far restrain our angry passions, that they do never indecently boil up within us, or break forth into opprobrious words or rancorous expressions, or proceed to malicious and spiteful actions; and that we never do exert them, but upon occasion of something which is truly evil, and displeasing to God, or when it may be for the benefit of others: we must so moderate our affections to, and our desires of, all worldly things, as to sit down contented with our present portion, not being anxiously solicitous about them, not pursuing them by unlawful means, not much cast down when we loose them, nor much delighted with them when we do enjoy them; but living still as men whose conversation is in heaven, and whose hearts are chiefly set on things above. We must so temper our desires of applause and reputation in this world, as only to pursue it by exact regards to what is virtuous and praiseworthy, and for virtuous ends, the doing good to others; never endeavouring to obtain or to preserve it by any sinister attempts, sinful compliances, or by neglect of duty. We must so regulate the cravings of the throat, and the gratifications of the palate, as not to eat or drink to the impairing of our health or reason, to the inflaming of our lusts or passions, or to the rendering ourselves unfit for the performance of that duty which we owe to God. We must be so moderate in reference to the pleasures of the world, that all the pleasures in which we do allow ourselves may be still ἡδοναὶ ἀμεταμέλητοι, such as call for no repentance; we must pursue them with such indifference, as that we can freely deny ourselves in the enjoyment of them, when the concernments of God's glory, or the welfare of our own or other men's souls is prejudiced by them; preferring still the pleasures of religion much above them.

Fourthly, We must live righteously, i. e. in all the offices of exact truth and justice betwixt man and man, being true in our words, exact to the performance of our promises, doing no injury to any in his good name, estate, or person, much less in the concernments of his soul, but dealing still with others as we would be dealt with.

We must live, δικαίως, charitably; preserving an unfeigned good-will, an affectionate kindness to, and having a sincere concernment for, the good of all men; and this affection must restrain us not only from biting them with the tongue, suspecting evil of them, or doing evil to them; but must engage us to hope well, and believe well of them, where we know nothing to the contrary; to rejoice in their prosperity, to be ready to promote it, to sympathize with them in their afflictions; and, as far as we are able to supply their wants, relieve their miseries, and contribute to the ease and comfort of their lives; and more especially to labour to prevent their ruin, and further the eternal interests of their precious souls; to conceal the evil that we know of others, where no necessity, i. e. no duty to ourselves, our brother, or the public, requires us to divulge it; to endure all things, without returning evil for evil; to be long-suffering, and bear with patience the infirmities of others: that, lastly, upon any reasonable submission, any fair acknowledgment of the offence, any desire of reconciliation, we be easy to be entreated, and ready to forgive: in a word, that in all cases of the same kind, we prefer the public before our private interest.

Fifthly, To teach us to live godlily: 1. By keeping up a high esteem, an admiration of God in our minds, acknowledging his excellences, by our repairing to and our continual dependance on his wisdom, power, and goodness, in our addresses to the throne of grace; by ascribing all the mercies we enjoy to his sole, free, and undeserved goodness, and therefore highly esteeming them, paying the tribute of our praises, and suitable returns of duty for them, and by performing that public and external homage to the author of them, which may best testify to others the inward veneration we have for him. 2. By yielding a firm assent to all his revelations, depending on his all-sufficiency and goodness, to order all things for us to the best, and hoping in his mercy for preservation from, or support under, and a good issue from, the troubles of this present life, and a supply of all those blessings which he sees needful for us, or most conducing to our good. 3. By valuing him as our chief and all-sufficient good, the only proper object of our happiness, and upon that account preferring him before whatever stands in competition with him; having none in heaven but him, and none on earth that we desire in comparison with him; doing all things to his glory, and for the promotion of his honour, and being zealous to remove whatsoever doth obstruct or oppose it. 4. By being in the fear of the Lord all the day long, and herein exercising ourselves to have always consciences void of offence towards God, so that we never wilfully do any thing which argues a contempt of him, or is a provocation to the pure eyes of his glory. 5. By acquainting ourselves with his sacred will, that we may do it; esteeming all his commandments, concerning all things, to be right; yielding a cheerful, constant, and sincere obedience to them, labouring to walk before him to all well-pleasing; and when we are convinced that we have deviated from his good and holy laws, returning by a speedy and sincere repentance and reformation of our evil ways. 6. By an humble submission to his chastisements, and a contented acquiescence in all the dispensations of his providence, and an entire resignation of ourselves and our concernments to the pleasure of his good and holy will.

Thus Philo doth inform us, That he that would be truly virtuous, must, in the first place, μεταναστεύειν τοῦ σώματος, become an exile from the enjoyments of the body, so far as not to be enslaved, ἐπιθυμίαις καὶ ἡδοναῖς, to the importunate desires of worldly things, or to the pleasures of the world, οὔτε φόβοις οὔτε λύπαις, nor to the fears of losing them; nor to excess of grief, that he doth not enjoy them: that, being thus prepared, he must govern his whole life by these three rules or canons, τῷ φιλοθέῳ, καὶ φιλαρέτῳ, καὶ φιλανθρώπῳ, the love of God, the love of virtue, and the love of man. (Lib. quod omnis probus liber, p. 676. C.)

[9] Ver. 13. Τοῦ μεγάλου Θεοῦ, The great God.] Here it deserveth to be noted, that it is highly probable, that Jesus Christ is here styled the great God; first, because in the original the article is prefixed only before the great God, and therefore seems to require this construction, the appearance of Jesus Christ the great God, and our Saviour. Secondly, Because, as God the Father is not said properly to appear, so the word ἐπιφάνεια never occurs in the New Testament, but when it is applied to Jesus Christ, and to some coming of his; the places in which it is to be found being only these, 2 Thess. ii. 8. 1 Tim. vi. 14. 2 Tim. i. 10. iv. 1. 8. Thirdly, Because Christ is emphatically styled our hope, the hope of glory, Colos. i. 23. 1 Tim. i. 1. And, lastly, Because not only all the ancient commentators on the place do so interpret this text, but the Ante-Nicene fathers also; Hippolytus,* speaking of the appearance of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ; and Clemens of Alexandria,† proving Christ to be both God and man, our creator, and the author of all our good things, from these very words of St. Paul. (Vid. Tract. de Vera Christi Deitate, p. 44, 45.)

[10] Ver. 14. Ἵνα λυτρώσηται, &c. That he might redeem and purify.] The words λυτρῶσαι and καθαρίσαι, here used, being sacrificial; the first signifying redemption, by paying a price, here said to be, the giving himself; the second, to purify from the guilt of sin, by an atonement offered for it; (Heb. ix. 22. 1 John i. 7. 9.) I conceive the import of them to be this, That Christ our Saviour gave himself a ransom for us, to redeem us from the guilt and punishment of our sins; that being, by this atonement, thus purified and reconciled to God, we might become, as the Jews were before, a peculiar people to him, and upon that account zealous of good works.

[11] Λαὸν περιούσιον, A peculiar people.] So segullah is rendered by the Septuagint, Exod. xix. 5. You shall be to me, λαὸς περιούσιος, a peculiar people above all people; Deut. vii. 6. Jehovah thy God hath chosen thee to be unto him, λαὸν περιούσιον, a peculiar people above all the people of the earth: so, xiv. 2. xxvi. 18. This, by the Chaldee, is always rendered—a beloved people. This title belonged to all Israël in general, Psal. cxxxv. 4. Jehovah hath chosen Jacob for himself, and Israel for his peculiar people. As therefore all Israel, being sanctified to the Lord, became to him a peculiar treasure, and a beloved people, above all other nations or religions in the world; so are now all Christians, God having purified their hearts by faith. (Acts xv. 9.) Secondly, As then salvation was of the Jews, (John iv. 22.) and belonged to others, only by being proselytes so far as to own their God, or their religion; so now that salvation which is promised in the gospel, and which consists in life eternal, is promised only to them who own the God and Saviour of the Christians, or embrace their religion: for this is the testimony that God hath given us eternal life; and that life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son hath not life. (1 John v. 11, 12.)

CHAP. III.

1. PUT them in mind to be [1] subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates, to be ready to (Gr. for) every good work,

2. To speak evil of no man, to be no brawlers (Gr. no fighters), but gentle, shewing all [2] meekness to all men (with whom they do converse).

3. [3] For we [4] ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful (to) and hating one another. (See i. 10—12.)

4. [5] But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man appeared,

5. Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration (in baptism), and (by the) renewing of the Holy Ghost (given then to the baptized);

6. Which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour;

7. That being (thus) justified by his (free) grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

8. This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they who have believed in God might be careful [6] to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto men.

9. [7] But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain.

10. [8] A man that is a heretic after the first and second admonition reject;

11. Knowing that he who is such is subverted, and sinneth, being condemned of himself.

12. When I shall send Artemas unto thee, or Tychicus (to supply thy absence, say the ancients), be diligent to come unto me to [9] Nicopolis: for I have determined there to winter.

13. Bring Zenas the lawyer and Apollos on their journey diligently, (and see) that nothing be wanting to them.

14. And let ours (i. e. Christians) also learn to maintain good works for necessary uses, that they be not unfruitful. (See note on ver. 8.)

15. All that are with me salute thee. Greet them that love us in (and for) the faith. Grace be with you all. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. ΑΡΧΑΙΣ καὶ ἐξουσίαις ὑποτάσσεσθαι, To be subject to principalities.] Besides the turbulent spirit of the Jews then in Crete, Suidas* hath left upon record concerning them, that the Cretians, fearing they should suffer punishment from their superiors, stirred up the people, exhorting them to maintain the liberty which they always had enjoyed. By which we see how needful this instruction was.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἐπιείκεια, Meekness.] This is that virtue which inclines us to be easy and merciful to offenders, kind in interpreting the actions of others, and yielding, in matters of our own concern, for peace' sake: and we shew all meekness, not by being never severe (for severity, at some times, towards some persons, is necessary), but by being mild in all cases, in which the circumstances of time, place, and persons, will admit of it.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἦμεν γάρ ποτε, For we ourselves were sometimes.] That these were the vices that reigned in the heathen world, see Rom. i. 26. 31. xiii. 13. Colos. iii. 5. 8. That the Cretians were prone to disobedience, we have proved from Suidas: that they were foolish, and deceived, is evident from their multitude of false gods, mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, lib. v. and their vain imagination, in thinking that their gods were mortal, with which Callimachus charges them. The lusts and pleasures they served were unnatural lusts, say Œcumenius and Theophylact: of which the Athenian, in Plato,* speaketh thus to Clinias of Crete; Of unnatural lusts your cities are chiefly guilty; for, taking up your laws from Jupiter, and retaining the fable of his Ganymede, they committed this unnatural lust in imitation of their Jupiter.

[4] Καὶ ἡμεῖς, We ourselves.] I cannot think, as St. Jerome doth, that St. Paul here condemns himself as one formerly guilty of all these vices; for then he could not have said, that he had lived, before his conversion, in all good conscience towards God; (Acts xxiii. 1.) that he had served God, from his progenitors, with a pure conscience; (2 Tim. i. 3.) and that, as to the righteousness which was by the law, he was blameless. (Phil. iii. 6.) Nor is any thing more common with St. Paul, than to speak thus, in the person of those to whom he writes. (See the note on Eph. ii. 3.)

[5] Ver. 4—7.] For the explication of these four verses, let it be observed;

First, That the apostle, in the very next verse, saith, This is a faithful saying; and of this I will that thou affirm constantly, that they who have believed in God should be careful to maintain good works: and, as he saith, that we are justified by grace; so doth he teach us, that this grace hath appeared, for this very end, to teach us, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, to live righteously, soberly, and godly, in this present world, looking for this blessed hope; clearly insinuating, that without living godly, righteously, and soberly, we cannot reasonably hope for happiness at our Lord's second coming. Wherefore these words could never be intended to excuse Christians from a necessity of being holy, in order to their being happy.

Secondly, That the apostle only saith, We are not saved by works of righteousness which we have done, before faith, before the laver of regeneration; but doth not in the least exclude the works of righteousness they should hereafter do, by virtue of the new nature given to them, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, from being conditions of their future happiness; and therefore hence it doth not follow, as Esthius suggests, that God hath predestinated us to salvation, of his mere mercy, without any respect to our works; but only, that he hath thus freely called any nation to the knowledge of that faith, that will, in the end, bring salvation to them that obey the prescripts of it.

Thirdly, That when the apostle saith, By his mercy he saved us; his meaning is, that by his free mercy he brought us from a state of wrath and condemnation, into the way of salvation; in which if we walk, and continue, we shall assuredly obtain salvation. (See note on Eph. ii. 8, 9.)

Fourthly, Some, by the laver of regeneration, understand that inward renovation which cleanseth the soul, as washing doth the body; but that the apostle, by the laver of regeneration, understands that baptism by which Christians, coming then from heathenism, engaged to renounce idolatry, the works of the flesh and of the world, and dedicated themselves to the service of the sacred Trinity, and testified their faith in Christ, cannot reasonably be doubted, if we consider,

First, How expressly our Saviour saith, We must be born again of water and of the Holy Ghost, that we may enter into the kingdom of God: (John iii. 5.) how he commis-

* Οἱ δὲ Κρῆτες φοβούμενοι μή τι τιμωρίας τύχωσιν, ἀνέστιον τὰ πλήθη, παρακαλοῦντες ἐξ αἰῶνος παραδεδομένην ἐλευθερίαν διαφυλάττειν. Voce ἀνέστιον.

* Καὶ τούτων τὰς ὑμετέρας πόλεις πρώτας ἂν αἰτιῶτο——πάντες δὲ δὴ Κρητῶν τὸν περὶ Γανυμήδη μῦθον κατηγορεῖτε, ὡς λογοποιησάντων τούτων, ἐπειδὴ παρὰ Διὸς αὐτοῖς οἱ νόμοι πεπιστευμένοι ἦσαν γεγονέναι, τοῦτον τὸν μῦθον προστεθεικέναι, ἵνα ἑπόμενοι τῷ Θεῷ καρπῶνται καὶ ταύτην τὴν ἡδονήν. Plato de Leg. lib. i. p. 776. D.

sionated his apostles to make disciples in all nations, by baptizing them; (Matt. xxviii. 16.) and how, from the beginning, the word παλιγγενεσία, regeneration, used here, was used to denote baptism, as Justin Martyr,* Irenæus,† and Clemens of Alexandria,‡ do inform us.

Secondly, That the same apostle elsewhere ascribes this virtue to baptism, saying, that Christ doth purify and cleanse his body, by the washing of water; (Eph. v. 26.) and that St. Peter saith, that baptism now saves us; (1 Pet. iii. 21.) and that baptism, at the first, was still attended with the vouchsafement of the Holy Ghost, here joined unto this laver of regeneration: (John iii. 5.) so that all Christians are said to be baptized into one Spirit, 1 Cor. xii. 13. who is here said to be plentifully poured out upon believers.

Thirdly, That being justified by faith, we become the sons of God, (John i. 12.) and being sons of God, are heirs of glory, (Rom. viii. 17.) and sons of the resurrection; or such as, if we do continue in the faith and our baptismal covenant, shall enjoy a happy resurrection. (Luke xx. 36. See note upon that place, and upon Rom. viii. 17.)

[6] Ver. 8. Καλῶν ἔργων προΐστασθαι, To maintain good works.] That is, say some, to employ themselves in honest trades and professions: but all the ancient commentators, on this and the fourteenth verse, interpret these words of alms-deeds or charity to supply the necessary wants of orphans, widows, &c. And they are followed by the learned Dr. Barrow, who observes, "That as in every kind, that which is most excellent, doth commonly assume the name of the whole kind; so are these works of charity, by way of excellency, styled good works." Thus Dorcas was full of good works; i. e. of alms-deeds which she did, Acts ix. 36. See you abound in every good work; i. e. in all charitable offices, 2 Cor. ix. 8. Let a widow be well-reported of for good works, 1 Tim. v. 10. i. e. for bringing up children, lodging strangers, washing the saints' feet, relieving the afflicted, and following every good work. Charge them who are rich in this world, that they be rich in good works, 1 Tim. vi. 18. (See Heb. x. 24.) And this sense may be confirmed, first, from the phrase itself; for it is not ἐργάζεσθαι τὰ καλὰ ἔργα, but προΐστασθαι καλῶν ἔργων. Now προΐστασθαι signifies to excel and outstrip others in good works; which, as to works of charity, is certainly the Christian's duty, and was the thing by which the primitive ages gained great credit to Christianity: but it is not the Christian's duty to labour more than others at their trades or callings. Secondly, From the reason here assigned, why they must excel in good works; because they were not only profitable, but καλὰ, creditable, in the sight of men, as are such works of charity more conspicuously, than labouring in our professions; and, ver. 15. That they be not unfruitful; i. e. saith Dr. Hammond, that they may have to give to others: these acts of charity being styled, Fruit abounding to their account, Phil. iv. 17. Good fruits, James iii. 17. The fruits of righteousness, ver. 18.

[7] Ver. 9.] See note on 1 Tim. i. 4. And note here, and from that place, this excellent rule; That disputes about matters which only serve to beget strife and contention, but tend little to edification in the faith, or to the edifying of the body in love, (Eph. iv. 16.) or the promoting that doctrine which is after godliness, (1 Tim. vi. 3.) are vain talking and unprofitable disputes.

[8] Ver. 10.] Hence we may learn who is a heretic, in the apostle's sense.

1. He is one who ἐξέστραπται, is perverted from the true faith; holding some doctrine or opinion which subverteth the foundation of it. (2 Tim. ii. 18. 1 Tim. i. 19, 20.) 2. He is αὐτοκατάκριτος, a man condemned by his own conscience, and who, in what he doth maintain or practise, sins against his own convictions: for, 1. the apostle saith not to Titus, Do thou convince or inform him of his error, but, Do thou admonish him of his fault; which shews the crime lay not in his head, or his mistaken judgment, for that can never be corrected by admonition, but only by instruction; but that it lay in the irregularity of his affections, and the perverseness of his will: and, 2. because otherwise he could not condemn himself by maintaining his heresy; for no man who acts according to his judgment, how erroneous soever it may be, is self-condemned in that action.

Obj. 1. Against this exposition it is objected, 1. That he who oppugns a doctrine, which he knows to be true, is indeed perverse, but he is no heretic.

Ans. 1. Yes, he is properly a heretic, according to St. Austin, because he follows or starts a new opinion, not from regard to truth, but to vain-glory, or temporal advantage: whence, saith he, "Errare possum, hæreticus esse nolo;" I may err, but I will not be a heretic; placing heresy not in the judgment, but in the will.

2. He is so also, according to the proper import of the word, because he properly doth choose to be of his opinion: whereas the judgment of the erroneous person doth oblige him to hold his error, it being not in our power to believe otherwise than our mind and judgment doth inform us; so that, in this case, we do not properly αἱρετίζειν, choose what opinion we will hold. And, 3. he is most properly a heretic in the Scripture sense, which still ascribeth to such men something relating not to the error of their judgments, but to the perverseness of their wills, or the corruption of their affections; as, that they designed not to serve the Lord, but their own bellies; (Rom. xvi. 18.) that they turned away from the truth, supposing that gain was godliness; (1 Tim. vi. 5.) that they taught things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake; (Tit. i. 11.) that through covetousness, with feigned words, they made merchandise of them whom they deceived, (2 Pet. ii. 3. 14.) having hearts exercised with covetous practices; and that they went greedily after the error of Balaam for reward. (Jude 11. Matt. xxiv. 11. 1 John iv. 1. 2 Cor. xi. 13. 2 Pet. ii. 1. 1 Tim. iv. 2.)

Hence they are often styled false prophets, false Christs, false apostles, false teachers, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ; men who insinuated their doctrines ἐν ὑποκρίσει ψευδολόγων, by hypocritical falsehoods, who preached up the necessity of circumcision, not that they themselves observed the law, or thought it necessary so to do, but that they might avoid persecution; (Gal. vi. 12, 13.) that they were men risen up among Christians, speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them, (Acts xx. 30.) wolves in sheep's clothing, (Matt. vii. 15.) men that went out from them, when indeed they were not of them. (1 John ii. 19.)

Obj. 2. Secondly, It is objected, That there be few who oppose the truth wittingly, and they are only known to God, not to the church; which therefore cannot admonish, avoid, or excommunicate them. He therefore must be self-condemned, not because he maintains what himself thinks to be false, but because he inflicts upon himself that punishment and condemnation, which the bishop and church useth to do upon malefactors, by separating himself from the communion of the faithful.

Ans. To this I answer, 1. That I do not find that the word αὐτοκατάκριτος bears any other sense but this; viz. one condemned by his own mind, or inward sentence; ὑφ' ἑαυτοῦ, καὶ τῆς οἰκείας συνειδήσεως κατακρινόμενον, saith Œcumenius. 2. Nor is it true that heretics did always cut themselves off from the church; for then what need was there of their excommunication? The Scripture shews the contrary, declaring, that these false teachers, that brought in damnable doctrines, were ἐν ὑμῖν, lurking among Christians: (2 Pet. ii. 1. 1 John ii. 19. 2 Pet. ii. 13. Jude 12. 19.) yea, saith the apostle, there must be heresies, ἐν ὑμῖν, among you, 1 Cor. xi. 9. they kept their love-feasts with them, till for fear of persecution they departed from them. (Gal. vi. 12.) They were inwardly wolves, but in sheep's clothing, εὐπροσωπήσαντες ἐν αὐτοῖς, making a fair show among them. Moreover, what need was there of avoiding men already separated, and gone out from them? or to what end should the apostle give them any admonitions, or excommunicate them, who had already exclnded themselves from the church's communion? This exposition therefore agrees not with the words of the apostle.

And whereas it is said, such heretics are only known to God; I hope they might be known also to Titus, the only person here bid either to admonish or avoid them, especially if we consider, that to him belonged, in those times, διάκρισις πνευμάτων, the discerning of spirits. Moreover, the church of those times, in which the apostles were still preaching, could easily know whether the doctrines which others taught in opposition to them, were indeed doctrines received from the apostles, or not; if they were not, they who taught them must know they received no such doctrine from them, and so must be self-condemned in teaching it, as received from them, or as the faith once delivered to the saints; and they who heard them must know they wilfully opposed the doctrine of those apostles, who had confirmed the faith with such authentic testimonies, as their opposers could not question. Moreover, they being then bid to try the spirits, whether they were of God, (1 John iv. 1.) and the gift of discerning spirits being then given to the prophets, who managed the church affairs, they might then very well be able to judge of these deceivers and false teachers.

[9] Ver. 12.] These words made the author of the postscript date this Epistle from Nicopolis of Macedonia, whereas they rather prove the contrary; for he saith not, I have determined to winter here, but there, which shews he was not yet come thither.

EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

SOME have thought this Epistle was not worthy to be ranked among the Epistles of St. Paul, as being writ upon an occasion of no great moment: but it contains instructions sufficient for so short an Epistle; as, v. g.

First, That no Christian, though of the meanest sort, is to be contemned: that Christianity makes the vilest servant both profitable and worthy to be highly loved and honoured by persons in the highest dignity; Onesimus being by the apostle styled his son, and his bowels.

Secondly, That Christianity doth not impair the power of masters over their servants, or give any authority to them who convert them to use them as their servants, without leave granted from their masters.

Thirdly, That servants ought to make satisfaction for any wrong or injury they have done to their masters.

Fourthly, That there is an affection due from the master to a profitable servant.

Who then (say the Greek interpreters *) would refuse to number an Epistle so profitable, with the rest?

The Apostolical Constitutions † have made this Philemon bishop of Colosse, and St. Jerome seems to incline to that opinion; but Hilary ‡ the deacon saith expressly, that he was of no ecclesiastical dignity, but one of the laity. Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, seem also of the same opinion.

This Epistle was writ in the same year with that to the Philippians, viz. the eighth of Nero, A. D. 62. when St. Paul expected to be delivered from his bonds, ver. 22.

† Κολοσσέων δὲ Φιλήμων. Lib. vii. cap. 46.

‡ "Philemon nulla erat ecclesiasticæ ordinationis præditus dignitate, sed vir laudabilis, unus ex plebe." In locum.

1. I, PAUL, a prisoner of Jesus Christ, and Timothy, our brother, (write) to Philemon our dearly beloved, and [1] fellow-labourer.

2. And to our [2] beloved Apphia, and Archippus [3] our fellow-soldier, and [4] to the church in thy house:

3. (And I wish) grace to you, and peace, from [5] God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

4. I thank my God, making mention of thee always in my prayers (or, I thank my God always when I mention thee in my prayers),

5. Hearing [6] of thy love and faith, which (faith) thou hast towards the Lord Jesus, and (love) towards all saints;

6. (And my prayer is,) that [7] the communication of thy faith (or, thy liberality to the saints, which is the fruit of thy faith,) may become effectual (to bring others to it) by the acknowledgment of every good thing which is in you in Christ Jesus, (or, may become effectual to the acknowledgment of thy good works by other Christians who have such instances of thy charity.

7. And I have reason thus to give thanks to God for thee,) for we have great joy and consolation in thy love (to the saints), because (hereby) the bowels of the saints (yearning for relief) are refreshed by thee, brother.

8. Wherefore, though I might be much bold (or, having great power) in Christ to enjoin thee that which is convenient,

9. Yet for love's sake I rather beseech thee (or, I rather beseech thee for love's sake), being such a one as Paul (the apostle of Christ) [8] the aged (and upon that account worthy of reverence), and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ, (and therefore worthy of respect, Gal. vi. 17. Eph. iv. 1. Colos. iv. 18.)

10. I beseech thee (I say) for my son Onesimus, whom I have begotten (i. e. converted to the faith, when I was) in my bonds:

11. Who in times past was to thee (an) [9] unprofitable (servant, ver. 18, 19.) but now (if received, will be) profitable to thee and (if sent back) to me:

12. Whom I have sent again (unto thee, he being in duty thine, and not to be employed by others, or detained without thy leave): thou therefore receive him, (him, I say,) that is mine own bowels (he being as dear to me as if he had proceeded from mine own bowels):

13. Whom I would (willingly) have retained with me, that [10] in thy stead he might have ministered to me, (being) in the bonds of the gospel:

14. But without thy mind would I do nothing (of this nature); that thy benefit (or, the advantage I receive from him who is thy servant) should not be (on thy part) [11] as it were (a matter) of necessity (because thou couldest not have him returned to thee), but willingly (by thy own grant).

15. For perhaps he therefore departed (from thee) for a season, [12] that thou shouldest receive him again for ever, (i. e. to serve thee during life;

16. That thou shouldest receive him, I say,) not now as a servant (only), but above a servant, (as being also in Christ) a brother [13] beloved, especially (or, particularly) to me, but how much more to thee, both in the flesh, and in the Lord? (i. e. as being of thy family, and of thy faith.)

17. If thou count me therefore a partner (in thy friendship), receive him as myself.

18. If he hath wronged thee (in any thing), or oweth thee aught, put that on my account;

19. I Paul have written it with my own hand, (and so have entered into a solemn obligation, that) I will repay it: albeit I do not say unto thee (i. e. I insist upon it) how thou owest to me (by whom thou wast converted) even thy own self (or, the well being of thy soul) besides.

20. [14] Yea, brother, (Gr. ναὶ, I pray thee therefore) let me (for thy compliance with me in this matter) have joy of thee in the Lord: [15] refresh my bowels in the Lord.

21. Having confidence in thy obedience I wrote (thus) to thee, knowing thou wilt also do more than I say.

22. But withal prepare me also a lodging (wherefore prepare me a lodging also): for I trust that [16] through your prayers I shall be given to you.

23. There salute thee Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus;

24. Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellow-labourers.

25. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

ANNOTATIONS.

[1] Ver. 1. ΚΑΙ᾽ συνεργῷ ἡμῶν, Our fellow-labourer.] Hence Chrysostom conjectures, that he must be one of the clergy: but this is no good argument, seeing Christians in general, that promoted the interests of Christianity, and even women, are by the apostle styled συνεργοὶ, his fellow-labourers. For the first, see 3 John, ver. 8. for the second, Rom. xvi. 3.

[2] Ver. 2. Ἀπφίᾳ τῇ ἀγαπητῇ.] He salutes also Apphia the wife of Philemon; as Œcumenius and Theophylact conjecture, and Theodoret positively asserts, and that very probably, she being here ranked before Archippus: and this he doth, that he might obtain her good will also in behalf of Onesimus.

[3] Συστρατιώτῃ, Our fellow-soldier.] So also he calls Epaphroditus fellow-prisoner with him at Rome, Phil. ii. 23. 25. either because they suffered with him as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, (2 Tim. ii. 23.) or, as St. Jerome * saith, because, being ministers with him in the work of the gospel, (Phil. ii. 25. Colos. iv. 17.) they were more particularly engaged in fighting the good fight of faith. (See note on 1 Tim. i. 18.)

[4] Καὶ τῇ κατ᾽ οἶκόν σου ἐκκλησίᾳ, And to the church in thy house.] He calls his house a church, saith Theodoret, ὡς εὐσεβείᾳ λαμπρυνομένη, as being illustrious for the piety of all its members. (See note on 1 Cor. xvi. 19.)

[5] Ver. 3. Ἀπὸ Θεοῦ Πατρὸς, καὶ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, From God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ.] "Ex quo ostenditur unam Filii Patrisque esse naturam, cum id potest Filius præstare quod Pater, et dicitur id Pater præstare quod Filius." Hieronymus in locum.

[6] Ver. 5. Τὴν ἀγάπην καὶ τὴν πίστιν, Thy love and faith.] Here the apostle useth the figure synthesis; for faith is to be referred to Christ, and love to the saints; according to those words of the same apostle, We give thanks for you,

* "Commilitoni quod in eudem certamine belloque superaverit." Hieron. in locum.

since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which you have to all the saints, Colos. i. 4. So, Matt. xii. 22. The blind and dumb both spake and saw; i. e. the blind saw, and the dumb spake: 1 Cor. vi. 11. But ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God; i. e. ye are sanctified by the Spirit, and justified by the name of Jesus. And so Theodoret interprets these words. Hence therefore papists vainly gather, that we may place our faith in saints departed; for even their own Esthius declares,* that, in the ecclesiastical phrase, to believe in any one, is a profession of divinity.

It is also farther to be noted from these words, That we ought to render thanks to God, not only for the blessings vouchsafed to ourselves, but to others also. (Rom. i. 8. 1 Cor. i. 4. Eph. i. 16.)

[7] Ver. 6. Ἡ κοινωνία, The communication.] Κοινωνίαν πίστεως τὴν ἐλεημοσύνην καλεῖ, ὡς διὰ πολλῆς πίστεως γενομένην· Theodoret, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, expound these words thus, "I pray that the faith in Christ, which thou hast common with us, may be operative in thee, to make thee know how to perform every good work."

[8] Ver. 9. Πρεσβύτης, The aged.] This Epistle being writ, at the farthest, but twenty-eight years from his conversion, when he is styled νεανίας, a young man, (Acts vii. 58.) it is inquired, How he could be now πρεσβύτης, Paul the aged?

I answer, That both the words, νεανίσκος, young, and πρεσβύτης, aged, are of that large signification, as is sufficient to remove this seeming difficulty. Phavorinus,† from Hippocrates, saith, a man is styled νεανίσκος, a young man, till twenty-eight, and πρεσβύτης, aged, from forty-nine to fifty-six; making but twenty-one years' difference betwixt them: elsewhere he saith, that old age begins, ἀπ' ἐτῶν ἑξήκοντα ἐννέα, from sixty-nine years; but then he saith, a man is, νεανίσκος, young, from twenty-three, ἕως ἐτῶν τεσσαράκοντα ἑνὸς, till forty-one years; making the difference between them twenty-eight years. Varro, in Cœlius Rhodiginus, lib. xxix. cap. 21. says, a man is juvenis, young, till forty-five, and aged at sixty. And thus St. Paul, according to the computation of St. Chrysostom,‡ might be a young man of thirty-five years at his conversion, an old man at the writing this Epistle, as being then sixty-three, and suffering martyrdom in the fourteenth year of Nero.

[9] Ver. 11. Ἄχρηστος.] Not only an unprofitable, but an injurious servant, having not only run away from his master, but purloined some of his goods, and spent what he had thus purloined: for had it not been thus, saith St. Jerome,* the apostle needed not to have stipulated for satisfaction of the injury, (ver. 18. 19.)

[10] Ver. 13. Ὑπὲρ σοῦ, In thy stead.] A ministry seems due from all that are able, towards those that suffer, and are in bonds for Christ's sake; and when it is not performed, there seems to be a lack of service due to them, especially to the ambassadors of Christ. (Phil. ii. 30.)

[11] Ver. 14. Ὡς κατ' ἀνάγκην, As of necessity.] Here again, freedom of will is put in opposition to necessity: (see note on 2 Cor. ix. 7.) according to those words of Seneca, De Benef. lib. ii. cap. 4. Si vis scire an velim, effice ut possim nolle.

[12] Ver. 15. Ἵνα αἰώνιον αὐτὸν ἀπέχῃς, That thou mightest have him during life.] Δουλεύσει αὐτῷ εἰς αἰῶνα, He shall serve him during life, Exod. xxi. 6. Ἔσται σοι οἰκέτης εἰς αἰῶνα, He shall be thy servant whilst he lives, Deut. xv. 17. Καθήσεται εἰς αἰῶνα, He shall abide for ever there, 1 Sam. i. 22. that is, ἕως ἡμέρας θανάτου αὐτοῦ, till the day of his death, ver. 11. all the days of his life, ver. 28.

[13] Ver. 16. Ἀγαπητὸν, Beloved.] Note here, that love is due even to bond-servants from their masters, when they are useful and profitable to them; for where advantage is received from the labours of another, there love is due.

[14] Ver. 20. Ναὶ.] As the Hebrew נָא is "verbum obsecrandi," a word of entreating; so is the Greek ναὶ very frequently. (See note on Matt. xv. 27.)

[15] Μου τὰ σπλάγχνα, Refresh my bowels.] Either meaning Onesimus, whom he calls his bowels, ver. 12. or rather himself, whose bowels would be refreshed by Philemon's receiving Onesimus kindly, for the Lord's sake.

[16] Ver. 22. Διὰ τῶν προσευχῶν ὑμῶν, By your prayers.] The apostle knew the efficacy of the prayers of the church, for preservation of Christ's eminent servants from impendent dangers; as in the case of Peter, Acts xii. and therefore, in most of his Epistles he doth most earnestly entreat them, that he might be enabled to preach the gospel with freedom and success, (Eph. vi. 19. Colos. iv. 3. 2 Thess. iii. 1.) and for deliverance from the malice of his persecutors; (Rom. xv. 30, 31. 2 Thess. iii. 2.) or else express his confidence that their prayers will be effectual to that end, as here, and 2 Cor. i. 10, 11. iv. 14, 15. Phil. i. 19. And had he thus conceived of prayers directed to angels and departed saints, why doth he not afford one instance of them in all his Epistles?

EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

PREFACE.

BY way of preface to this excellent Epistle, I shall inquire,

I. Concerning the author of it.

II. Touching the canonical authority of this Epistle.

III. Concerning the language in which it was originally written.

IV. To whom it was indited and sent, and when.

V. Concerning the occasion and design of writing this Epistle. And,

I. That St. Paul was the author of this Epistle, I prove,

First, From these words of St. Peter, As our dear brother Paul, according to the wisdom given to him, hath written unto you, as in all his Epistles, 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16. whence it is evident, 1. That the apostle Paul had writ to them to whom St. Peter was then writing; i. e. to the believing Jews in general, 2 Pet. i. 1. to those of the dispersion, mentioned 1 Pet. i. 1. 2. That he writ to them some certain letter, distinct from all his other epistolary writings; as appears from those words, as also in all his Epistles, i. e his other Epistles. Since then none of the ancients say that this Epistle was lost, it must be that which bears the name of The Epistle to the Hebrews.

Obj. To this it is answered, That the Epistle intended by St. Peter may be that written to the Romans, in which he speaketh to the Jews by name, ii. 17. and in which is an exhortation found, to count the long-suffering of God salvation, or that which leadeth to repentance, ver. 4.

Ans. But, (1.) that which is written there, is plainly written to the unbelieving Jews, and concerns them only: whereas St. Peter writes to the brethren, iii. 12. the beloved, ver. 1. 14. 17. to them who had received like precious faith, i. 1. he therefore could not mean the Jews, of whom St. Paul speaks in the Epistle to the Romans: nor, (2.) can that Epistle be properly said to be writ to the dispersed Jews, it being writ to those at Rome only, i. 7. and chiefly to the gentiles there, i. 13. xi. 13. xv. 15, 16. (3.) The words, ii. 4. are not an exhortation to count the long-suffering of God salvation; but a reproof for despising this long-suffering; whereas, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, chap. x. he commends their patience under sufferings, and assures them it would find salvation; and that if they lived by faith, the Lord would come and would not tarry.

Arg. 2. A second argument to prove St. Paul the author of this Epistle, is taken from these words, Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty; with whom, if ye come shortly, I will see you: They of Italy salute you, xiii. 23, 24. and from those also, Pray for us; and, Do this now the rather, that I may be restored to you the sooner, ver. 18, 19. For, first, it is customary with St. Paul, when he writes to others, to call St. Timothy his brother: so, Paul the apostle of Jesus Christ, and Timothy our brother, 2 Cor. i. 1. and again, Colos. i. 1. in the same words; We sent Timothy our brother, 1 Thess. iii. 2. and, Paul a prisoner of Jesus Christ, and Timothy our brother, Philem. ver. 1. This Timothy was a prisoner at Rome in the seventh year of Nero; and set at liberty the eighth, saith Dr. Lightfoot, Harm. p. 139, 140. of which here the author of this Epistle gives notice, and saith, he would come with him to them; i. e. to the Jews in Judea, to whom I shall prove, anon, that this Epistle was indited. Now Timothy, we know, was still the companion of St. Paul. Lastly, He desires them to pray for him, which is frequently done by St. Paul in most of his Epistles, viz. in that directed to the Romans, Rom. xv. 30. to the Ephesians, Eph. vi. 19. to the Philippians, Phil. i. 19. to the Colossians, Colos. iv. 3. and to the Thessalonians, 2 Thess. iii. 1. and is never done in any of the catholic epistles. Pray for me (saith he), that I may be restored to you the sooner. Now Paul was sent bound from Judea to Rome, and therefore his return from Rome to Judea was properly a restoring of him to them. And that he was thus restored to them, we learn from St. Chrysostom,* declaring, that being at liberty, he went to Spain, thence to Judea, and so back to Rome.

Arg. 3. That this Epistle was written or composed by St. Paul, may yet more strongly be concluded from the authority of the ancients; for that they did deliver this as the Epistle of St. Paul, and that they were not rash in so doing, we learn from the words of Origen.† Now among these ancients we may reckon,

1. Clemens Romanus, the companion of and coworker with St. Paul, who, as Eusebius‡ and St. Jerome§ note, "hath many notions which are in this Epistle, and used many expressions, word for word, taken thence:" which shew this Epistle not to be new, and to be duly reckoned among the writings of this apostle.

2. Irenæus, in the second century, by whom this Epistle is supposed to be cited as a book written by the Spirit, Adv. Hær. lib. iii. cap. 6. But not to insist on that, as being uncertain,

3. Clemens Alexandrinus* cites those words of St. Paul, Without faith it is impossible to please God, Heb. xi. 6. adding, that faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen, ibid. ver. 1. κατὰ τὸν θεῖον ἀπόστολον, according to the Divine apostle. And again he saith,† Ὁ θεῖος ἀπόστολος, The Divine apostle fears not to say, Remember the former days, in which ye, being enlightened, suffered a great fight of affliction, Heb. x. 32. and so he cites him on to the end of that chapter; then gives the substance of the eleventh chapter, and the exhortation in the beginning of the twelfth, ver. 1, 2. And that this Divine apostle was St. Paul, we are assured from these words,‡ Ἐπεὶ καὶ Παῦλος τοῖς Ἑβραίοις γράφων τοῖς ἀνακάμπτουσιν εἰς νόμον ἐκ πίστεως: Paul also writing to the Hebrews, relapsing from faith unto the law, saith, Ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God, and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat, Heb. v. 12.

4. In the third century, Origen,§ citing the very words now mentioned, and the following words, ver. 13. For every one that useth milk is unskilful in the word of righteousness; he saith, He that writ this was the same Paul who said to the Corinthians, I have fed you with milk, and not with meat, &c. 1 Cor. iii. 2. In his Philocalia‖ he saith, The apostle Paul, who said to the Corinthians, These things happened in a figure, and they were written for us, on whom the ends of the ages are come, 1 Cor. x. 11. doth also, in another Epistle, use these words, relating to the tabernacle, Thou shalt make all things according to the pattern shewed thee in the mount, Heb. viii. 5. and that the apostle who said,¶ Jerusalem which is above is free, and is the mother of us all, Gal. iv. 26. said also in another Epistle, Ye are come to Mount Sion, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to myriads of angels, &c. Heb. xii. 22, 23. In his exhortation to martyrdom, he hath these words, Φησί που ὁ Παῦλος, St. Paul, speaking somewhere to them who suffered from the beginning, and exhorting them to suffer patiently the trials which afterward fell upon them for the word, saith, Call to remembrance the former days in which ye, being enlightened, suffered a great fight of afflictions—Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompence of reward; for ye have need of patience, Heb. x. 32—36. And in his answer to Africanus, having cited these words from this Epistle, They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, they were slain with the sword, Heb. xi. 37. he saith,†† If any person being pressed with these words should fall into the opinion of them who reject this Epistle as none of St. Paul's, he would use other words, to demonstrate to him that it was the Epistle of St. Paul. He also adds,‡‡ that the sentences contained in it are admirable, and no whit inferior to the writings of the apostles; as he who diligently reads them must confess.

In a word, when this Epistle was denied by the Arians in the fourth century, because they were not able to resist the conviction it affords us of our Lord's Divinity,* Theodoret saith, They ought at least to revere the length of time in which the children of the church have read this Epistle in the churches, viz. as long as they have read the apostolic writings: or, if this be not sufficient to persuade them, they should hearken to Eusebius,† of whom they boast, as of the patron of their doctrine; for he confesses this was St. Paul's Epistle, and he declares that all the ancients had this opinion of it.

That they of Rome, and other Latins, did, for awhile, reject this Epistle, will not much weaken this tradition, if we consider,

First, That this Epistle was not writ to them, but to the Hebrews, who, as Eusebius‡ testifies, delighted much in it.

Secondly, That it was rejected by them, not that they had any thing to say against it, but because they could not answer the arguments which the Novatian schismatics among them produced from the sixth and tenth chapters of this Epistle, against receiving lapsed penitents into the church, whence, as Philastrius informs us, they rejected it, as thinking it was depraved by heretics; or,

Thirdly, Because it wants its name, which he concealed, not as St. Jerome conjectures, διὰ φθόνον, to avoid the offence of those who liked not his person, by reason of his doctrine concerning the nonobservation of their law; for it is evident from his desire of their prayers, and from his intimation that he designed shortly to be with them, that he must be well known unto them; but, as Theodoret observes, because he was made an apostle, not of the circumcision, but of the gentiles. Lastly, The difference in style, some mention, is so nice a thing, and may happen upon so many accounts, that it deserves not to be looked on as an argument of any force against plain testimonies of the ancients, that St. Paul was the author of this work.

II. That this Epistle was written and directed to the Jews dwelling in Judea and Palestine, is the opinion of the ancients,§ though not so as to exclude the believing Jews of the dispersion. This may be argued from the endorsement of it, To the Hebrews, rather than To the Jews. It cannot be imagined but that he sends it to be delivered at a certain place, within some reasonable compass, seeing the bearer of it, whoever he was, could not deliver it to all the Jews dispersed through the whole world; and because he directs them to pray, that he might be restored to them, and promiseth to come and see them. The title therefore, To the Hebrews, must determine the place, and point out the Jews that dwelt in Judea, or the land of Israel; and this sense doth the Holy Ghost put upon the title, The Hebrews, when it is said, There was a murmuring of the Hellenists against the Hebrews, Acts vi. 1. by the Hellenists, meaning the Jews that dwelt in foreign countries among the Greeks; and by the Hebrews, those that dwelt in Judea. So again, 2 Cor. xi. 22. Are they Hebrews? so am I. Are they Israelites? so am I. And, Phil. iii. 5. Of the stock of Israel, a Hebrew of the Hebrews; i. e. a Hebrew not only by descent, as were all of the stock of Israel, but by language, which some of them had lost; and by habitation in the holy land, and not among the uncircumcised gentiles, he being bred up at the feet of Gamaliel. And so it is most proper to understand the inscription of this Epistle, namely, that St. Paul directs and sends it to the believing Jews of Judea, which he styles his own nation, Acts xxiv. 17. For though he, doubtless, did intend it also for the benefit of the believing Jews dispersed, yet might he send it first and chiefly to those in Judea, the principal seat of the circumcision; from whence it might, in time, diffuse itself through the whole circumference of the circumcision.

III. But hence it cannot reasonably be concluded, that this Epistle was writ in Hebrew, or in Syriac: for the Gospel of St. John, and his First Epistle, the catholic epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and St. Jude, were also written to the Jews, and yet were writ in Greek, that being a tongue so well known to the Jews, that they call it the vulgar tongue; therefore in all the discourses of the Jews with the Roman governors, who understood the Greek tongue, we never read, either in Scripture or Josephus, that the Jews spake to them, or they unto the Jews, by an interpreter; nor is there any of the ancients, who pretends to have seen any Hebrew copy of this Epistle. That it was writ in Greek, appears not only from the passages of Scripture, so often cited in it from the Septuagint, even where they differ from the Hebrew, i. 6. iii. 8—10. viii. 8, 9. x. 5. 37, 38. but also from vii. 2. where we read thus, πρῶτον μὲν ἑρμηνευόμενος Βασιλεὺς δικαιοσύνης, first being interpreted King of righteousness, and afterward King of Salem, which is, King of peace: for both the word Melchisedec and King of Salem, being in the first verse, should have been there interpreted, had this been the addition of the interpreter; for so we find it is throughout the New Testament, where the interpretation immediately follows the Hebrew word or phrase, as Mark v. 41. Talitha, cumi; which is, by interpretation, Daughter, arise: Golgotha, which is, by interpretation, The place of a skull, Mark xv. 22. So Matt. xxvii. 46. Mark xv. 34. John i. 38. Rabbi, which is, being interpreted, Master; and, ver. 41. Messiah, which is, being interpreted, The Christ. So ix. 7. xix. 37. Acts iv. 36. ix. 36. xiii. 8. Whereas here the word Melchisedec is in the beginning of the first verse, and the supposed addition of the interpreter is added where the word is not; so King of Salem is in the first verse not interpreted, and when it is repeated, then comes the interpretation; which plainly shews, that it is not made to give the sense, but the mystery contained in the words, viz. that Christ was our peace, Eph. ii. 14. and his sceptre was a sceptre of righteousness, i. 8.

IV. As for the time when this Epistle was indited, 1. it seems evident, that it was written after that to the Colossians and to Philemon; for there he is Paul the prisoner, here he is set at liberty, and hoping to come quickly to them to whom he writes: those Epistles therefore being writ in the sixty-second year of Christ, and the eighth of Nero, this must at least be written in the following year. Again, in the Epistle to the Colossians, we have mention of St. Timothy, but nothing of his bonds; here we have mention both of his imprisonment and his ensuing liberty, which may well cast this Epistle into the ninth of Nero, where it is placed by Bishop Pearson.

V. To speak a little of the occasion of it: I have shewed in the preface to the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, and in the preface to the Epistle of St. James, that it was written chiefly to prevent that epidemical apostacy from Christ to Moses, which the believing Jews were then too prone to. But we learn also from the matter of the Epistle, that it was written to prove that Jesus was the Son of God: now in what sense this chiefly was denied by the Jews, we learn from the Gospel of St. John, where, when our Lord had said, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work, John v. 17. the Jews seek to kill him, because Πατέρα ἴδιον ἔλεγε τὸν Θεὸν, he said God was his own Father, making himself equal to God, ver. 18. And again, We stone thee (say they) for blasphemy, because thou, being a man, makest thyself God, John x. 33. What was this blasphemy of which they thus accuse him? It was only this, that he said, I am the Son of God, ver. 36. It is therefore plain, they judged it the same thing to say he was the Son of God, and to say that he was God; whence we may rationally conclude, it was also in this sense that the apostle here asserts, and doth endeavour to confirm this truth.

And, lastly, this Epistle being written to persons now relapsing from Christ to Moses, and to the law given, said they, by angels; this seems to be the reason why the apostle is so large in shewing that Christ was greater than the angels, a greater lawgiver than Moses, a greater priest than Aaron, and that the Levitical priesthood, covenant, and law, were to give place to Christ our great high-priest, to his new law of liberty, and that new covenant he had established upon better promises.

CHAP. I.

1. GOD, who [1] at sundry times and [2] in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets,

2. Hath in these last days (the times of the Messiah, see note on 2 Tim. iii. 1.) spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed (ἔθηκε, constituted) [3] heir of all things, [4] by whom also he made the worlds;

3. Who being the [5] brightness of his glory, and the [6] express image of his person (or, character of his substance), and [7] upholding all things by the word of his power, [8] when he had (Gr. having) by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high;

4. Being made (Gr. being) so much better than the angels (and superior to them by this exaltation to the right hand of Majesty), as he hath by inheritance obtained [9] a more excellent name (title and authority) than they.

5. For to which of the angels said he at any time (as he did to Christ), [10] Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? and again (to Solomon the son of David, what did more eminently belong to this Son and Lord of David), [11] I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son? (2 Sam. vii. 14. 1 Chron. xxii. 10.)

6. And again, when he bringeth in (ὅταν δὲ πάλιν, and when he brings again) the first-begotten (from the dead, Colos. i. 18.) into the world, he saith, And [12] let all the angels of God worship him (establishing thus his dominion over them, and their subjection to him, and also the Divine excellence of him who was thus to be worshipped by the highest of created beings).

7. And (moreover, speaking) [13] of the angels, he (i. e. David only) saith, (He is that God) who maketh his angels spirits (or winds), and his ministers a flame of fire; (giving them no higher titles than those of his messengers and ministers, and shewing their efficacy and swiftness in doing his commandments, and hearkening to the voice of his words, by comparing them to the winds and fire, Psal. cxxiii. 20, 21.)

8. But (speaking) to (of) the Son, he (i. e. David, moved by the Holy Ghost,) saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom. (Psal. xlv. 7.)

9. Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore [14] God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness (i. e. advanced thee in eminence and dignity) above thy fellows (styling him, in these words, God, and an eternal king; ascribing to him a throne and kingdom, and a righteous government, to reward his righteous servants, whom he loves, and to punish his obdurate enemies, whose iniquities render them hateful to him. So that these words again prove both his Divine nature, and his exaltation to the government of the whole world).

10. And (that also by him he made the heavens, is testified in these words spoken of him), [15] Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens are the works of thy hands.

11. They shall perish; but thou remainest: and they shall all wax old as doth a garment;

12. And as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail. (Psal. cii.)

13. But (yea) to which of the angels said he at any time, (as he did to Christ, Psal. cx. 1.) [16] Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool?

14. Are they not all (declared, Psal. ciii. 20, 21. civ. 4. to be) ministering spirits, sent forth (not for government and dominion, but) to minister for them who (being sons by adoption) shall be (also) [17] heirs of salvation?

[2] Πολυτρόπως, In divers manners.] In a cloud, fire, a still breath; by visions, dreams, a voice from heaven, and by the Holy Spirit speaking in the prophets, 2 Pet. i. 21.

[3] Ver. 2. Κληρονόμον πάντων, Heir of all things;] As it were by succession to his Father, who now judgeth no man, but hath given all judgment to his Son, John v. 22. Heb. iii. 6. We cannot desire a fairer comment on these words, than that of the Socinians on the place,* That Christ is made heir of all things in heaven and earth, yea, of heaven and earth itself; that he is heir and Lord of all angels, and of all men living and dead, Rom. xiv. 8, 9. That he is absolutely the heir of all things, and hath the highest empire and dominion over all angels and men; by which words is signified the highest excellency and divinity, and, as it were, the unity of Christ with God, though with diversity, in that he is his Son and heir, and received this dominion from another. And I believe it is as impossible to understand how a man should have this empire over all things in heaven and earth, and over death itself, and yet be a mere man, as it is to understand any mystery of the sacred Trinity. The word Heir doth also signify Lord of all things. (See the note on Colos. i. 15.)

[4] Δι' οὗ καὶ τοὺς αἰῶνας ἐποίησεν, By whom also he made the worlds.] That is, saith Grotius, "propter quem," for whom he made them, according to the doctrine of the rabbins, that the world was made for the Messiah. But this exposition is contrary to the rule of all grammarians,† that τὸ διὰ, ὅτε μὲν συντάσσεται γενικῇ, μεσιτείαν, ὅτε δὲ αἰτιατικῇ, αἰτίαν δηλοῖ, that the preposition διὰ, when it is joined with a genitive case, signifies the means by which, and the final cause only, when it is joined with an accusative case. It is contrary to the exposition of all the Greek fathers, who unanimously say, τοῦτο δηλωτικὸν τῆς θεότητος, this shews the Divinity of Christ. It is also without example in the New Testament, for διὰ τῆς δόξης τοῦ Πατρὸς, Rom. vi. 4. which is the only place he cites, signifies by the glory or power of the Father, by which Christ was raised from the dead. (Eph. i. 19. Colos. ii. 12.) The Socinians by the worlds here understand the new creation, or the church begun by Christ's ministry upon earth, begotten and renewed by the evangelical dispensation. But neither can this exposition stand: for (1.) though Christ be styled, in some of the Greek versions, Πατὴρ τοῦ μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, Isa. ix. 6. the Father of the age to come, yet οἱ αἰῶνες, absolutely put, doth never signify the church or evangelical state; nor doth the Scripture ever speak of the world to come in the plural, but in the singular number only, preserving the phrase holam habba, as they received it from the Jews. (2.) Were this the import of the words, the worlds might as well have been said to have been created or made by Christ's apostles, they being the great converters of the world; or, at least, this being done by them, assisted by the power of Christ, after he had been thus made heir of all things, it must have properly been said that Christ made the worlds by his apostles, which yet the Holy Ghost never thinks fit to intimate. Moreover, whereas this making of the world by Jesus Christ is done by his prophetic office, i. e. his speaking to us in the last days, the apostle had mentioned this already, and makes a plain gradation from it to his kingly office, in saying he was constituted Lord of all things, not speaking of making the world by way of consecution, thus, καὶ δι' οὗ, and by whom, but, by way of farther gradation, δι' οὗ καὶ, by whom also he made the world; as if he should have said, Nor is it to be wondered that he should be constituted Lord of the whole world,

* "Christus solus omniam plane rerum hæreditate gaudet, et summo in omnes, tam angelos, quam homines, imperio ac dominatu pollet——Licet autem istis verbis significata sit summa Christi præstantia, ac divinitas, ac veluti cum Deo unitas, tamen simul significata etiam Christi à Deo diversitas." seeing he made the whole. And that the apostle here doth speak, not of the reforming of the new, but of the forming of the old world, he himself sufficiently instructs us, by saying in this same Epistle, By faith we understand, κατηρτίσθαι τοὺς αἰῶνας ῥήματι Θεοῦ, that the worlds were formed by the word of God, xi. 3. For that by τοὺς αἰῶνας we are to understand the material world, the Socinian commentators grant, and the parallel place in St. Peter doth enforce, when he saith, that the heavens were of old, and the earth, ἐξ ὕδατος συνεστῶσα τῷ τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγῳ, consisting out of water by the Word of God, 2 Pet. iii. 5. and this world is mentioned in both places in the plural number, agreeably to the phrase and doctrine of the Jews,* who speak of עולמים, i. e. the worlds, in the plural, and divide them into עולם הזה, or עולם השפל, i. e. this inferior and habitable world, called by St. Peter, ὁ τότε κόσμος, the then world, which perished by water, ver. 6. and the עולם העליון, superior world, that is, the heavens. And it is no improbable conjecture, that when St. Peter saith, the heavens and earth consisted by the Word of God, and St. Paul, that by faith we learn that the worlds were framed, ῥήματι Θεοῦ, by the Word of God, they mean this substantial world, of which the apostle is here speaking; for the word דבר seems plainly to be used in this sense, when we read in the Targum of Jerusalem, on Gen. xxviii. 11. דהוה דבוריה, For his Word, i. e. the Word of God, desired to speak with Jacob; and in that of Jonathan, דבירא, The Word would speak with him; which in Bereschith Rabbi, §. 68. runs thus, God would speak with him: and the word ῥῆμα seems also to be either used in this sense, or applied to the Λόγος, often by Philo;† as when he saith, that Moses was translated, διὰ ῥήματος τοῦ αἰτίου, δι' οὗ καὶ σύμπας κόσμος ἐδημιουργεῖτο, by the Word of the First Cause, by which the world was made; and that God made both ‡ the heavens and the earth by a Word, by his most illustrious and resplendent Λόγος. And to be sure, Philo was of the same opinion with St. Paul, that the Word made and fashioned the world; whence he so often mentions the Divine Word§ adorning all things, the Word of God that maketh the world, the Word by which the world is fashioned and made, and by which, as his organ, God gave being to it; and saith in words like those of the apostle,‖ That God possesseth all things, using that Word as the dispenser of his gifts, by which also he made the world. And this was also the doctrine of all the primitive fathers from the beginning, as well as of all the commentators on this text. St. Barnabas¶ declares, that he is the Lord of the world, the maker of the sun, the person by whom and to whom are all things.—He is (saith J. Martyr) the Word by which the heaven, the earth, and every creature was made, by whom God at the beginning made and ordained all things, viz. the heavens and the earth, and by whom he will renew them. This Irenæus* delivers as the rule of faith contained in the Scripture, which they who hold to may easily prove, that the heretics had deviated from the truth. He adds, that the barbarians who held the ancient tradition did believe in one God, the maker of heaven and earth, and of all things therein, by Jesus Christ the Son of God; and this doctrine he repeats almost a hundred times elsewhere. Our doctrine (saith Athenagoras†) celebrates one God the creator of all things, who made all things by Jesus Christ, from whom and by whom all things were made.—God (saith Theophilus‡) made all things by him, and he is called the beginning, because he is the principle, and ruler of all things made by him. He adds, that by this principle God made the heavens: that God said to him, Let us make man; he being his word, by which he made all things.—Him (saith Tatian§) we know to have been the author of the world; for that which was begotten in the beginning, gave beginning to the things made: he made man the image of his immortality, and before man he made the angels.—We rational creatures (saith Clemens of Alexandria‖) are the work of God the Word; for he was and is the Divine principle of all things, by whom all things were made, and who, as the framer of all things in the beginning, gave also life to us; by whom are all things; who made man; our God and Maker, the cause of the creation. In the third century we learn the same from Origen,¶ Tertullian, Novatian,†† St. Cyprian,‡‡ and others cited by the learned Dr. Bull. So that in these two verses there be visible these gradations; one, from Christ's prophetic office to his kingly office, conferred on him as heir of all things; the other, from his kingly office to the foundation of it, laid in his Divine nature, and in the work of the creation; it being, say Irenæus and the ancient fathers, fit that he should reform and govern the world, by whom it was formed; that he should give new life to man, who gave him his being and first breath.

shining forth of his glory.] This metaphor, some of the fathers think, is taken from the sun, whence Justin Martyr* saith, he proceedeth from the Father, as τὸ τοῦ ἡλίου φῶς, the light of the sun, without division or separation, from him. Others, with him, παραδείγματος χάριν, for example's sake, say,† he proceedeth ὡς ἀπὸ πυρὸς ἀναπυρόμενα πυρὰ, as fire is kindled from fire, without the diminution of the fire that kindles it, or as ἀπὸ δᾳδὸς δᾷς, as one torch is lighted from another, which is the metaphor of Tatian, p. 145. which metaphors they have borrowed from Philo,‡ who, speaking of the spirit in Moses, derived upon the seventy elders, cautions us not to understand this to be done, κατὰ ἀποκοπὴν, καὶ διάζευξιν, by abscission, or disjunction, ἀλλ' οἷα γένοιτ' ἂν ἀπὸ πυρὸς, but as light from fire, at which if you light a thousand torches, it is not diminished. Accordingly the Nicene council style him Light of light, and hence they argue his consubstantiality with the Father, who produces not another essence, or substance, in the Son, but communicates the same essence to him. The like notions the Jews seem to have had of their Λόγος, or Wisdom, which is with them the same: for the book of Wisdom saith of her, that she is ἀπόῤῥοια τῆς τῶν παντοκράτορος δόξης εἰλικρινὴς, καὶ ἀπαύγασμα φωτὸς ἀϊδίου, an efflux of the sincere glory of the Almighty, and the splendour of eternal light, (vii. 25, 26.) And Philo§ saith of the Λόγος, that he is τὸ τοῦ ἀοράτου καὶ μεγίστου Θεοῦ περιφεγγέστατον καὶ περιαυγέστατον φῶς, the most illustrious and splendid light of the invisible and highest God. And this the Jews might better understand, if it were taken, as probably it was, from the glory that conducted them out of Egypt, and led them through the wilderness, and dwelt among them, first in the ark and tabernacle, and afterward in the temple. For it is observable,

First, That this δόξα, glory, or Schechinah, so often mentioned in the Old Testament, and in the writings of the Jews, was not the cloud itself, that being only the cover of it, but the light, fire, or splendour that issued from it. So Exod. xxiv. 16. And the glory of the Lord dwelt upon Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it (viz. the glory of the Lord) six days; and the sight of the glory of the Lord (when it broke out of the cloud after six days) was as burning fire on the top of the mount, in the sight of the people of Israel. And, Exod. xl. 34. Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. And, ver. 35. Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the house. 1 Kings viii. 10, 11. When the priests were come out of the holy place, the cloud filled the house of the Lord, so that the priests could not stand to minister, because of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord. Ezek. x. 4. And the house was filled with the cloud, and the court was full of the brightness of the glory of the Lord. Note, Secondly, That this glory is styled the glory of the Lord, not as being itself a Divine thing, or a ray of Divinity, but as being the symbol of God's glorious presence and abode where it appeared and resided. Thus the cloud, which consisteth of a dark part to cover the fire, or light, and a bright side by the appearance of the light, is called the cloud of Jehovah, Exod. iv. 38. Numb. x. 34. because God was gloriously present in it; or, as Rabbi Moses ben Nachman, on Exod. xl. 34. saith כי הכביד שוכן כתוך הענן, because the glory dwelt in the midst of it; whence God said, Lo, I come to thee in a thick cloud, Exod. xix. 9. I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy-seat, Lev. xvi. 2. He spake to Moses out of the cloud, Numb. vii. 89. And when he went to receive his commands, it is said, And Moses drew near to the thick darkness where God was, Exod. xx. 21. And, lastly, God is said to go before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, and by night in the pillar of fire, Exod. xiii. 21. Numb. xiv. 14.

Again, The ark in which this glory dwelt between the cherubims, is called, כבוד יי, the glory of the Lord, i. e. of that glorious Majesty who dwelt in it; whence the God of Israel is often styled the God that sitteth between the cherubims; because here, say the Jews,* he fixed his residence and presence, notwithstanding that he fills heaven and earth, and his Majesty is in heaven, and in all the earth. And when the ark was to be taken up and carried any whither, they sang thus, Arise, Jehovah, and let thine enemies be scattered, Numb. x. 35. Psal. lxviii. 2. and when it rested, thus, Give rest, Jehovah, to the many thousands of Israel; not styling the ark, Jehovah, but the glorious Majesty that dwelt in it, or him, and the ark of his strength, Psal. cxxxii. 8. where also it may be noted, that the Targums of Jerusalem and Jonathan read thus; Rise up, O Word of the Lord, and, Return, O Word of the Lord. And, Psal. xxiv. when the ark was brought from the house of Obed-Edom, and settled in Mount-Sion, and placed in the holy of holies, they sang thus, Lift up your heads, O ye gates, that the King of glory may come in; i. e. the Lord of hosts, who dwelt in the ark.

Accordingly our Lord Jesus, after his ascension, appeared still in or with the glory of the Lord. When he was transfigured on Mount Tabor, he was in this splendour, Matt. xvii. 2. styled by St. Peter, μεγαλοπρεπὴς δόξα, the magnificent glory, 2 Pet. i. 17. so he appeared to Stephen, who saw the glory of the Lord, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God, Acts vii. 55. so to Saul, when a light brighter than the sun shone round about him, and he heard a voice out of it, saying to him; I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest, Acts ix. 5. xxvi. 13. he being ὁ Κύριος τῆς δόξης, the Lord of glory, 1 Cor. ii. 8. (see Rev. i. 14, 15. ii. 18. xviii. 1. xix. 12.) and because of God's residence in this glory, the word Glory doth often signify God himself; as when we read of the throne and the house of Glory, i. e. of the glorious God. So Rabbi Joseph Abbo;† It is the manner of the Scripture, to call the visible glory and splendour of the Divine Majesty by the name of God. So Psal. cvi. 20. They turned their glory into the similitude of a calf: Jer. ii. 12. My people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit: and so the fathers seem to take the word glory here for the Divine glory. Note,

Thirdly, That from this glory, when God did any wondrous works of power, mercy, and judgment, there is said to be an emanation or shining-forth of glory; as when fire went forth from the glory of the Lord, to consume their sacrifices, in token of his favourable acceptance of them: so Lev. ix. 23, 24. The glory of the Lord appeared, and there came a fire out from before the Lord, and consumed upon the altar the burnt-offering, and the fat: so 2 Chron. vii. 1—3. accordingly they begged his favour in these words, Thou that dwellest between the cherubims, shine forth, Psal. lxxx. 1. (See Psal. l. 2. Deut. xxxiii. 2.) And to consume transgressors, viz. Nadab and Abihu, Lev. x. 2. and the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense, Numb. xvi. 35. (See Exod. xiv. 24, 25.) And in like manner may the Son be said to be ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης, an emanation or shining-forth from the glory of the Father; as being before all things, "prolatus à Patre sive generatus," begotten or brought forth by the Father, saith Irenæus, lib. ii. cap. 48. 4. 28. being always in him, but τῶν ὑλικῶν ξυμπάντων ἰδέα καὶ ἐνέργεια εἶναι προελθών, coming forth before all things, to be the idea and active power of all material beings: so Athenagoras, p. 10. The Word, whom the Father begat, ἐξερευξάμενος πρὸ πάντων, sending him forth before all things, who was always in God, and became λόγος προφορικὸς, when he would create the world. So Theophilus,* Whom he made προπηδᾷν, to leap from him; say Justin Martyr† and Tatian, He being in him before all ages; προελθὼν ὁ λόγος δημιουργίας, The Word coming forth, which is the cause of the creation, προγεννηθεὶς, δι' οὗ τὰ πάντα, and fore-begotten, by which all things were made, saith Clemens Alexandrinus;‡ The Word brought forth by the Father, and by that prolation generated, and therefore the Son of God, saith Tertullian.§

[6] Καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ, The impression, or representation of his subsistence.] The phrase signifies, saith Theodoret, that he subsists by himself, καὶ ἐν ἑαυτῷ δείκνυσι τοὺς πατρικοὺς χαρακτῆρας, and in himself represents the characters of his Father. Χαρακτὴρ, saith Phavorinus, is διατύπωσις δηλοῦσα τὴν ὑπόστασιν, a form or draught manifesting the substance whence it was taken. Ὑπόστασις, saith he, is the substance with the properties; οὐσία μετὰ τῶν ἰδιωμάτων, or συνδρομὴ τῶν περὶ ἑκάστου ἰδιωμάτων, a concourse of all the properties of any being; so that the character of his subsistence here is, according to him, a draught manifesting or exhibiting the substance and properties of God. According to the Greek commentators on the place, it is the same with our Lord's being in the form of God, before he took our nature on him. (Phil. ii. 6.) Accordingly, Wisdom is, by the author of the book that bears that name, styled ἔσοπτρον ἀκηλίδωτον τῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐνεργείας, καὶ εἰκὼν τῆς ἀγαθότητος αὐτοῦ, the unspotted mirror of the power or activity of God, and the image of his goodness, vii. 26. The Λόγος is, saith Philo,‖ ἀΐδιος εἰκὼν αὐτοῦ, the eternal image of God. The image of God,¶ δι' οὗ σύμπας ὁ κόσμος ἐδημιουργεῖτο, by which the whole world was made. And of the angel, which God sent before Israel, in whom God's name was, Exod. xxiii. 21. the Jews say he was, מלאך פניו, i. e. the angel of his face; because, saith R. M. Cerundensis, God's face, or glory, might be seen in him, or be exactly represented by him: yea, the government of the whole world was committed to him, and God had made him Lord over his whole house, and had made all things subject to him. Now these things so exactly agree with what the apostle here ascribes to Christ, that I could not think them unworthy to be noted here.

[7] Φέρων τε τὰ πάντα τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ, And holding all things by the word of his power.] Tho Hebrew word נשא is sometimes rendered φέρω, sustineo; as when it is said of Moses, Numb. xi. 14. 17. I cannot φέρειν, sustain, or bear, all this people. And, Deut. i. 9. 12. How can I alone, φέρειν τὸν κόπον, bear the labour of all this people? And of Christ, that φέρει, he bears the burden of our sin, Isa. liii. 4. Sometimes it signifies to govern; whence נשיא is sometimes rendered βασιλεὺς, a king; Gen. xxiii. 6. sometimes ἄρχων, a prince, as it is rendered above sixty times; sometimes ἀρχηγὸς, in the same sense, Numb. xiii. 3. xvi. 2. and sometimes ἡγούμενος, a governor, Josh. xiii. 22. 2 Chron. v. 1. and the Greek φέρειν signifies not only to sustain, but also, "suo arbitratu moderari," to govern at his will: now which of these two senses you put upon the words, it is not much material, since it is equally the effect of a Divine power to sustain and govern all things; whence this is, by the Jews, made the description of God himself, that he is a God, סביל כלא,* sustaining all things, the heavens, the earth, and the abyss, and bearing all people, מימרוה ברוח, by the Spirit of his Word. Accordingly, of the Λογος, Philo† often saith, That he is πηδαλιοῦχος καὶ κυβερνήτης πάντων, he that sits at the helm, and governs all things: that he is‡ ὁ συνέχων καὶ διοικῶν τὰ πάντα, he that containeth and dispenseth all things: that God, as a king and shepherd, rules according to law and right, and placing over us his first-begotten Son, § ὃς τὴν ἐπιμέλειαν τῆς ἱερᾶς ταύτης ἀγέλης οἷά τε μεγάλου βασιλέως ὕπαρχος διαδέχεται, who, as the pro-rex of the great King, takes care of the sacred flock.

It remains yet to be inquired, whether these things are spoken of our Lord, as acting here on earth, or purely of the Divine nature he had before the world was made. The Socinians, and some others, think all this relates to our Saviour, as acting here on earth, That he was the splendour of his Father's glory; because God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness hath shined into our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ: (2 Cor. iv. 6.) on which account the apostle saith, We have seen his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten Son of God: (John i. 14.) that he was the character of his substance, or his attributes, as he was the image of the invisible God, (Colos. i. 15.) in which his power, wisdom, holiness, love, and mercy, shined forth conspicuously: that he did φέρειν, præstare, perform all things by the word of his power; as he made the winds and seas calm, rebuked diseases, and cast out devils by his word. And Mr. Clerc is positive, that it must be the human nature which this sacred writer spake of, that the Jews might understand what he said was true: for that alone is visible; and nothing but what is such can be called the image or brightness of any thing among men. On the other hand, it is certain that all the fathers were of another mind; that when Philo and the ancient Jews spake thus of Wisdom, the Logos, the Angel of God's face, they understood all that they said of the Logos and Wisdom subsisting long before our Saviour's incarnation, and so thought this Logos the splendour and image of the Father, when he was not visible among men; as the apostle saith he was, when he was taken from them into heaven. It is certain also, that the preceding words, by whom also he made the worlds, cannot be spoken of Christ incarnate; and the words, upholding all things by the Word of his power, seem to import the same with that expression of the apostle, Colos. i. 17. By him all things consist. Moreover, could these things be attributed to our Lord Christ as acting in the flesh, yet have I proved, note on Colos. i. 15. that they must be ascribed to a Divine nature residing in him, or to God manifested in the flesh; and so, what Mr. Clerc says must be the human nature,—must (say I) be the Divine nature.

[8] Δι' ἑαυτοῦ καθαρισμὸν ποιησάμενος τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, When he had by himself purged our sins.] i. e. When he had made himself an expiatory sacrifice, to purge us from the guilt and punishment of our transgressions. To confirm this, let it be noted,

First, That this was the opinion of all nations, that their expiatory sacrifices were designed to take away the guilt of sin, and make atonement for it to an offended Majesty. For why are they still said, ἁγνίζειν, καθαρίζειν, "purgare, lustrare," to purge, and to make clean, but from their supposed virtue to purify them from the guilt of sin? and because sin is often represented in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, under the metaphors of uncleanness, filthiness, defilement, and pollution; therefore their sacrifices also are still represented as cleansing them from the guilt and the defilement of sin, and so making the pollution to pass from them. Hence the blood which made the atonement is styled, αἷμα καθαρισμοῦ, the blood of cleansing, or purgation. So Exod. xxx. 10. And Aaron shall make an atonement upon the horns of the incense-offering once a year, ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵματος καθαρισμοῦ καθαριεῖ αὐτό, with the blood of the sin-offering shall he make atonement upon it. And the sacrifice offered for sin is said to be offered καθαρίσαι, to purify them from it by an atonement: so, Lev. ix. 15. And he brought the people's offering, and took the goat which was the sin-offering, and slew it, καὶ ἐκαθάρισεν αὐτὸν, and offered it for sin. And, Lev. xvi. 30. in the great day of atonement, the priest shall make an atonement for you, καθαρίσαι ὑμᾶς, to cleanse you, that you may be clean from all your sins before the Lord, καὶ καθαρισθήσετε, and you shall be cleansed. So Job is said καθαρίζειν, to cleanse his sons from their supposed sins by a burnt-offering, i. 5. and so he inquires, vii. 21. Why dost thou not make καθαρισμὸν τῆς ἁμαρτίας μου; i. e. Why dost thou not forgive my sin? Since therefore it is very reasonable to conceive that the word καθαρίζειν, used in an epistle written to the Jews touching the expiatory sacrifice of Christ, is used in the sense in which they always took it, when applied in the Old Testament to sacrifices, which made atonement for their sins; it follows, that when the apostle here saith, Christ made καθαρισμὸν, a purgation of our sins by himself; and when he adds, That whereas the blood of the legal sacrifices did expiate εἰς τὴν τῆς σαρκὸς καθαρότητα, to the purification of the flesh, the blood of Christ, καθαριεῖ, shall much more expiate to the purification of the conscience from the guilt of sin, ix. 13. when he proceeds to say, that whereas under the law almost all things ἐν αἵματι καθαρίζεται, were purified by blood, and without shedding of blood there was no remission, ver. 22, 23. and thence argues, that the heavenly things must be purged with better sacrifices: he, in these cases, must speak of the blood of Christ as making atonement for our sins, by purging away the guilt of them, and averting the punishment due to us for them. (See the reading vindicated, Examen Millii.)

[9] Ver. 4. Διαφορώτερον ὄνομα, A more excellent name.] i. e. Not only title, but authority and superior excellency. So Phil. ii. 9. God hath highly exalted him, and given him ὄνομα τὸ ὑπὲρ πᾶν ὄνομα, a name above every name, i. e. the highest dignity and power, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow; i. e. that all creatures in heaven or earth, or under it, should own his power and dominion, ver. 10. Eph. i. 21. He hath set him at his right hand, above all principality, power, might, and dominion, καὶ παντὸς ὀνόματος, and every name. In both these senses Christ hath a more excellent name, viz. the name of his only Son, (ver. 5.) the name of God, (ver. 8.) and a more excellent authority and dignity, viz. that of sitting at the right hand of Majesty, (ver. 13.) and ruling all things by the word of his power; and this excellency he hath upon a better foundation, as being the maker of the world, &c. (ver. 2, 3.)

[10] Ver. 5. Υἱός μου εἶ σὺ, Thou art my Son.] R. Solomon* here saith, Our masters have interpreted all that is written in this Psalm of the king Messiah. And Saadias Gaon† doth, from these very words, prove the dominion and kingdom of the Messiah, because it is here said, I have set thee, my King, upon the holy hill of Sion; I will declare the command, Jehovah hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, &c. which also is apparent from the following words, I will give the heathen for thine inheritance, &c. (ver. 8.) and from the exhortation to all kings to submit to him. And that this was the ancient and received exposition of these words, confirmed by the Holy Ghost, we learn from this apostle, who disputing with the Jews touching our Saviour's resurrection, when all power in heaven and earth was given to him, Matt. xxviii. 18. he proves it from these very words, Acts xiii. 33. And again, speaking of his priesthood, which he was to exercise in heaven after his resurrection and ascension, he proves it to the same Jews from the same words, Heb. v. 5.

[11] Ἔσομαι αὐτῷ εἰς πατέρα, I will be to him a Father, &c.] These words are cited from 2 Sam. vii. 14. and they do promise to Solomon, the type of Christ, a kingdom to be established for ever, ver. 13. 16. and so to Christ the antitype, and eminently the Son of God, an everlasting kingdom and dominion. (See the Judgment of the Jewish Church, p. 61.)

Note also, That though the angels be sometimes in Scripture called the sons of God, Job i. 6. ii. 1. xxxviii. 7. God never said to any of them, I will be to him a Father, to protect him in his kingdom; much less, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee, to a kingdom; and so these passages, in the true and full extent of them, cannot agree to any of the angels.

[12] Ver. 6. Προσκυνησάτωσαν αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι Θεοῦ, Let all the angels of God worship him.] It is generally thought these words are cited from Psal. xcvii. 7. where in the Septuagint we have words very like them, viz. Προσκυνήσατε αὐτῷ, πάντες ἄγγελοι αὐτοῦ, Worship him, all his angels; in the Hebrew it is indeed כל אלהים, all ye elohim; but

* In Dan. vii. 13. † Vide Cart. Mell. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 5.

Aben Ezra's note is, that some think כל אלהים הם המלאכים, the word elohim always denotes the angels: and Kimchi saith,* the Hebrews did expound this Psalm, of what was to come to pass in the days of the Messiah. In the Septuagint it is styled a Psalm of David, ὅτε ἡ γῆ αὐτῷ καθίστατο, when the land was established to him, or when he was made master of all those countries which God designed to be the inheritance of Israel, and therefore may very probably be referred to the Son of David at his resurrection, or his coming again into the world, that being the time when all power in heaven and earth was given to him, when he was solemnly inaugurated, and instated in his spiritual and heavenly kingdom, and the government was upon his shoulders, and he sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high, ver. 3.

But it is observable, that these words are expressly to be found, Deut. xxxii. 43. as here they are cited: and it is certain from St. Paul, that God there speaks of the times when the Messiah was to be preached unto the gentiles; for that the gentiles should glorify God for his mercy, he proves from these words of the same verse, Rejoice, ye gentiles, with his people, Rom. xv. 9, 10. Accordingly, the Jews expound many of the words of Moses he recorded. Thus Jonathan on ver. 39. saith thus, When Memra d' Jehovah, the Word of the Lord, shall reveal himself to redeem his people, he shall say to all people, See, I am he that am, and have been, and shall be; (see Heb. xiii. 8.) I by my Word kill and make alive; I smite the people Israel, and I will heal them in the end of the days. On ver. 40. the Targum of Jerusalem saith thus, I live במימרי by my Word for ever; that of Jonathan, I have prepared in the heavens בית שכנתי, the house of my Majesty; that is, saith R. Solomon, מקם שכינתי, the place of my Majesty; expressions often used by Philo† to signify the Λόγος, as when he saith, οἶκον ἔχειν τὸν ἑαυτοῦ λόγον; God hath his house, viz. his own Word, and that‡ ὁ θεῖος Λόγος, the Divine Word in his place; and upon ver. 43. Jonathan ben Uziel paraphraseth thus, He with his Word will expiate for the land, and for his people, viz. as the high-priest did on the great day of expiation. The other words, He will render vengeance to his enemies, and make his arrow drunk with the blood of the slain, are fit expressions of Christ's exercise of his kingly government over his enemies, by which he was to break them with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces as a potter's vessel. (Psal. ii. 9.) The import of these words therefore may be this, When God was to introduce his first-born again into the world by the resurrection, and give him power and dominion over all things in heaven and earth, he said, Let all the angels of God worship him, and own him as their Lord and Maker. Dr. Owen saith, this cannot be applied to the resurrection, because Christ did not leave the world, or go out of it at his death; but to this it may be answered, that going hence, (Psal. xxix. 13.) and going out of the world, (1 Cor. v. 10.) are common expressions to signify death. And, secondly, God being said to beget Christ, when he raised him from the dead, (Psal. ii. 7. Acts xiii. 33. Heb. v. 5.) and gave him power over all things in heaven and earth, i. e. over all the world, this may be fitly called a second introduction of him into the world. Thirdly, Whereas he saith, that these words προσκυνῆσαι αὐτῷ, &c. cannot be taken from Deut. xxxii. 43. because there are no such words in the original, and it is absurd to think the apostle should cite that from the Scripture as the word and testimony of God, which indeed is not in it, nor was ever spoken by God, for this and for two other reasons offered by the reverend Dr. Hammond, note on Psal. xcvii. 7. I think it more reasonable to conceive these words were taken from the Psalms.

[13] Ver. 7. Πρὸς τοὺς ἀγγέλους.] The Psalmist speaking, Psal. civ. 4. not to, but of, the angels, it is necessary to translate these words as our version doth; Of the angels he saith; and as the Hebrew אל, so the Greek πρὸς, is oft of the same import with de and περὶ. He spake this parable πρὸς αὐτοὺς, concerning them, Luke xix. 20. Mark xii. 12. πρὸς δὲ τὸν Ἰσραὴλ, but of Israel he saith, Rom. x. 21. πρὸς ὃν, of whom we speak, Heb. iv. 13. So Neh. ii. 18. He spake to you of the good hand of God upon him, καὶ πρὸς τοὺς λόγους τοῦ βασιλέως, and of the words of the King. Of the particle אל, see Noldius, p. 458.

[14] Ver. 9. Ὁ Θεὸς, ὁ Θεός σου, God even thy God.] For Christ is God of God, according to the Nicene symbol. Hence do the primitive fathers thus distinguish betwixt him and the Father; that God the Father is that God above whom there is no other God; whereas Christ is God of God; and as to that, inferior to God the Father: so Justin Martyr* and Irenæus. That this Psalm was spoken of the Messiah, is evident from the Targum on the place, which saith, Because thou, O king Messiah, hast loved justice, &c. And on ver. 3. Thy fairness, O king Messiah, exceeds the sons of men. To this purpose, see Rabbi Solomon and Aben Ezra on this Psalm.

[15] Ver. 10.] That this Psalm hath relation to the times of the Messiah, we learn from the Chaldee paraphrast, which saith on ver. 16. Zion is builded by the Word of the Lord; and from the creation of a new people to praise the Lord, ver. 18. which the Jews themselves expounded of the world to come, or the state of the church under the Messiah; and, thirdly, from the calling of the gentiles, mentioned ver. 15. So the heathens shall fear the name of the Lord; and all the kings of the earth thy glory: and, ver. 22. When the people are gathered together, and the kingdoms to serve the Lord. (See the Judgment of the Jewish Church, p. 38.) That these things are here spoken of, and applied to Christ, is also evident, 1. from the connective particle καὶ, which knits this to the former citation, and makes it to run thus: Of the Son it is said, Thy throne, O God, is for ever, καὶ, and of him it is also said, Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundations of the earth. 2. From the scope of the apostle, which, both before and after, is to bring testimonies to prove the excellency of the Messiah, and the truth of what he had asserted of him, (ver. 2, 3.) and therefore he must pursue the same design here. And, 3. from the concession of the Socinians upon the place, that the latter words, which speak of the destruction of the heavens and the earth, belong to Christ. Now these words, they shall perish, but thou remainest, are plainly spoken of the same person who founded the earth in the beginning; and therefore must equally belong to Christ. But here it is objected:

Obj. That if the author of this Epistle had indeed believed that Christ was the creator of the world, to what purpose doth he spend so much time to prove him more excellent than the angels? For who can doubt that the Creator is more excellent than his creatures?

Ans. First, He doth not absolutely go about to prove him more excellent than the angels, but comparatively, so far more excellent as the titles given him in Scripture shewed that he exceeded them; and that was as much as the Creator doth exceed his creatures.

Secondly, I have shewed, note on the second and third verses, that the apostle had asserted, not only Christ's dignity, as heir of all things, and so succeeding in his Father's kingdom, but also that he was therefore Lord of all things, because he made the world, and therefore was obliged, in his testimonies, to prove both these things; as he doth in most of the testimonies produced.

Thirdly, As there were then divers heretics, who ascribed the creation of this visible world to angels, and not to Christ; so also were there divers Jews, who held that they were God's ministers, or συνεργοὶ, coworkers, in the creation of the world; and that God said to them, Let us make man, Gen. i. 26. Now against these Jews and heretics, the apostle very appositely proves, that the creation of the world was not to be ascribed to those angels, who, they say, gave the law, ii. 2. but to that Jesus from whom we have received the gospel. Of the sayings of the Jews, concerning the assistance of the angels in framing man, see note on ii. 5. and Maimonides, More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 6. Of Simon Magus, Irenæus doth inform us, lib. i. cap. 20. that he held, that his Ennoia produced "angelos et potestates a quibus et mundum hunc factum esse dixit," angels and powers by whom the Word was made: that Menander also held, "mundum factum ab angelis," that the world was made by angels, cap. 21. lib. ii. cap. 9. that Cerinthus held, that the world was made by some separate virtues, inferior to God, lib. ii. cap. 22, 23. and that the world was not made by Christ, but that he rather came "ad dissolvenda omnia opera ejus Dei, qui mundum fecit," to dissolve all the works of that God, who made the world: and, lastly, Χριστῷ ὁμογενεῖς ἀγγέλους συνπροβεβλῆσθαι, That the angels were of the same rank with Christ, and produced together with him. All which vain fancies gave just occasion to the apostle to assert, that Christ was thus superior to the angels, and the creator both of them and of the world. Accordingly, the Targum of Jerusalem gives this description of the Word of the Lord, that it is he who said to the world, Be, and it was; and who will say unto it, Be, and it shall be. Which words the Targum of B. Uziel (in Exod. iii. 14.) applies to the Lord himself.

[16] Ver. 13. Κάθου ἐκ δεξιῶν μου, Sit thou on my right hand.] That these words were spoken of the Messiah, appears, 1. from the two Targums on this Psalm, both declaring, that this was spoken Bememreh, in or to his Word. That is, saith R. Saadias Gaon, on Dan. vii. 13. the Messiah, our righteousness; as it is written, Psal. cx. 1. The Lord said to my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand. R. Moses Haddarson says, (Beresch. Rabba, in Gen. xviii. 1.) Hereafter God will cause the Messiah to sit on his right hand; as it is said, Psal. cx. 1. The Lord said unto my Lord, &c. Midrash Tehillim, on Psal. ii. 7. saith, The affairs of the Messiah are set forth in the hagiography in these words, Psal. cx. The Lord said. And again, R. Joden on Psal. xviii. 35. in the name of R. Chija, said, That in the age of the Messiah, the blessed God will set the king Messiah on his right hand; as it is written, The Lord said to my Lord. And though on this Psalm he expounds the words, first of Abraham, whom they introduce complaining that God has placed his Son on his right hand, and him only on his left; yet presently follow these words, And so he saith to the Messiah. And R. Obadiah not only saith, The Psalmist composed this Psalm of the Messiah, but adds what illustrates ver. 14. That God farther said, Thou shalt sit on my right hand, and the ministering angels on my left. (See more in Cartw. Mellificium, p. 2969.) And since our blessed Saviour confounded the scribes and pharisees with this inquiry, How the Messiah could be the son of David, since David here in spirit calls him Lord? Matt. xxii. 42. it is evident this was then the received exposition of these words.

[17] Ver. 14. Μέλλοντας κληρονομεῖν σωτηρίαν, Who shall be heirs of salvation.] i. e. By right of sonship; for if sons, then heirs, Rom. viii. 17. If a Son, then κληρονόμος Θεοῦ, an heir of God through Christ, Gal. iv. 7. Heirs according to the promise, Gal. iii. 29. For to as many as believed, he gave power to be the sons of God, John i. 12.

CHAP. II.

1. THEREFORE we (knowing the excellency of the person speaking now to us in the gospel above all other prophets, and above those angels which were employed in delivering the law of Moses) ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard (from the Son of God), [1] lest at any time we should let them slip (out of our memory).

2. For if the word [2] spoken by angels (from Sinai) was steadfast (and by God's dealing with the Jews confirmed), and every (wilful) transgression and disobedience (of it) received a just recompence of reward (the atonements of the law being only for sins of ignorance and error, v. 2. and cutting off being the punishment for wilful sins, as being acts of rebellion against God their governor);

3. How shall we escape (the Divine wrath), if we (Christians) neglect [3] so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord (Christ himself), and (after) was [4] confirmed to us by them that heard him;

4. God also bearing them witness both with signs and wonders (as he did to Moses delivering the law to the Jews), and [5] with divers miracles, and gifts (or distributions) of the Holy Ghost, (performed) according to his own will.

5. [6] For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection [7] the world to come, whereof we speak (but unto Christ, now crowned with honour and glory, ver. 9. to whom all power both in heaven and earth is given).

6. [8] But one in a certain place (viz. David, Psal. viii. 4.) testified, saying, Lord, what is man, that thou art (so) mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou (so) visitest him?

7. Thou madest him (but) a little lower than the angels; [9] thou crownedst him with glory and honour, and didst set him over the works of thine hands. (Psal. viii.)

8. Thou hast put all things (and so the world to come) in subjection under his feet. For in (saying) that he (hath) put all (things) in subjection under him, (it is manifest that) he left nothing (besides himself, 1 Cor. xv. 27.) that is not put under him. But now (as for Adam and his posterity, of whom these things were primarily spoken) we see not yet all things put under him:

9. But we see Jesus (the second Adam), who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, that he by the grace of God might taste death for every man, (already) [10] crowned with glory and honour (and therefore know that all things are, and shall be subjected to him.

10. To this Jesus, I say, who by the grace of God tasted [11] death for every man:) for it became him for whom are (were) all things, and by whom are (were) all things (ordered), in (his design of) bringing many sons to glory, to (effect this, by) mak-(ing) the Captain of their salvation [12] perfect through sufferings (τελειῶσαι, to consecrate him to that work, by sufferings).

11. For [13] both he (our priest) who sanctifieth (i. e. by his oblation purgeth us from sin) and they who are sanctified (or purged from it) are all of one (original and nature): for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren,

12. Saying, [14] (Psal. xxii. 22.) I will declare thy name unto (among) my brethren, in the midst of the church (or congregation) will I sing praise to thee.

13. And again, (Isa. viii. 17.) [15] I will put my trust in him. And again, (ver. 18.) Behold I and the children which God hath given me.

14. Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through (the) death (they had deserved, and he suffered in their stead), he might destroy (evacuate and frustrate) him [16] who had the power of death, that is, the devil;

15. And (might) deliver them (from the sting of it), who [17] through fear of (the) death (threatened to the posterity of Adam, without any promise of a resurrection) were all their lifetime subject unto bondage.

16. For verily he [18] took not on him the nature of (οὐ ἐπιλαμβάνεται, he laid not hold of, he helped not the fallen) angels; but he took on him (Gr. he laid hold of) [19] the seed of Abraham.

17. Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like to (these) his brethren, that he might be a merciful (high-priest to them, under all their sufferings,) and (a) faithful high-priest (exactly performing his priestly office) in things pertaining to God, (so as) to make reconciliation [20] for the sins of the people.

18. For in that he himself hath (actually) suffered [21] being tempted, he is (become) [22] able (and willing) to succour them who (at any time) are tempted (i. e. exposed to sufferings).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. ΜΗ' ποτε παραῤῥυῶμεν.] Τουτέστι, μὴ ἐκπέσωμεν, Lest we fall off from them. So Œcumenius, Theophylact, and Phavorinus, which sense agrees well with the scope of this Epistle: but the sense given by our translation, is also very good and proper: for in this sense παραῤῥυεῖν is used, in those words of Solomon; My son, μὴ παραῤῥυῇς, τήρησον δὲ ἐμὴν βουλὴν, be not forgetful of, but keep in mind, or lay up in thy heart, my counsel, Prov. iii. 21. So the wise man interprets himself, in the beginning of that chapter: My son, forget not my precepts, but let thy heart keep my words, ver. 1. So Origen,* speaking of the festivals of the church, the Lord's-day, Easter, Pentecost, saith, The common people had need of those sensible admonitions, or memorials of the blessings then celebrated, ἵνα μὴ τέλεον παραῤῥυῇ, that they may not entirely slip out of their memories: and this translation and interpretation is confirmed from the word ἀμελεῖν, ver. 3. which signifies, to be unmindful of this great salvation.

[2] Ver. 2. Ὁ δι' ἀγγέλων λαληθεὶς λόγος, The word spoken by angels.] Maimonides saith expressly,† "Non invenies Deum ullum opus fecisse, nisi per manum alicujus angeli;" God doth no work but by the hand of some angel. To confirm this, he cites that passage of their wise men, that God does nothing without consulting before the family above. And that in Bereschith Rabba,‡ Wheresoever it is said in Scripture, ויהוה, and Jehovah did this or that, "ibi intelligitur ipse, et domus Judicii ejus," there we must understand, that all things are done by him; "mediantibus angelis," by the mediation of angels. Josephus § saith, The law was given, τοῦ Θεοῦ διαλεγομένου πρὸς αὐτοὺς περὶ τῶν πρακτέων, by God declaring to them what they ought to do: and yet he introduces Herod, proving that legates, or ambassadors, were sacred, from this, that ‖ the Jews had received the choicest of their laws from God by angels, i. e. by messengers, or legates, as that name imports. Philo¶ is express, that God spake the law, δι' αὐτοῦ μόνου, οὐ προσχρησάμενος ἀλλῳ, by himself, using no other; but yet, saith the same Philo, he did this, κελεύσας ἠχὴν ἀόρατον ἐν ἀέρι δημιουργηθῆναι, commanding an invisible sound to be formed in the air. And to whom could this command be directed, but to some of the angels then attending on him? He therefore seems only to mean, that the decalogue was administered by God himself speaking to the people, and not by Moses the mediator betwixt God and them, as the residue of his laws were. For in his book de Somniis, he observes, that the holy Scripture speaks of those dreams, as, Θεόπεμπτοι, sent from God, which proceed, διὰ τῶν ὑποφητῶν αὐτοῦ καὶ ὀπαδῶν ἀγγέλων, from his ministers and attendants the angels, p. 461. He adds, that these messengers are employed in bringing τὰς τοῦ πατρὸς ἐπικελεύσεις τοῖς ἐκγόνοις, the commands of the Father to his sons: and that this is done, because we cannot bear his immediate chastisements, nor yet his excellent benefits, p. 455. F.

As for the fathers, they seem universally to conspire in this doctrine, that the apostle speaks here, and Gal. iii. 19. περὶ τῶν διακονησαμένων τῷ λόγῳ ἀγγέλων, of the angels ministering to the delivery of the law. So Origen;†† so Chrysostom on this place; Theodoret on Gal. iii. 19. Œcumenius and Theophylact. Origen,‡‡ speaking of Jerusalem, saith, The angels have now deserted her, who before were always helpful to her: Δι' ὧν διετάγη καὶ ὁ Μώσεως νόμος, by whom also the law of Moses was ordained; it being, saith the apostle, ordained by angels. The same is the opinion of St. Jerome on Gal. iii. 19.

And though Jehovah speaks to Moses in and from Mount Sinai, and from him the Jews received the law; yet that he used the ministry of angels in the dispensing of it, is evident from many passages of the New Testament. For,

First, St. Stephen speaketh thus unto the Jews, You have received the law, εἰς διαταγὰς (κατὰ διαταγὰς, Œcumenius) ἀγγέλων, by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it. (Acts vii. 53.) Now when he was aggravating their guilt, in violating this law, from the consideration of the dignity of the persons who were by God employed in giving it to them, he would not have omitted the Son of God, or the Λόγος, the principal actor, and spoken of these inferior ministering spirits, could he both truly, and according to the then present notion of the Jews, have said it was the Λόγος, who by his Father was employed in giving the law. For though most of the fathers say, the Λόγος, or the Son of God, appeared to Moses and the patriarchs, and others under the Old Testament, they* all agree in this, that he appeared then as ἄλλος, one that sustained another person; or, as the legate, the ambassador; or, as ὑπουργὸς, i. e. the minister of God the Father, as also Philo still saith.

Secondly, When the apostle Paul affirms, after St. Stephen, that the law was, διαταγεὶς δι' ἀγγέλων, administered by angels, (Gal. iii. 19.) he cannot reasonably be supposed to mean only, that it was delivered, inter angelos, between angels; or, by God attended with his angels. For (1.) as by is the proper import of the word διὰ; so it is very rarely, if at all, that it is rendered, inter, between, or among: it is so rendered indeed, by our translators, 2 Tim. ii. 2. but with the note in the margin, by, to shew they thought it might there bear that sense, as it doth, thus; The things which thou hast heard from me (and which have been confirmed), διὰ πολλῶν μαρτύρων, by many witnesses, commit to faithful men. (2.) Seeing here the word spoken, δι' ἀγγέλων, being put in opposition to the word spoken, διὰ Χριστοῦ, by Christ, shews that διὰ retains its proper sense, and must be rendered, by angels; why should we put another sense on the same particle used, Gal. iii. 19. by the same apostle, with respect to the same subject?

Thirdly, That the word spoken by angels here, respects the law in general, and not only the threatenings made by the prophets, to whom the Λόγος sent his angels, to bring back the people of Israel from their wickedness, is also evident from these words: for (1.) the word spoken by angels here seems to be the same with the word administered by angels, Acts vii. 53. Gal. iii. 12. Now that was the law, say both St. Stephen and St. Paul. (2.) It was ὁ Λόγος βέβαιος, the Word made firm, by the miracles done by Moses to establish it, as was the gospel by more glorious miracles: the miracles done by Moses being only σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα, signs and wonders; whereas the gospel was confirmed also by divers powers, and distributions of the Holy Ghost, ver. 4. (3.) As the apostle saith here, Every transgression of this word received a just recompence of reward; so he saith, x. 28. He that despiseth Moses's law, died without mercy; where the argument being in sense the same, demonstrates that the work spoken here must be the law of Moses. (4.) We are properly said to transgress, and disobey a law; but as for threatenings, though we may disregard, we are not properly said to transgress them. In fine, I can answer the argument of Schlictingius on the place, "That God, in person, could not give the law from Mount Sinai; since, were it given by God himself, it must, on that account, be preferred before the gospel;" by saying, The comparison is here made only betwixt God speaking to the Jews by the ministry of angels, and the same God speaking to us by his Son, which supposes God the Father to be the supreme author both of the law and the gospel; asserting only, that his ambassadors, or ministers, in the one, were much inferior to his ambassador, and his great Prophet, by whom the other was revealed: but I am not able to resist the evidence of his second argument, that "the opposition put between the word spoken by angels* to them, and the gospel delivered to us by the Son of God, will not permit us to own, that the law was given to the Jews by the same Son of God, seeing that supposition wholly destroys the force of the apostle's argument in this place." But then I do not think that any angel was so employed in the delivery of the law, as to take upon him the person of God; or, that any creature said, I am the Lord thy God, &c. but only, that the Divine Majesty, there present with his thousands of angels, (Deut. xxxiii. 2. Psal. lxviii. 17.) made some of them his ministers to form the voice, by which he said, I am the Lord thy God, &c. And it may probably be conjectured, that wherever there is mention of an angel and Jehovah together, or any worship or excellency specified which is proper to God, there was an appearance of the Schechinah, or Divine Majesty, conjunct with the angel. Dr. Lightfoot, in his note on Acts vii. 53. and in his sermon on the text, solves this objection, by saying, that by angels there, and here, and Gal. iii. 19. we are not to understand angels, properly so called, but God's messengers; i. e. the prophets and teachers who are styled angels, Mal. ii. 7. iii. 1. But this seems a very forced exposition of these words: for (1.) after St. Stephen had said, (Acts vii. 53.) that the Jews had slain those prophets, which had told them of the coming of that Just One, he adds this farther aggravation of their guilt, (ver. 53.) that they had received the law by the disposition of angels, and had not kept it, plainly distinguishing these angels from the prophets. St. Paul also saith, the law was given by angels in, or through, or by the hand of a mediator, that is, of their great prophet Moses, plainly again distinguishing those angels from that prophet; when therefore the same St. Paul saith, the law was spoken not by an angel, to wit, Moses, but by angels, in the plural number, it is most reasonable to interpret his words to the same sense, especially considering his inference from these words, (ver. 5.) For God hath not subjected to angels the world to come, of which we now speak.

faithful from persecutions, at or after the destruction of Jerusalem, should here be represented as that great salvation, which began to be spoken by the Lord, was testified to by the apostles, and even by God himself, by so great miracles, is incredible. No, sure, our Saviour brought life and immortality to light by the gospel, 2 Tim. ii. 11. his apostles testified to us eternal life, 1 John i. 2. and this is the testimony of God himself, that he hath given us eternal life, and that life is in his Son, 1 John v. 11. (See note on iv. 3.)

[4] Ἐβεβαιώθη εἰς ἡμᾶς, Was confirmed to us,] Jews; not to us apostles, by whom it was confirmed. Vain therefore is the argument taken from these words, to prove St. Paul was not the author of this Epistle; because the gospel was not confirmed to him by them that heard Christ, he receiving it by immediate revelation from him. (Gal. i. 12.) And usual is it with St. Paul, in this and other Epistles, to say we; when not he himself, but only they he speaks to, or of, must be understood. So vi. 1. Let us go on to perfection. (See x. 25. xii. 1. Rom. iii. 5. 7. 1 Cor. x. 8, 9. 2 Cor. vii. 1. Eph. ii. 3. 1 Thess. iv. 15. Tit. iii. 3.)

[5] Ver. 4. Ποικίλαις δυνάμεσι, With divers miracles.] Because (saith Theodoret) the law was confirmed by miracles, the apostle thought it necessary to shew the gospel was in this superior to it, as it was in these two respects:

1. That the apostles and disciples of our Lord abounded in these miraculous dispensations which confirmed the gospel, as well as Christ himself.

2. That Moses chiefly wrought σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα, signs and wonders; whereas the δυνάμεις, powers and distributions of the Holy Ghost, here mentioned, were the proper confirmations of the gospel-dispensation. For here are four things mentioned, which will admit of a distinct consideration; the first and second are, σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα, signs and wonders, which refer to portentous actions done in the heavens, as when the sun stood still; in the earth, as when it opened to swallow up Dathan and Abiram; in the air, as when it was turned into darkness; in the waters, as when they were turned into blood: and these were often wrought by Moses and others under the Old Testament, and still are styled σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα. So Exod. vii. 2. πληθυνῶ τὰ σημεῖά μου καὶ τέρατα, I will multiply my signs and wonders in the land of Egypt. And again, ver. 9. Deut. iv. 32. He took his people out of that nation, ἐν σημείοις καὶ τέρασι, by signs and wonders: shewing, σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα μεγάλα, signs and great wonders upon Pharaoh, and all his house, vi. 22. vii. 19. xi. 3. xxvi. 8. xxix. 3. And there arose not a prophet like unto Moses, ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς σημείοις καὶ τέρασιν, in all the signs and wonders which God sent him to do in the land of Egypt, Deut. xxxiv. 11. (See Nehem. ix. 10. Psal. cxxxiv. 9. Jer. xxxii. 42.) Thus Nabuchodonosor declares, σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα, the signs and wonders which the most high God had shewed him, Dan. iv. 2. And Darius saith of him, vi. 27. ποιεῖ σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, He doth signs and wonders in the heavens, and on the earth.

Moreover, σημεῖα and δυνάμεις are used in the New Testament, with relation to the miracles wrought by the apostles upon others, in casting out devils, making the blind to see, and the lame to walk, and healing all manner of diseases; now none of these things were done by Moses, and very rarely by any of the prophets. And, lastly, as for the distributions of the Holy Ghost, consisting in the internal gift of wisdom, knowledge, faith, the gift of tongues, and the interpretation of them; these were peculiar to the latter days, that is, the times of the Messiah.

[6] Ver. 5.] For explication of these words, let it be observed,
